ii. THE GODS.—(A) Historical development of the power of particular gods.—(1) We have already remarked that the Egyptian religion was not a unity. Nor did it form a concentrated system any more than the Egyptian State. The latter had originated in early times from a number of small States, which either peaceably or as the result of conquest had become united under a single ruler, without thereby making a complete surrender of their former independence. To these ancient petty States corresponded the later so-called nomes (Egyp. hesp), of which there were generally reckoned 22 for Upper and 20 for Lower Egypt. The number underwent not infrequent variations, adjacent nomes being sometimes united for administrative purposes, while at other times particular nomes might be partitioned owing to rights of succession or other causes. Nevertheless, these nomes, especially in Upper Egypt, continued to be the same on the whole from the Pyramid era down to that of the Greeks and Romans.

The nomes were independent from not only a political but a religious point of view. In their principal city stood the temple of the chief god of the nome, and here the conception and the worship of this higher being developed themselves independently of the religious development in other parts of Egypt. The cultus, however, was not confined to this nome god; worship was offered in his temple to other gods as well. In this way groups were readily formed, a goddess and a son or a larger family being assigned to the god, or the latter was conceived as the supreme deity, with a circle of inferior gods surrounding him. Nor did his cult exclude the worship of other gods in other localities of the same nome or in other temples of the same metropolis. The nome god was simply regarded in general as the tutelary lord who had the first claim upon the inhabitants in all specially important matters, and, above all, when their common interests were concerned.

(2) The authority of the nome god was not so firmly established but that it might be overshadowed, even in his own nome, by other deities, although such an experience was relatively rare. Thus the god of the Thinite nome was originally Ȧnḥer. At a later period, Osiris, the god of the city of Abydos, in the same nome, gained such preponderance that he stepped into the place of Ȧnḥer in the nome cult as well. In the Thebaid the principal rôle appears to have been played at first by Mont (Ment), the god of the ancient metropolis Hermonthis. With the advance of Thebes and the growing importance of its temple of Amon, the latter became from the 12th dynasty onwards the principal deity. But as the power of Thebes waned more and more during the Saitic period, the prestige of its god also sank in the nome, and the significance of Mont once more revived.

In other instances nome gods were able to extend their worship beyond the limits of their own province. Thus shrines were occasionally built to their own gods by men who had migrated from one nome to another. If these shrines were richly endowed, other Egyptians might be led to attach themselves to the newly introduced cult. As far as we can trace the matter back, in such cases the gods who from of old had been in possession were always tolerant, and took no umbrage at the introduction of the new divinities so long as these made no claim to supremacy over themselves. But cults of this kind, whose introduction was due to private persons, had no importance outside a limited sphere. The authority of a nome god increased in far greater measure when the princes of his province raised themselves to the rank of Pharaohs. The god had procured for his prince the supreme power in Egypt, and thereby showed that he was mightier than the other nome gods. The maintenance of his cult was consequently the primary duty of the royal house and of all the courtiers and officials connected with it, not indeed in the sense that an officially prescribed State cult was introduced, but one that had the force of consuetudinary propriety in view of the religious notions which had been cherished from olden times by the now reigning Pharaonic house. But similar considerations would gain over other Egyptians also to the new cult, and move the various priestly colleges to grant it admittance into their temples. This advance in the honours paid to some particular god, followed by a decline when the power of the dynasty from that nome decayed, may still be traced, by aid of the inscriptions, in the case of Amon, Bast, and other Divine figures. With other gods the change of prestige has taken place prior to the commencement of the literary tradition accessible to us. In primitive times, for instance, great significance was possessed by the jackal-headed god Ȧp-uat, who was ultimately regarded as the nome god of Siut. His image was borne upon a standard before the king, and the jackal's tail, in allusion to his cult, was, down to the latest times, worn by the Pharaohs, attached to their girdle behind, as a symbol of rule. In the course of Egyptian history, however, Ȧp-uat receded quite into the background in the cult. In the Old Empire he still held the place of one of the chief gods of the dead, in the Middle Empire even this prestige begins to decay, and under the New Empire in almost every necropolis his place is taken by another jackal-god, Anubis, who, in the train of Osiris, the god of the dead, obtains growing significance in the conceptions of the under world.

(3) In all these instances a political development of Egypt, originally quite apart from religious considerations, had brought with it as a logical consequence a change of faith, without the co-operation of any external compulsion on the part of the State. Once only was it otherwise, namely, when Amenophis IV. sought at one bound forcibly to raise to the chief place the cult of Ȧten, the solar disc, worshipped as one of the natural bodies—a cult which under his predecessors had been slowly growing in importance. The rest of the gods were to take only a secondary place, if indeed the attempt was not made, as in the case of Amon, to prevent their worship altogether, and to damage the god by destroying his name in inscriptions, etc. This violent revolution had no success. After the death of the innovator, even his own family speedily lost interest in his god. The temples consecrated to Ȧten were deserted and destroyed, his worship survived in only a few places, and even there to only an insignificant extent.

(4) In order that the heavenly figures should enjoy Divine authority, it was not necessary for them to be the chief gods in one of the nomes of Egypt; the enormous number of Egyptian divinities is itself sufficient to exclude such a supposition. Some of them even enjoyed widespread regard throughout Egypt, without ever having possessed any such local authority. Some even of the chief deities of the whole country have no place among the nome gods, as for instance the goddess of Truth Maāt, the god Nefer-Tum, the Nile god Ḥāpi, and, above all, the principal god of historical Egypt, Rā. This sun-god was indeed specially worshipped at Heliopolis, a city which was called after him by the sacred name Pa-Rā, 'house of Rā,' but the nome god here was originally not Rā but Ȧtum (Tum). The latter is likewise a sun-god, who even in later times always enjoyed veneration side by side with Rā, an attempt being frequently made to represent him as a partial form of Rā, namely, the god of the evening sun. For his veneration over the whole of Egypt, Rā is indebted, accordingly, not to any local authority possessed by him,—as a city Heliopolis never had any very great importance,—but to the doctrine concerning him and to the development of religious conceptions in the Nile valley.

In the time of the early dynasties, whose power was concentrated in Upper Egypt, and which, it would appear, succeeded only gradually in conquering the Delta, Rā plays no considerable rôle. Even under the 4th dynasty, which had its residence at Memphis, not far from Heliopolis, he is still quite in the background. With the accession of the 5th dynasty these conditions are changed. A fabulous story, dating from c. 2000 B.C., makes the first three kings of this dynasty to have been the offspring of the god Rā by the wife of a priest of Rā in an otherwise unknown place of the name of Sachebu. How old this legend is we cannot tell, but it is certain that from the 5th dynasty onwards all the Pharaohs give themselves out to be sons of Rā. Nevertheless, the god does not at first appear very frequently in the inscriptions, although king Rā-en-user of the 5th dynasty already caused a great sanctuary to be erected to him at Abusir (cf. Aegyp. Ztschr. xxxvii. 1 ff., xxxviii. 94 ff., xxxix. 91 ff.). It is not till the time of the Middle Empire that Rā is mentioned with ever-increasing frequency, and that the conception of the specially close relation between deity and sun begins at the same time to influence the conception formed of other gods. This leads, for instance, in the case of the Theban Amon, to a complete amalgamation of the old god of Thebes with the sun-god—a result which finds outward expression in the usual name for this deity under the New Empire, namely Amon-Rā. But, even when this new name is not employed, the simple name Amon is always during this period to be understood of the deity who had become a solar one. The same happened with other Divine figures. Sometimes the amalgamation is indicated by the name (Sebek-Rā, and the like), at other times the old name is retained, and it is merely the conception of the god that is influenced by solar notions. In the first millennium B.C. practically the whole of the more important Egyptian gods became more or less clearly defined sun-gods, and processes of thought derived from the solar faith were allowed to influence even the conceptions of the gods of the under world who were connected with the Osirian doctrine of immortality (see below, p. 195^b).

But, although the nature of the Egyptian deities was in later times prevailingly solar, we must be careful not to carry inferences from this back to earlier periods. We can trace the progress of the process by aid of the monuments, and are not at liberty offhand to place the result at the beginning of the development of Egyptian religion.

(5) In consequence of the independence of the various nome gods, the doublets already referred to were bound to arise in the circle of the higher powers. In his own district each nome god is at once creator, preserver, ruler of the world, quite untrammelled by similar pretensions on the part of his Divine neighbour. The Egyptians never attempted to remove the logical contradiction that thus arose. Quite the reverse! In taking over a foreign god to a new nome, they calmly took over also his titles and his myths, quite unconcerned that in this way a Doppelgänger to the old nome god found entrance into the nome. The only concession occasionally made in favour of more systematized thought was that deities of this kind were declared to be essentially identical or emanations of the same Divine notion, without, however, the further step being taken of abandoning the assumption of an independent individuality for each particular form. Especially in later texts it is often asserted that the nome or temple god bears in other places the names of the local deities, but one must not infer from this, as has frequently been done, e.g. even by Brugsch, that the forms in question are actually identical. Such statements are merely intended to characterize the particular god as the possessor of all Divine power—a position which in other places might quite well be attributed to any other who was the ruling deity there.

(6) In principle, then, the nome gods have equal importance, they may all of them, if the occasion demands it, have omnipotence attributed to them; but we have already noted that this relation might assume a different form in practice, according to the power of their particular nome. The material at our disposal does not indeed always give us a trustworthy picture of the actual conditions. We have an exact knowledge only of those deities whose places of worship and temples survive and have been already excavated. Our views are thus subject to constant shifting when new texts and monuments emerge from places that had not been previously examined. Chance plays so great a part in the matter that it is quite possible that gods at present scarcely known to us had great importance in antiquity, and, conversely, that the forms which are frequently named in our sources once possessed only slight significance. Here, as little as elsewhere in Egyptological questions, are we at liberty to forget that, in spite of the wealth of monuments that have survived, their number is relatively small considering the thousands of years of Egyptian history, and hence their data must be used with caution in drawing inferences as to ancient conditions in general. This must be kept in view in judging of the following list of the most important Egyptian deities. These are the forms of which the extant texts principally speak; and, above all, they are those which possessed the greatest interest for the nations of antiquity outside Egypt.

(B) List of gods:—1. NATIVE EGYPTIAN DEITIES.—Rā is the god of the sun, who, conceived of as a man, or as a man with a hawk's head, guides the heavenly bodies, creates new life by his rays, and thus blesses mankind, although at times he also shoots forth consuming fire (his eye is the goddess Sechet, cf. above, p. 182). The centre of his worship is Heliopolis (Egyp. Ȧn [Heb. אֹן] or Pa-Rā, Gr. Ἡλιούπολις [Heb. בֵּית שֶׁמֶשׁ]), where the kings of the 12th dynasty built him a great temple. For the most part he stands alone, but occasionally an artificially formed consort (see above, p. 179^a), Rā-t (Rā-t-ta-ui), is placed by his side. The monuments of the cult of Rā resemble the conical stone in which among others he embodied himself at Heliopolis. In the time of the Old Empire huge buildings were erected to him in the form of a flat-topped pyramid surmounted by an obelisk. The best known of these was that erected by king Rā-en-user at Abusir (see above, p. 183^b).

The god pursued his course in the heavens by ship. Two barks, bearing the names Mādet and Sekti, are generally attributed to him; in later times he is supposed to use a special vessel for every hour of the day. The name of Rā is associated with numerous legends which depict him as a king decaying with age, against whom gods and men rebel, but who always emerges victorious from the resulting conflicts. The texts name a number of other sun-gods along with and often confused with Rā. Of these we now proceed to notice the five most important—

(1) Horus.—Our treatment of this god is rendered difficult by the circumstance that under this name were understood two deities, who were originally quite distinct, although afterwards they passed into one another: Horus, the son of Isis (see below, p. 194^b), and Horus the sun-god. The latter, again, is separated into a number of independent individual forms, which are distinguished by additions to the name Horus. Thus we have: Ḥer-ur, 'Horus the ancient,' of Letopolis; Ḥer-men-ti, 'Horus of the two eyes,' of Shedenu in the Delta; Ḥer-chent-ȧn-ma, 'Horus in the condition of not seeing,' of Letopolis; Ḥer-em-chuti, 'Horus on the horizon,' the Greek Harmachis, at Tanis, and in the environs of Memphis, where the great sphinx of Gizeh is his symbol; Ḥer-nub, 'the golden Horus,' who is regarded especially as the midday sun; Ḥer-beḥudti, 'Horus of Edfu,' whose symbol, the winged solar disc, used to be placed as an omen-averter on temples, steles, etc. Then, again, Ḥer-ka, 'Horus the bull'; Ḥer-desher, 'the red Horus'; Ḥer-ȧp-shetu, 'Horus the revealer of the secret,' answer to the planets Saturn, Mars, Jupiter, which were thus thought of as solar forms.—Ḥer-t is a later-formed female complementary form of the male Horus (see p. 179^a).

(2) Cheperȧ, 'he that becomes' (Germ. 'der Werdende'), is primarily the morning sun. A Turin text declares: 'I am Cheperȧ in the morning, Rā at midday, Tum in the evening,' but the three deities just named are usually thought of in pretty much one and the same way as = the sun in general.

(3) Tum or Ȧtum is the god of Heliopolis, and is frequently regarded as the creator; he is portrayed mostly as a man with the crowns of Egypt. A great temple dedicated to him was situated at the modern Tell el-Maskhuta, and known as Pa-Tum ('house of Tum,' the biblical Pithom; cf. Naville, The Store-city of Pithom, London, 1885).

(4) Shu appears, above all, as creator, and at Thebes and Memphis is named as one of the Egyptian kings of the gods. His female consort and twin sister is the lion-headed Tefnut. The notions cherished regarding this goddess, and especially her genealogical place in the Egyptian religious system, underwent numerous variations. In the myths she does not come at all prominently forward.

(5) Ȧten, 'the sun's disc,' of whom we have spoken already (see p. 183[b]), is, in contrast to Rā, not an anthropomorphic form, but the celestial body itself. He is portrayed as the solar disc from which rays stream down towards the earth. These end in hands which reach down the signs for life, power, etc. Amenophis IV. (c. 1450 B.C.) desired to make Ȧten the ruling god in Egypt, called himself in honour of him Chu(achu)-en-ȧten, 'splendour of the solar disc,' and built him a great temple at Tel el-Amarna in Central Egypt, to whose neighbourhood he removed the royal residence, which had been at Thebes. Apart from the prominence it gave to the new god, the henotheistic (not monotheistic) reformation of this king made little change in Egypt. The organization of officials remained the same (cf. Baillet, Rec. de trav. rel. à l'Egypt. xxiii. 140 ff.), and so did the cultus and the religious formulæ, in which the ancient Divine names were simply replaced in many instances by that of Ȧten. In numerous hymns, touched with poetical feeling, which have been found in the tombs of el-Amarna, the god is hailed as beneficent star, bringer of light and heat, rejoicer of man and beast, creator and nourisher of all things and beings, the only deity that is worthy of veneration, etc. As a matter of course, no myth is attached to the nature god himself.

Amon of Thebes was presumably at first a god of the reproductive natural force which generates animals and plants, as were his neighbour gods, Ment of Hermonthis and Min of Koptos. The three names probably go back to the root men (='stand'), the allusion being to the erected phallus. At a later period Amon blends more and more with the sun-god (see above, p. 184[a]), and thus arises Amon-Rā, who is now hailed repeatedly in hymns as creator, dispenser of nourishment, etc. More and more he arrogates the functions of other gods, and is first invoked in a henotheistic sense, and then designated pantheistically as god of the All, the other gods being his members and parts. During this period the custom originated of deriving his name from ȧmen ('to be hidden'), the idea being that his true name, i.e. his real nature, is concealed (see above, p. 181[a]). He is portrayed as a man with a high feather crown.

At Thebes Amon does not usually appear alone, but in company with the goddess Mut and their son Chunsu. There is thus constituted a Divine family, a triad, the members of which, however, always remain independent, and never blend into a trinity. It was generally held in ancient Egypt that a god, like a man, grows old and dies. In order to secure, in spite of this, the perpetual life of the god, he is supposed to generate by his wife, who is usually also his sister, a son like himself, who, when the father dies, steps into his place. He in turn generates, by her who had been his own mother, a son like himself—he becomes, as the Egyptians say, ka-mut-f, 'husband of his mother,'—who succeeds him on his death. Strangely enough, there is no word of the goddess dying. But this is probably due, not to any real immortality being attributed to her, but to the meagre significance of goddesses in Egyptian mythology.

Besides the triad, we find in Egyptian temples groups of four or eight, and especially of nine deities. The composition of these groups rests upon a variety of principles: at times the forms have actually a close connexion, at other times one of the gods is regarded as king, the others as his court, etc. Pre-eminent in this class is the ennead of Heliopolis, in the formation of which a mythological system co-operated, and which then exercised an influence upon other temples as well (cf. Maspero, Ét. de myth. ii. 337 ff.). In place of a single ennead some temples have two, a great and a small, while others have a still larger number.

Mut, depicted as a woman with a human head or that of a lion, had a temple of her own to the south of Karnak in Thebes (Benson-Gourlay, The Temple of Mut in Asher, London, 1899), where she passed for queen of heaven and eye of Rā, and where numerous lion-headed statues were dedicated to her or to Sechet (see below, p. 186[a]), particularly by Amenophis III. and Sheshonk I. Instead of her we occasionally meet with the grammatically formed goddess Ȧment by the side of Amon. She has nothing to do with the almost homonymous goddess of the under world, Ȧmenti, 'she who belongs to the realm of the dead.'

Chunsu appears to have been primarily a moon-god [chens='pass through,' here with reference to the motion of the stars]. He bears upon his hawk's head a moon-crescent and sun's disc, and the mention of him runs parallel with that of the other moon-deities (Thoth, Ȧāḥ, etc.). In later times he becomes the god of healing, and falls apart into two forms, 'Chunsu, the beautifully resting one,' who always abides in the temple at Thebes, and 'Chunsu, the executor of plans,' who is sent out by the other as physician and magician. To the first of these a great temple was erected at Karnak by Ramses III. and his successors; the latter had a small sanctuary beside it, which is mentioned as late as the Ptolemaic era (cf. Aegyp. Ztschr. xxxviii. 126).

Ment was worshipped at various places in the Thebaid; he has a hawk's head, solar disc, and the Amon feathers, and in the Theban period of Egyptian history he is regarded especially as the god of war, to whom the Pharaoh, as he sets out for battle, is compared. His embodiment at Erment is the Bacis (see below, p. 190[a]).

Min [formerly read Chem or Ȧmsi] was the god of Panopolis, Koptos, and other places; he presents himself as an ithyphallic man, and is viewed as the god of procreation. Harvest and other joyous festivals are held in his honour, and he often coincides with Amon ka-mut-f, as the god who constantly reproduces himself and thus lives for ever.

Chnum or Chnuphis, the ram-headed god of the cataract region, is creator of the world, which he fashioned upon the potter's wheel, and of human beings, whom he 'constructed.' By his side appear the goddesses to be presently mentioned, Sati and Ȧnukit. In addition, we find occasionally coupled with him the frog-headed goddess Ḥekt, who is frequently mentioned from the earliest times downwards, without our being able, however, to fix her exact significance. At all events, she played a part in the resurrection dogma, which was symbolized down to the Christian-Coptic era by her sacred animal, the frog.

Ptaḥ (Gr. Φθᾶ) was the god of Memphis, and, as such, well known to the Greeks, who for unknown reasons call him Hephæstos. Herodotus visited and described his temple (Herod. ii. 99, 101, 121, 176). Ptaḥ appears in mummy form, swathed, with only the head free; the feet are placed upon the sign for truth. In Memphis he was regarded as the first king of the country and as creator, a rôle which at Philæ is assigned to Ptah-Tatunen, a combination of Ptaḥ and Tanen or Tatunen, a deity who makes his appearance especially in Nubia, and who, as earth-god, recalls the Egyptian Seb (Keb). Ptaḥ is also combined with other deities so as to form new special gods. Thus we have Ptaḥ-Āten-en-pet, 'Ptaḥ solar disc of the heaven,' who illumines the earth with his rays; Ptaḥ-Nu, the father of the gods; Ptaḥ-Ḥāpi, Ptaḥ the Nile; and, above all, Ptaḥ-Sokaris, to whom Ptaḥ-Sokaris-Osiris, Ptaḥ-Osiris, and Sokaris alone (see below) correspond. The triad at Memphis is composed of Ptaḥ along with Sechet and their son Nefer-Tum or Imḥetep (Imûthes).

Sechet (Sechmet) is a lion-headed sun-goddess, who, under the title of 'the eye of Rā,' slaughters Rā's enemies. In her essential significance she coincides pretty nearly with the lion-headed Mut of Thebes, Tefnut, Pacht of Speos Artemidos, and the cat-headed Bast of Bubastis.

Nefer-Tum appears, particularly in more recent texts, as a man whose head is surmounted by a budding lotus, from which we may infer that he was a god of the regeneration and reawakening of nature, although there are no specific details of this in the inscriptions. Imḥetep, 'he who comes in peace,' is depicted as a youth with a closely-fitting cap upon his head. He generally appears seated, with a rolled-up papyrus upon his knees. In earlier times his figure does not seem to occur, but in the later New Empire, and, above all, in the Saitic period, numerous bronzes of him are found, notwithstanding which he does not become any more prominent in the texts, where he is introduced as a learned god.—For the associates of Ptaḥ, see above, p. 179^b.

Sokaris, conceived of as hawk-headed, is primarily a sun-god. His principal festival fell at the winter solstice, and in the Ptolemaic period was celebrated on the morning [at an earlier period perhaps on the evening] of the 26th of Choiak (cf. Brugsch, Rev. égyp. i. 42 ff.). He was worshipped especially in the neighbourhood of the necropolis of Memphis (where there is still a reminiscence of him in the name Saqqarah), and thus became blended on the one side with the Memphitic Ptaḥ, and on the other with the god of the dead, Osiris, whose symbols were, in consequence, often assigned to him.

Nechebit of Eileithyiaspolis, the vulture-formed tutelary goddess of Upper Egypt, generally appears in company with the serpent-formed Uat'-it of Buto, the tutelary goddess of Lower Egypt. The combination of the two stands for the empire of the Pharaoh, who united both their spheres of authority under his sway.

Hathor, 'the house of Horus' according to the later etymology, is mentioned times without number, and had her principal temple at Denderah. She is the goddess of joy, the patroness of mirthful gatherings. Her sacred animal was the cow, in consequence of which she occasionally appears with a cow's head, and, even when she wears a human form, she has very frequently cow's ears. Another Hathor is regarded as the goddess of the under world, and yet other Hathors are the seven female beings who made their appearance at the birth of a child and, like our fairies, foretold its fortune.

Sebak (Suchos) appears with a crocodile's head or as a crocodile. Under this same name, however, we must distinguish at least three different deities. In the first place there was a sun-god, who is combined with Rā and makes his appearance pre-eminently at Ombos, side by side with the sun-god Aroëris. Another Sebak constitutes a kind of by-form of Osiris. Finally, there is a Sebak who is regarded as the god of evil. His sacred animals were the crocodiles, which were supposed to be the associates of Set in the under world, and which in most of the nomes of Egypt were hunted to the death. The centre of worship of a Sebak who was well disposed to men continued till a late period to be the Fayum.

(2) FOREIGN DEITIES.—The Egyptian gods during the flourishing period of the country's history were not exclusive. They admitted into their number such of the gods of neighbouring peoples as had been found to be powerful and capable of resistance. It is a sign of deterioration that such a course was not followed with the Greek and Roman deities, who had no place assigned to them in the temple cult, but had to be content with the worship of certain circles of the people who would regard them as special gods. In the first millennium B.C. the Egyptian religion was too ossified to permit of its assimilation of new ideas. And this all the more because at this very time an archaizing tendency made itself felt in religion, so that from the time of the 25th dynasty the oldest attainable religious formulæ are in the most unmistakable fashion sought out and employed once more. In earlier times it was different. Libyan, African, Semite deities were then worshipped in the Nile valley along with the native gods.

(a) From the Libyans the Egyptians, in invading their future settlements, presumably borrowed the goddesses Neith and Bast, who at the beginning of Egyptian history play a considerable part, then recede entirely, and come forward once more in the Saitic period (from B.C. 700 onwards).

Bast appears pre-eminently as the local goddess of Bubastis in the Delta, where she had a share in the cult of the principal temple (Naville, Bubastis, London, 1891; Festival Hall of Osorkon II., London, 1892). She is portrayed with a cat's head, and, like all lion- and cat-headed goddesses, is regarded as an embodiment of the sun. She plays no considerable part in the mythology.

Neith was thought of as an armed woman, with bow and arrow in her hand. As local goddess of Sais she was well known to the Greeks. In mythology she is regarded as the mother of Rā, and then becomes blended with Isis, along with whom she plays a rôle in the Osirian festivals, which under the New Empire had one of their centres at Sais. The Libyans of the time of Seti I. tattooed the ideogram of Neith upon their arms and wove it into their clothes (cf. Mallet, Le culte de Neith à Sais, Paris, 1889; Petrie, Naqada, p. 64).

Amongst deities that were originally Libyan should perhaps be included also the two goddesses Sati and Ānukit, who at a later period make their appearance in the cataract district as companions of Chnum (see above). Sati is depicted with the crown of Upper Egypt and the cow's horns, and is regarded as queen of heaven and of Egypt, queen of all gods, and is compared by the Greeks with Hera, although she has fundamentally nothing in common with her. Ānukit wears a feather crown, is regarded above all as mistress of the island of Sehel in the neighbourhood of Philæ, and is compared with Hestia, but never succeeded in gaining any firm footing in Egypt proper.

(b) Bes and Ta-urt and their companions appear to be of African origin, by which is not meant that we are to think of divinities of a pronounced negro type. We have to do rather with deities whose acquaintance the Egyptians made through the medium of the tribes on the southern border of their empire, and to whom they left their grotesque forms, although these stood in the most glaring opposition to the refined forms of the genuine Egyptian gods, and permanently retained the stamp of their barbarian origin.

Bes is portrayed as a bearded dwarf, with long ears, bandy legs, long and generally bent arms, with a feather crown on his head. Behind him hangs down to the ground a long tail, probably that of the cynœlurus guttatus, whose name (bes) the god himself bears. Apart from occasional ornaments, he is represented naked, and almost always as of the male sex. It is only rarely that a female form appears beside him. In later times a number of by-forms (Ḥait, Aḥti, Sepd, Âḥaui, etc.) take their place by his side. These are at one time identified with him, and at another remain independent. In the Old Empire he seems to have as yet played no part; in the Middle Empire there is still little mention of him; it is during the New Empire, especially in the Saitic period, that he attains his bloom (cf. Krall in Jahrb. d. Wien. Kunsthist. Samml. ix. p. 72 ff.; A. Grenfell, PSBA xxiv. 21 ff.). He is regarded as a deity who renders aid at the birth of gods and kings, who amuses the newborn babe with his dances and waits upon it, protecting it at the same time from all evil, and especially against witchcraft. He thus becomes one of the most important of the omen-averting deities. At times he is confused with the young sun, and at a later period is thought of also as a pantheistic divinity.

Ta-urt's embodiment is a female hippopotamus standing upon its hind legs, with thick belly and pendant breasts, and often with a long mane hanging down to the ground. She, too, is ready with her aid at the birth of gods and kings, and in certain localities she is regarded, in her by-form Âpet, as mother of Osiris. In representations of the under world she takes her place by the side of the cow-formed Hathor. She appears at the entrance to necropoleis and to the realm of the dead, presumably occupying this position that she may render aid at the new birth of the dead, the resurrection. Her symbol is one of the most frequently occurring amulets in tombs belonging to the more recent periods of Egyptian history.

(c) Asiatic, principally Semitic, deities (cf. Meyer, ZDMG xxi. 716 ff.; W. Max Müller, Asien u. Europa, 311 ff.) found their way into the Egyptian temples under the New Empire, a period during which the Egyptian people was much brought into contact, alike in peace and war, with the different tribes of Western Asia. The principal deities of this class are Baal, Reshpu, Astarte, Anta, and the city goddess of Ḳadesh. The last named will be dealt with in the same category as the Egyptian city goddesses (see below, p. 191ᵃ).

Baal was worshipped notably in the Ramesside period, and indeed his cult appears to have had its starting-point at the city of Tanis in the eastern Delta, where Ramses II. gave to this god a place even in the chief temple. His name has frequently for its determinative the sacred animal of the god Set, with whom he thus appears to have been identified—a result which would be reached all the more readily because the by-form of Set, namely Sutech, was also regarded elsewhere as god of the Asiatics. No statues of Baal have been discovered in Egyptian temples up till now.

Reshpu, the Phœnician Reseph, carries a lance, exhibits Semitic features, and makes his appearance frequently upon steles belonging to the flourishing period of Egyptian history.

Astarte was worshipped in several Egyptian temples. The most frequently mentioned is her shrine at Memphis, which existed down to the Ptolemaic period, and must have stood not far from the Serapeum. In the treaty between Ramses II. and the Asiatic Kheta, she appears as goddess of the Kheta, but even Ramses II. himself esteemed her so highly that he named one of his sons after her—Mer-Â-(s)trot (Wiedemann, Herodot's Zweites Buch, 433; cf. Spiegelberg, PSBA xxiv. 41 ff.).

Anta likewise makes her appearance as goddess of the Kheta. She bears shield, lance, and battle-club, and is occasionally mounted on horseback. Ramses II. and III. worshipped her, and the first named of these monarchs called his favourite daughter and future wife after her—Bent-Ânta, 'daughter of Anta.' But neither her cult nor that of her Semitic associates appears to have laid hold upon the mass of the people. It remained an official cult, quite in contrast with that of the Libyan and African divinities, who appear to have found their principal worshippers in popular circles.

(3) DEIFIED MEN.—In treating of the Egyptian religion, great importance has frequently been attached to the worship of the king of the land, and a whole pantheon of kings has been attributed to the Egyptians. But this way of putting it is not correct. The Pharaoh was, as we have seen already (p. 180ᵇ), the direct offspring of a god, and hence bore the title 'beautiful god,' and felt himself to belong to the order of heavenly beings. Even during his lifetime hymns were composed which attributed to him all manner of divine attributes (for examples see Maspero, Genre épist. 76 ff.); he is portrayed with the insignia of the gods; his subjects approached him as a god, and no doubt offered adoration to him in the popular cult and elsewhere. But in the temple cult his worship had a very subordinate place. Amenophis III. indeed prays to his own ka, and obtains from the latter the promise of all kinds of heavenly gifts. Ramses II. admits himself into the number of his temple gods, etc. But, upon the whole, even these monarchs stand a long way behind the great gods. It may be noted also as a circumstance connected with this, that the cult ceases as a rule upon the death of the particular Pharaoh concerned. It is true indeed, that occasionally, even after their death, offerings continue for a considerable time to be presented to them in accordance with their own directions and from funds left by them for the purpose, until later generations apply these gifts to their own use, but it is seldom that the defunct Pharaohs continue to be invoked as actual heavenly powers. Only a few of them are mentioned after the lapse of centuries as deities (cf. e.g. for the kings of the first dynasties, Erman, Aegyp. Ztschr. xxxviii. 121 ff.), and even then only in company with others. The temples to the dead, which the Pharaohs erected to themselves, appear to have been nearly all very quickly alienated from their proper use.

Still less frequently than kings did ordinary mortals attain to Divine honours after death. One of these rare instances is found in the time of Amenophis III. in the person of Amenophis the son of Ḥapu, who is still regarded as a god as late as the Ptolemaic period (cf. Wiedemann in PSBA xiv. 334, Urquell, vii. 289 ff.; Sethe, Ægyptiaca, 107 ff.). Another is the prince of Cush, Pa-ser, who for a length of time bears the title of 'the god' (Wiedemann, PSBA xiv. 332 f.), and there are examples of the same in other two private persons under the 18th dynasty (Wiedemann, Orient. Ltztg. iii. 361 ff.). The Greeks assert, further (see the citations in Wiedemann, PSBA xiv. 335), that in the otherwise unknown city of Anabis a man was venerated as a god, and had gifts presented for him to eat. But such notices are isolated; the veneration of such men being confined as a rule to the narrow circle of the clan to which they belonged, or the officials of the building erected by them.

Naturally, we must not confound Divine veneration of this kind with the proper cult of the dead, the object of which was to ensure a supply of food and drink to the deceased so as to prevent his wandering about as a ghost, but which did not necessarily imply the attributing to him of any Divine attributes in the stricter sense of the term.

(4) THE POPULAR GODS.—Partition of the great gods.—The older investigators of the history of Egyptian religion proceeded on the principle that the best way to arrive at a thorough knowledge of the character of the particular deities was to collect all the references to them in the monuments and to draw conclusions from these. But the progress of study showed that identity of name is in the Nile valley no necessary guarantee for identity of deity, that, for instance, Horus of Edfu is quite a different form from Horus of Letopolis or Horus the son of Isis. This circumstance it was sought in the first instance to explain by assuming that the original Egyptian gods were worshipped at different places, and that, under the influence of the varying local development of doctrine, the varying images, etc., there arose in course of time different conceptions of the gods, which found expression in the local by-names for the primeval divinities. This view is in general correct, but the phenomenon had a much fuller scope than was formerly supposed. It happened not infrequently that even in one and the same place the same god was worshipped under several forms, and that each of these forms was regarded as an independent personality.

When in invocations a god appears with different by-names, as for instance Amon-Rā the king of the gods, side by side with Amon-Rā the lord of the throne of the world, our first impulse is to find here two titles of one and the same god, and we shall thus do justice upon the whole to the notion of the worshipper. But when in pictorial representations we see a number of forms seated together who all represent the same god, but with the addition in each instance of a different by-name, and who are worshipped together, the Egyptians held in such cases that each of the pictures had also a special divine personality corresponding to it. Thus Thutmosis III. appears at Karnak (Leps. Denkm. iii. 36 c, d) in the act of worshipping ten gods who are seated side by side and who are all called Amon, but one is Amon the lord of the throne of the world, another Amon-Rā the lord of heaven, another Amon of western Thebes; and these are followed by Amon the bull of his mother, Amon-Rā the great in love, etc. Sometimes the texts in such instances indicate that one is to address the god by his names. But in Egypt to name any one must not be understood in our weakened sense; the name is an independent part of the Ego, the different names have different independent forms corresponding to them. This occurrence of different forms of one and the same primeval god, if one might use the expression, explains how it is that upon certain steles the same god is portrayed in a variety of embodiments. Thus a stele now at Berlin (No. 7295, publ. by Wiedemann in Mélanges déd. à Harlez, p. 372 ff.) represents one of the king's shoemakers, Amen-em-apt (about the 20th dynasty), engaged in worshipping the following forms: (1) the human-formed Amon-Rā in the valley, the lord of heaven; (2) the goose-formed Amon-Rā, the lion of valour, the great god; (3) the ram-formed Amon-Rā of Surerii, i.e. probably the deity who lived in animal form in a shrine erected by Surerii.

It will scarcely be safe to assume that in such instances as the above there has been uniformly a partition, due to local conditions, of the god into a number of individualities. Rather may we find in not a few of these forms originally independent deities, whose old names afterwards became by-names of a greater divinity, without the memory of their original independence being thereby permanently lost. Many indications in the texts suggest that there was once a god known as 'lord of heaven,' another as 'lord of the All,' a third as 'great in love,' etc., and that these titles were gradually drawn into the sphere of Osiris, Amon, etc., just as happened, for instance, in Greece with deities like Hygieia, Eubuleus, Basileia, and others (cf. Usener, Götternamen, 216 ff.). But the old deities never became completely absorbed in the new form, but always detached themselves from it afresh, as may be seen from the variety of their embodiments. To each particular form of the deity a special form of embodiment must correspond, for the Egyptians recognized no gods but such as were conceived of personally, whether as man or beast or any other perceptible object. Thus there could be in the same place different embodiments of the same great god, the latter being only apparently a unity, but in reality composed of a long series of Divine individualities independent of one another.

(a) The Divine forms for heaven and earth are supplied, in the Egyptian mythology known to us, by personal forms that animate these concepts, namely, the goddess of heaven, Nut, and the earth-god, Seb, to whom we have referred already in dealing with the creation myths. So is it also with the heavenly bodies. Here, again, there is in general no mention of the worship of the natural body but of that of a deity animating it. For the most part, it is true, these remained special gods; it is only in a few instances that we have to do with great gods whose functions extended beyond giving its proper movement to the heavenly body. Occasionally, however, the attempt was made to combine the special god with a great god, in the same way as at Thebes the special gods were readily brought into relation to Amon-Rā (see above, p. 185^{a}). We thus hear of Isis-Sothis instead of Sothis alone as goddess of the dog-star, or of Bennu-Osiris instead of Bennu (Phœnix). The combination of Horus with the planet-gods also belongs to this category. The old month-gods were almost wholly replaced by great gods, to whom the months were dedicated; the lists of later times have preserved of the old deities, properly speaking, only 'the great heat' and 'the little heat' for the two principal summer months (see, for lists of such divinities, Leps. Denkm. iii. 170 f.). The gods of the particular days of the week were also combined with great gods, whereas the goddesses of the hours of day and night were able to preserve their independence down to the latest times. It is only rarely then that we find an invocation of the stars themselves, or that a particular star is mentioned as a god except in star catalogues.

The proper moon-god Ȧāḥ gradually passed into the god Thoth, and, even when he is not exactly amalgamated with the latter, he is depicted similarly to him. In later times he is further attached also to Osiris. In the case of Thoth it is probable that, at least in some localities, we have in him an actual moon-god whose personality originally ran parallel with that of Ȧāḥ, and to whom the cynocephalus was sacred; whereas the later more important Ibis-Thoth, associated with writing and the healing art, is, to all appearance, of a different origin. Egyptology has not as yet succeeded in separating the various Divine primary elements combined in the same god, although the task is one that in the Nile valley is at once suggested and facilitated by the presence of the various sacred animals.

(b) Stone worship prevailed especially in Heliopolis, where the sun-god embodied himself, amongst other forms, in a stone. It is hard to say whether we should detect here the influence of the Semites, in whose native land Divine stones played a great part, or whether we have to do with genuine Egyptian notions. In any case, this species of worship exhibits itself as long established. The form of the deity appears to have varied; the texts speak now of a pyramid, now of an obelisk (whence the obelisks in the classical period of Egyptian history are always dedicated to Rā or to some deity amalgamated with him), and again of a kind of pillar; but the essential form is always that of a cone, the shape common to the Semites. It was probably owing simply to the influence of Heliopolis that the belief in this embodiment of Rā found entrance into other temples. The god Set, the opponent of Osiris, was occasionally thought of as embodied in a stone, as is shown by the determinative of his name, which is a stone in the shape of a brick-mould. Late texts mention also worship paid to the metals and to half-precious stones, but such notices are rare.

(c) The worship of high places could naturally attain to no great proportions in the Nile valley, as characteristic elevations are in general wanting in the flat plateaus that stretch along both banks of the river; but instances of it do occur. The circumstance that the temple of the Hathor of the copper mines of the Sinaitic peninsula was situated upon a mountain height, may, it is true, have been due to Semitic influence. But we find a similar state of things in other places as well. At Heliopolis there was a sandhill, on which sacrifices were offered to the sun-god at his rising (Piānchi stele, l. 102). At Gebel Barkal the mountain on which the temples were situated was called the holy mountain, probably because it was itself regarded as holy, and not merely because of the sanctuaries to which it afforded shelter. From the end of the second millennium B.C. come some notices pointing to the paying of Divine honours to the mountain peak over Sheḥ Abd el-Gurnah at Thebes. This peak has prayers addressed to it; a ka, a Divine personality, is attributed to it; transgressions may be committed against it, which it punishes severely, or forgives if entreaty to that effect is addressed to it. In other texts it is brought into connexion or even identified with the serpent Mer-seker ('she who loves silence'), one of the most popular deities of the Theban necropolis. But originally the mountain was an independent Divine form (cf. the texts in Maspero, Ét. de myth. ii. 402 ff.; Capart, Revue de l'Université de Bruxelles, vi. [April 1901]), which, amongst other functions, was supposed to discharge those of a healing deity. A more exact study of the rock-inscriptions of Egypt may be expected to bring to light more of these high-place deities; in temple-inscriptions, on the contrary, they appear to be practically wanting, showing that here they were not regarded as of sufficiently high rank to find mention by the side of the great gods.

(d) The cult of springs and streams was in the Nile valley naturally confined to a few instances, there being so slender a supply of independent watercourses. Of springs, the only one, properly speaking, that comes into consideration, is at Heliopolis. In it, according to a stele of the 8th cent. B.C. (Piānchi stele, l. 102), the sun-god Rā washed his face, and his example was followed by kings when they visited the sanctuary. It is not said whether the spring actually received Divine honours, but it certainly possessed a certain sacredness, which it retained even after the fall of the Egyptian State. The Arabs regarded it as the fountain of the sun; and, according to the Christian legend, the Virgin Mary, when fleeing from Herod, washed the swaddling-bands of the infant Jesus in it (Evang. Inf. Arab. c. 24; Abd Allatif, Rel. de l'Égypte [French tr. by de Sacy], p. 88 ff.).

Far more important was the place held by the Nile (Ḥāpi), on whose flow and inundation the prosperity and even the existence of Egypt depended, and which was conceived of as a fat man with nipple-formed breasts, flowers upon his head, and wearing a loin-cloth composed of sedge. He had temples in a number of places (Nilopolis near Memphis, Heliopolis, etc.); in other instances he was received into the important temples in company with other deities. The greatest of the popular festivals were held in his honour and to mark the phases of his increase; numerous hymns celebrating his beneficence have come down to us, being found even engraved upon rock-walls along with lists of offerings to be presented to him (cf. e.g. Stern, Aegyp. Ztschr. 1873, p. 129 ff.; Maspero, Hymne au Nil, Paris, 1868). In these texts he is hailed as giver of life to all men, bringer of joy, creator, nourisher of the whole land. In all this we have no myth in the proper sense of the term, and the Nile comes into no further relations with the great deities of the temples. Occasionally the Nile is not viewed as one divinity, but is divided into the Nile of Upper and of Lower Egypt. When these two bind together for Pharaoh the plants that characterize them, he is thereby constituted lord of the whole land. There are other instances where the process of partition is carried still further, and each nome has its own Nile.

In the train of the Nile appear a number of forms which embody the blessings dispensed by him. Thus we have the god of provisions, Ka (not to be confounded with the soul-form ka), who is also called the father of the gods; the gods Ḥu, T'efā, and Resef, which stand for abundance and nourishment; the goddess of corn, Neperā, and the serpent-headed goddess of the harvest, Rennut.

(e) The worship of animals (cf. Wiedemann, 'Culte des animaux' in the Muséon, viii. 211 ff., 309 ff.; Mél. de Harlez, 372 ff.; Herodot's Zweites Buch, 271 ff.) has been regarded from ancient times as one of the most remarkable features of Egyptian religion. In discussing this subject we must distinguish between the Divine honours paid to certain individual animals, and the high regard for whole classes of animals sacred to certain gods. In the latter instance it was supposed that certain animals were specially dear to certain gods, whether because they were fond of incorporating themselves in these, or for some other mythological reason. The animals in question must not be hurt or killed, in their lifetime they must be fed, after their death they were frequently embalmed and buried, but were not worshipped. The phenomenon with which we are dealing may be compared with the high regard for certain animals shown in other lands: for instance, at the present day, for the stork in N. Germany; it is not animal worship, properly so called. Almost every species of animal found in Egypt is included in this category of sacred animals (see list in Parthey's Plutarch, de Is. 261 ff.), but regard for a particular species is commonly confined to particular nomes or districts, and one nome had no scruple about killing and eating the sacred animals of another.

The case is quite different with individual animals that ranked as Divine. In them a particular god embodies himself when he descends to earth, and lives on in this incarnation in the temple. The cult is then occupied essentially with this god-animal, which is duly supplied with food, drink, adornments, etc. We learn this, above all, from the classical writers; the inscriptions in such cases always speak of the god himself. These animal deities were immortal in the sense that, whenever the animal incorporation died, a fresh embodiment of the god in an animal of the same species immediately took place. Moreover, the death of the first embodiment was not a complete one; its immortal soul passed, like that of man, as Osiris, into the world beyond. Hence the Osiris dirge was raised for the animal, and it was solemnly interred, sometimes in an isolated tomb, sometimes in a spot where there were numerous such graves of animals. Besides real animals, we encounter, amongst these embodiments of deity, certain fabulous creatures. Pre-eminent amongst these is the phœnix, an embodiment of Rā. The Egyptians came to look upon these fancied forms as actually existing creatures, like the sphinx, the griffin, etc., which were supposed to inhabit the desert (cf. e.g. Leps. Denkm. ii. 131).

The most important of the god-animals, or at least the most frequently mentioned in the classical authors, are the following:—

Apis (Egyp. Ḥāpi)—a bull in the form of which Ptaḥ of Memphis embodied himself, and whose worship is attested from the 4th dynasty down to the time of the emperor Julian. This animal was believed to be engendered by a moonbeam; the cow which gave birth to him shared in the veneration paid him. He was recognized by a number of marks, about whose appearance tradition varies as to details. Solemnly introduced into the temple, the animal gave oracles, partly directly, and partly through his attendants. His death occasioned general mourning; his place of burial, from the middle of the 18th dynasty, was a rock-cut catacomb, the so-called Serapeum, in the middle of the necropolis of Memphis. The soul of the animal passed as Osiris-Apis into the world beyond, and this double form became blended, in the minds of the Greeks who were settled in Egypt, with the notions of Pluto and Asclepios. Thus arose the hybrid god Sarapis or Serapis, whose cult at the beginning of the Christian era was diffused over the whole of the Roman Empire (cf. e.g. Lafaye, Hist. du culte des divinités d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1884).

Mnevis—an incorporation of Rā as a bull, at Heliopolis.

Bacis—a bull form of Rā (Mont), at Hermonthis.

Suchos—a crocodile embodiment of Sebak in a lake in the Fayum, which likewise gave oracles, and was interred in the catacombs of the labyrinth.

A ram form belonged, amongst others, to Osiris at Mendes, and Amon-Rā at Thebes. Thoth had the form of an ibis at Hermopolis Magna, and, it would appear, also in a temple at Memphis, where the ibis was regarded as a sacred animal, and buried accordingly.

The Phœnix (bennu), in earlier times conceived of as a heron, in later also as an eagle, was an embodiment of Rā, especially as the morning sun, in a temple at Heliopolis (cf. Wiedemann, Aegyp. Ztschr. 1878, p. 89 ff.), but worshipped also in other places in Egypt, and one of the forms of the blessed dead, whose resurrection was guaranteed by that of the Phœnix itself.

The Sphinx, a lion with human head, was an embodiment of Rā-Harmachis, who is represented in this manifestation-form by the great Sphinx of Gizeh. The Sphinx, further, represents more generally the form assumed by various deities when they descend to the earth as watchers. The figures representing sphinxes generally have the features of the dedicator of the particular sphinx, i.e., for the most part, the features of a king. The majority of sphinxes are of the male sex. But if the deity portrayed should be female, and the dedicator of the monument a woman, the sphinx may also have a female form. The sphinx was originally unwinged; it was only under Asiatic influence that it came to assume wings.

The cow was an embodiment of Hathor and of other maternal deities.—The serpent was the form of embodiment of several deities of the tomb districts—above all, of Mer-seker (see above, p. 189^a), as well as of harvest deities like Rennut and many others.

(f) In the Nile valley there is less frequent mention of the worship of plants and trees than one might expect in the case of an essentially agricultural people. This deficiency of statement is explicable on the ground that the cult of vegetable life was part of the popular religion, and only found occasional admittance into the temple cult. Even when the latter was the case, one can always see clearly how loose was the connexion of the cult of plants with that of the great gods, and how little, in consequence, this connexion was maintained.

Thus, a religiously important tree is the sycomore which stood in the West on the way to the world beyond, and from which a goddess, who is more or less identified with the tree, supplied the dead with food and drink for their wanderings. This notion took its rise from the actually existing isolated trees growing at the commencement of the desert, in small hollows where water is found. Under the shadow of these the shepherd or the huntsman would seek rest, and express his gratitude by paying veneration to them. A great deal of vacillation is shown as to the particular deity with whom this sycomore is to be brought into relation. The one usually selected was Hathor, the mistress of the West, but besides her we find Isis, Selkit, Neith, Nut (cf. Wiedemann, Rec. de trav. rel. à l'Egypt. xvii. 10 f.). Within the sacred domain of the temples there were groves, the trees of which were occasionally venerated in the same sense as everything else connected with the temple. In the Ptolemaic period an attempt was made systematically to establish this veneration in the case of all temples, and thus to include the various species of sacred trees in the lists of materia sacra. Thus in 24 nomes we find the Nile acacia, in 17 the Cordia myxa (?), in 16 the Zizyphus Spina Christi, in 1 or 2 the sycomore, the Juniperus Phœnicea, and the Tamarix Nilotica. In all, 10 species of trees appear as sacred. Of these as many as 3 are sometimes venerated in the same nome (Moldenke, Ueber die in altägyp. Texten erwähnten Bäume, 8 ff.). So far as we know, the only tree that played a considerable rôle in the temple cult was one that grew at Heliopolis near the spot where the sun-cat killed the Āpepi serpent. From this tree the Phœnix took flight, and on its leaves Thoth or Safech inscribed the name of the king in order thus to endue him with everlasting life (cf. Lefébure, Sphinx, v. 1 ff., 65 ff.).

The most surprising circumstance in connexion with the whole subject of plant worship is that the tree which is most characteristic of the Nile valley, namely the palm, makes its appearance only very rarely in the cultus inscriptions. Thus, the palm is found instead of the sycomore of Nut upon a relief now at Berlin (No. 7322); and a stele at Dorpat (PSBA xvi. 152) mentions the goddess Ta-urt of the Dum palm; but such notices are only exceptional.

With greater frequency than sacred trees we encounter the special gods of corn, who, as noted above, are sometimes assigned to the train of the Nile god. Also the dogma of the resurrection of Osiris is brought into connexion with plant life, and Osiris awakening to new life is portrayed as a mummy lying upon its back, and with corn sprouting from it (Papyr. Louvre, v. 27, in Pierret, Dogme de la resurrection; relief at Philæ, in Rosellini, Mon. del culto, p. 23). Allusions to this doctrine are found as early as the Middle Empire (Birch, Coffin of Amamu, pl. 276), and then repeatedly in the Book of the Dead. Even in the Osiris festivals of late times the sprouting of grains of corn from the figure of Osiris still plays a part; and in a tomb of the time of Amenophis III. proof has been discovered by Loret (cf. Sphinx, iii. 106 f.) that it was occasionally the practice then, in connexion with burial, to make corn grow from an image of Osiris as a kind of pledge of human immortality.

(g) Of city divinities there must have been a considerable number, but only one of them is mentioned somewhat frequently, namely the goddess of Thebes, who was conceived of as an armed woman, and who appears in two forms, namely Uas-t 'Thebes,' and 'she who is there in sight of her lord' (originally the necropolis of Drah abu Neggah; cf. Maspero, Ét. de myth. ii. 403). As yet, we know nothing of temples erected in honour of such personifications. Even a foreign city deity found admittance into the Egyptian pantheon, namely the goddess Kadesh, who derived her name from a Syrian city on the Orontes, and who comes before us as queen of heaven, mistress of all gods, daughter of Rā. She is portrayed, with a front view, as a woman standing upon a lion. To what foreign deity she originally answered, whether a Semitic Astarte in her local form as worshipped at Ḳadesh, or a Hittite goddess, cannot be determined, but the fashion of her portraiture makes the latter supposition the more probable.

(h) There were also certain buildings, temples, pyramids, and the like, that were temporarily regarded as divinities to whom veneration was due.

(5) DEIFIED ABSTRACT NOTIONS.—These hold a special place in the list of Egyptian objects of veneration. It would be a mistake to look upon such deification as the result of profound philosophical speculation; it is simply a development of the fundamental idea which never ceased to make itself felt in Egypt, namely, that every word must have corresponding to it a perceptible form, a kind of personality, which could be portrayed and, if necessary, worshipped. The number of abstract notions known as yet from lists of gods or from other indications, is pretty large; the discovery of fuller lists will no doubt increase the number. The base of an altar (now at Turin, pub. in TSBA iii. p. 110 ff.) dating from the time of king Pepi I. (6th dynasty), supplies the following group: Day (Hru), Year (Renpt), Eternity (Ḥeḥ), Unendingness (Ṭ'eṭ-ta); followed by Life (Ȧnch), Stability (Ṭeṭ), and Joy (Fu-t-ȧb). Further, we find here Seeing (Ma), and Hearing (Sen), and, finally, Right Speaking (Maā-cher). In other inscriptions appear Taste (Ḥu), Perception (Sa), Strength (Us), etc. When it is desired to portray these abstract notions, they are simply provided with a human form having the appropriate written sign on its head, or their ideographic hieroglyph sign is drawn with arms and legs appended to it. In the temple cult these forms in general scarcely received actual worship, although some of them are mentioned not infrequently under the New Empire. A number of abstract notions seem to make their appearance as a connected group at Hermopolis, where the so-called eight elementary deities enjoyed Divine honours. These eight, divided into four pairs, each with a male and a female, were Eternity (Ḥeḥ), Darkness (Kek), Heavenly Water (Nu), Earthly Water of Inundation (of the Nile, Nenû); see the Literature in Wiedemann, Orient. Ltztg. iv. 381 ff. From this starting-point they found admittance into other temples as well.

There was only one abstract notion which by itself played a prominent part, namely the goddess Maāt, 'Truth,' who appears as a woman, with the ideogram for 'truth' upon her head. She is quite materialistically conceived of; one can eat and drink the truth, in order to become truthful. Maāt is mentioned from the earliest times onwards, but, in spite of the widely diffused veneration for her, she had seldom a sacrificial cult of her own. When prominent officials are called 'priests of the truth,' this is probably rather a title intended to characterize them as specially truthful, and not the name of an actual office. Occasionally we hear of two Truths, in which case there was probably in view the distinction between truth in action, i.e. justice, and inward sincerity. The goddess of Truth, when represented as human, appears at times blindfolded, because she judges without respect of persons. She conducts the dead into the judgment-hall of Osiris, where she attends to the weighing of the heart. In mythology she plays no part; and if at times she appears as the consort of Thoth, this has nothing to do with her proper significance, but rests upon later speculation, which desired to bring the god of wisdom into connexion with the truth. A similar judgment is to be passed on the statement that Maāt is a daughter of Rā. This is simply an expression of the thought that the light of the sun brings the truth to view. None of these notions has been further worked up (cf. for Maāt, Stern, Aegyp. Ztschr. 1877, pp. 86 ff., 113 ff.; Wiedemann, Ann. du Musée Guimet, x. 581 ff.).

iii. THE CULTUS.—The worship of the deity in the temple was concerned, above all, with the charge of the image of the god or the sacred animal that found a place in the holiest part of the building, the naos. The door leading to the naos, or the barred gate giving access to the god-animal, was fastened by a priest every evening with a strip of papyrus, the ends of which were smeared with clay and a stamp impressed upon them. The following morning it was one of the first sacred functions to break this seal, and thus to renew the possibility of communion between the deity and man. Regarding this ceremony and others which accompanied or followed the breaking of the seal, we are informed through the ritual books of various temples which have come down to us, and which describe the various sacred duties to be performed on the morning of each day. We have the ritual at Abydos, in the time of Seti I., for Osiris, Isis, Horus, Amon, Rā-Harmachis and Ptaḥ (publ. by Mariette in Abydos, i. 34–86); at Karnak (in the Hall of Pillars, back wall), from the time of Seti I., for Amon-Rā (not yet publ.). Then there are isolated pieces; mostly with reference to royal visits to the temple, containing also pictures of the various ceremonies, mostly in the correct order, but furnished with abbreviated legends. These are to be met with on most temple walls, on the outside of the naos, temple doors, obelisks, etc. Further texts may be found in Papyr. Berlin 55 [now 3055] for Amon, and 14 and 53 [now 3014 and 3053] for Mut, both dating from the time of the 20th dynasty (publ. in Hieratische Papyr. aus der Königl. Mus. zu Berlin, i., Leipzig, 1896–1901); cf. Lemm, Ritualbuch des Ammondienstes, Leipzig, 1882; and Moret, Le rituel du culte divin journalier en Égypte, Paris, 1902. For the parallel texts of the ritual for the dead, cf. especially Schiaparelli, Il Libro dei Funerali, ii., where numerous examples are given; for the meaning and translation of the latter texts, cf. Maspero, Ét. de myth. i. 283 ff. A number of the statements that come under the present category are already found in the Pyramid texts of the 6th dynasty. These surviving accounts of the ritual show that the ceremonies were nearly the same in almost all Egyptian temples.

There is first a brief indication of the ritual act to be performed, with a picture of it also when the text happens to be engraved in relief on the temple wall, and then follow the terms of the prayer which the priest is to utter as he performs each of the acts named. These prayers consist almost exclusively of invocations of the deity, without any further point of interest, whereas the acts themselves have a higher significance, as they let us see what was the form of the ancient Egyptian divine service. They show at the same time that the latter was very much of one cast, for the same ceremonies as were performed before the god every morning were performed also by the king when he brought a great offering to the temple in the hope of obtaining from the god in return the promise of victory over his enemies, joy, strength, or everlasting life. Much the same usages were followed, moreover, when the object was to reanimate a dead man, that he might be able to enter the world beyond and eat and drink there. We cannot go more fully into these ceremonies here, but we must speak of their order:—(1) There was first the 'striking or rubbing of the fire,' i.e. a spark was generated by striking a flint or rubbing dry pieces of wood against each other, and this spark was regarded as Divine and as an effluence of the eye of the sun-god Horus. It furnished the means of lighting the temple and of kindling the fire for the burnt-offering. The latter was the main object, for now follow: (2) the taking hold of the censer, (3) the placing of the incense-container on the censer, (4) the casting of the incense into the flame. Thereupon (5, 6) the ministrant advanced to the elevated place, the naos, (7) loosed the band that fastened its door, (8) broke the seal, (9) opened the naos, and thus (10) made the face of the god himself visible, and (11) looked upon the god. Reverently (12–17) he cast himself upon the ground, raised himself, and repeated the prostration a number of times, keeping his face all the while turned towards the earth, and then (18, 19) commenced a hymn of praise to the god. When this was ended, a series of offerings were presented to the god: first of all (20) a mixture of oil and honey, with which it was customary to anoint the images of the gods, and then (21) incense. After this the priest stepped back from the naos into the adjoining room of the temple, where (22) he uttered a short prayer. Then (23, 24) he took his place once more in front of the naos, and (25) solemnly praying ascended the steps which led from the temple floor to the level of the interior of the naos. Whereas he had hitherto stood lower than the deity, he now felt himself, after performing the above-mentioned ceremonies, to be on an equal footing with him, and might thus stand on the same level. But scarcely had he taken this step when he was seized once more with awe of the god, whose countenance was now distinctly visible (26, 27), he looked upon him (28), and repeated the prostrations he had previously performed (29–34). Then he burned incense (35, 36), and uttered one or more prayers and hymns in honour of the god (37–41). A figure of the goddess of Truth was now presented to the god (42), who, in order to be truthful, must receive the truth into himself by eating or drinking. Then followed an incense-offering, meant not only for the god who was the special object of worship, but for all his companions who shared the veneration of the temple (43). Then began the purifying and clothing of the god. First of all the priest laid both his hands upon the god himself (44), then upon the upper side of the case in which the figure was placed, in order to effect its purifications as well (45). Then he purified the deity with four libation-pitchers full of water (46) and with four red pitchers full of water (47), fumigated him with incense (48), brought a white sash (49) and put it on the god (50). Then he put on him, successively, a green, a bright-red, and a dark-red sash (51–53), after which he brought to him two kinds of ointment (54, 55), then green and black eye-paint (56, 57), an act which was followed by scattering dust before the god (58), in order thereby to make even the spot, on which the god or the sacred animal stood, clean. The priest next walked four times round the god (59), and this ceremony explains why the temple naos occupied a detached position in the sanctuary, namely, in order that this walking round it might be possible. At the close of this performance the presentation of offerings again took place. First the god received natron with which he was purified (60), then he was fumigated with incense (61), and underwent a purification with four grains of a substance brought from the south, and then with four grains of the same from the north (62, 63), then a purification with water (64), followed by a fumigation with ordinary incense, and another with the Ānti incense from Arabia (65, 66). Here ended the regular Divine service.

The object of all these acts was to clothe and to purify the god. The latter point was considered important, because the Egyptians in all matters of religion laid special stress upon bodily cleanness. Washings of every kind were required before any sacred transaction; even the gods must wash themselves repeatedly if they desire to consult the sacred books. Fumigating and rubbing with ointment also come under the category of purification, it being the custom in the Nile valley to perfume oneself before important transactions of a civil as well as a religious character. The man who above all had to wash himself was the priest, who was accordingly designated 'the clean' (āb, uāb), the ideogram for which is a man over whom water is poured or who finds himself beside water, in allusion to these frequent washings.

In addition to the purifying, the supplying of food and drink to the god or to the sacred animal played a part in the cultus; but here we have no extensive books of ritual to tell us in detail, for instance, about the prayers to be uttered in connexion with the performance of the various acts. No doubt, all this was regulated by as exact a code of ceremonial as the actions and prayers connected with the clothing and the purifying of the god. In regard also to other religious ceremonies we are without the prescriptions as to the occasions and the ordering of processions, burnt-offerings, and various consecrations. There are merely allusions in the inscriptions, but these show that here too everything was fixed by a hard-and-fast rule instead of being left to the discretion of the individual worshipper or the temple college.

iv. CONCEPTIONS OF A FUTURE LIFE.—(1) The notions as to a world beyond (cf. Wiedemann, The Realms of the Egyptian Dead, London, 1901), where gods and the dead have their home, are primarily connected in the Nile valley with the sun and his 24-hours' course. The sun rises in the east in the morning, and sails in his bark to the west; for the motion of the sun, like that of all the heavenly bodies, is conceived of by the Egyptians as effected by a vessel, the waters on which it sails being sometimes viewed as a heavenly ocean, and sometimes as a Nile that flows through the brazen heaven. The sun-bark is generally supposed to be carried along by the stream, requiring merely to be steered; it is only exceptionally that it is represented as drawn by jackals which run on both banks of the heavenly stream. In the cabin of the bark sits the sun-god, while other gods man the vessel. The day voyage lasts 12 hours, that is to say, the Egyptians divided the time from sunrise to sunset into 12 equal parts, these being consequently, as a matter of course, longer in summer than in winter.

The sun sets in the west, and commences now upon a subterranean stream its night voyage, which also lasts 12 hours. The whole voyage of the sun is compared by the Egyptians to the life of man. The god is born in the morning, grows old during his course, sinks in the evening, as an old man, into the night, to rise again as a new god the following morning. Usually the whole process is accomplished, as indicated above, within four and twenty hours; more rarely, instead of this, it is spread over a whole year or over longer periods of 365 and more years. Wherever the sun comes, he finds gods and spirits, but the distribution of these beings over heaven, earth, and the under world is variously conceived of at different times.

(2) As to the dwelling-place of the gods themselves we have only meagre data. In the matter of the cultus, apart from the offerings which were daily offered to the sun upon open-air altars, the whole concern was with the embodiments of the gods that dwelt in the temples. If Doppelgängers who did not dwell on earth were postulated for these, they were spoken of without any precise localizing of them, or they were called by such general titles as 'lord of heaven or earth or Egypt,' etc. In later times, in addition to this, the various gods are frequently conceived of pantheistically as inhabiting the whole world. Thus it is said (Horrack, Lamentations d' Isis, pl. 5, l. 2) of Osiris: 'The heaven contains thy soul, the earth contains thy forms, the under world (Duat) contains thy secrets.' A dwelling-place of the gods in the sense of the Greek Olympus is unknown to the Egyptians.

(3) Far more numerous than the statements regarding the abodes of gods are those about the region which was believed to be the place of sojourn of dead men when they were awakened to new life. This region is variously placed—

(a) Above the earth, in heaven.—Different views prevailed as to how the soul succeeded in gaining admittance into the sun-bark among the stars or into the spreading Plain of the Blessed. According to some, the soul, immediately upon a man's death, hastened to the west to the spot where the sun sank through a narrow opening into the deep, and there clambered into the solar bark. On board of the latter it passed through the under world, and the following morning rose to heaven. Others believed in a ladder, by whose aid the soul could climb to heaven. Another set of notions attached themselves to the cremation of the dead; the soul was supposed to ascend with the smoke from the burning corpse. But the most widely diffused view was that the soul had the form of a bird, that of kings being in the form of a hawk, that of other men in that of a bird with a human head. In this shape it left the body as it grew cold in death, and flew upwards.

On reaching heaven, the soul dwelt in the company of the gods and of the souls that had arrived there before it. How a place was assigned it here is a question on which the Egyptians in general do not appear to have had settled convictions. Only the Pyramids of the 5th and 6th dynasties notice it, the dead Pharaoh being here represented as seizing the supremacy of the other world by force. With the aid of his servants he captures the gods on his arrival, causes them to be slaughtered and cooked, and devours them along with their souls and attributes, crowns and bracelets. In this way their magical power passes over to him, and he becomes the mightiest of the gods. The texts give no indication, it is true, of how he was able to maintain this position against a subsequently dying Pharaoh, or to avoid being himself captured and eaten in turn.

(b) Under the earth.—Here lay Duat, 'the deep,' which the sun passed through by night, and which was divided into 12 parts, corresponding to the 12 hours of night. These were separated from one another by doors, or, according to another view, by massive gates. This realm is described in words and illustrated by pictures in a number of texts, notably in the Book of Am-Duat, 'that which is in the deep,' and the Book of the Gates, the beginnings of which go back to the Middle Empire, but which were widely circulated above all in Thebes from the 18th to the 20th dynasty. In later times they were less frequently copied. While their accounts are similar in their fundamental ideas, there are far-reaching differences in details. Through the midst of Duat flows a Nile, upon which floats the bark containing the ram-headed night sun. On the banks to right and left were found innumerable demons of the most varied forms, men, animals, especially serpents, or hybrid forms, human and animal. Many of them attend upon the sun, aiding him in his course. Others, with the great Āpepi serpent at their head, labour to destroy the sun, but are always overcome, although this does not prevent their always commencing afresh the conflict of darkness with light—a conflict whose end the Egyptians never attempted to portray, and probably never expected.

The souls of men joined the sun in the west when he entered Duat. The god assigned them fields in the various divisions. Here they lived under conditions that were in general far from enjoyable, and had to render help to the god on subsequent nights. Each of them had the benefit of only a single hour's sunshine upon their land. As soon as the god had left any division, night reigned in it, illuminated at most by the seas of fire in which enemies of the sun-god were burned, or by fire-vomiting serpents. Originally it was held that all men, good and bad, kings and subjects, would experience much the same lot in these regions. Only those who were expert in magic might escape from Duat and pursue their journey in company with the sun till they reached a new day. In later times Duat became the scene of a process of judgment, in which sentence was pronounced concerning good and evil. The good were then allowed to till the fields, the bad were punished by being plunged in seas of water and fire.

Similar and as little reassuring is the account of the future world contained also in other Egyptian works; hence, above all, the numerous exhortations to enjoy life which were in vogue from ancient times down to the closing period of Egyptian history. Here the future world is presented as a land of sleep and darkness, whose inhabitants recognize neither father nor mother, in which they pine for water and fresh air, and where there is a reign of absolute death, which shows no tenderness to its worshippers, and regards not the offerer of sacrifice.

(c) On the earth.—On this theory the realm of the dead appears to have been for long sought in the north, in the Delta. This Plain of Peace or Plain of Åalu (i.e. 'of marsh plants'; later, by popular etymology, explained as Plain 'of worms'), as it was called, was thought of as a district traversed by a stream and divided by numerous canals and river-arms into islands, which were the abode of the gods and the dead. The latter were mainly occupied with agriculture, which provided them with the necessary food. When the Delta came to be better known, the realm of the dead was naturally banished from it. At first it moved further north, still continuing on earth, but was afterwards transferred to heaven, being located in the region of the Great Bear.

In that form of Egyptian conceptions of the future world which prevailed in later times, above all in the Osirian faith, a realm of the dead, similarly thought of and named, lies in another quarter of the heavens, in the west, where the sun sets. Whether this notion is as old as that of the dwelling of the dead in the north—which appears most likely—or was of later origin, cannot be made out from the texts. From the time of the Middle Empire the adherents of the Osirian system are likewise at one regarding the western situation of the Plain of Åalu. The dead man, before he could arrive there, must first traverse the desert. In his earthly form, with the traveller's staff in his hand, he set out on his journey, commencing, according to the commonest view, at Abydos, from which a number of caravan roads ran to the west. Hunger and thirst threatened him; with Divine help he procured refreshment from the presiding deities of isolated trees; by means of magical formulæ he overcame the serpents which beset him, and the crocodiles which filled the streams he had to pass through. He was aided by the same kind of formulæ also when he wished to pass terrible demons, or had to go through mysterious rooms, or was terrified by all kinds of dangers. These formulæ, consequently, appeared to be indispensably necessary for reaching the life beyond; and they were collected into a compilation called by modern scholars the Book of the Dead. From the time of the Middle Empire it was a favourite practice to commit these formulæ to the grave along with the body of the deceased, inscribing them at times on the walls of the tomb or on the coffin, at other times entrusting them to the corpse itself, written on papyrus or on the swathings of the mummy. In the various copies extant the terms of the formulæ are approximately the same, but their order varies very frequently. The Egyptians did not mark off the road to the world beyond with geographical precision; the notions on this subject changed again and again; the order of the demons to be encountered and of the various realms of the gods is not the same. Only the starting-point is given, the western mountain-chain of Egypt, and the goal, the Hall of Judgment, in which the verdict is pronounced on the dead (see below, p. 197^a). If this was favourable, they entered the Plain of Åalu, to dwell there for ever, or at least to find a home, which they left only if it was their own wish to do so. In the latter event, they could assume any other form they pleased, visit the earth, or even change themselves into gods.

(4) The Osirian doctrine of immortality.—We have already noticed in the preceding pages a considerable number of Egyptian conceptions of the future life. In this matter there was no uniform system of belief in the Nile valley. It appears to have been a generally accepted dogma that man's life endures for ever; but this was represented and developed by each nome in conjunction with its own religious conceptions, without any regard to the possible prevalence of contradictory notions amongst their neighbours. They even went further than this in their want of system. The very same individuals occasionally regarded views of the future life which were logically self-contradictory as equally legitimate, and gave them a place side by side in their funeral texts. We must here pass over a long list of such doctrines, and rest content with giving a short account of the most important of them—a dogma which already played a part in the earliest period of Egyptian history, and became from c. 2000 B.C. the prevailing conception of the future life, till, finally, in the first millennium B.C. it was practically the only doctrine on the subject that was taken account of by the great mass of the Egyptian people.

(a) This doctrine connects itself with the fortunes of the god Osiris. The first biography of this god we possess comes from the post-Christian period, being found in Plutarch's de Iside et Osiride; but allusions in the monuments show that much the same story of his life was known as early as the Old Empire. It is true that, besides this main narrative, there were a number of others which showed deviations in details. Above all, the conceptions regarding the most important episode in the god's existence, namely his resurrection, differed very widely, especially in the later texts. This may be due to the fact that, now that the Osirian doctrine was the prevailing one, the attempt was made to assimilate to it other doctrines of immortality, which originally started from other divine conceptions, or, conversely, to assimilate the Osirian doctrine itself to these heterogeneous processes of thought. The most widely current version, however, continued, to all appearance, to be that handed down by Plutarch, which is essentially as follows:—

Rhea (Nut), the consort of Helios (Rā), had sexual relations with Kronos (Seb). Helios observed this, and laid a curse upon her to the effect that she should not give birth to a child in any month of the year. But Hermes (Thoth), who was also in love with the goddess, succeeded in evading the curse. He won from Selene (Åāḥ) at draughts the 70th part of each day, and formed from these 5 intercalary days, which he placed at the end of the year. Osiris was born on the first of these days, Aroĕris (Ḥer-ur, the elder Horus) on the second, Set on the third, Isis on the fourth, Nephthys on the fifth. Osiris and Aroĕris pass for children of Helios, Isis of Hermes, Set and Nephthys of Kronos. According to some accounts, Osiris and Isis had already intercourse in their mother's womb, the result being the birth of Aroëris. In general Osiris and Isis appear as one married couple, Set and Nephthys as another. After a time Osiris became king of Egypt, ruled mildly, gave laws, taught the doctrines concerning the gods, and then journeyed over the world as an introducer of civilization. On his return he was murdered, on the 17th of Athyr, in the 28th year of his life or his reign, by Set, who had associated with him as fellow-conspirators 72 men and a queen of Ethiopia named Aso. Isis' grief was profound, but she found a companion in Anubis, a son of Osiris and Nephthys. Besides, she had herself a son by Osiris, namely Horus, who later became a helper to her after having during his youth been often threatened with danger at the hands of Set. According to Plutarch, Isis discovered the coffin in which Set had deposited Osiris, at Byblos in Phœnicia, and brought it from there to Egypt. Set, however, found the coffin which had been concealed by Isis, tore the corpse of Osiris to pieces, and scattered them. When Isis discovered this outrage, she searched for the different parts of her husband's corpse, and, wherever she found one of them, erected an Osiris tomb. Then she and Horus commenced a campaign against Set, which ended in the victory of Horus. By way of appendix Plutarch states that Isis had intercourse even with the dead Osiris, the result of which was the birth of Harpocrates (Ḥer-pe-chrut, 'Horus the child').

When we look more closely at the treatment of the corpse of Osiris, as described in Plutarch's narrative, we are struck with one feature which points to a mixing up of originally different accounts of the fate of the corpse. At first the latter rests as a whole in the coffin, then it is cut in pieces, and, finally, the pieces are again brought together. As a matter of fact, we have here a reflexion of the chief points in the Egyptian treatment of dead bodies; the only feature wanting is cremation, which in the earliest times was practised in the case of kings, and later occurs sporadically and in connexion with human sacrifice. This omission must be due to the circumstance that, at the time when the Osirian doctrine was attaining to full vigour, cremation was no longer sufficiently in vogue to demand consideration. During the Naqada period, a dismemberment of the corpse was customary at burial. In the Pyramid era this was generally replaced by the burial of the whole body, which it was sought at the same time to preserve from decay by a more or less complete process of embalming. During this same period we find also a transition form, by which the corpse was first allowed to decompose, and then the bones were collected and placed again in the proper order of a skeleton. At a later period the custom that had practically exclusive sway in the Nile valley was that of embalming, which then came in general to be regarded as that applied to Osiris. During the process of embalming the latter, Nephthys and Isis were said to have sung dirges over the god, in order to aid in his resurrection; and a similar practice for a like purpose was followed also in connexion with human interments (see the texts in Horrack, Lamentations d'Isis et de Nephthys, Paris, 1866; Budge, Archæologia, lii. 11 ff., 65 ff. The festivals in commemoration of the burial and the resurrection of Osiris at the end of the month Choiak are portrayed at Denderah; cf. Loret, Rec. de trav. rel. à l'Égypt. iii. 43 ff., iv. 21 ff., v. 85 ff.).

In addition to the embalming of the god, we hear of the reconstruction of his body. This connects itself with the erecting of his spinal column, and a festival in its honour was held on the 30th of Choiak especially at Busiris in Lower Egypt. Finally, side by side with this there lingers on till the latest times the conception of the dismemberment, in consequence of which various parts of Osiris' body remained at different places in the land, and continued to be venerated as relics in the particular temples, the so-called Serapeums. Upon this theory, then, there was no such collection of the parts of the body as is referred to by Plutarch. Thus the head of the god was said to be preserved at Memphis, the neck at Letopolis, the heart at Athribis. There is, however, no fixed system in the matter; occasionally the same parts rest at different places, according to the tradition of the temples concerned. Thus the head, for instance, is claimed not only for Memphis but for Abydos, and the legs are catalogued as Divine relics at a plurality of sanctuaries.

(b) Taken as a whole, Osiris stands in Egypt for the prototype of the man who after a virtuous life must die, but who afterwards rose again to life for ever. Even in early times, moreover, an influence on the conception of Osiris entered from the side of the sun-religion. This movement appears to have originated at Memphis, where Osiris was identified with Sokaris, the local god of the dead and of the sun,—in Abydos this amalgamation rarely meets us. Then, when the sun-worship was centralized in Rā, the latter assumed the character of a parallel to Osiris. The custom grew up of identifying the fate and the death of Osiris with the fate of the sun; and, as the old Osiris myth was also retained, duplicate dates were thus obtained for the period of the year that marked the occurrence of the different events in the life of Osiris. For instance, the murder of Osiris fell, according to Papyrus Sallier iv. (19th dynasty) and Plutarch, upon the 17th of Athyr. Numerous other texts (from the 18th dynasty onwards), on the other hand, transfer this event to the end of the month Choiak, the period of the shortest days of the year, within which the death and the regeneration of the sun are accomplished. It is this contamination between the Osiris and the sun-god myths that explains how Osiris, from being a human king of divine descent, becomes a complete god. Thus a text of the 18th dynasty describes him in detailed fashion as creator of the world (see above, p. 179^b), although, remarkably enough, it contains also copious allusions to the usual Osiris myth, and remarks: 'Isis the glorious, the avenger of her brother (Osiris), sought him and rested not while she journeyed through this land full of grief; she ceased not until she had found him; a wind she stirred up with her feathers, a breeze she created with her wings; she performed the panegyrics usual at burial; she raised up the wearied parts of him whose heart is still (the dead Osiris); she took his seed and fashioned an heir for herself.' The extraordinary method by which Horus is here generated after the death of his father is mentioned also in Plutarch, and meets us already in the Pyramid texts. This was a matter of faith then during the whole period of Egyptian history, and is even frequently (in Abydos and Denderah) the subject of pictorial representation (cf. Wiedemann, Rec. de trav. rel. à l'Égypt. xx. 134 ff.).

(c) Osiris in his lifetime had been a king on earth, after his death he became ruler in the world beyond. He there passed judgment on the dead, to him were presented the prescribed offerings which were meant to procure food and drink for the dead. His sisters Isis and Nephthys play no rôle in the world beyond. In general, Set, the murderer of the god, is of course tabooed there, and hence his name is avoided in sepulchral texts. This is carried so far that king Seti I., in the inscriptions on his tomb, in writing his own name, everywhere replaces the Set by Osiris. It is true that alongside of the usual tradition a wholly different class of conceptions is found attached to the god Set. In Tanis, for instance, he is regarded as a good god and a favourite of the sun-god, on whose behalf he pierces with his lance the Āpepi serpent—in contrast, again, to the Theban conception, in which Set himself corresponds essentially to the Āpepi serpent. This difference is probably connected with the circumstance that at Thebes one started from the original form of the Osiris myth, where Set appears as the murderer of Osiris; whereas, at Tanis, Set or Sutech, as god of the desert and of foreign parts, was amalgamated with the foreign god Baal, who was thought of as the sun-god, the result of which was that in this roundabout way Set assumed a wholly altered character.

Of far more importance in the future world than Set is the jackal-god Anubis, who is generally presented as a son of Osiris and Nephthys, but occasionally also as a son of Rā. He had aided Isis and directed the embalming of Osiris. According to the usual view, he was one of the guides of the dead, whom he, alternating in this function with Thoth, conducted into the judgment-hall of Osiris. His cult had no great vogue, whereas in early times a prominent part was played by another jackal-god Ȧp-uat (see above, p. 183). The worship of the latter had its centres at Lycopolis in Upper Egypt and Lycopolis in the Delta. In consequence of this double local worship, we frequently hear of two gods of the same name, who are called, respectively, 'Ȧp-uat of the south' and 'Ȧp-uat of the north,' and, further, by a combination of Ȧp-uat with Anubis, two jackals are frequently portrayed upon steles of the dead as guardians of the under world.

(d) The doctrine of immortality attached to the name of Osiris is the best known to us of all the Egyptian conceptions of the future life. To it is devoted the so-called Book of the Dead, whose oldest texts date from the Middle Empire (cf. Lepsius, Aelteste Texte des Todtenbuchs, Berlin, 1867; Birch, Egyptian Texts of the Coffin of Amamu, London, 1886; Lepsius, Denkm. ii. 98 f., 145–148; Maspero, Mém. de la Miss. du Caire, i. 155 f. [These texts show a great resemblance to the Pyramid texts which Maspero published in Les inscriptions des Pyramides de Saqqarah, Paris, 1894, a reprint from Rec. de trav. rel. à l'Égypt., vols. iii.–xiv.]). Its period of bloom, to which belong the copies that are relatively freest from verbal errors and best illustrated, falls within the period from the 18th to the 20th dynasty (for the texts see Naville, Das aegyp. Todtenbuch der 18–20 Dynastie, Berlin, 1886; le Page Renouf, Facsimile of the Papyrus of Ani, London, 1890 [2nd ed. by Budge, 1894–1895, with Introduction and Translation]; Budge, Facsimiles of the Papyri of Hunefer, etc., London, 1899 [among them notably the very important text of the Papyrus of Nu]. Translations have been published by le Page Renouf in PSBA xv. ff. [recently continued by Naville]; Budge, The Book of the Dead, 3 vols., London, 1898 [abridged ed. under same title, London, 1901]. Renouf's notes are mainly on the language; Budge discusses also the history of the Book of the Dead, with the later and the supplementary texts). In later times many passages were no longer intelligible to the scribes, who, accordingly, frequently produced very faulty copies. To this category belongs the Turin exemplar (emanating from the Ptolemaic period) published by Lepsius, which is now used as the basis for citations from the Book of the Dead (Lepsius, Todtenbuch der Aegypter, Berlin, 1842). A similar but less complete text is found in the Papyrus Cadet used by Champollion, and published in the Description d'Égyp. Ant. ii. 72–75. Translations, mainly based on the Turin exemplar, have been published by Birch (in Bunsen's Egypt's Place in Universal History, v. 123 ff.) and Pierret (Le Livre des Morts, Paris, 1881).

At a late period, from about B.C. 1000 onwards, there grew up, side by side with the Book of the Dead, numerous religious compilations, based upon the same doctrines, and utilizing the Book itself as a source. Thus we have the various Books of 'Breathing,' the Book of 'Journeying through Eternity,' the Book of 'May my name flourish,' and the like. (Texts of this class have been published and discussed by, amongst others, Maspero, Les momies royales de Deir el-Bahari, p. 594 f.; cf. Budge, The Book of the Dead, 1898, ii. pp. clxxxiii ff. [text of Nesi-Chunsu]; Horrack, Livre des Respirations, Paris, 1877 [another text in Budge, l.c. p. cxcv ff., publ. by Budge with the Book of the Dead of Hunefer]; von Bergmann, 'Das Buch vom Durchwandeln der Ewigkeit' in Sitzungsber. der Wiener Akad. 1886, p. 369 ff.; Lieblein, Le Livre Égyptien 'Que mon nom fleurisse,' Leipzig, 1895; Papyrus Louvre, No. 3283, ed. by Wiedemann in Hieratische Texte, Leipzig, 1879). These works help in some measure to fill up lacunæ in the conceptions of the Book of the Dead. Further supplements, emanating from the same circle of ideas, are furnished by the rituals for the process of embalming (Rhind Papyri, ed. by Birch, London, 1863, and Brugsch, Leipzig, 1865; a 'hieratic Papyrus from Vienna' in von Bergmann's Hieratische Texte, Vienna, 1887; texts from Gizeh and Paris in Maspero's Mém. sur quelques papyrus du Louvre, Paris, 1875) and for the ceremonies at the door of the tomb (Schiaparelli, Libro dei Funerali, Turin, 1881–1890; cf. Maspero, Ét. de myth. i. 283 ff.).

These texts yield an uncommonly large number of notices with reference to the notions of immortality that attached to Osiris, but they contain nothing like a systematic Osirian religion. This is due to the circumstance that from first to last the Book of the Dead was a collection of hymns to gods and of magical formulæ, which were based upon the most diverse fundamental doctrines, and were united in a single work without any attempt being made to remove the contradictions and establish a harmony. As time went on, this compilation always received fresh accessions in the shape of independent passages; and, in addition to this, the already existing texts were constantly being expanded at every turn, without any regard to the harmony of the various doctrines expressed.

(e) Thus the same confusion that reigns in Egyptian religion in general, prevails also in the Book of the Dead and its supplementary texts. It is impossible here to illustrate this in detail; we must be content to sketch briefly the principal features of the Osirian faith, passing over all incidental points and particular deviations.

Originally, the adherents of Osiris appear to have held, in accordance with the teaching of the Book of the Dead, that the dead man as a whole would enter upon the way to the world beyond. The name Osiris—and this custom persisted through the whole course of Egyptian history—was then given to him, in the hope that, like the god Osiris, he would attain to immortality. In earlier times, so far as we know, the deceased was always thought of as male. It was only at a later period, after c. 500 B.C., that women began to have their sex left to them, and to be sometimes called in the funeral texts by the name Hathor instead of Osiris.

As experience proved more and more that mummies did not leave the sepulchres, a distinction was drawn between the mummy (cha) and the Osiris; the former remained in the coffin, the latter passed to the Plain of Ȧalu. All the same, however, the two were thought of as essentially identical. The mummy was equipped for the journey to the world beyond, the necessary amulets and magical formulæ were given to it, the tomb was so arranged that it could serve as a dwelling-place of the Osiris, and offerings of food and drink were put in it.

While, on the above view, the immortal part of the deceased, his soul as we should say, was an Osiris, thought of as with an earthly human form, in other places the soul was quite differently conceived. But these divergent views were, even at an early, and still more fully at a later, period amalgamated with the Osiris conception just mentioned, without on that account being completely given up. Thus it came about that a man was credited with a number of souls that pursued their course side by side. It was then supposed that in the man's lifetime these souls were united, while at death they forsook the corpse and sought, each one independently, the way to the next world. If they succeeded in this, and if the deceased was found righteous when tried before Osiris, his souls once more united within him and lived with him in the Plain of Åalu, as they had once done on earth. The fact that these part-souls are borrowed from originally independent doctrines, explains how the views of their nature frequently clash and contradict one another, and, above all, how a number of attributes are ascribed to several of the part-souls. Here, again, there is a complete lack of any systematic harmonizing of the various doctrines, which must of necessity be logically contradictory. Besides, it is to be remarked that the texts in general do not introduce all the part-souls at once, and that now one and now another, according to place and time, came more to the front. The following is a list of the most important of them, along with some notes on the main significance attributed to each of them (cf. Wiedemann, The Ancient Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul, London, 1895, and 'Le Livre des Morts' in the Muséon, xv. 40 ff.):—

Ka had the same form as the man, and corresponded to the Osiris, standing in much the same relation to the man as that in which the word stands to the thing, the name to the person. The ka was born with the man, and could, even during his lifetime, separate itself from him to a certain extent: thus Amenophis III. honoured his own ka as a god. After a man's death, the ka could at any time return into the mummy, animate it, and assume the dignity of the 'ka living in his coffin.' For the most part, the cult of the dead recognized in the ka the essential personality of the deceased, the sacrificial formulæ were addressed to it, the tomb is its house, its temple, etc.

Ba has the form of a bird, mostly with human head and arms. At death it takes flight from the body, but visits it occasionally, and brings it food and drink. The ba itself, like the ka, also requires nourishment, being thus as little as the rest of the part-souls thought of as an immaterial being.

Ab or ḥāti is the heart. At death it leaves the man and goes by itself into the next world. In the Hall of Judgment it encounters its former possessor, and gives evidence, if need be, against him. In the event of his being pronounced righteous, it was restored to him; in the opposite case, the heart was supposed to live on in the Dwelling-place of Hearts. The deceased being bereft of his heart was thereby consigned to annihilation, for without a heart no existence was possible. This notion led to a peculiar practice. In the process of embalming, the readily decomposing heart was removed from the body. But, as neither the latter nor the Osiris could live without this organ, an artificial heart was substituted for the natural one. For this purpose they selected an amulet in the form of a small vase or of a scarabæus beetle, the latter symbolizing the notions of Becoming, Being, and Resurrection in general.

Sāḥu is the form, the envelope of the man.

Chaibit is the shadow cast by the man, which has an existence of its own, and is depicted as a black human form, or figuratively as a fan.

Chu (achu) is a shining transfigured soul, which was frequently, it may be assumed, conceived of in bird form.

Sechem is the personally conceived strength and power of the man; occasionally it appears to stand also for the form of the dead.

Ren is the name of the man. As long as this survived, and monuments associated with it lasted, as long as sacrificial formulæ, which commemorated it, were uttered, the dead man also continued to live in the other world. In the Saitic period in particular, great importance was attached to the ren, the conception of which at times coincides with that of the ka.

Literature.

i. LIFE.—Philo, called Judæus, to distinguish him from others of the same name, was a resident, probably a native, of Alexandria. Born about the year B.C. 20, or perhaps a little earlier, he was an older contemporary of Jesus Christ; and this fact lends a peculiar interest to his writings, as revealing the intellectual and religious position of a Hellenist who was at once enlightened and conservative. If these writings did not directly influence the earliest expressions of Christian faith, they certainly exhibit the line of philosophical thought, to some extent the phraseology, and the method of Scripture exegesis, to which that faith resorted when it first appealed to the Græco-Roman world as a system of theology.

Little is known of Philo's life. He belonged to a wealthy and distinguished family, his brother enjoying Imperial favour, and holding the high position of alabarch. Familiar with cultivated society and the luxuries of Alexandria, he did not regularly practise the asceticism which he sometimes admired in others. But he led a blameless and studious life, amply availing himself of those opportunities of learning which Alexandria at that time afforded, with its Museum and Library, its concourse of lecturers and students, and the commingling of ideas which resulted from its position as a meeting-place of East and West. He was well versed in Greek literature, especially in the works of the great philosophers, whom he regarded with admiration; but, instead of being led by this admiration to despise the simple records of the Pentateuch, he found whole and untarnished in the sacred books of Israel the wisdom which was partially contained in the writings of Greece, so that, with all his width of culture, he remained a devout and believing Jew. He was strongly attached to his own people. On some occasion he was sent to Jerusalem to offer prayer and sacrifices; and late in life, notwithstanding his aversion to the turbulence and anxieties of political life, he was so moved by the brutal riots in which the Jews were barbarously treated, that he went on an embassy to Caligula, in the winter of A.D. 39–40, to seek for redress and security against further outrage. From such an Emperor nothing was to be obtained but insult and even blows, so that the members of the embassy were glad to escape with their lives. Philo describes himself as old and grey-headed when writing an account of this transaction. The year of his death is unknown.

ii. WORKS.—Philo's collected works have appeared in several editions, of which that of Thomas Mangey is still the standard. This edition, however, published in 1742, is neither sufficiently complete nor sufficiently accurate, and will be superseded by that of Cohn and Wendland, of which four volumes have appeared (November 1902). A convenient edition is that of Richter, in eight volumes (1828–1830), containing in addition to Mangey's text the treatises de Festo Cophini and de Parentibus Colendis, and the books translated from Armenian into Latin by Aucher. From this the Tauchnitz edition (1851–1853) was taken, with some slight alterations.

The works fall into several groups. 1. There is a series of philosophical works, which are believed by Cohn to have been written in Philo's early life, because they contain little of his characteristic thought, and seem like exercises in philosophical style and dialectic. The difference of their character from that of the other writings of Philo has led to suspicions of their genuineness; but Cohn thinks their style so specifically Philonean that there ought not to be a doubt on this point. This series comprises:—1. de Incorruptibilitate Mundi. This has been commonly regarded as spurious, but its genuineness has been defended by F. Cumont in the Prolegomena to his edition of the treatise (Berlin, 1891), and is accepted by Cohn. At the close it promises a sequel, which, however, has not been preserved. 2. Quod omnis probus liber sit, which, as we learn from its opening lines, was preceded by a discourse Περὶ τοῦ πάντα δοῦλον εἶναι φαῦλον. 3. de Providentia, in two books, preserved in Armenian (with considerable fragments in Greek), of which the genuineness of the first, which has been somewhat injured in transmission, has been questioned. 4. Alexander, sive de eo quod rationem habeant bruta animalia, preserved in Armenian. The mention, in § 54, of an embassy to Rome cannot refer to the embassy to Gaius, as it occurs not in a speech of Philo's, but in the treatise of Alexander which Philo begins to read in § 10. But, as Cohn points out, the consulship of Germanicus, in A.D. 12, is alluded to in § 27, so that the book must be later than this, but might still be a comparatively early work. Philo, however, in § 73, says 'ex juventute in hac nutritus sum disciplina,' so that he probably wrote this treatise in middle life.

2. There is the great collection of writings containing explanations of the Pentateuch. This embraces three extensive works. 1. The large group of allegorical commentaries, designed for educated Jews. These begin with the treatises now known as Sacrarum Legum Allegoriæ (a title which once had a more extended application), and dealt with the text of Gn 2–20, certain parts being omitted for special reasons. There are several gaps, some of which were certainly, and others probably, filled by books which are lost. This group, following the order observed in the editions, ends with the two books (originally five) de Somniis. To this series must have belonged the two lost books 'On Covenants,' to which reference is made in de Mutatione Nominum, 6 [i. 586].* A second book 'On Drunkenness' also, with the exception of some fragments, is lost; and yet another treatise, 'On Rewards' (founded on Gn 15^1), is referred to as having preceded Quis rerum divinarum heres (1 [i. 473]). The fragment de Deo, preserved in Armenian, may have belonged to this group, and formed part of a treatise between de Mutatione Nominum and de Somniis. A few pages which appear in Mangey (ii. 265 ff.) as part of a separate tract, de Mercede Meretricis, have been restored by Cohn and Wendland to their proper place in the de Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini, § 5. The first section belongs to the treatise de Sacrificantibus, where it should be inserted between sections 4 and 5. 2. The explanation of portions of the Pentateuch in the form of question and answer. This was intended to cover the whole Pentateuch; but it is uncertain whether it was completed. Several books on Genesis and Exodus have been preserved in an Armenian translation, and some fragments in Latin and Greek. Though this work is shown by references to be later than the great group of allegorical commentaries, certain difficulties suggest that the two works may to some extent have proceeded simultaneously. 3. An exposition of the Mosaic legislation, in which allegorical explanation is sparingly used. The plan of this series is clearly described by Philo himself in the opening of the treatise de Præmiis et Pœnis. It dealt first with the account of the Creation, then with history, and lastly with laws, the following treatises being a supplement. It is clear, therefore, that the tract de Mundi Opificio, which occupies the first place in the editions, formed the beginning of this group. This indeed foreshadows the general plan, and is expressly referred to as 'the former composition' in the opening of the treatise de Abrahamo, which introduces the second division. The object of this division was to illustrate the excellence of the laws through typical examples. The essays on Isaac and Jacob are lost; and the three books on the Life of Moses do not belong to the series. The tract on Joseph is succeeded by one 'On the Decalogue,' and this again by four books on 'Special Laws.' The first of these has been broken up into several distinct treatises, beginning with that 'On Circumcision,' and the second and fourth books also comprise treatises with distinct titles. The essays on Fortitude, Philanthropy, and Penitence form a kind of appendix, and the work is completed by a dissertation on Rewards and Punishments, and on Curses.

3. There are several historical treatises, which were complete in themselves. 1. de Vita Mosis, originally in two, but now arranged in three books.

* The first number refers to the section in Richter and Tauchnitz; the subsequent figures to the volume and page of Mangey.

2. A work called Ὑποθετικά, of which only fragments have been preserved. This is perhaps the same as—3. The Apology for the Jews, from which Eusebius extracted an account of the Essenes (Præp. Ev. viii. 11), and to which perhaps belonged the de Vita Contemplativa, containing an account of the Therapeutæ. The genuineness of the latter has been sharply disputed by Lucius and others, and ably defended especially by Massebieau and Conybeare (the former in the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, xvi. [1887] pp. 170 ff., 284 ff.; the latter in his edition of the treatise, 1895. There are some valuable remarks also in Edersheim's article on Philo in Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Christian Biography, iv. 368 ff., and some of the principal objections are considered in a review of Conybeare in the Jewish Quarterly Review, 1896, p. 155 ff.). 4. in Flaccum. 5. Legatio ad Gaium, which survives out of five books Περὶ ἀρετῶν, describing the persecutions of the Jews, and the sad fate of the persecutors.

The editions contain also certain works, the spuriousness of which is generally admitted: de Mundo; and, in Armenian, de Sampsone and de Iona.

For fuller information and references, see the excellent section on the writings of Philo in Schürer's GJV^{3} iii. 487 ff. The above classification is in the main that suggested by Ewald (GVI^{2} vi. 294 ff.), who, however, regards the Life of Moses as an introduction to group 2 (3), and places the leading groups in a different order. We have followed the careful classification of Cohn ('Einteilung und Chronologie der Schriften Philos,' published in Philologus, Zeitschr. für das classische Alterthum: Supplementband vii. Heft 3, 1899). A similar classification, though somewhat differently arranged, is given, with other interesting matter, in an earlier article by Cohn, on 'The latest Researches on Philo of Alexandria' in the Jewish Quarterly Review, v. [Oct. 1892] pp. 24–50.

iii. SYSTEM OF THOUGHT.—1. The general character and basis of Philo's system.—The peculiarities of Philo's thought are largely due to the influence of his time and place. In Alexandria, Greek philosophy and Oriental mysticism met and mingled; and while the former, in its decline into scepticism, sought for support in eclectic schemes or in positive revelation, the latter endeavoured to justify itself before the world of thought by clothing its ideas in the language of philosophy. Jews, living in the midst of intellectual culture, and deeply versed in the finest portions of Greek literature, could no longer be satisfied with the crude ideas of their forefathers, and it became necessary to show that their ancestral religion was in harmony with the highest philosophy. Of those who made this attempt Philo was by far the most eminent, and his writings possess a singular interest for the Christian student, not only as revealing an instructive phase of human thought, but on account of the influence which they exercised, directly and indirectly, on the theology of the Church. He combined in himself the two tendencies which were seeking for reconciliation; for he was at once a religious man, full of devout feeling and moral enthusiasm, and, although his philosophy was largely borrowed, distinguished by no small share of speculative faculty. Of the truth and Divine authority of the Jewish religion he was profoundly convinced. His system avowedly rested upon the Scriptures, which were inspired in the minutest details. The prophets speak nothing of their own, but only what the Divine Spirit suggests, while the voluntary powers are in suspense. This condition, transcending the ordinary operations of the will, is open to good and wise men, and Philo does not hesitate to speak of his own enjoyment of it (de Migrat. Abr. 7 [i. 441]). Moses, however, was the supreme prophet, as well as king, legislator, and high priest; and his law remained, among the vicissitudes of States, unchangeable and eternal. Nevertheless, Philo did not resort to the Hebrew Scriptures, but, accepting the current story of the miraculous origin of the LXX, he assumed that the Hebrew and Greek were one and the same both in the facts and in the words. But, though he was ready to attach the utmost importance to a letter or even to an accent, he is not remarkable for the correctness of his citations. This subject has been investigated by Siegfried, who arrives at the following results:—A large part of Philo's citations consists of paraphrases from memory; in many instances the citation and the interpretation are so blended that a complete separation is impossible; there are many examples of double citation, one agreeing with the LXX, the other deviating from it; many of his deviations are found in single manuscripts of the LXX; others are explicable from the Hebrew text; some instances occur which point to a Hebrew text different from the Massoretic; and others indicate an attempt to improve the Greek. Passages also occur in which Philo bases an interpretation on an expression which is not found in our text of the LXX. And, finally, some variations must be ascribed to errors of transcribers. (See Siegfried's Philo von Alexandria als Ausleger des Alten Testaments, 1875, p. 162, where he sums up the results of three articles in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol. 1873. See also Dr. H. E. Ryle's Philo and Holy Scripture: or the Quotations of Philo from the Books of the OT, 1895, where the subject is carefully treated in the Introduction, § ii.; and two articles in the JQR, v. [Jan. 1893] pp. 246–280, and viii. [Oct. 1895] pp. 88–122, 'On the Philonean Text of the Septuagint,' so far as it may be gathered from the Armenian version of the Quæstiones et Responsiones, by F. C. Conybeare, who surmises that 'Philo, at different times, and in writing his different works, used different texts of the LXX'; which would not be surprising, as the text must by that time have swarmed with variants). His canon must have been substantially the same as that which is now recognized, though there is no direct proof that he accepted Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Lamentations, Ezekiel, or Daniel. (See the subject fully treated in Dr. Ryle's work, Introduction, § i. This volume contains also the text of Philo's quotations from Scripture).

Notwithstanding his apparent narrowness of view and rigid scripturalism, Philo was far from limiting his sympathies to the Jewish nation. The man who conformed to the Law was, he conceived, a citizen of the world. He himself attended the theatre as well as lectures on philosophy, and was a shrewd observer of the habits and emotions of men. But philosophy could not satisfy him; for, owing to the difficulty of its problems, it was broken up into conflicting schools, and, while he found in all the great sects certain elements of Divine truth, he took the teaching of Moses with him as a clue to guide him amidst their contending thoughts. He was not, however, content with carrying the great monotheistic faith and noble moral principles of Judaism into the disputes of the lecture-room; he believed that Moses had anticipated the philosophers, and that the sublimest speculations of Greece lay embedded in the Pentateuch. But how was it possible to find the philosophy of Plato or of the Stoics in the simple tales of Genesis? By the method of allegorical interpretation, which had already been applied by some of the philosophers, and especially by the Stoics, to the ancient mythology, and which Philo seriously adopted in order to rescue the wisdom of Scripture. If anything in the venerated records appeared on the surface to be childish and absurd; if any statement was made which appeared derogatory to God; if there was something contradictory, or a representation which was contrary to known fact,—any of these cases was in itself an indication of some hidden meaning which was worthy of a Divine author; and so a method of exegesis which must seem to us false and arbitrary grew out of the exigencies of the time, and was reduced to a kind of rule among the interpreters of Scripture. The rules which are followed by Philo are carefully classified by Siegfried in the above-mentioned work (p. 168 ff.); and it is evident that allegorical interpretation, however absurd and fantastic it must appear to us, was not left wholly to individual caprice, but followed certain definite lines which were considered as established among the students of allegory. Several of these canons, though differently applied, are found in the Haggadic interpretation of Palestine; but this connexion may be due less to Philo's knowledge of Rabbinical methods than to the general tendencies of thought which characterized the age. While thus holding that almost everything in the Pentateuch was related allegorically, Philo did not reject the literal meaning of that which seemed intrinsically credible or reasonable; and he insists that the ceremonial laws, though possessing a spiritual significance, must be observed according to the letter. Many things, however, especially anthropomorphic expressions, could be understood only allegorically; and here we may observe that no distinction is drawn between allegorical and simply figurative language. Philo's mode of treatment, being that of a commentator rather than a thinker, leaves no room for a systematic exposition of the problems of philosophy, and his theory of the universe must be gathered and pieced together from an immense number of unconnected passages. His style, though flowing and ornate, is often tedious, and the modern reader grows weary of interpretations which destroy the living beauty of the original text, and make the patriarchs the puppets of Alexandrian speculation. Yet the patient student may find many a golden saying, and perceive that Philo's rambling disquisitions are bound to one another by a thread of coherent thought.

From what has been already said, it is evident that for a proper understanding of Philo some knowledge of Greek philosophy, especially of the Platonic doctrine of ideas and of the Stoical doctrine of the Logos, must be presupposed. This the reader must necessarily seek elsewhere. The Old Testament, too, prepared the way both for the main problem of philosophy and for the special mode of solving it. The problem may be thus stated: How was the transcendent and infinite Spirit to be brought into connexion with the material universe and with the souls of men? An answer was partly suggested by the doctrine of angels, and by the poetical personification of Wisdom, while 'the word of the Lord,' frequently translated λόγος, furnished the very expression which Heraclitus and the Stoics had selected to denote the all-pervasive reason of the cosmos, and so provided a scriptural basis for the speculations of the thinker.

2. The origin and nature of philosophy.—According to Philo, philosophy originated in the contemplation of the cosmos, especially of the orderly movements of the heavens; but, as this suggested problems which seemed to him insoluble, he turned to the study of human nature, which permitted a closer and more fruitful examination. Thus he was led to the universal Mind, to Him who alone is real Being. Philosophy, accordingly, concerned itself with the whole nature of things, visible and invisible, and with the regulation of conduct, its end being wisdom, which consisted in the knowledge of Divine and human things and their causes. The incentive to it was found in the hope of blessedness (εὐδαιμονία). Before entering on so serious a pursuit, it was necessary to have a good moral and intellectual education, and to master the preparatory or 'encyclical' studies—grammar, geometry, and rhetoric. Philosophy itself had been divided into physics, ethics, and logic. Of these Philo assigns the lowest place to logic, and entertains a very poor opinion of physics or cosmology, as presenting nothing higher than fruitless conjecture. To ethics, which includes theology, or the knowledge of God, is assigned the highest and only worthy position.

3. Philo's theory of the universe.—Notwithstanding his depreciation of physics, Philo believed that the invisible could be entered only through the door of the visible cosmos, and he was fairly familiar with the science of his day. In order to understand some of his speculations, it is necessary to know in what sort of universe he conceived himself to be living. The earth, apparently regarded as spherical, was its fixed centre, and around it extended the heavens in successive spheres. Enclosing all was the vast sphere of the fixed stars, with its daily revolution from east to west. Within this were the seven spheres of the planets, the Sun occupying the centre; above it Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars; below it Mercury, Venus, and the Moon. This arrangement was symbolized by the golden candlestick. Matter was divided into four elements—fire, air, earth, and water, the ἀρχάς τε καὶ δυνάμεις of the cosmos. The air extended from the earth to the lunar sphere, beyond which was the ether, the salutary form of fire, as distinguished from the useful but destructive form with which we are familiar on the earth. The various objects of nature which admit of classification were constituted by a process of rational differentiation. First, things were divided into animate and inanimate. The latter comprised things which remained unaltered, through the possession of 'habit' (ἕξις), and things which had the higher property of 'nature' (φύσις), involving nutrition, change, and growth. The animated kingdom, divided into rational and irrational, was distinguished by the presence of soul (ψυχή), which rose above φύσις by having the attributes of perception, mental representation, and impulse. To these, rational beings add reason and free preferential power. Air, or πνεῦμα, was the element which constituted habit, nature, and soul. The air, the life-giving element, must be full of living beings, and therefore was peopled by invisible and immortal souls. It seemed impious to suppose that the stars were only fiery masses of earth. They were unmixed and Divine souls, 'manifest and perceptible gods.'

This survey of the phenomenal world led to many important questions, the answers to which must be briefly given. The universe, notwithstanding the multiplicity of its phenomena, was proved both by monotheistic faith and by pantheistic philosophy to be one, all its parts being mutually related, and each object depending for its perfection upon its place and function in the entire system. The heavenly bodies, besides shedding down light upon the earth, gave indications of future events through eclipses and other celestial occurrences; but Philo rejected the Chaldæan astrology, as deifying fate and destroying human responsibility. This unity, which presented the universe to the eye of reason as a well-ordered city, showed that there were powers by which the several parts were united, and an everlasting law, stretching from centre to circumference, and forming a bond that could not be broken. It was assumed that this universe, being the work of the greatest Creator, must be itself perfect, that is to say, complete in itself, and not depending on anything extraneous for the supply of its wants. Its perfection proved that it was the only cosmos; for it could not be perfect unless the whole substance of the elements had been used up in its production, and the Creator, being one, made it resemble himself in solitude. To the question whether the cosmos was self-existent and eternal a Jew could give but one answer: there was a time when the universe was not. That which is eternal is immutable; and therefore the universe, which is constantly changing, must have come into existence. Its genesis, however, did not take place in time; for time began with the interval of days and nights, and the six days of creation denote not a chronological succession, but an order in thought. Nevertheless, as the cosmos came into existence, Philo is driven into the expression, 'there was once a time when it was not' (Dec. Orac. 12 [ii. 190]). The archetype of time is eternity, in which nothing is either past or future, but only present. The genesis of the world was, according to a philosophical maxim, the beginning of its corruption; but the natural process might be stayed by the providence of the Creator, and thus Philo was able to believe that the entire cosmos endures for ever. But, while he admitted the dependence of the universe on an eternal and transcendent Cause, he was not a monist. The four elements pointed to something prior to themselves, of which they were differentiated forms. This was matter (οὐσία or ὕλη). It was conceived as the necessary substratum of the forms impressed upon it by reason, and as therefore in itself wholly destitute of rational distinctions. It was accordingly described by negative predicates, ἄποιος, ἄτακτος, ἄψυχος, ἄμορφος, ἀνείδεος, ἀσχημάτιστος, ἀτύπωτος, ἄσημος, ἄπειρος, πλημμελής, ἀνώμαλος, ἄνισος, νεκρός. Matter was thus only the passive condition of the exercise of efficient causality. Its existence was postulated by a necessity of thought; for causality involved four things—the agent, the material, the instrument, and the end in view. Matter being thus the condition of the efficient causality of God, was itself uncaused and eternal. Nevertheless, Philo does not seem quite at home with dualism, for he nowhere explicitly asserts the eternity of matter, and he occasionally uses expressions which, on a cursory perusal, seem inconsistent with it, but on more careful consideration appear not to be so. Again, he was not a dualist in the sense of accepting an eternal principle of evil. Dead matter could not be an efficient cause of imperfection, or limit the agency of God. Passages are, however, cited which establish Philo's belief that the created universe limited in some way the flow of Divine power. This limitation was due, not to the opposition of matter but to the very fact of creation, for the phenomenal is necessarily contrasted with that which is not phenomenal, and therefore could not be a full expression of Eternal Being. And, again, the parts of the universe were, in the original design of God, arranged in an ascending scale, and so could experience Divine benefits only in proportion to the capacity of their being. These considerations sufficiently explain Philo's language, without attributing to matter a causality which is expressly denied.

4. Man as the microcosm.—From the macrocosm we pass to the microcosm, man, considering him at present simply as a natural object. He combines in himself the powers which we have already encountered, ἑκτική, φυτική, ψυχική, and adds to these λογική and διανοητική. It is accordingly from the study of man that we derive our knowledge of God; for the higher principle in man corresponds with the supreme Mind in the cosmos. Man, then, is a duad, composed of body and soul. The body is made out of the same four elements as the rest of the material world. Soul is distinguished by the possession of αἴσθησις, which, being an εἴσθεσις, introduces things to the mind through the five channels of sensation, which are signified by the creation of animals on the fifth day; of φαντασία, which is an impression (τύπωσις) left in the soul by what the senses have communicated; and impulse (ὁρμή), which has the two forms of desire and aversion. The human soul, however, is twofold, and, in addition to the lower part which it shares with the animals, has the higher principle of reason. The lower part of the soul, the vital principle, consists of blood, or, more properly, of air which is mixed with blood, and carried by it to every part of the body. Like the sphere of the planets, it has seven parts or natures. These are the five senses, speech, and the faculty of reproduction. Being material, it is mortal. The higher principle is regularly spoken of as νοῦς. The possession of νοῦς in a qualified sense is indeed sometimes extended to the lower animals; but this vacillation in the use of language does not necessarily indicate any contradiction in Philo's thought. The rational principle, in its highest sense, was distinctive of man, and in him it was the sovereign part (τὸ ἡγεμονικόν). Several able interpreters believe that Philo derived the substance of the rational soul from the ether, and to that extent was a materialist, although he sometimes wavers. A remarkable passage seems decisive. He alleges that we cannot know the substance (οὐσία) of mind, and nevertheless asserts parenthetically, as though this one point were certain, ἀλλ' οὐ σῶμα, ἀσώματον δὲ λεκτέον (de Somn. i. 6 [i. 625]). To resolve his doubts he appeals to the statement of Moses, 'God breathed into his face a spirit of life,' meaning by spirit 'not air in motion, but a certain stamp and character of Divine power' (Quod det. pot. ins. 22, 23 [i. 207]). Accordingly, the substance of the higher soul is 'Divine spirit' (de Concup. 11 [ii. 356]), 'derived from nothing at all that is originated, but from the Father and Sovereign of the universe' (de Mundi Op. 46 [i. 32]). It is accordingly τῆς μακαρίας φύσεως ἐκμαγεῖον ἢ ἀπόσπασμα ἢ ἀπαύγασμα (ib. 51 [i. 35]). In one of the passages which are thought to contradict this view he is simply stating the opinions of others; one or two more admit of an interpretation which is consistent with his more clearly expressed view; and in the remainder the word 'ethereal' may readily be understood figuratively of a pure and heavenly origin. Philo is a rhetorical writer; and his highly wrought language must frequently be interpreted by reference to his more careful and exact statements. The immaterial soul was by its nature incapable of division, and accordingly corresponded with the unbroken sphere of the fixed stars, and so completed the analogy between the microcosmos and the macrocosmos. It belonged to the tribe of souls who peopled the air. These fell into two divisions: some, endowed with a more Divine constitution, living close to the ether; others descending into mortal bodies. The former were called by Moses angels, as bearing messages between God and man. The desire of the latter to descend into bodies is not clearly explained, and seems to imply an original moral distinction among souls. The souls of the wise, indeed, may have come to increase their experience and wisdom; but others abandoned wisdom, and were swept away by the earthly torrent. In either case, however, the soul was intrinsically immortal.

We must now view the soul in its temporary connexion with the body. Its seat is the heart or brain, more probably the brain, which is so closely connected with the senses. There it acts as a 'god' of the irrational part (Leg. All. i. 13 [i. 51]), through which, though itself incapable of severance, it is wholly diffused. This diffusion is effected by means of the ductile powers, which, without rupture, not only pervade the body but extend far beyond it, reaching even to God Himself. The analogy for this extension of an inseparable monad confined to one small portion of space is found in the sun, which, without leaving its place, sends its rays into every part of the cosmos (de Somn. i. 14 [i. 632]). These powers, however, are not dependent on the soul that has them, but are in their nature imperishable, so that the individual mind only has its share of those spiritual essences which belong equally to countless others. Beyond the division into rational and irrational, Philo does not venture on any systematic classification, though numerous powers are casually alluded to. We must confine our attention to the most important. Man alone, upon earth, has been endowed with freedom and the power of voluntary choice between good and evil, and is therefore justly subject to praise and blame (the most important passage is Quod Deus immut. 10 [i. 279 f.]). He alone is capable of sin, for higher beings are above the reach of temptations, and the animals, being subject to necessity, are below it. It is not inconsistent with the power of choice between alternatives that God is represented as the sole originating Cause; but one fragment pushes this so far as to be inconsistent with the general doctrine, the writer's mind being for the time overwhelmed by his sense of the nothingness of the creature (see J. Rendel Harris, Fragments of Philo Judæus, p. 8). The logos is another faculty which raises man above the brute. Here Philo, except in his scriptural allegories, simply follows the Greek philosophers. The logos is twofold: ὁ ἐνδιάθετος, ὁ κατὰ διάνοιαν λόγος, by virtue of which we are rational; and ὁ προφορικός, or ὁ κατὰ προφοράν, or ὁ γεγωνὼς λόγος, whereby we are able to converse. The latter is the interpreter (ἑρμηνεύς) of the mind, and therefore ought to be cultivated, so as to do justice to the thought. The virtues of the double logos were symbolized by the Urim and Thummim (δήλωσις and ἀλήθεια) on the breastplate of the high priest. The sources of knowledge are sensible perception and reason. The former brings the mind into connexion with the material world, and is the starting-point of all our knowledge; for the intuitive apprehension of the intelligible cosmos arises only on occasion of some sensible experience, as space is apprehended from the perception of bodies at rest, and time from perceiving bodies in motion. Nevertheless noümena shine by their own light, and in their higher forms reveal themselves only to the pure. Knowledge, however, which depended simply on the natural faculties, was insecure. As a rule, things were known only by comparison with their opposites, and that which required something else to support it could not be depended on. The formula of scepticism, that it is safest to suspend one's judgment (ἐπέχειν), is advocated in a long passage, in which the errors of the senses and the conflicting views of men are dwelt upon (de Ebriet. 41–49 [i. 383–388]). Through the varying opinions of the philosophers, therefore, Philo took for his unerring guide the laws and customs divinely communicated to the Jews.

5. The doctrine of God as eternal Being.—(a) The belief in the existence of one supreme God was fundamental in the Jewish religion. In the world of speculation, however, this was opposed by atheistic and pantheistic hypotheses, and it was therefore necessary to support the belief by philosophical arguments. The microcosm, man, suggested the true solution of the problems presented by the macrocosm. As the visible body was presided over by the invisible mind, so the universe which engages our vision must be held together and governed by an unseen sovereign. This conclusion is confirmed by the evidence of design and harmony in the objects around us. The cosmos has all the appearance of being a work of art, and consequently cannot be itself ὁ πρῶτος θεός, but must have proceeded from an intelligent and providential artificer. Again, the universe, as we have seen, bore the marks of transience and dependence, and so pointed to a πρῶτον or πρεσβύτατον αἴτιον, which could be none other than supreme Reason or Mind (ὁ τῶν ὅλων νοῦς), which alone could produce a world that bore everywhere the impress of rational thought. But the highest mode of approaching God was by religious intuition. The world was only a shadow, which left men subject to conjecture; but God shone by His own light, revealing Himself to the eyes of the soul, and imprinting immortal thoughts upon the mind. This intuition is not universal. It requires solitude, detachment from earthly cares, and freedom from the sway of the senses. Self-knowledge, leading to self-despair, opened the way for this diviner knowledge; and he who had despaired of himself knew the Self-existent. Accordingly, the apprehension of God not only varied in different persons, but in the same person changed with changing moods.

(b) In forming an opinion about the Divine nature we are necessarily hampered by the limitations of our own consciousness. The human analogy evidently fails in a fundamental point. Man is a derived being, placed in a world which he has not created, while God is the underived Creator of the universe. He is not only without the human form, but without human passions. The highest truth is expressed by the statement that 'God is not as man' (Nu 23^{19}), and it is only for purposes of admonition that He is said to be 'as man' (Dt 1^{31}), and to have bodily organs, and such passions as enmity and wrath. This thought is frequently insisted on. The two most instructive passages are de Sacr. Ab. et Caini, 28–30 [i. 181–183], and Quod Deus immut. 11–14 [i. 280–283]. The former, explaining the necessary use of anthropomorphic language on account of our weakness, sums up in these words: ἀφελεῖς οὖν, ὦ ψυχή, πᾶν γενητὸν θνητὸν μεταβλητὸν βέβηλον ἀπὸ ἐννοίας τῆς περὶ θεοῦ τοῦ ἀγενήτου καὶ ἀφθάρτου καὶ ἀτρέπτου καὶ ἁγίου καὶ μόνου μακαρίου. The higher faculties in men, however, reason and the preferential freedom of the will, were peculiar to them among created beings, and must be regarded as essentially Divine; so that we may regard God as free, self-determining, ever active Mind (ὁ τοῦ παντὸς νοῦς), possessed of τὸ αὐτεξούσιον κράτος, even His beneficence being ascribed, not to His inability to do evil, but to His preference for the good (de Plantat. Noe, 20 [i. 342].

When we seek to pass beyond this description, and inquire into the essence of God, we are met with blank mystery. The essence of the human mind is impenetrable, much more that of God, so that we can know only that He is, not what He is: ὁ δ' ἄρα οὐδὲ τῷ νῷ καταληπτὸς ὅτι μὴ κατὰ τὸ εἶναι μόνον· ὕπαρξις γὰρ ἔσθ' ἣν καταλαμβάνομεν αὐτοῦ, τῶν δέ γε χωρὶς ὑπάρξεως οὐδέν (Quod Deus sit immut. 13 [i. 282]). Accordingly, He is in the strictest sense without a name. There are, indeed, numerous appellations which serve to denote Him, and He is called in Scripture κυρίῳ ὀνόματι ὁ ὤν (de Abr. 24 [ii. 19]); but these do not reveal His essence, so as to communicate a perfect knowledge of what

He is. In spite of this opinion, Philo constantly assumes that we have a very extensive knowledge of God, and it is generally supposed that his whole doctrine is involved in hopeless contradiction. This, however, may be resolved by a strict attention to the meaning of words. According to Philo, God is a simple uncompounded unity. But, when we speak of Him as rational, good, powerful, we violate His unity, and represent Him as manifold. This is due to the imperfection of our thought, which cannot comprehend the essence in which these things are one, but can notice only the different effects of the Divine causality in the manifoldness of nature. As a simple essence, God is without qualities (ἄποιος, a word which expresses not, as is often said, the absence of attributes, but the impossibility of classification). God is not a sort of God, or a sort of anything, but is alone in His incomprehensible perfection. How, then, are we to regard His attributes? A man is good by partaking of goodness, which, as it may be shared by others, makes the man a particular sort of man. God, however, is not good by partaking of goodness, as though it were something extraneous to Himself. Goodness and all such attributes are among the ἰδιότητες of God; and if other beings may be classified as good, it is only because they participate in the Divine essence, in the eternal and archetypal ideas which the fulness of God exhausts and transcends. Οὐδὲν γάρ ἐστι τῶν καλῶν, ὃ μὴ θεοῦ τε καὶ θεῖον (de Sacr. Ab. et Caini, 17 [i. 174]); πλήρης δὲ ἀγαθῶν τελείων, μᾶλλον δὲ, εἰ χρὴ τὸ ἀληθὲς εἰπεῖν, αὐτὸς ὢν τὸ ἀγαθόν, ὃς οὐρανῷ καὶ γῇ τὰ κατὰ μέρος ὤμβρισεν ἀγαθά (de Scpten. 5 [ii. 280]); ὁ τῶν ὅλων νοῦς ἐστὶν εἰλικρινέστατος καὶ ἀκραιφνέστατος, κρείττων ἢ ἀρετὴ καὶ κρείττων ἢ ἐπιστήμη καὶ κρείττων ἢ αὐτὸ τὸ ἀγαθὸν καὶ αὐτὸ τὸ καλόν (de Mundi Op. 2 [i. 2]).

(c) There is, then, no contradiction in ascribing attributes to Him whose uncompounded essence is so inscrutable. He is eternal, incorruptible, and immutable, and thus differentiated in the most absolute way from every thing created. Hence He is not only the one only God, but He is the indivisible, archetypal unity, without parts or members. He is invisible, except as spiritual light revealing itself to the soul. He is omnipresent, and 'has filled the cosmos with Himself' (de Post. Cain. 5 [i. 229]), having stretched his powers through the earth and sky, so as to leave no part empty. Being independent of place, He is at once everywhere and nowhere, and all terms of motion, like up and down, are inapplicable, except figuratively, to God in His essence (τῷ κατὰ τὸ εἶναι θεῷ; see especially Conf. Ling. 27 [i. 425]). He is equally independent of time, which belongs only to the phenomenal world. Every thing being thus present to His view, He is omniscient, and no man can hide himself from Him. As sole efficient Cause, He is omnipotent. He is also perfect, that is, complete in Himself, so that nothing could add to the fulness from which all things come; and, regarded as pure Being, He is out of all relation (τὸ γὰρ ὄν, ᾗ ὄν ἐστιν, οὐχὶ τῶν πρός τι), but some of His powers are, as it were, relative (ὡσανεὶ πρός τι); a phrase which implies that, though they are described by relative terms, their character is not altered by the relation, but they impart all and receive nothing (see de Mut. Nom. 4 [i. 582]). Philo habitually teaches that God has no participation in evil, and is the source only of good. With him are οἱ θησαυροὶ μόνων ἀγαθῶν (de Fuga et Invent. 15 [i. 557]). In one passage, however, this is verbally contradicted, εἰσὶ γὰρ ὥσπερ ἀγαθῶν οὕτω καὶ κακῶν παρὰ τῷ θεῷ θησαυροί (Leg. All. iii. 34 [i. 108]). This may illustrate the kind of inconsistency into which Philo is betrayed by his allegorical interpretation of different passages; but here the contradiction is relieved by the consideration that in one passage he is dealing with moral evil, and in the other with Divine punishments. When we add that God enjoys perfect blessedness and uninterrupted peace, we have completed this preliminary survey of His attributes.

And now a profound question arises which philosophy was bold enough to answer. Why did a Being so perfect, and in need of nothing, create the universe? Because He was good and munificent, and did not grudge to matter a share of His own best nature; and in thus bestowing His favours He acted from His own sole initiative, οὐδενὶ δὲ παρακλήτῳ—τίς γὰρ ἦν ἕτερος;—μόνῳ δὲ αὐτῷ χρησάμενος (de Mundi Op. 5, 6 [i. 5]). From the same source springs His providential care, with which He pours forth the abundant riches of His favours, blessing the imperfect, and pitying the unworthy. But His mercies are measured out in due proportion, for not even the whole world could contain them in their purity. Every doctrine of Providence, however, is required to account for the existence of pain and of moral evil. The questions thus suggested are discussed by Philo in his treatise on Providence, where he gives the usual philosophical answers, on which it is unnecessary to linger. We must pass to the more characteristic problem, How are we to reconcile the absolute simplicity and unity of God with His manifold activity in the world of phenomena?

6. The doctrine of the Divine powers.—(a) Their existence and character.—When we survey this world and observe the mutual relation of its several parts, we are driven to the conviction that it is one system, and therefore that it is held together by a pervasive and enduring power. But this power is manifested in a vast variety of objects, which embody distinct ideas or rational forms; and nothing but the presence of a compelling force can prevent them from sinking back into amorphous matter. We are therefore constrained in thought to recognize a multitude of powers, such as habitual, vital, rational. God being the only efficient Cause, these powers must be Divine, and so constitute the link between God and matter. They belong therefore to the Divine essence, and, as that essence is unknown, the powers too hide their essence, and reveal only their effects. They are uncircumscribed, timeless, and unbegotten, holy and unerring as God Himself, and consequently they are only partially exercised in creation. From this brief description it is apparent that they correspond with the Platonic ideas, and accordingly Philo adopts this part of Platonic philosophy. The principal passage bearing on this subject may be quoted. God is represented as replying thus to Moses: 'As, among you, seals, whenever wax or any similar material is applied to them, make innumerable impressions, not suffering the loss of any part, but remaining as they were, such you must suppose the powers around Me to be, applying qualities to things without quality, and forms to the formless, while they experience no change or diminution in their eternal nature. But some among you call them very appropriately ideas, since they give ideal form to each thing, arranging the unarranged, and communicating determinate limits and definition and shape to the indeterminate and indefinite and shapeless, and, in a word, altering the worse into the better' (de Monarch. i. 6 [ii. 218 f.]). The function of these powers or ideas in the work of creation is described in the following passage: 'For God, as being God, anticipating that there could never be a beautiful imitation without a beautiful pattern, or any perceptible thing faultless which was not modelled in conformity with an archetypal and intelligible idea, when He wished to fabricate this visible cosmos, first shaped forth the intelligible, in order that, using an immaterial and most Godlike pattern, He might work out the material cosmos, a more recent copy of an older one, destined to contain as many perceptible genera as there were intelligible in the other. But it is not to be said or supposed that the cosmos which consists of the ideas is in any place; but in what way it subsists we shall know by following up an example of what takes place among ourselves. Whenever a city is founded to gratify the high ambition of some king or emperor, claiming autocratic authority, and at the same time brilliant in thought, adding splendour to his good fortune, sometimes a trained architect having offered his services, and inspected the good temperature and suitability of the place, describes first within himself almost all the parts of the city that is to be erected—temples, gymnasia, town-halls, market-places, harbours, docks, lanes, equipment of walls, foundations of houses and other public edifices. Then, having received the forms of each in his own soul, as in wax, he bears the figure of an intelligible city, and having stirred up the images of this in his memory, and, still more, having sealed there its characters, looking, like a good workman, to the pattern, he begins to prepare that made of stones and timber, making the material substances like each of the immaterial ideas. Similarly, then, we must think about God, who, when He purposed founding the great city, first devised its forms, out of which, having composed an intelligible cosmos, He completed the perceptible, using the former as a pattern. As, then, the city which was first formed within the architect had no exterior place, but had been sealed in the artist's soul, in the same way not even the cosmos that consists of the ideas could have any other place than the Divine Logos which disposed these things into a cosmos. For what other place could there be for his powers which would be adequate to receive and contain, I do not say all, but any one unmixed?' (de Mundi Op. 4 f. [i. 4]). The ideas are not mere names, which could have no efficiency, but are real essences, to which the qualities of things are due (see especially Sacrificant. 13 [ii. 261 f.]), and which maintain in material objects the permanence of ideal types. They are eternal, and do not perish with the things on which their seal has been set; for wisdom and goodness do not die with the wise and good man. In their combination they form the κόσμος νοητός, which is the archetype of the κόσμος αἰσθητός. They have no locality but the Divine thought, or God Himself, who is the 'immaterial place of immaterial ideas' (Cherub. 14 [i. 148]), the primal archetype, or rather older and higher than the archetype, the Idea being only one mode of the eternal Thought. From this point of view the κόσμος νοητός is the son of God, and its counterpart, the κόσμος αἰσθητός, is his younger son. Philo attempts no careful classification of the powers; but there are a few on which he frequently dwells. The highest of all is the Logos. Next to this comes the creative power, ἡ ποιητική, and then, in succession, ἡ βασιλική, ἡ ἵλεως, and the two divisions of ἡ νομοθετική, the preceptive and the prohibitive. The lowest on the scale, which are virtually only two, are subordinate varieties of the two powers above them, affecting the life of men, and not the entire cosmos. The two great powers, the creative and the regal, have their unity in the Logos. They are otherwise called ἀγαθότης and ἐξουσία, for by goodness God generated the universe, and by authority He rules it. Scripture represents this distinction by the two titles, θεός and κύριος. Under the latter power is ranked the punitive, for it is the business of a ruler to punish the guilty; but this is not inconsistent with goodness, 'the oldest [i.e. the highest and best] of the graces,' for punishment is intended as a prevention or correction of sin.

(b) We must now notice a very difficult question, What was the relation of the Divine powers to God? It is generally said that Philo is here involved in hopeless contradiction, sometimes treating the powers merely as attributes, sometimes regarding them as distinct persons. Philo himself felt that the subject was obscure, and not to be rashly spoken of before those who were incapable of philosophical reflexion (see, especially, de Sacr. Ab. et Caini, 15 and 39 [i. 173 f. and 189]). The most definite statement is found in an allegorical interpretation of the visit of the three men to Abraham. These symbolized the Father of the universe, and His two oldest and nearest powers, the creative and the regal. These present to the seeing intelligence a mental image, now of one, and now of three,—of one, whenever the soul, being perfectly purified, presses on to the idea which is unmingled and complete in itself; but of three when it is unable to apprehend the self-existent Being from itself alone, but apprehends it through the effects. That the triple image is virtually that of one subject is apparent not only from allegorical speculation, but from the word of Scripture, which represents Abraham as addressing his visitors, not as three but as one, and as receiving the promise from one only (de Abr. 24 f. [ii. 18 ff.]). It is clear from this passage that the creative and regal powers are not conceived as beings distinct from God, but only as answering to our imperfect modes of apprehension, while to a true perception both are lost in the supreme and unbroken unity of God. In other words, our highest thought, when it penetrates to the Divine unity, can apprehend God only as pure Being; but, when we view Him through the variety of His operations, we are obliged to think and speak of certain aspects of that Being. An instructive analogy is furnished by a description of the 'power' in the wise man. It receives various names, piety, natural philosophy, ethical, political; and the wise man contains these and numberless other powers; but in all he has one and the same εἶδος (de Ebriet. 22 [i. 370 f.]). Agreeably to this view, the powers are spoken of collectively as equivalent to the 'invisible' or 'eternal nature' of God. It is not surprising, therefore, that God and His power or powers are used interchangeably. Again, there are several passages in which the powers are regarded as predicates of God, and God is referred to as Himself being or doing what is implied by their several names.

(c) What, then, is the function of the powers? They are not intended, as is so often said, to act as personal agents who can take the place of God in all mundane affairs, but to present to our thought the mode in which we may conceive of the Eternal Mind as acting in time and space; or, in other words, they are not meant to separate God from the material world, but to bring Him into contact with it. It is through them that the self-existent Being (ὁ ὤν or τὸ ὄν) is omnipresent, having filled the universe with Himself. He 'stretches' them into every part, as we may stretch our mind to a speaker, or the energies of our souls to God. It is through the powers that God 'touches' the soul; for we can receive only a broken and partial revelation. The passage which is thought to prove decisively the separate personality of the powers is the following: ἐξ ἐκείνης [οὐσίας] γὰρ πάντα ἐγέννησεν ὁ θεός, οὐκ ἐφαπτόμενος αὐτός· οὐ γὰρ ἦν θέμις ἀπείρου καὶ πεφυρμένης ὕλης ψαύειν τὸν ἴδμονα καὶ μακάριον, ἀλλὰ ταῖς ἀσωμάτοις δυνάμεσιν, ὧν ἔτυμον ὄνομα αἱ ἰδέαι, κατεχρήσατο πρὸς τὸ γένος ἕκαστον τὴν ἁρμόττουσαν λαβεῖν μορφήν (Sacrificant. 13 [ii. 261]). Yet even here it is God, evidently used in the highest sense, who generated the universe, and the powers are really 'ideas,' which impart form to every genus. God did not touch matter Himself, for that would imply that He communicated to it the totality of the Divine idea, and that the universe, instead of affording fragmentary glimpses of the Divine thoughts, was a complete revelation of His nature. Again, it is quite in conformity with Philo's abundant use of figurative language when God and His powers are compared to a sovereign and his attendant bodyguard. Similarly, the human mind, as a king, has its bodyguard of attendant powers (de Migrat. Abr. 31 [i. 462], and several other passages); and the passages where the Divine powers figure most clearly as separate persons may all be explained as instances of this rhetorical style. It is impossible for us to survey these in detail. Some confusion arises also because expositors are not careful to separate Philo's literal interpretations from his allegorical. Thus the three visitors to Abraham might literally be angels, and yet allegorically might be designed to represent God under three aspects of His being. A different order of reflexion arises in connexion with the creation of man. The words 'Let us make man' point to a plurality of persons. These words would have been quite intelligible if Philo had looked upon all the Divine powers as distinct persons; but in fact he feels their difficulty, and declares that the truest reason for them is known to God only. He treats of them in four passages of considerable length (de Mundi Op. 24 [i. 16 f.]; Conf. Ling. 33–36 [i. 430–433]; de Fuga et Inv. 13 f. [i. 556]; and de Mut. Nom. 4 [i. 582 f.]); and in these he professes to give only a plausible conjecture. One distinction is made perfectly clear. Man, unlike the rest of the creation, has been partly formed by inferior agents, whereas the whole cosmos, heaven and earth and sea, was made by the architect Himself, without the co-operation of others. This proves conclusively that the subordinate agents, to whom is assigned the partial creation of man, were not regarded as identical with the Divine powers which were exercised in every part of creation. Man occupies a unique place in that he is liable to sin; and therefore God delegated the creation of man in part to others, in order that, if evil arose, it might not be ascribed to the Supreme Goodness. These others are angels, and angels are souls flying in the air, and 'under-servants of God's powers' (τοὺς ὑποδιακόνους αὐτοῦ τῶν δυνάμεων ἀγγέλους, de Monarch. ii. 1 [ii. 222]). Nevertheless, they are themselves spoken of as God's powers. This apparent inconsistency is easily explained. All objects which embodied a rational idea might be spoken of as powers; but these created and finite manifestations of Divine thought in the elements, in all the lovely sights of nature, and in pure angelic souls inhabiting the air, are not to be identified with the infinite and unbegotten powers which, in our modern language, must be described as attributes of God. While, however, they are distinct to our thought and perception, they participate in the same nature; for it is only through sharing in a Divine idea that matter can receive the impress of rational form, or souls concentrate in themselves the characters of personality.

7. The doctrine of the Logos.—(a) At the head of the hierarchy of Divine powers was the Logos. This word occasions a good deal of difficulty to interpreters of Philo, owing to the want of any precise English equivalent. It denotes, in its highest sense, the mind itself, but more especially the rational faculty. Then it is applied to any rational thought or idea residing within the mind, and is extended to any relation which may be rationally conceived, to an underlying principle or law, for instance, of numbers or harmony, and to the meaning of anything. From this it passes to any kind of outward expression of some thought or idea, particularly in spoken or written language. Probably its best representative in English is 'Thought,' a word which has some approach to the same variable application.

(b) We have already seen that the cosmos presented a picture of rational forms or ideas; and, as these were combined in one harmonious whole, they constituted one cosmic thought. This thought was the highest genus, under which the multitudinous ideas took rank as species; or, more strictly, God, as pure Being, was the most generic, and His reason or thought was second. The Logos, therefore, regarded as a Divine power, was the unitary principle of all beneath it. It was by virtue of His reason that God was both ruler and good; or, in other words, creation and providence were both expressions of reason. If so, a νοητὸς κόσμος must have existed in the mind of God prior to the visible world; and, as it was the sum of the Divine thoughts, it was the Logos of God. 'The intelligible cosmos,' says Philo, 'is nothing else than God's Logos, when he is already engaged in making a cosmos; for neither is the intelligible city anything else than the reflexion (λογισμός) of the architect when he is already intending to create the city' (de Mundi Op. 6 [i. 5]). From this point of view the Logos is the supreme archetypal idea (ἰδέα τῶν ἰδεῶν), which by its impress, as of a seal, on matter constitutes the visible universe. Matter, however, was inherently incapable of retaining what was once impressed upon it; and hence its ideal forms were forces or powers constantly present and active, and might be regarded as a law, the eternal and pervasive law of 'right reason,' which, stretching from centre to circumference, was a bond of the universe that could not be broken. The same supreme Logos appeared in man as the moral law, enjoining what was right and forbidding what was wrong. Thus the Logos, the intelligible cosmos, became manifest in the universe, where it dwelt as an 'intelligent and rational nature,' ministering as a high priest in the cosmic temple of God.

(c) It is well known that the human logos was divided into ἐνδιάθετος and προφορικός, and that these terms were, in the later theology, extended to the Logos of God. Now Philo, while familiar with this distinction in the case of man, never applies to God the technical language by which it was described. Hence it is sometimes maintained that the distinction in the Divine Logos was absent from his thought. But the conception of a twofold Logos is involved in the account which we have already given, and it is quite explicitly recognized by Philo. The principal passage is in the Vita Mosis, iii. 13 [ii. 154], where it is said that the 'Logos is double both in the universe and in the nature of man,' and the former is divided into that which relates to immaterial ideas, and that which relates to the visible objects of the perceptible cosmos. Nevertheless, the analogy between man and God was incomplete; for God had no organs of speech, and His word was seen in His works, and not heard by the ears (see, especially, de Migrat. Abr. 9 [i. 443 f.]). Philo may therefore have shrunk from adopting the usual terms, as one of them suggested anthropomorphic ideas.

(d) The Logos, as the sum and unity of the world of ideas, was identical with the Divine reason; and this reason was not an essence extraneous to God, by sharing in which God became rational, but was a mode of the Divine essence, and in no way broke the solitude of God which existed prior to creation. God, however, was more than reason (κρείσσων ἢ πᾶσα λογικὴ φύσις, Fragments, ii. 625); and therefore it was possible to apprehend the Divine reason, though none could reach God in His essence. Since thought may be regarded as a product of the mind, the Logos, as the cosmic thought, might be conceived as produced by God, and in this aspect is spoken of under the figure of a son, πρεσβύτατος or πρωτόγονος υἱός. The epithet implies that there were other and younger sons; and this is agreeable to Philo's view of God as ὁ πατὴρ τῶν ὅλων or τῶν ὄντων. As the son of God, the firstborn archetypal idea, which by its impress has converted formless matter into a cosmos, it is God's image, in accordance with which the rational soul in man was created. Or, in another figure, it is the shadow of God, disclosing by its incidence upon matter the rational form of which the substance is invisible.

(e) It is now apparent in what sense the Logos was conceived as mediator between God and matter. It was not a personal demiurgus, creating, under orders, a universe which God Himself would not touch, but rather the effectual Divine Thought, through which God made His own work (τὸ ἴδιον ἔργον, Quis rer. div. her. 42 [i. 502]), impressing it, like a seal, upon matter. As the hidden Reason of God, it is eternal; as the objective Thought of God, impressed upon matter, it has come into existence. As essentially Divine, it might be spoken of, but only imperfectly (ἐν καταχρήσει), as God (de Somn. i. 39 [i. 655]); and once it is described as ὁ δεύτερος θεός (Fragments, ii. 625). This we can understand, if we bear in mind that matter was not regarded as simply put into shape, and then left to itself, but its cosmic form was the living presence of Divine thought, the sum of all that man could truly apprehend of God, though he could rise to the knowledge that Reason was not exhaustive of Being, but transcendent beyond it was the eternal Cause, whose essence was unknowable.

(f) Philo, following the Old Testament, frequently refers to Wisdom. In many passages this is identified with the Logos. In others the two terms are distinguished; and it is a little perplexing to find that their mutual relations are inverted, Wisdom being the fountain of the Logos, and the Logos being the fountain of Wisdom. Probably the difficulty may be resolved by the difference between the universal and the particular. Human reason or wisdom, distributed among many souls, flows from the supreme Wisdom or Reason, which are identical with one another in either the higher or the lower sphere. The term Wisdom is almost always used in relation to man, and is more applicable than Logos to some forms of character and attainment; but the latter term is generally preferred, both on account of its philosophical associations, and perhaps owing to Philo's preference for a masculine substantive.

Another word which is sometimes used instead of Logos is πνεῦμα. This occasionally denotes 'air in motion'; but in its higher sense it is identical with Logos. In the latter sense it is used only in connexion with men, and under the suggestion of some passage of Scripture.

The cosmical Thought necessarily contained a multitude of subordinate thoughts or logoi. This Stoical doctrine was fully adopted by Philo, who used the word logoi as synonymous with the Platonic ideas, the powers which constituted the essence of things. In relation to man they are 'the right words of wisdom,' seen with the eyes of the soul, ethical ideas or laws, the heavenly manna by which the soul is fed.

(g) The question of the personality of the Logos is one beset with difficulty, and consequently receives conflicting answers. It may be maintained that Philo regarded it as a person, that he did not so regard it, or that he vacillated illogically between the two conceptions. The doctrine hitherto laid down does not involve the attribute of personality. Large allowance must be made for Philo's excessive love of poetical personification. Laughter is the ideal son of God, and the graces are his virgin daughters. Similar figures are abundantly applied to the Logos. It is a 'charioteer and umpire,' a 'physician,' a 'military officer,' a 'spear-bearer,' and a 'champion.' This use of personification is largely suggested by the allegorical interpretation of the persons in Genesis, who represent ideas, including the Logos. Passages where such figures are employed could hardly induce any one to ascribe personality to the Logos; but they may warn us to be very careful in other passages where the figurative meaning is not so obvious. We must briefly survey the arguments which have most weight. The Logos is the image of God and the archetype of man: could this be true of anything but a person? The answer must depend on the writer's style of thought and language; and this is clearly revealed in his treatment of the number seven. This number is the 'image' of God, and is referred to as if it were the very essence of the Logos. It is everywhere impressed upon creation. There are seven stars in the Pleiades and in the Bear. There are seven planets. There are seven zones marking the divisions of the sky. There are seven days in the week, determined by the changes of the moon. The same law extends to man. The head has seven essential parts—two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and the mouth. We need not give further details. In brief, the number seven is a mirror in which the Maker and Father of the universe is manifested (see especially de Mundi Op. 30 ff. [i. 21 ff.]; Leg. All. i. 4, 5 [i. 45 f.]; de Decal. 21 [ii. 198]). This presents to us in a very striking way the mode in which Philo conceived that the Divine Thought was impressed upon matter, and became there an image of its originator. Regarded as the archetype of human reason, the Logos is simply the rational power of God, by participation in which man becomes rational. 'The suppliant Logos' (ὁ ἱκέτης λόγος) is sometimes the suppliant cry of men; and once, where it is represented as standing between God and creation, the ambassador of the one and the suppliant of the other, it seems clearly to mean, in a figure, the cry 'of the mortal pining always for the incorruptible,' seeking for the complete realization of the Divine idea (Quis rer. div. her. 42 [i. 501 f.]). Whether the title παράκλητος is ever applied to the Logos is at least doubtful; if it is so at all, it is only to the Logos as identified with the cosmos. The passages which are most relied on as proving the personality of the Logos are those in which the term 'angel' is applied either to it or to the logoi. Of these there are no fewer than seventeen, and it is impossible for us to consider them here one by one. The key to the true interpretation of all of them is to be found in Philo's system of allegorical interpretation. The angels of the Old Testament become in this system Divine thoughts, just as the patriarchs, Moses and Aaron, and other persons, have fixed symbolical meanings attached to them. As we might expect in dealing with such a visionary world, Philo's language is not always quite consistent and clear; but, with a little care, every passage will yield its allegorical sense, and will save us from the necessity of forcing on Philo the absurd supposition that the great cosmic Thought of God was a soul flying in the air, that Jacob literally wrestled with this uncircumscribed and incorporeal power, and that ordinary men eat showers of angels. The Scripture is accustomed to describe heavenly visitations under the name of angels; but these, when applied to the various characters represented by the persons whom they visited, symbolize the Divine thoughts, precepts, or laws which come with their heavenly messages to the soul. We may be permitted to sum up in words which have been used elsewhere: 'The Logos is the Thought of God, dwelling subjectively in the infinite Mind, planted out and made objective in the universe. The cosmos is a tissue of rational forces, which images the beauty, the power, the goodness of its primeval fountain. The reason of man is this same rational force entering into consciousness, and held by each in proportion to the truth and variety of his thoughts; and to follow it is the law of righteous living. Each form which we can differentiate as a distinct species, each rule of conduct which we can treat as an injunction of reason, is itself a Logos, one of those innumerable thoughts or laws into which the universal Thought may, through self-reflexion, be resolved. Thus, wherever we turn, these Words, which are really Works of God, confront us, and lift our minds to that uniting and cosmic Thought which, though comprehending them, is itself dependent, and tells us of that impenetrable BEING from whose inexhaustible fulness it comes, of whose perfections it is the shadow, and whose splendours, too dazzling for all but the purified intuitions of the highest souls, it at once suggests and veils' (Drummond, Philo Judæus, ii. p. 273).

8. The higher relations of man, and the ethical principles which rested upon them.—(a) The Logos was the archetype of human reason; and this reason was the true generic man, made according to the image of God, and not yet divided into species, which arose with the 'moulded' man, who participated in quality, consisted of body and soul, was man or woman, and naturally mortal. We have seen that Philo believed in the pre-existence of the soul; but how he reconciled this doctrine with the biblical account of the creation of man is not apparent. The first man, having proceeded more directly from God, was the most perfect, while his descendants, who sprung from men, underwent continual degeneration. Adam himself made a wrong choice, being led astray by woman, sensation, which acted under the seduction of the serpent, pleasure. But participation in the original type of humanity was never lost. Man was the true temple of God, and none was so base as never to be visited with noble thoughts. The highest form of this visitation was prophecy, which came only to the wise and good, who in moments of ecstasy were possessed by God, and spoke nothing of their own. The knowledge of grand ideals, combined with the power of wrong choice, made man a moral and responsible being; and Philo deals so abundantly with ethical questions that it is possible to gather his unsystematic utterances into some sort of orderly arrangement.

(b) The supreme end of human life is εὐδαιμονία, and this consists of 'the practice of perfect virtue in a perfect life' (Quod det. pot. ins. 17 [i. 203]). But, while virtue should be followed for its own sake, it is something higher to follow it for the sake of honouring and pleasing God. He is the perfect good; and to follow Him, and find refuge with Him, is eternal life (ζωὴ αἰώνιος), while departure from Him is death (de Fuga et Invent. 15 [i. 557]). The supreme evil, then, is φιλαυτία, otherwise described as μεγαλαυχία, ἀσέβεια, or ἀμαθία. This ignorance is a forgetfulness of our indebtedness to God, to whom alone it is congruous to say 'mine'; and 'whoever dares to say that anything is his own shall be written down a slave for all eternity' (Leg. All. iii. 70 [i. 126]). The conditions of responsibility are, first, the possession of a twofold nature, inclining respectively to the eternal and the transient; consequently the power of choice between alternatives; and, thirdly, a knowledge of the better and the worse, which is given by the conscience. It is man's bodily constitution that renders him liable to sin; for the body, being phenomenal, is opposed to the eternal, and sin consists of a preference for the transient and partial instead of the eternal and universal. The body, accordingly, is a prison, a tomb, or a foreign land, which impedes the reason in the pursuit of its true end. Pleasure (ἡδονή), one of the irrational passions, is the principle which brings mind and sensation together; and it is the desire for pleasure that leads us into moral evil. Ἐπιθυμία is generally used in a bad sense, as the desire 'for absent things which are looked upon as good, but are not truly so,' such as food and drink, wealth, glory, power. From this source all public and private wrongs have sprung. Nevertheless, Philo distinctly disapproves of asceticism. 'If,' he says, 'you see any one not taking food and drink at the proper time, or declining the use of baths and ointments, or neglecting covering for his body, or sleeping on the ground and keeping an uncomfortable house, and then from these things counterfeiting temperance, take compassion on his error, and show him the true way of temperance' (Quod det. pot. ins. 7 [i. 195]). If the perfect man reaches a state of ἀπάθεια, this is only a deliverance from the sway of the irrational passions through the joyous energy of love and trust. As the end of man's probation, Philo expected the triumph of good over evil. The Israelites would be gathered together into their own land; but there is no clear recognition of a Messiah, still less of any identification of him with the Logos. The punishment of sin is a living death, and the final reward of virtue is to have the Divine Spirit of wisdom within, and to hold communion with the Unbegotten and Eternal.

iv. PHILO'S INFLUENCE ON CHRISTIAN WRITERS.—The interest which is felt by Christian theologians in the writings of Philo is due not only to the light which they throw on Hellenistic thought in the time of Christ, but still more to the wide influence which they exerted on the development of Christian theology. The beginning of this influence is sometimes traced in the doctrine and language of the Fourth Gospel. The doctrine of the Logos set forth in the Prologue has several points of contact with Philo's, and through the remainder of the Gospel many other parallels have been pointed out. Nevertheless there is no obvious quotation, and the style of the author is entirely different from that of Philo. His vocabulary too is strikingly different, as any one may see by looking through Siegfried's 'Glossarium Philoneum,' which fills more than 83 pages of his Philo von Alexandria (pp. 47-131). A few examples of classes of words, taken at random, may be given. Philo is fond of compounds with δυς-, having 28 words of this kind; the Gospel has none. Philo has 40 compounds with εὐ-; the Gospel has only 2 quite common words. Philo has 73 compounds with ἐκ-, not one of which is in the Gospel, though the latter has 14 such compounds, nearly all very common words. Philo has 67 compounds with ἐπι- which are not in the Gospel, the Gospel having 11 ordinary words. If the writer was versed in the writings of Philo, it is strange that he has not even inadvertently borrowed an appreciable quantity of his characteristic vocabulary. Even in the doctrine of the Logos the characteristic phraseology is wanting in the Gospel: πολυώνυμος, ὁ ἑρμηνεὺς τοῦ θεοῦ λόγος, ὁ τομεύς, πρεσβύτατος υἱός, ὁ ἀγγέλων πρεσβύτατος, ἀρχάγγελος, εἰκών, ὁ κατ' εἰκόνα ἄνθρωπος, ἀπεικόνισμα, παράδειγμα, ἰδέα τῶν ἰδεῶν, ἀρχέτυπος ἰδέα, ὁ νοητὸς κόσμος, τόπος τοῦ ἐκ τῶν ἰδεῶν κόσμου, σφραγίς, χαρακτήρ, σκιὰ θεοῦ, δεύτερος θεός. We may further observe that the multitude of philosophical terms descriptive of God is entirely absent from the Gospel. In reading the valuable collection of parallels made by Professor Julius Grill (Untersuchungen über die Entstehung des vierten Evangeliums, Erster Teil, 1902, pp. 106–138), where the Greek text of Philo is fully presented, one cannot fail to be impressed by the marked difference in the style and phraseology of the two writers. Amid many interesting resemblances of thought, which indicate the presence of a similar religious and philosophical atmosphere, there are some striking contrasts; and, in the few cases where the same words are used, the identity may be explained without the hypothesis of direct literary dependence. These facts show that it is not unreasonable to suppose that the resemblances may be due to the common stock of ideas which belonged to thoughtful men at that time. There are two lines of evidence which strengthen the probability that this may be the case. First, Philo himself had an extensive acquaintance with Palestinian interpretation. For particulars see Siegfried, Philo von Alexandria, p. 145 ff., and Bernhard Ritter, Philo und die Halacha: Eine vergleichende Studie unter steter Berücksichtigung des Josephus, 1879. Secondly, other books of the New Testament also contain a number of parallels to Philo's exposition; and, although we cannot prove that the writers of these books had not read Philo, it seems more probable that the coincidences are due to the general drift of thought. Even the Synoptic Gospels furnish some striking resemblances in phraseology and sentiment. The Epistles of St. Paul approach Philo more nearly, and even contain examples of allegorical interpretation. It is perhaps more surprising to find that the Epistle of James has many words and figures, allusions and precepts, in common with Philo, and that the two writers agree in some of their doctrines, both in substance and in the mode of presenting them. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews betrays an obvious affinity with the Alexandrian school; and yet, even in his case, we cannot prove a direct dependence upon Philo. See particulars, and other works referred to, in Siegfried, and in Anathon Aall, Geschichte der Logosidee in der christlichen Litteratur, 1899, who assumes a more direct dependence upon Philo than seems securely established by the evidence. On the wide prevalence of a Logos-doctrine in the 1st cent., and its connexion, through the mediation of Stoicism, with the old Egyptian theology, see many interesting particulars in R. Reitzenstein's Zwei religionsgeschichtliche Fragen nach ungedruckten griechischen Texten der Strassburger Bibliothek, 1901.

When we pass from the New Testament, the connexion with Philo gradually becomes more and more obvious, especially through the predominance of that vicious mode of interpretation of which he made such extensive use. This is seen in the Epistle of Barnabas, which follows some of the principal rules of allegory. It is still further exemplified in the writings of Justin Martyr, where the whole false system is fully established. The Apologist, moreover, in his doctrine of the Logos, has many points of agreement with Philo, which are wholly wanting in St. John; and it is certainly not improbable that a philosopher had studied the works of the Alexandrian sage. Similar appearances are presented by the works of other apologists, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus. When we come to the great Alexandrian writers, Clement and Origen, there is no longer any room for doubt; for they expressly refer to him. They inherit from him the rules of allegorical interpretation, and are dependent on him in some of their important doctrinal statements. Eusebius frequently quotes him, and borrows his doctrines and interpretations; and he was read even in the West, for Ambrose makes ample use of him, and sometimes transfers his very words, in a Latin translation, to his own pages. Jerome, too, is familiar with his writings, and avails himself especially of his interpretations of scriptural names, though sometimes correcting him. It was probably, for the most part, through Jerome that these explanations passed on to other Latin Fathers. See the whole subject treated by Siegfried, p. 303 ff., where other works are referred to. This widely spread knowledge of his writings shows the high estimation in which Philo was held; but, nevertheless, we cannot place him among the world's great original thinkers. To class him, as ancient writers did, with Plato, must seem to us an absurd exaggeration of his powers. His system of interpretation, borrowed indeed but extended and popularized by him, may have helped for a time to save the reverence due to the Scriptures, but was in its ultimate effect purely mischievous, hiding the real beauties of the ancient records, and reducing Revelation to a fantastic puzzle. But he gave eloquent expression to a great movement of thought, and prepared a sort of philosophical mould in which the fluid doctrines of Christianity could acquire consistency and shape; and amid his tedious interpretations there are splendid flashes of spiritual thought, while his ethical teaching reaches an exalted purity, without transgressing the bounds of sober sense, and is always flushed with the hues of religious faith, and reverence for the Will and Spirit of God.

LITERATURE.—In the foregoing article only the most important references have been given; for the opinions of Philo are collected from such a number of passages that the complete references would occupy an undue amount of space. They will be found in the present author's work, Philo Judæus: or the Jewish-Alexandrian Philosophy in its Development and Completion, 2 vols., London, 1888, where also there is a much fuller discussion of controverted points. In addition to works already referred to, it may be sufficient to mention the following: August Gfrörer, Philo und die alexandrinische Theosophie, 1831; August Ferdinand Dähne, Geschichtliche Darstellung der jüdisch-alexandrinischen Religions-Philosophie, 1834; Friedrich Keferstein, Philo's Lehre von den göttlichen Mittelwesen, 1846; Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, iii. Thl. 2 Abth. 1881; Henry Soulier, La Doctrine du Logos chez Philon d'Alexandrie, 1876; Anathon Aall, Geschichte der Logosidee in der griechischen Philosophie, 1896. A fuller bibliography may be consulted in Schürer, GJV^{3} iii. 542 ff. An interesting Florilegium Philonis has been collected and published by Mr. C. G. Montefiore in the JQR [April 1895 vii. pp. 481–545.

i. OBJECT.—1. The object of Textual Criticism is to recover the ipsissima verba of the documents of which the NT is composed, and to present them to modern readers as nearly as possible in the form in which they left their authors' hands. This definition is based on the assumption that all the copies of the different books we possess, whether in Greek or in a translation, are capable of being traced back in the last resort to one and the same original. The assumption is a natural one, and not to be surrendered without very cogent reason. Still we cannot exclude the possibility that any particular book may have been current from Apostolic times in two closely related but distinct forms. St. Paul may, as Lightfoot suggested,[*] have issued a second edition of his Epistle to the Romans. St. Luke may, as Blass maintains, have issued two editions, both of his Gospel and of the Acts. The phenomena presented by the text of St. Mark, not only in regard to the last twelve verses but throughout the Gospel, may need the same hypothesis for their adequate solution.[†] In such cases the task of the critic becomes still more delicate. He has to disentangle and present distinctly not one original but two, which were once current side by side, but which have in the course of time been blended together, in almost inextricable confusion, in all our extant authorities.

2. From this definition of the object which all textual critics alike have before them two consequences follow, to which it will not be superfluous, judging from the past history of the science, to call attention before we pass on.

The first is this. There is at present, and there must remain, room for legitimate difference of opinion. We must be careful not to arrogate to the form of text which we ourselves prefer an exclusive right to represent the true 'word of God.' The necessity for this caution is perhaps not so great as it was in the days of Griesbach.[*] The appeal made in a recent pamphlet by the leading supporter of one of the two rival schools of Textual Criticism to a standard which has yet to be fixed is a most hopeful sign.[†]

The second consequence which follows from our definition of the object of Textual Criticism is this. As all textual critics are engaged on one and the same sacred study, and are fellow-workers to a common end, they will do well to take special pains to cultivate mutual respect. It is strange, but it is none the less true, that the study of Textual Criticism seems to have a peculiarly disastrous effect upon the temper. The virulence with which Walton, Mill, Griesbach, and Lachmann were assailed, not to speak of more recent examples, is a deep stain on the annals of the study.[‡]

ii. MATERIALS.—3. It does not fall within the scope of this article to describe at length the materials available for the Textual Criticism of NT. In part they are dealt with under separate heads (see A, ℵ, B, C, D, Arabic Version, etc.). For a complete list (and for purposes of reference anything short of a complete list is unsatisfactory) the student must be referred to the recognized storehouses of information, e.g. Tregelles, vol. i. of Horne's Introduction to the New Testament, revised 1856, by no means to be neglected; Prolegomena to Tischendorf, ed. C. R. Gregory, 1884-94; Scrivener's *Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament*⁴, 1894, revised by E. Miller and others; Gregory, Textkritik des Neuen Testamentes, Leipzig, 1900. The evidence, so far as it had been ascertained at the time of publication, was collected in two great critical editions.

4. The edition by Tischendorf, ed. viii. 1869-72, is at present indispensable for students, but it needs throughout to be carefully checked and supplemented. The edition of Tregelles (1857-79) is no less a marvel of patient accuracy. Unfortunately, the first two Gospels were issued before the discovery of ℵ, and, though the evidence is supplied in an Appendix issued by Hort and Streane after the author's death, it is awkward to use. The statement of the evidence is, however, given with great clearness. And the method adopted—a deliberate limitation of the authorities, whose evidence was to be represented, to the uncial

MSS, a few select cursives, all the Versions, and the Fathers up to Eusebius—has a real advantage, as it concentrates attention on that period in the history of the text about which there is room for serious difference of opinion.*

Editions which aim at giving only a selection of readings such as Baljon's (1898) are radically unsatisfactory. It is impossible to estimate the value of any authority in any single book without studying the whole of its readings through that book.

Editions such as that published by E. Nestle at Stuttgart in 1899 are convenient as indicating concisely the differences between the most important among recent critical editors, but do not profess to give the grounds on which their judgments are based. A Textual Commentary upon the Holy Gospels, edited by E. Miller largely from materials collected by the late Dean Burgon, of which part i. (Mt 1–14) appeared in 1899, will afford a useful index to the Gospel references to be found in the Fathers down to the latest period. This list is based directly on the indexes compiled with enormous labour by Dean Burgon, now in the British Museum. It has not apparently been supplemented by reference to other sources, e.g. Tregelles, or Hort in the Notes on Select Readings in his Appendix. It needs, besides, and will no doubt in due course receive, careful sifting. Scholars, however, cannot but be grateful for the labour that has been bestowed on its preparation.

It is only right to add that Mr. Miller's judgment on the drawback to the use of Patristic evidence from the uncritical character of the current editions of their works † must be checked in the light of Barnard's edition of the Quis dives salvetur, and his account of 'The Biblical Text of Clement of Alexandria' in Cambridge Texts and Studies, v. 2 and 5. Nestle also has some pertinent remarks, with illustrations, in his Textual Criticism of NT, p. 144 ff., Eng. tr.

Mr. Miller's edition embodies, besides, the results of recent collations, chiefly of cursives. A certain number of misprints are inevitable in a work of this scope. Students, however, should be warned that Mr. Miller has not incorporated all the various readings for which there is MS evidence. Nor does he always quote completely the subsidiary authorities, e.g. the MSS of the Latin Versions, in the passages which he selects for comment. Again, the authority of the Revisers is quoted constantly for readings on which it is clear that they were never called upon to pronounce an opinion.

iii. METHODS AND PRINCIPLES.—5. The main purpose of this article is to discuss the methods and principles by the help of which we may hope to secure the best result from our use of the materials available for Textual Criticism. This, it is well to remember, is the true province of the textual critic. It is, no doubt, of first-rate importance for any one who wishes to bring out a critical edition, that he should have a certain amount of experience in the direct handling of MSS. But to imagine, as Dean Burgon seems to do, that the value of a man's opinion on a matter of Textual Criticism depends directly on the extent of his first-hand acquaintance with original documents, is very like measuring the skill of a jeweller by the amount of his experience in the work of a diamond field or of a gold mine, or refusing to accept a historian's estimate of a document unless he has himself inspected the MS from which it was printed. In fact, the qualities that go to make an ideal collator, such as Scrivener for instance, are very rarely combined with the capacity and the opportunity for taking such a comprehensive and intelligent survey of the whole evidence as can qualify a man to pronounce a sound judgment on the relative importance of any particular element in it. The constant growth of available material makes it increasingly important to lay stress on the radical distinction between the two functions —the function of collecting and the function of interpreting the materials of criticism.

It is strange, and not a little sad, that after nearly two centuries of discussion there should as yet be no general agreement among textual critics on the fundamental principles or even the methods of their science. Yet so it is. Critics have from the first been divided into two main schools—the 'Traditional' and the 'Critical.' They approach the problem from diametrically opposite points of view, and are at present almost as far from coming to an agreement as they have ever been. The 'Oxford Debate,' however, at least indicates a desire for mutual understanding, and is so far a sign of better days in store.

6. The Traditional School is represented by a small but vigorous band of English scholars, at the head of whom stands Mr. Miller,* to whom reference has already been made more than once.† This school has, so far as known to the present writer, no support on the Continent, though readings of the Traditional Text constantly commended themselves to the veteran French commentator, Godet.

7. Traditionalists are strong in the prescriptive right due to fifteen centuries of almost unchallenged supremacy. They have, or had,—for the 19th cent. has not left matters as they were in this respect,—what Mr. Gwilliam in writing of the Peshitta (Scrivener⁴, vol. ii. p. 17) fairly calls 'the advantage of possession.' They are, however, fully alive to the necessity of establishing their position on the ground of a reasoned and not an unreasoning faith. They are busy, therefore, in justifying their position by argument in the court of truth and fact, which, as they cannot but feel, must cast prescription to the winds if there is a flaw in their title. Their fundamental canon, as formulated by Mr. Miller (Oxford Debate, p. xii), runs as follows:—

> 'It (the true text) must be grounded upon an exhaustive view of the evidence of Greek copies in manuscript in the first place, and, in all cases where they differ so as to afford doubt, of Versions or Translations into other languages, and of Quotations from the NT made by Fathers and other early writers.'
>
> On p. xiv we read further: 'In the ascertainment of this text, or these readings, guidance is to be sought under Seven Notes of Truth, viz.—(1) Antiquity, (2) Number, (3) Variety, (4) Weight, (5) Continuity of Witnesses, (6) The Context of Passages, (7) Internal Evidence. These Seven Notes of Truth, which are essential to the Traditional Text, sufficiently exhibit the agreement of it with the Canons laid down. In fact, coincidence with the first Canon implies coincidence with all the rest.'

---

* Von Soden's Die Schriften des NT, etc. (Bd. i. Abt. 1, 1902) is a worthy fruit of the recent revival of German interest in NT Textual Criticism. He has already revolutionized the catalogue of NT Greek MSS. When completed, the work cannot fail to mark an immense advance in the scientific presentment of the materials for Criticism.

† l.c. p. xiii: 'I am persuaded that more is made of this drawback than would be if it were generally known how little modern editing of the best kind, perhaps not in Eusebius, but in most authors, alters the quotations.'

A somewhat lurid light is thrown on this remark by a sentence in Nestle, l.c. p. 145, Eng. tr. 'As late as 1872 an Oxford editor, in bringing out Cyril of Alexandria's Commentary on the Gospel according to St. John, wrote down only the initial and final words of the quotations in his manuscript, and allowed the compositor to set up the rest from a printed edition of the Textus Receptus.'

* Mr. Miller died while the present art. was passing through the press.

† Mr. Miller is the author of—(1) A Guide to the Textual Criticism of the NT, 1886; (2) The Oxford Debate, 1897; (3) The Present State of the Textual Controversy, 1899; (4) The Textual Controversy and the Twentieth Century, 1901. He is joint author with Dean Burgon of The Traditional Text of the Holy Gospels, 1896; and The Causes of the Corruption of the Traditional Text, 1896. He also edited the 4th ed. of Scrivener's Introduction.

8. There is no indication of the kind of differences between MSS which 'afford doubt,' and render it necessary to call in the evidence of Versions or Quotations; nor is there any hint of the method of determining the 'weight' of a witness. Judging from his Textual Commentary, Mr. Miller's own habit is to weigh uncials against uncials and cursives against cursives, and he feels no doubt so long as there is a clear numerical preponderance in each class in favour of the same reading. In 7 cases an adverse group is characterized as 'Western.' In 5 of these it includes ℵ and B. In one case (Mt 9^{13}) a reading attested by ℵBD + 6^{unc} 30^{cu} all latt. exc. c $g^{1,2}$ Syr-vg (against cur and sin) and Clem. Rom. (ii. 2), is described as 'Syrio-Low-Latin with Alexandrian support.' These are the only cases in which he gives any guidance in the classification of MSS.

In 4 cases, viz. Mt 6^{28} (pl. verb after τὰ κρίνα), 13^{25} (ἐπέσπειρεν for ἔσπειρεν), 13^{36} (διασάφησον for φράσον, 'prob. a Latin gloss adopted by Origen'), 13^{57} (ἰδίᾳ for αὐτοῦ, disregarding Jn 4^{44}), he suspects 'Latinization.' In 14^{24} (σταδίους πολλοὺς ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ἀπεῖχεν for μέσον τῆς θαλάσσης ἦν) he hints at retranslation from Syriac. Here, again, we might wish that the suggestions were more illuminating. In 5 cases he discusses the possibility of the influence of Lection systems; in 2 of assimilation to St. Mark; in one case (14^{30}) he appeals to 'internal testimony' (construction of βλέπω). For the rest, he is content to let his lists speak for themselves. The mere recital of a long list of authorities ought, he has no doubt, to bear down opposition by sheer weight of numbers. It is true that in the 'Seven Notes of Truth' antiquity stands before number. But his power to estimate the antiquity of witnesses is limited by his failure to grasp clearly the distinction between the date of a document and the date of the text contained in it, or at least by his failure to apply this distinction consistently.* In practice, his convenient assumption, that the almost universal prevalence of the Traditional Text in the Greek Church after the end of cent. iv proves that text to be Apostolic, frees him from any qualms arising from the demonstrable antiquity of those witnesses which he is content to disregard.

9. At this point it will be well to examine a little more minutely the claim of the Traditionalists to be the only school that takes account of the whole available evidence. It would, no doubt, be a strong point in their favour if they could substantiate it. Unfortunately for them, the assertion is utterly baseless. Their most formidable antagonist, Dr. Hort, framed his text, as any one who has read his Introduction must know, at least as directly as any Traditionalist, on a patient examination of all the evidence. And he lays at least as much stress on the importance of bringing the knowledge gained by the examination of all the facts to bear on the interpretation of the evidence in each case that comes up for decision. When at last a choice has to be made between two rival groups of authorities, the one or the other must be rejected. But it does not follow that its claims have not been fully considered. Otherwise, the Traditionalists themselves would be open to the charge of 'taking no account' of what seems to others the most significant part of the evidence. This charge would, of course, be untrue. And it is an encouraging sign of a rapprochement between the two schools, that the Traditionalists are beginning to admit the necessity for accounting for the existence of the various readings which they reject, on some more satisfactory theory than that of the blind or malignant perversity of the individual scribe of ℵ, B, or D. A great step towards ultimate agreement will have been made when it is admitted on both sides that no solution of a textual problem can be final which does not leave room for a rational account of the origin of all the extant variants.

10. The cause of corruption on which Mr. Miller is at present inclined (Oxford Debate, p. xv) to lay most stress, is a striking admission of the antiquity of the texts affected by it. He traces it back to forms of the oral Gospel which may have been in existence 'even before the Gospels were written.' A similar source was suggested long ago by Dr. Hort as a possible explanation of certain remarkable insertions in the text of D and its allies. It remains to be seen whether the characteristic differences between the text of ℵB and the text of the later Gospel MSS are best explained on the same hypothesis. The suggestion does not at first sight commend itself. In the text of ℵB the separate Gospels stand before us, each with a marked individuality of its own. In the Traditional Text the specific differences in the several reports of the same utterance or the same incident which help to define this individuality, are constantly obliterated. Now, of course, it is a priori possible that this uniformity was original, and that the variations came from a corrupting force, which may well have been very potent while it lasted, but which can, ex hypothesi, only have been in operation during a very limited period. Only in that case it is difficult to see why it should not have affected all the Gospels equally.

On the other hand, we are bound to make allowance for an undeniable tendency towards the assimilation of parallel passages—a tendency which must have acted with growing intensity as the comparative study of the Gospels developed (as it did very early), and especially in a country which possessed a popular 'Harmony' (cf. Chase, Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 76 ff.). It is unlikely, therefore, that Mr. Miller's suggestion will obtain any wide acceptance as an explanation of the characteristic readings of ℵB.[*]

* As this distinction is of primary importance in estimating the weight to be attached to a document, and as beginners in Textual Criticism sometimes find a difficulty in understanding it, it may be worth while to explain that the 'date of a document' is, strictly speaking, the date at which it was written, and, when the MS is not expressly dated by the scribe, is settled by palæographical considerations. 'The date of the text contained in the document' is, of course, primarily the date of the autograph. But in the case of a text like that of NT, which has a continuous history, the 'date of the text' refers naturally to the time when the particular form of text contained in the document was current, either generally or in some particular district. E.g. D (Codex Bezæ) is a document of cent. vi, but its text represents a type which was widely prevalent in cent. ii. 'k' (Bobiensis) is usually assigned to cent. v. Mr. Burkitt has recently given strong grounds for dating it early in cent. iv, but the text of 'k' is the text current in Africa in the days of Cyprian, A.D. 250 (see Old-Latin Biblical Texts, ii.).

It is interesting to notice that Mr. Miller is alive to this distinction in regard to Syr-cur and Syr-sin (p. xviii of Text. Com.). But he habitually ignores it in the case of ℵ and B. The confusion in this case goes back to Scrivener, who writes in a note (p. vi, Advers. Crit. Sacr.), describing the work of Dean Burgon, which underlies Miller's Text. Com.: 'He had been engaged day and night for years in making a complete index or view of the MSS used by the Nicene (and ante-Nicene) Fathers, by way of showing that they were not identical with those copied in Codd. ℵ and B, and, inasmuch as they were older, they must needs be purer and more authentic than those overvalued uncials' [italics are the present writer's]. He also quotes, 'as helping to annul much of Dr. Hort's erroneous theories' (p. xxviii), an extract from Mr. Rendel Harris, which exactly expresses Dr. Hort's fundamental contention on the matter. 'It is not a little curious to the person who commences the critical study of the documents of the NT to find that he can discover no settled proportion between the age of a MS and the critical weight attached to it. . . . A little study soon convinces the tyro of the impossibility of determining any law by which the value of a codex can be determined in terms of its age only without reference to its history.'

This quotation can have no point in Scrivener's note, except on the assumption, which Mr. Miller adopts without hesitation, that Westcott and Hort attached fundamental importance to the dates at which ℵ and B were written in arriving at their estimate of the weight to be ascribed to them.

11. In treating of the problems raised by the felt necessity of offering an explanation of the origin of variant readings, we have reached what is really the starting-point of the labours of the 'Critical' school. Ever since the collection of the evidence for the text of NT began in earnest, in the great edition published by Mill in 1707, the attention of critics was attracted by the nature of the variants from the 'Traditional' text contained in the writings of the earliest Fathers, in the Versions, and in a few of the oldest MSS.[†]

Not only was the authority for these variants demonstrably early, but it was again and again so much easier to account for the origin of the variants on the supposition that the Traditional Text was wrong. In fact it soon became clear that the substantial uniformity of the bulk of the later copies of the Greek Text was due to a gradual process, by which the variety of texts current in cent. iv were in the course of three or four centuries transformed after a common type. This common 'Traditional' type Bengel called 'Byzantine.' It is the same as that which Dr. Hort calls 'Syrian' and some modern scholars 'Antiochian.'

It is interesting to notice that there is now no controversy as to the fact of this transformation.[*] The only question at issue is the significance to be attached to it. Mr. Miller contends that the triumph of the Traditional Text was due to the fact that it was already widely diffused at the beginning of the period in documents of such excellence, and so highly accredited, that it simply crushed all rivals out of existence.

12. This contention clearly demands careful examination. In order that the investigation may be as precise as possible, it will be well to define the field which it is proposed to explore. As Mr. Miller's language (e.g. Preface to Oxford Debate, p. xiv) is quite general, all periods may be assumed to come alike to him. Let us take, then, the period between the Council of Constantinople in 381 and the Council of Chalcedon in 450. It is the latest that we can choose that will give us evidence which can in any real sense be said to speak with the voice of the whole Eastern Church. During this period the development of Christian thought was determined by influences emanating from three main centres: from Alexandria, fresh from the triumph over Arianism, which Athanasius had done so much single-handed to secure; from Antioch; and from the Church which ecclesiastically was the daughter of Antioch, from Constantinople. Of these three centres it is not, the present writer thinks, too much to say that Alexandria never accepted the Traditional Text. The date of the Bohairic Version must, we suppose, still be regarded as uncertain. If, as seems to be at present the verdict of the most competent Coptic scholars, it is to be assigned to cent. iv or v, it would give us exactly the evidence that we need as to the state of the text officially recognized in Egypt either at the beginning or at some point in the course of our period. The Bohairic constantly sides with ℵ and B against the Traditional Text.

Nor does this evidence stand alone. The same type of text[†] is found in the two great Alexandrian writers of this period, Didymus (†394) and Cyril (†444). Further evidence on this point will, no doubt, come to light with the progress of Egyptian exploration. It is too soon as yet to summarize the evidence of the papyri.[‡] Here, then, at the outset, the boasted 'universality' breaks down. On textual matters, as the earliest nomenclature for describing the 'families' of readings might have warned us to expect, there was a permanent distinction between Constantinople and Alexandria.

13. Nor is this all. Jerome's revision of the Old Latin Versions was made at Rome c. 382 by the aid of the Greek MSS which he judged most trustworthy. It is true, as Nestle says (Textual Criticism, p. 124), that it is not yet clearly made out

---

[*] This seems the most convenient place to notice Dr. Salmon's criticism of Westcott and Hort for their lack of interest 'in the question of the origin of the Synoptic Gospels; that is to say, in inquiries whether the narratives of the three have any common basis, oral or written' (Some Criticism of the Text of NT, ch. v.). It is strange that in making this criticism Dr. Salmon should have forgotten Dr. Westcott's Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, the most powerful statement in any language of the case on behalf of the old 'oral' hypothesis, and the share Dr. Hort took in the formation of the plan of (Abbott and) Rushbrooke's Synopticon, which was designed as an instrument for testing any 'Documentary Theory' that might be started. Otherwise, he might have looked for some other reason than 'lack of interest' to account for the silence of their Introduction to the NT in regard to the Synoptic Problem. The fact is, that to have called in one out of many possible solutions of the Synoptic Problem to fix the weight to be attached to MSS of the Gospels, would have been to explain obscurum per obscurius.

It is strange also that so close a reasoner should have failed to notice that his application to the Synoptic Problem of Dr. Hort's method for 'the recovery of the text of a single lost original, assuming the fact of exclusive descent from it to have been sufficiently established,' must fail from the neglect of two vital considerations. He has failed to allow (see Hort, p. 55, l. 6) for the possibility of 'mixture' between the representatives of his different groups. But, what is even more serious, he has overlooked the primary condition of 'exclusive descent.' For, while we may well believe that the three Synoptics take us back to a common original, whether that original be our St. Mark or an Ur-Marcus, no one, least of all Dr. Salmon, has ventured to suggest that St. Matthew and St. Luke had no independent information. In fact, if St. Matthew had anything to do with the Gospel that bears his name, it may well preserve genuine elements in certain incidents that had failed to attract St. Peter's attention. From this point of view, the story of the 'Canaanitish woman' (Mt $15^{21\text{f.}}$, Mk $7^{24\text{f.}}$), where there is no serious question of reading, affords an instructive parallel to 'the rich young man' (Mt 19^{16}, Mk 10^{17}, Lk 18^{18}). In each case Matthew follows a distinct but by no means necessarily inconsistent tradition. (On 'the rich young man' see G. Macdonald, Unspoken Sermons, 2nd series).

It is clear that in settling the text of the Gospels we have to allow for the operation of forces acting in opposite directions: (1) a constant tendency to assimilation, affecting all the Gospels alike, complicated by (2) a tendency to dissimilation, produced by various accidents in the special history of the transmission of each Gospel.

No mechanical rule can therefore be laid down, and we may be thankful that in this, as in other cases, the editors were content to follow consistently the evidence of the MSS which, taking everything into account, they found most reason to trust, whether it made for likeness (e.g. Mt 8^9 15^{26}) or for difference (as in Mt 19^{16}) between the Evangelists, instead of revising their decision in each case with an eye to the Synoptic Problem. No doubt, the questions cannot be ultimately dissociated. But, after all, we must provisionally settle our text of the Gospels before we can solve the problem of their inter-relation.

[†] A few dates may with advantage be noted here. In the time of Mill (1707) the only 'primary uncials' of the Gospels of which full collations were available were A and D. Bengel (1734) had access as well to 'select readings' of C. Griesbach, in his first edition, used full collations of ACDL. No collation of B was published till 1788. ℵ was discovered in 1859.

In the light of these facts, Mr. Miller's method of accounting for the preference shown by the 'Critical' school for the small over the large group of authorities needs correction. 'The explanation,' he says (Oxford Debate, p. 6), 'is what has frequently been called by other men the extreme adulation paid to B, especially by Dr. Hort and men of that side. I think some of it is very natural, and that history quite accounts for it. They [ℵ and B] are the two oldest MSS; and in early times, when people had in their view only a small amount of evidence, it was very natural that they should say that these two MSS, which come to us as the earliest, and were therefore nearest to the original autographs, should be right.'

In the interests of 'true history' and 'sound logic' we must remember that the foundations of the Critical position were laid, not only long before ℵ was discovered, but even while the readings of B were almost entirely unknown.

It must, no doubt, have given B a peculiar interest in the eyes of Griesbach when he found how exactly it verified results which he had arrived at independently (see Tregelles, Intr. p. 131), a forecast only less brilliant than that which was verified by the discovery of the Curetonian and Sinaitic Syriac.

[*] See Miller's Text. Cont. p. 29: 'Thenceforward [from the end of the 4th cent.] till the 19th [? 18th] cent. was far advanced it [the Traditional Text] reigned without a rival, though perhaps the thorough establishment of it did not take effect till the beginning of the 8th century.'

what these MSS were. But it is remarkable that the latest editors of the Vulgate have seen reasons to infer for them a close kinship with ℵ and B.[*] At any rate, Jerome had not been taught by his stay in the East to believe in the exclusive validity of the Traditional Text.

14. The other two centres, Antioch and Constantinople, resolve themselves into one, at least in the person of Chrysostom, the most prominent representative of the Imperial city. Here, no doubt, we do find clear evidence of the coming supremacy of the Traditional Text. But even here the agreement is by no means as complete as it might appear to a casual observer. Each writer, even of those connected with these centres, has his own degree of approximation to the Traditional Text, and can be identified by his readings.

The fact to which we allude is in itself so striking an evidence both of the phenomenon to which we wish to call attention, and of the insight of the scholar who alone in our generation seems to have mastered the textual problems presented by Patristic citations, that we venture to transcribe in full the account which Dr. Hort gave of the steps by which he was led to the discovery of the lost commentaries of Theodore of Mopsuestia. He is referring to commentaries in Latin on ten of St. Paul's Epistles contained in a Corbey MS to which Pitra had recently called attention, claiming their authorship for Hilary of Poitiers. He writes (Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, No. xii., Feb. 1860, p. 303 f.) as follows :—

> 'What led me to the true authorship was, first, the character of the text used in the quotations ; and, secondly, two passages on Gal $4^{24.29}$, referred to by Pitra among the "splendidiora, quibus sibi haud impar identidem Hilarius emicat." St. Hilary employs, as is well known, a tolerably pure form of the Old Latin version of the NT : the text of the commentary is distinctively Greek of a late and bad type. No Father using any known Latin text could have so written ; it contains many corruptions not found in the very worst copies of the Vulgate, much less in earlier versions. It is too corrupt in its character for any considerable Greek Father even of cent. iv, except those connected with the Syrian school, and, among them, a shade too bad for St. Chrysostom or Theodoret. These facts considerably narrowed the question of authorship. And when, in commenting on the passages of Galatians, the author showed himself a vehement opponent of allegorical interpretation, it was easy to see that he must have been a literalist of too decided a character to be unknown,—in fact could not well be any other than Theodore himself, the chief of the literalists, or his brother Polychronius. Reference to a catena at once put an end to all speculation ; the Greek fragments of Theodore appeared in the Latin along with their lost context.'

15. Now, if Alexandria persistently rejected the Traditional Text, if Jerome came back from the East convinced of the excellence of the MSS that least resembled it, if there are marked differences during this period even between individual members of the Antiochene-Constantinopolitan school, it is difficult to know where to look for evidence of the universal, not to say exclusive, predominance of the Traditional Text in cent. v. Even the Peshiṭta, which Mr. Gwilliam[†] believes, and no doubt rightly (Oxford Debate, p. 32), that he can trace back with minute accuracy to the shape which it possessed in this same cent. v, is very far from affording that undivided support which Mr. Miller desiderates ; a fact which perhaps accounts for the coldness with which he receives a statement that used to be regarded almost as a commonplace —to wit, that 'the Syriac Version is the sheet-anchor of the Traditionalist position.' We are not sure that he would have been pleased with the suggestion, for which nevertheless there is something to be said, that Theodore of Mopsuestia should be promoted to the place left vacant by the Peshiṭta.

16. These, however, are matters of minor importance. It has all along been admitted that the Traditional Text was in existence in substantially its present form by the middle of the fourth century. The really vital point is to determine whether there is any evidence of its existence in the preceding period. On this point Dr. Hort 20 years ago made a statement, which was precise and definite enough, one might have thought, to ensure patient and attentive consideration on the part of those whose whole system must fall to the ground if the position laid down in it should prove to be well founded. His words are these (Introduction, p. 114, § 162) : 'Before the middle of the third century, at the very earliest, we have no historical signs of the existence of readings, conflate or other, that are marked as distinctively Syrian by the want of attestation from groups of documents which have preserved the other ancient forms of text.' For the identification of the readings referred to, full directions are given in §§ 225 f., 343. And any one who chose to take the trouble could make out lists of them for himself and test the accuracy of the contention. Mr. Miller refuses to take this method of attempting to understand the position of his opponent. He prefers a method which is not a little surprising in a writer who lays such stress on the importance of sound logic. His words (p. xv, Preface to Oxford Debate) are as follows :—

> 'We entirely traverse the assertion, that "no distinctly (sic) Syrian (i.e. Traditional) readings" are found amongst the earliest Fathers. Very many of the readings in the Traditional Text which are rejected by the other school are supported by those Fathers : and there is no evidence, as we maintain, to show that they pertain to the other side or to any other Text rather than to us, or that readings confessedly old and found in the Traditional Text did not belong to that Text.'

In other words, 'we entirely traverse' a statement, which has express reference to one element in the Traditional Text, by asserting propositions which have never been denied with regard to the other elements which on any hypothesis are recognizable in its composition. It would have been simpler to deny altogether the existence of 'distinctively Syrian readings' as defined by Dr. Hort. That at least is a question which can be brought to a definite issue. On that point the Apparatus Criticus will be recognized as an impartial arbiter.

17. Let us, then, examine the facts for ourselves. It is clear that in this article we shall have to limit ourselves to illustrative specimens, as an example of a method which any one can learn to apply for himself to any part of the NT that he chooses. At the same time it is important for the right understanding of the method, that it should be seen in application to continuous portions of the text—and not in isolated examples chosen because they possess special features of interest or importance. The weight of authorities in cases of primary importance can be learnt only by patient attention to details which in themselves may seem absurdly trivial and insignificant.

We propose therefore to set forth and to examine first a list of all the readings which have a claim to be regarded as distinctively Syrian in 1 Timothy, and then to attempt a more comprehensive analysis of all the variants in Mk $1^{1\text{-}28}$. It is true that the ultimate decision of the true text in the Pastoral Epistles is less secure than it is in the case of most of the books of the NT, owing to the absence not only of B, but also of any demonstrably early Latin or Syriac evidence—apart from the isolated quotations in Cyprian ; but these considerations will not seriously affect the identification of 'distinctively Syrian readings,' and the specimen chosen has the advantage of enabling us to study the influence of similar but not identical contexts on one another in a way that may throw light on a class of readings that meet us constantly in the Synoptic Gospels.

[*] Wordsworth and White, N.T. Latine Epilogus, cap. vi. 'De regulis a nobis in Textu constituendo adhibitis.'

[†] Mr. Burkitt's essay (Texts and Studies, vii. 2) goes far to prove that the Peshiṭta is in fact a revision made in this century.

18. The first step is to collect all the readings supported by the mass of later documents without the support of any of the five leading uncials ℵACD$_2$G$_3$.

(1) 1 Ti 1^2—ἡμῶν (after πατρός) ℵ*AD$_2$*G$_3$ cu^6 Lat-vg Boh Go Arm : Orig$^{\text{int}}$.

+ ϛ c. rell. Syrr Sah Æth : Chr, etc.

See v.^{1}, and note similar addition in 2 Ti 1^2, Tit 1^4, 1 Th 1^1.

It forms part of the true text in all the other Pauline salutations except Galatians.

(2) 1 Ti 1^4 (a) οἰκονομίαν, ℵAG$_3$K$_2$L$_2$P$_2$ most cursives Arm Boh : Chr, etc.

(b) οἰκοδομήν, D$_2$* Iren Lat-vg Go Syr.

(c) οἰκοδομίαν, ϛ^e D$_2$^{c} and a few cursives.

Note characteristic Pauline use of οἰκονομίαν ; cf. Eph 3^2.

οἰκοδομίαν (not found elsewhere in Gr. Bible) combines the sound of (a) with the sense of (b).

(3) 1 Ti 1^9 πατρο- μητρολῴαις, ℵAD$_2$G$_3$ (P$_2$) (K$_2$) 17 37 137.

πατρα- μητραλῴαις, ϛ c. rell.

The spelling πατρο- is due to a false analogy ; but the question we have to settle is not which spelling is right in itself, but which St. Paul is most likely to have used.

(4) 1 Ti 1^{13} τὸ πρότερον ὄντα, ℵAD$_2$*G$_3$P$_2$ cu^7 : Chr$^{\text{mosc 1}}$ Cyr.

τὸν πρότερον ὄντα, ϛ c. rell. Lat-vg : Chr, etc.

Here the neuter is clearly the more idiomatic.

(5) 1 Ti 1^{17} μόνῳ θεῷ, ℵ*AD$_2$*G$_3$ cu^3 Lat-vg Syr-hr Boh Sah Arm Æth : Eus Cyr Chr$^{\text{com}}$ Tert.

μόνῳ σοφῷ θεῷ, ϛ c. rell. Go Syr-hcl : Chr$^{\text{txt \textit{not} com}}$, etc.

Cf. Ro 16^{27} where σοφῷ has point, cf. 11^{33} ; and note similar insertion in Jude^{25}.

(6) 1 Ti 2^9 ὡσαύτως γυναῖκας, ℵ*AP$_2$(D$_2$*G$_3$ add καί): (Clem) (Orig).

ὡσαύτως καὶ τὰς γυν., ϛ c. D$_2$$^{\text{b. c}}$ rel : Chr.

Cf. v.l. in 1 P 3^1, and note neighbourhood of τοὺς ἄνδρας.

(7) 1 Ti 2^9 ἐν πλέγμασιν καὶ χρυσῷ ἢ μαρ., ℵAD$_2$*G$_3$ Syr-vg Boh : Orig $\frac{1}{2}$.

ἐν πλέγμασιν ἢ χρυσῷ ἢ μαρ., ϛ c. rell. (exc. P$_2$al^3) f m Lat-vg Syr-hcl Go Sah : Clem Orig $\frac{1}{2}$ Cypr Chr.

The combined evidence of Versions and Fathers, if the details may be trusted, proves that this variant is pre-Syrian. It is possibly Alexandrian.

Cf. v.l. in 1 P 3^3. There seems to be a point in the distinction between the treatment of the hair and of the jewels.

(8) 1 Ti 2^{12} διδάσκειν δὲ γυναικί, ℵAD$_2$G$_3$P cu^{11} Lat-vg Arm : Orig Cypr.

γυναικὶ δὲ διδάσκειν, ϛ c. rell. Syrr (Boh) Sah : Chr.

The emphasis clearly lies on διδάσκειν.

(9) 1 Ti 2^{14} ἐξαπατηθεῖσα, ℵ*AD$_2$*G$_3$P$_2$ cu^{11}: Chr $\frac{1}{4}$.

ἀπατηθεῖσα, ϛ c. rell : Chr $\frac{3}{4}$.

ἐξαπ. Pauline, cf. 2 Co 11^3. ἀπατ. has come in from context.

(10*) 1 Ti 3^3—μὴ αἰσχροκερδῆ, ℵAD$_2$G$_3$KLP cu^{37} verss : Orig$^{\text{int}}$ Tert Chr.

+ ϛ c. rell. Syr-hcl-mg.

Insertion from v.^{8}, Ti 1^7 ; cf. Ti 1^{11}, 1 P 5^2. Here superfluous, see ἀφιλάργυρον.

(11) 1 Ti 3^{16} ὃς ἐφανερώθη, ℵ*A*C*F$_2$G$_3$ cu^3 Boh Sah Syr-hcl-mg : Orig$^{\text{int}}$.

ὃ ἐφανερώθη, D$_2$* Lat-vg Syr-vg-hcl Arm.

$\overline{\theta\varsigma}$ ἐφανερώθη, ϛ c. ℵ^{c}C^{c}D$_2$^{c}KLP rell.

F$_2$ is quoted here, though the present writer does not believe that it has any authority independent of G$_3$, because it is sometimes quoted wrongly in support of θεός. The line above ο is not horizontal, and corresponds exactly to the line which elsewhere indicates a rough breathing in this MS. There is no trace of a sagitta in the ο.

On this reading see Hort, Appendix, p. 132 ff.

Note especially the evidence of the Versions.

(12) 1 Ti 4^{12} ἐν ἀγάπῃ ∧ ἐν πίστει, ℵACD$_2$G$_3$ cu^9 verss : Clem Chr.

ἐν ἀγ. ἐν πνεύματι ἐν π., ϛ c. rell.

Insertion awkward ; 1 Co 4^{21}, 2 Co 6^6 no parallels. Prob. from Col 1^8.

Insertion from 2^3. The only other instance of ἀποδ. in NT.

Perhaps from Mt 5^{16}, note οὐ δύναται κρυβῆναι v.^{14}.

(17) 1 Ti 5^{25} (a) πρόδηλα, ℵA 67.

(b) πρ. εἰσι, D$_2$G$_3$P$_2$ cu^7.

(c) πρ. ἐστι., ϛ c. rell : Chr.

Here (b) and (c) are insertions of a common type. (c) apparently a correction of (b) to bring it into agreement with classical rules ; cf. 2 Ti 4^{17}.

The plural is by no means uncommon in later Greek.

(18*) 1 Ti 6^5 διαπαρατριβαί, ℵAD$_2$G$_3$L$_2$P$_2$, etc.: Clem Chr.

παραδιατριβαί, ϛ 'not many cursives.'

διαπαρα—in itself a rarer form of compound—is much more vigorous, connoting an intensified form of παρατριβή, 'friction' or 'collision.'

[19] 1 Ti 6^5 – ἀφίστασο ἀπὸ τῶν τοιούτων, ℵAD$_2$G$_3$ cu^3 Lat-vg Boh Sah Go Æth.

+ ϛ c. rell. incl. Syrr Arm : Chr ; cf. Cypr.

An insertion, of an unusually bold type for this form of text, to complete a misunderstood construction. The evidence of Cyprian shows that it is not purely 'Syrian.' It is of a Western type.

(20) 1 Ti 6^7 (a) ὅτι οὐδὲ ἐξ., ℵ*AG$_3$ 17 (Lat-vg-codd) r Sah Boh Arm : Ath.

(b) ἀληθὲς ὅτι ο. ἐ., D$_2$* m Go : Cypr al. aliter.

(c) δῆλον ὅτι ο. ἐ., ϛ c. ℵ^{c}D$_2$$^{\text{bc}}K_2L_2P_2$: Chr.

(b) and (c) are independent attempts to mend (a).

See Hort, Appendix, p. 134. He conjectures that the true reading is simply οὐδὲ ἐξ. This is found in Arm Cyr. Cyprian also seems to omit ὅτι.

(21*) 1 Ti 6^{12} εἰς ἣν ἐκλήθης. All uncials, many cursives, all versions (exc. Syr-hcl) : Chr.

εἰς ἣν καὶ ἐ., ϛ c. rell.

An echo of Col 3^{15}.

(22) 1 Ti 6^{17} ἀλλ' ἐπὶ θεῷ (or τῷ θεῷ), ℵAD$_2$*G$_3$P$_2$ cu^{13} : Orig Chr.

ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ θ., ϛ c. rell.

It seems difficult to find a clear case of ἐλπ. ἐν in NT. Certainly not Ph 2^{19}, and 1 Co 15^{19} is more than doubtful.

ἐπί is found regularly, e.g. 1 Jn 3^3, 1 Ti 4^{10}, and in this verse.

(23*) 1 Ti 6^{17} πάντα πλουσίως, all uncials exc. G, most cursives, all versions (exc. Æth): Orig Chr.

πλουσίως πάντα, ϛ Æth, not many cursives.

G_3 omits πάντα.

(24) 1 Ti 6^{19} ὄντως, ℵAD_2*G_3 cu^{10} verss.

αἰωνίου, ϛ c. rell. (37 'conflates' αἰωνίου ὄντως): Chr.

αἰωνίου is habitual with ζωῆς; cf. v.^{12}.

ὄντως is striking, and characteristic of this Ep.; cf. $5^{3.\,5.\,16}$.

(25*) 1 Ti 6^{20} παραθήκην, all uncials, most cursives: Clem Ign.

παρακαταθήκην, ϛ with many cursives: Hipp Chr.

παρακαταθ. is said to be the Attic form.

19. Here, then, are 25 readings which have a prima facie claim to be regarded as 'Syrian' or 'post-Syrian.' The criterion, as Dr. Hort warns us (§§ 324 f., 343), is not an infallible one. We need not be surprised, therefore, to find among them 2 readings (7 and 19) which are proved by Old Latin evidence to be pre-Syrian; we may therefore strike them out of our list. The whole 25 belong to the Received Text. How many of them Mr. Miller would assign to the Traditional Text it is impossible to say. No. 2, the support for which is infinitesimal, may be assumed to disappear. We shall therefore exclude it also from consideration. Nos. 10, 14, 18, 21, 23, 25 (which are distinguished above by an asterisk), when there is serious division among the cursives, must be regarded as at best uncertain. Dr. Hort would call them post-Syrian; it would be interesting to know how many of them Mr. Miller would class as 'post-Traditional.' In any case, they witness to a progressive deterioration in the text of the Epistle. We shall not, however, strike them out of the list, as their internal characteristics show a striking 'family likeness' to their predecessors. They may well be regarded as later results of the working of one and the same tendency. We shall, however, where possible, mark a distinction between them and the other readings. We have no wish to take an unfair advantage of the Traditional Text.

20. The first point that strikes us on a survey of the list as a whole is the triviality of by far the greater number of the examples. One (3) is a mere matter of spelling, (4, 6, 16) affect only an article, 3 (8, 16, 23*) relate to the order of words, 2 (13, 22) to prepositions, 3 (9, 18*, 25*) to different compounds of the same root, 4 (1, 17, 20, 21*) are quite trivial insertions; there are only 7—2 changes of words (11, 24) and 5 insertions (5, 10*, 12, 14*, 15)—which can be regarded as at all important. Of these, only 1 (11) can be supposed to affect any point of doctrine, and, as the Nicene Fathers managed to make shift without the reading of the Traditional Text, we need not be afraid to keep the demonstrably older reading.

21. The next point of interest is the distribution of support on the different sides on the part of Fathers and Versions.*

In the Patristic evidence the result is remarkable. Taking the whole number of passages (25), ante-Nicene evidence is quoted against the 'Syrian' Text 18 times, and only once (25*—a reading in Hippolytus incapable of verification) in support of it. If we leave out the 6 doubtful examples, the numbers are 12 against, 0 for. Chrysostom's text shows a marked contrast. He is quoted in all on 20 of the passages. In the 6 doubtful cases he supports the ante-Nicene in 5. In the remaining 14 his authority is quoted on both sides in 3 cases (4, 5, 9). He supports the Traditional Text in 12 (or 9) cases, he opposes it in 2 (or 5).

Among Versions the results are as follows:—

Latin Vulg.	supports the Trad. Text	1,	opposes it	13 (9)	times.
Bohairic .	,,	2 (1)	,,	10 (7)	,,
Sahidic .	,,	1	,,	10 (7)	,,
Syriac Vulg.	,,	3	,,	9 (5)	,,
Harclean Syriac	,,	4	,,	8 (4)	,,
Æthiopic .	,,	1	,,	10 (6)	,,
Armenian .	,,	1 (0)	,,	12 (9)	,,
Gothic .	,,	4 (2)	,,	6 (5)	,,

All the extant Versions are combined in 10*, 11, 12, 13, 23*, 24, in each case against the Received Text.

22. It remains to indicate briefly the character of the readings of the Traditional Text. Clearly, its most noteworthy feature is its fulness. In one case (16) it errs by defect, it drops one article out of two, while it contains 9 (6) additions. The most potent factor in this expansion of the text is, without doubt, the tendency to assimilate cognate passages. A second feature we may fairly describe as general weakness. In no single case has any of the editors collated by Nestle in his Stuttgart edition accepted any of those distinctively Traditional readings.

The net result of our examination may, we think, be fairly stated as follows: There is a demonstrably late element in the Traditional Text of 1 Tim.; the readings, which may fairly be regarded as distinctive of it, in which it is unsupported by any member of the numerically insignificant group ℵAC$D_2$$G_3$, are both weak in themselves and can very rarely be traced back historically into ante-Nicene times, and then they seem to belong also to other types of text.

23. We pass* now to our second specimen passage, Mk $1^{1\text{-}28}$.

This time—as we wish to study the whole structure of the Traditional Text, and not merely to sift out 'distinctively Syrian' readings—we must begin by printing the verses at length, marking as clearly as the typographical means at our disposal will allow, the relation in which this text stands to the other types of text out of which, on the Critical hypothesis, it was constructed. In one case (v.^{16}) where 'the verdict of the MSS' seemed decisive, we have ventured to print as 'traditional' a reading which is not found in the Received Text. Otherwise, the text printed here agrees with that which Scrivener edited for the Cambridge University Press as representing the Greek Text that may be presumed to underlie the AV.

[In the form of the extract the following points should be noticed: Words in ordinary type, and undistinguished by any signs above or below them, are common to all forms of text alike; words in heavy type belong to readings which, either in particular words or in arrangement or combination of words, may be regarded as 'distinctively Syrian,' because as they stand they agree exactly with no other form of text.

The relation in which the text as a whole stands to the 'Western' Text is indicated by continuous lines. These lines are drawn under the word

---

[*] We have taken the evidence from Tischendorf and Tregelles. We have not thought it worth while to subject the whole to an independent verification. The Patristic evidence includes, it will be noticed, all the ante-Nicene quotations, together with the quotations in Chrysostom.

[*] A careful collation of the readings of 1 and the MSS related to it in Mk 1 has just been published by Mr. Lake in Cambridge Texts and Studies. It contains a few variants which have not been noticed above, notably λίνα for δίκτυα in v.^{18}.

when the Traditional Text has accepted, above the word when it has rejected, a 'Western' reading. Its relation to the 'Alexandrian' Text is similarly indicated by spaced lines.

In a few cases, where it is desired to call attention to some evidence for or against a reading of the Traditional Text, though the authorities cannot be assigned with certainty to any of these types, the words affected are indicated on the same principle by a row of dots.

The 'Neutral' Text may be assumed to be at variance with the Traditional Text in all cases where words are underscored; all the other words in ordinary type are supported by it. Slight differences in form and spelling have in this case been neglected].

(d) βαπτίζων ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ καὶ κηρύσσων, A rell f Syr-hcl.

The clue to the readings here, as the present writer finds hinted in a MS note of Dr. Hort's, lies in Mark's use of 'Ιω. ὁ βαπτίζων (6$^{14.\,24}$, not 8^{28}; yet see 28 2$^{\text{pe}}$) as a title for the Baptist. The original reading is: (a)=‘John the Baptizer appeared in the wilderness preaching.’ (b) is an Alexandrian emendation, the Marcan idiom not being recognized, and the article causing difficulty in consequence =‘There appeared John who used to baptize in the wilderness and preach.’ (c) shows the Western handling of the difficulty, dropping the troublesome article, inserting καί, and, because the wilderness was a strange place to be specially connected with the baptisms, transposing the words. (d) is ‘distinctively Syrian,’ and conflates (b) and (c), keeping the order of (b) and dropping the article with (c). This is a first-rate example of the excellence of B in Ternary Variations. The connecting particle with ἐγένετο in ℵ* and Boh should be noticed. It could preclude the conn. of vv.^{1} and ^{4} which Orig Joh favours.

Note, further (d), that ℵ 69 a om. καί before ἐβαπτ.

In (d) the omission was probably due to the idea that the subj. of ἐξεπορεύετο was complete at χώρα (cf. the post-Syrian ἐξεπορεύοντο). The result is a strange statement that the city folk took the lead in accepting baptism, which can hardly be historical.

The Syrian change of the position of πάντες may be a modified echo of this. It is more likely due to a misunderstanding of the characteristically Marcan indefiniteness of ἐβαπτίζοντο=‘men’ were being baptized. πάντες with ἐβαπτ. is hyperbolical after a fashion to which Luke supplies parallels, not Mark.

In (b) and (c) notice once more how the Syrian Text combines the language of the ‘Neutral’ with the order of the ‘Western’ Text. The result is a close assimilation to Mt.

V.^{6} (1) καὶ ἦν, ℵBL 33.

ἦν δὲ, AD$^{\text{gr}}$P rel.

Mark's resolute adherence to καί causes constant difficulty to scribes. At least 40 times δέ has been wrongly introduced into the Syrian Text; cf. vv.$^{14.\,16.\,28}$ in this extract.

(3) For τρίχας καμήλου D$^{\text{gr}}$ reads δέρρην (=δέρριν) καμ., ‘a’ pellem and ‘d’ pilos. δέρριν in LXX (of raiment) Jg 4$^{18.\,21}$, Zec 13^{4} only.

In Zec 13^{4} δέρριν=אַדֶּרֶת, found also (Heb. not LXX) for Elijah's mantle in 1 K 19$^{13.\,19}$, 2 K 2$^{8.\,13\text{f.}}$.

This is remarkable, because the clause καὶ ζώνην δερμ. π.τ. ὀσφ. αὐτοῦ, omitted by D, is found exactly in 2 K 1^{8} in another description of Elijah. δέρριν (=the prophetic mantle) was probably regarded as a concise and picturesque equivalent for the whole phrase. But the man who introduced it must have known his Hebrew Bible and his LXX. Note that ‘a,’ which also omits καὶ ζώνην, κ.τ.λ., places v.^{6} after v.^{8}.

V.^{7} ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς for ἐκήρυσσεν λέγων, D (a). In ‘a's’ arrangement of the verses, αὐτοῖς has a point which is lost in D. In view of the rest of vv.$^{7.\,8}$ in D, it is safe to say that ἔλεγεν comes from Lk 3^{7} or Mt 3^{7}. ἐκήρυσσεν is characteristic of Mk. (cf. e.g. 1^{38} and Lk 4^{43}, 1^{45} and Lk 5^{15}, 6^{12} and Lk 9^{6}. It is curious that in these passages there should be no par. in Mt.). It has also point as resuming v.^{4}.

Vv.$^{7.\,8}$ (1) D a (ff^{1}) read: 'Εγὼ μὲν ὑμᾶς βαπτίζω ἐν ὕδατι, ἔρχεται δὲ ὀπίσω μου ὁ ἰσχυρότερός μου οὗ οὐκ εἰμὶ ἱκανὸς λῦσαι τὸν ἱμάντα τῶν ὑποδημάτων αὐτοῦ· καὶ αὐτὸς ὑμᾶς βαπτίζει ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ. Notice first the order of the clauses, natural in Lk 3^{16}, which this reading reproduces almost verbatim, but weak in Mk., where there is no ref. in the context to popular surmises about John. Notice also the omission of the characteristic Marcan κύψας.

A clear case of assimilation in the ‘Western’ text.

(2) The Syrian text adopts μέν from this text, or from Mt. and Lk. ℵBL 33 69 124 Orig om.; cf. Jn 1^{26}. μέν rare, in Mk 4^{4} 9^{12} 12^{5} 14$^{21.\,38}$ only; cf. 10^{39}.

In Mt 3^{11} Jn 1$^{26.\,33}$ ἐν is found with both words without variant. In Ac 1^{5} ὕδ. and ἐν πν. without variant. In Lk 3^{16} ὑδ. (exc. D 1 13 69 al ἐν ὑδ.) and ἐν πν. without variant. There seems, therefore, no tendency to omit ἐν where it is clearly genuine, even to balance phrases, e.g. Ac 1^{5}. The tendency to insert from par. must have been very strong.

Notice the converse change in v.^{5}. Here clearly the important fact is that the baptism was administered by John, not that it took place in the Jordan. ὑπὸ 'Ιω. is therefore rightly kept to the last.

V.^{10} (1) εὐθέως or εὐθύς, om. D a b.

A peculiarly difficult word for the textual critic in Mk., clearly characteristic, offending some scribes and some translators by its recurrence, at the same time always to hand when an adventurous scribe wished to ‘improve’ the story. We find ourselves therefore driven by sheer perplexity to take refuge in obedience to the one golden rule of sound criticism and to ‘trust our MSS.’ The result will show if our confidence is misplaced.

One point we can lay down at the outset. A close examination of the facts shows that the effect of Synoptic parallels on the text of Mk. must, so far as this word is concerned, have been uniformly towards omission: Mk 14^{45} om. D 251 2$^{\text{pe}}$ a c ff^{2} k q (Mt 26^{49} ‘non fluctuat’) is the only possible exception.

The facts are interesting, and we may allow ourselves this one excursion into the field of Synoptic criticism. Assuming the WH text as our standard, εὐθύς occurs 40 times in Mark. In 29 of these there are parallel contexts in both Mt. and Lk., in 8 there is a parallel in Mt. only, in 2 in Lk. only, in 1 there is no parallel in either. In one case, 1^{42}=Mt 8^{3} =Lk 5^{13}, εὐθ. is found in all three Gospels. In none of the other 30 cases where Lk. has a parallel context is εὐθ. found: in 7 the whole phrase to which εὐθ. belongs in Mk. is transformed; in 17 εὐθ. is simply omitted; in 5 he substitutes παραχρῆμα, in 1 εἶτα. Of the 37 places where Mt. presents a parallel, εὐθ. is retained in 12; in 8 the whole phrase, in 15 the word, disappears; in 2 ἀπὸ τῆς ὥρας ἐκείνης does duty as an equivalent. In one case Lk. (21^{9} =Mt 24^{6}=Mk 13^{7}) substitutes οὐκ εὐθέως for οὔπω.

Assuming, as it is probably worth while to do at present, that our Mk. was in the hands of both Mt. and Lk., the figures given above supply a good illustration of the delicate literary criticism to which Mark was subjected, esp. by Luke. This general result is not seriously affected by questions of text. In 6 places TR ins. where WH om., in 4 TR om. where WH ins. But it is worth notice that the 'Western' Text, esp. in D and in the various MSS of Lat-vet, shows a clear tendency to omit εὐθ. The chief passages are $1^{10.\ 28.\ 29}$ 2^{8} 3^{6} 4^{16} $5^{2.\ 42}$ $6^{25.\ 50}$ 9^{20} $14^{43.\ 45}$. The same tendency is found in the same authorities in Mt., e.g. 4^{22} 21^{2}.

In the case before us (1^{10}) the genuineness of εὐθύς in Mk. is, we think, supported by its presence in Mt 3^{16}. There are only 2 cases (24^{29} 27^{48}) where Mt. in a parallel context shows a εὐθ. which is not represented in the true text of Mark. And in neither of these does any authority for the text of Mk. attempt to assimilate.

(2) ἐκ τοῦ ὕδ., ℵBDL 13 28 33 69 124.
ἀπό, AP rell; cf. Mt 3^{16}.

Here, again, ἐκ is characteristic of Mark. In 4 other cases it corresponds to ἀπό in a parallel context in Mt., and in 10 cases in Luke. A similar reaction on the MSS of Mk. also in $1^{25.\ 26}$ 7^{15} 9^{9} 16^{3}.

(3) σχιζομένους, ℵAB rell.
ἠνυγμένους, D Latt ('apertos')=Mt. and Luke.

Here there is nothing to account for the change of ἀνεῳγμένους if it were genuine, while σχιζομένους is at once vivid and difficult.

καταβαῖνον ἐπ' αὐτόν, ℵAP rell, but note that ℵ 33 insert καὶ μένον before ἐπ' from Jn 1^{32}.

Fondness for εἰς is another characteristic feature of Mark's style. It occurs in all about 157 times. Of these, 42 are found in both Mt. and Lk., 39 in Mt. alone, 19 in Lk. alone, 57 belong to sections or phrases peculiar to Mark. In 3 places Lk. substitutes ἐν, in 2 ἐπί, in 1 ἐν μέσῳ. Mt. substitutes ἐν in 5 places and ἐπί in 4. Here (1^{10}) Mt. and Lk. agree in substituting ἐπί as they agree in substituting ἐν in 11^{8}. In 4 cases Mt. or Lk. supports εἰς when the other has changed it.

On the other hand, ἐπί with acc. occurs only 32 times in Mark. There is only very slight evidence of a tendency to change it into εἰς. See 6^{53} $15^{22.\ 46}$, and perhaps d (not D) in 9^{13}. In no case is there a real parallel to the phrase here, which must have suffered from 'assimilation.'

V.^{11} (a) Om. ἐγένετο, ℵ* D ff^{2} mt (a f 'venit'; 28 2^{pe} g^{1} ἠκούσθη).

Here, again, light is thrown on the reading by a careful study of Mark's usage. He is fond of γίνεσθαι, and uses it to cover a great variety of different meanings. It occurs 52 times in the WH Text; of these, 6 are found both in Mt. and Luke. Besides these, Mt. retains only 16, Lk. only 9; and even in some of these instances slight modifications are introduced. (Mt. has a parallel context in 49, Lk. in 36 cases). The text of Mk. shows similar traces of the attempt to obliterate this individualism. See 1^{17} 2^{27} $4^{4.\ 11}$ 5^{16} 6^{2} (9^{6}) 9^{7} 10^{43} 12^{11} 14^{4}. 9^{6} seems to be Syrian. In all the other cases, except 1^{17} 2^{27} 5^{16}, D appears in the group which either omits or provides a substitute for γίν. D is generally supported by some Old Latin MSS and various members of the group 1–28, etc. The most instructive case is the closely par. 9^{7} ἐγένετο φωνὴ ἐκ τῆς νεφέλης (ℵBCLΔ), where AD rell inc. Syr-sin read ἦλθεν (exc. k l Syr-vg-codd om.), while ἰδού from Mt. and λέγουσα from Lk. also find support. In Lk 9^{35} ἐγένετο . . . λέγουσα is found without variant, except that D reads ἦλθεν, Syr-cu-sin ἠκούσθη. In 10^{44} the Syrian Text has γενέσθαι, ℵBC(D)LΔ εἶναι. The omission of ἐγένετο may therefore safely be regarded as 'Western.'

The tendency to add ἅγιον is much less than might have been expected (see 2^{8}, Jn 7^{39}). Its presence here, perhaps due to Lk 4^{1}, is more likely meant to mark the contrast with the Tempter.

Here (a) is apparently the original reading. The repetition εἰς τὴν ἐρ., ἐν τῇ ἐρ. is thoroughly Marcan; cf. v.^{16}. It is interesting to notice that Mt. keeps εἰς τὴν ἐρ. and Lk. ἐν τῇ ἐρ.

(b) is a substitute for (a) to avoid the repetition.

(c) is a simple conflation of (a) and (b).

The only alternative is to regard (c) as a reduplication of the regular Marcan type (e.g. ὀψίας δὲ γενομένης ὅτε ἔδυ ὁ ἥλιος), of which (a) and (b) are alternative redactions. But Mark's pleonasms are never, we think, weakly tautological, as this would be; e.g. in 5^{11} ἐκεῖ πρὸς τῷ ὄρει, the second clause brings out a fresh and important feature in the scene; cf. v.^{28}.

τὸ εὐαγγέλιον is used without further definition 5 times in Mk. (cf. Ac 15^{7}). In 1^{1} Ἰησ. Χρ. is added. In Mt. εὐαγ. occurs 4 times, 3 times defined by τῆς βασιλείας. εὐαγ. is not found in Lk. or John. The full phrase τὸ εὐ. τ. βασ. τ. θεοῦ is not found anywhere else. It is most likely that τ. βασ. came in from Mt. assisted by its recurrence in v.^{15}. No good reason can be given to explain its omission, if it were genuine. The phrase ἡ βασ. τ. θεοῦ is constant (14 times) in Mk., and never seems to have provoked alteration.

(c) Om. ℵ* c mt Syr-sin: Orig.

This is a difficult case. It is surprising how many of the various readings in Mk. involve the insertion or omission or change of λέγων. In some cases the insertion is clearly due to assimilation, 9^{7} 11^{9} 14^{4} 15^{34}. In others the word is omitted or changed because it seemed bald or pleonastic, 1^{7} 6^{25} 8^{28} 10^{49} 11^{31} 12^{14}. The aberrant text is almost uniformly supported by D, some MSS of Lat-vet, and some members of the 'Ferrar Group.'

In 3 cases besides this, 1^{25} 2^{12} 15^{4}, no certain decision is possible. In 2 of these, 1^{25} 15^{4}, ℵ is the chief authority for omission. It is difficult to account for the change of (a) either into (b) or (c) if it be genuine. (a) is also open to suspicion from Mt 4^{17}.

The asyndeton in (b) might have led to (a) and (c) as independent simplifications (cf. 1^{40}). But it is harsh even for Mark.

(c) might have caused difficulty, because v.^{15} can hardly be regarded as merely epexegetic of τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς βασιλείας.

A reading worth looking at. At first sight (a) seems entirely natural, and we wonder why it should have caused any trouble. Then we notice the sequence of verbs, ἀπῆλθον, εἰσπορεύονται, ἐδίδασκεν. The subject of no two of them is the same, though they are linked by καί, but in genuine Marcan fashion the reader is trusted to infer the subject of each himself.

Again the sequence of tenses, an historic present, characteristic of Mk., between an Aor. and an Imperfect. (b) and (c) are independent attempts to smooth over the change of subject, (d) assimilates the tenses.

(f) et ingrediens cum eis sabb. in synag. Capharnaum docebat populum c.
Note that Syr-sin omits καὶ εἰσ. εἰς Καφ.

This is a strange case of confusion affecting the simplest of sentences. The omission of εἰσελθών, which is common to (c) (d) and (e), produces a reading which at first sight seems attractive. It is short and vigorous. And the pregnant use of εἰς might easily have led to the insertion of εἰσελθών. On the other hand, the group ℵCLΔ, which supports the omission, is, the present writer believes, in Mark typically 'Alexandrian,' in Dr. Hort's sense of the term. They exhibit constantly a type of readings quite their own, which, though always interesting, rarely succeed in establishing their claim to preserve the original text. The most favourable examples are $3^{6.\ 7}$ $4^{22.\ 28}$ 11^{11} $15^{1.\ 44}$. Here it is worth noticing that in (f) ingrediens may stand either for εἰσπορευόμενος or εἰσελθών. And it is possible that the repetition may have given offence to the linguistic sense of the Alexandrians, and have led to the dropping of εἰσελθών. Both words are well established in Mark's vocabulary. For though πορεύεσθαι never occurs (outside 16^{9-21}) exc. perhaps in 9^{30}, εἰσπορ. is found 8 times.

Nor is Mk. fond of the pregnant use of εἰς. 1^{9} 1^{39} (2^{1} v.l.) $13^{9.\,16}$ 14^{9} are the only examples; and even κηρύσσειν εἰς (1^{39} 14^{9}) hardly justifies διδάσκειν εἰς.

The larger omission in Syr-sin may well be due to the difficulty of supposing that the work from which Simon had been called (v.^{16}) lay at any distance from his home (v.^{29}).

(3) αὐτοὺς post ἐδίδ., D (Latt) Syr-hcl Arm Æth Go. Probably from v.^{22}.

There is no difficulty in the absolute use of διδάσκειν, which occurs fairly often in all the Gospels, and generally causes no trouble. Mt 4^{23} is the only parallel. Curiously enough, in Mt 21^{23} 26^{55} Lk 23^{5} some auth. omit διδάσκειν altogether. Mark is never tired of emphasizing this aspect of our Lord's activity. In 9 cases (out of 17) the word is not paralleled either in Matthew or Luke.

V.^{22} καὶ ante οὐχ, om. D*b c d e.

Cf. v.^{14} (3) (b).

V.^{23} (1) εὐθὺς post καί, ℵBL 1 33 131 209 Boh: Orig. Om. ACDΔ rell.

Cf. on v.^{10} (1). It is not found in Lk 4^{33}.

Here the word would be specially liable to alteration, as it expresses simply the suddenness of the interruption, without reference to any definite point of time.

(2) αὐτῶν post συναγωγῇ, om. DL 72 b c e ff^{2} g^{1} Boh.

The presence of the word is remarkable. It has no antecedent. συναγ. is regularly defined in Mt., but very rarely in Mark or Luke. Only Mk $1^{23.\,39}$, Lk 4^{15} (where as here D a b l om.). But there is no trace of any tendency to supply αὐτῶν mechanically with συναγ. in either Mark or Luke. Lat-vg in Lk 13^{10} is an instructive exception. So it is unlikely that it has come in here from Matthew. On the other hand, Mark has no quite similar case (exc. 9^{48}, where αὐτῶν has come in from LXX) of an indefinite αὐτῶν. It is possible that it may represent Mark's transformation of what on St. Peter's lips was 'our' synagogue.

V.^{24} (1) Ἔα om. ℵBD 157 2^{pe} Latt Boh Syr-sin-vg Æth.

Ins. (A) CLΔ rell. Syr-hcl Arm Go: Orig Eus = Lk 4^{34} (where as here D cu^{4} Lat-vet Boh Syr-sin-hier Æth om.).

Another 'Alexandrian' reading, this time adopted by the 'Syrian' Text, against the 'Neutral' and the 'Western.' Granted that the 'Western' authority here must be discounted because of its behaviour in Lk 4^{34}, still the 'Neutral' reading is preferable because it alone explains the phenomena in the two passages taken together. There seems no reason why Ἔα (however it is to be understood) should have caused trouble. All is simple, if we suppose that the 'Alexandrian' and 'Syrian' texts here assimilated Mark to Luke, while conversely the 'Western' assimilated Luke to Mark.

(2) οἴδαμεν, ℵLΔ Boh Arm Æth: Tert Iren^{int} Orig Eus.

οἶδα, ABCD rell Latt Syrr = Lk 4^{34} (where only Arm has pl.).

Neither reading has any intrinsic difficulty. It is simply a question whether the Alexandrian Text introduced the pl. in consequence of ἡμῖν (cf. ᾔδεισαν, v.^{34}), or whether the rest assimilated Mark to Luke. The fact that the Alexandrians omitted to insert the corresponding change in Luke is not a fatal objection to the first hypothesis.

V.^{25} (1) ἀπ' for ἐξ, HL 33 cu^{16} c f g^{1} = Lk.

See on v.^{10}. ἐκ is habitual in cases of possession in Mark. In these cases it is never retained either by Matthew or Luke.

(2) (a) τοῦ ἀνθρώπου for αὐτοῦ and + πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον, D (8^{pe}) Latt (exc. f) (Go Æth).

Go Æth add πν. ἀκ. but read αὐτοῦ. 8^{pe} τὸ πν. τὸ ἀκ.

(b) ℵABCLΔ rell: Orig Syr-sin read αὐτοῦ without πν. ἀκ. = Lk.

Here we have to balance the chance that (b) has arisen out of (a) by assimilation to Luke, against the chance that (a) has arisen out of (b) by assimilation to 5^{8}. (a), as 5^{8} shows, is thoroughly Marcan; but the evidence for it, as our experience even in these few verses is enough to suggest, is far from trustworthy. Again, if we may allow any weight to our provisional hypothesis as to the relation between Luke and Mark, there is no reason to suppose that Luke would have modified (a) if his text of Mark had contained it. In 8^{29} (= Mk 5^{8}) he retains the words, though putting them into the oratio obliqua. His agreement with Mark in these verses, $4^{33\text{-}35}$ = Mk $1^{23\text{-}26}$, is exceptionally close. There is no par. in Matthew.

V.^{26} (1) The whole verse reads as follows in D:—

καὶ ἐξῆλθεν τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον σπαράξας αὐτὸν καὶ κράξας φωνῇ μεγάλῃ ἐξῆλθεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ.

With this e agrees (only omitting τὸ ἀκάθαρτον), and ff^{2} (only transposing σπαρ. αὐτ. with τὸ πν. τὸ ἀκ.).

It is difficult not to believe that this exhibits a conflation of two readings: (a) καὶ ἐξῆλθεν τὸ πν. τὸ ἀκ. σπαράξας αὐτὸν καὶ κράξας φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, with (b) the reading in the text. Some such conflation must also underlie the reading of D in v.^{34}. (a) might have arisen out of (b) by free assimilation to Mk 9^{26}, where also we find the masc. καὶ κράξας καὶ πολλὰ σπαράξας ἐξῆλθεν.

(2) κράξαν is read by AC(D) rell.

φωνῆσαν, ℵBL 33: Orig.

Neither phrase is objectionable in itself. φων. φ. μεγ. is found in Lk 23^{46}, Ac 16^{28}, but not in contexts likely to have suggested themselves here. κράζω, on the other hand, is constantly used of the cries of the possessed, and κράξας φ. μ. occurs in Mk 5^{7}.

(3) ἀπ' is read for ἐξ by C(D)ΔM 33 Latt.

See on v.^{25}.

V.^{27} (1) (a) αὐτούς, ℵB (b e ff^{2} q).

(b) πρὸς ἑαυτούς, ACDΔ unc^{9} al^{90}.

(c) πρὸς αὐτούς, GLS rell verss.

It is difficult to find any test to enable us to judge between these readings. The reciprocal use of πρὸς ἑαυτ. is characteristic of Mk 9^{10} 11^{31} 12^{7} 14^{4} 16^{3}, besides v.l. $9^{14.\,16.\,33}$ 10^{26}. It is not found in Matthew. It occurs in Lk 20^{5} (= Mk) 22^{23} (v.l. 20^{14} = Mk), and in Jn 12^{19}. On the other hand, ℵB exhibit no special animus against it. They seem clearly right on the three other occasions (9^{33} 10^{26}, Lk 20^{14}), where they combine to attest an alternative reading. συνζητεῖν is used absolutely in 12^{28} and Lk 24^{15}. The construction of Mk 9^{10} is ambiguous. In $9^{14.\,16}$ the true reading is clearly πρὸς αὐτούς, though here ℵ in each case reads ἑαυτ. These facts, so far as they go, are in favour of (a), as is the fact that some of the authorities for πρός (ACE* MΔ^{2} al^{20}) give what is perhaps a further sign of the influence of Lk 4^{36} by reading λέγοντες for λέγοντας. αὐτούς has a real point (cf. on αὐτῶν in v.^{23}) if it indicates a distinction between the circle immediately round our Lord, and that part of the congregation whose astonishment found vent in the words that follow.

(2) (a) τί ἐστιν τοῦτο; διδαχὴ καινὴ κατ' ἐξουσίαν, ℵBL 33 (1 118 131 2^{pe} al^{3} + αὕτη) Boh.

(b) τίς ἡ διδαχὴ ἐκείνη ἡ καινὴ αὕτη ἡ ἐξουσία ὅτι, D (evv^{3} Latt).

Note that the Latin renderings are very various.

They agree with D in leaving out τί ἐστιν τοῦτο; Some omit καινή. Most, if not all, may represent κατ' ἐξουσίαν, none exc. 'd,' ἐξουσία.

The simplest solution is to regard (a) as the original reading; it is vigorous and vivid, and its abruptness might easily offend. (b) would then be a 'Western' paraphrase, (c) a 'Syrian' conflation of (a), with one or other of the various forms of (b).

24. The facts are now before us. We can judge for ourselves the kind of variations that are to be met with on every page of the Gospels, and the kind of considerations by which we can attempt to discriminate between alternative readings, before we are in a position to assign a special value to any particular authority, or group of authorities, over the rest. It is true that we have in one or two particulars anticipated results that must be verified by further examination. We have treated certain groups of authorities, which even within the limits of this passage can be seen to mark themselves off from time to time from all the rest, as approximately constant units, and we have given distinctive names to the particular sets of readings which they attest. The fact that the authorities do exhibit this tendency to fall into groups is now generally admitted, and even the Traditionalists are beginning to see that a careful study of these groups is the first step towards the understanding of the history of the changes through which the text, taken as a whole, has passed. They point out, however, quite rightly, that the term 'text' as applied to these groups must be used with caution. It does not necessarily imply, e.g., that there ever existed an edition of the 'Western Text,' including all the variants that we should be prepared to class as 'Western,' and excluding all their rivals, in the sense in which Westcott and Hort include, with a few exceptions, all the 'Neutral' readings; or, again, in which Mr. Miller prints the Traditional Text. No critic is likely to take serious exception to the definition which Mr. Miller puts forward of the sense in which he is himself prepared to use the word. 'What is properly meant,' he writes,* 'is that of the variant readings of the words of the Gospels which, from whatever cause, grew up more or less all over the Christian Church, so far as we know some have family likenesses of one kind or another, and may be traced to a kindred source.'

25. More serious exception has been taken by Dr. Salmon to the names which Dr. Hort gave to the different groups. He calls them 'question-begging.' But it is by no means easy to see the exact point of his criticism. The names are as free as possible from any invidious connotation, differing in this respect toto cœlo from the name 'Neologian,' which Mr. Miller regards as a fair description of the text of any editor who rejects a 'Traditional' reading. They are all descriptive of certain clearly marked and carefully defined characteristics of the groups to which they are applied. The 'Syrian' Text is so called because its most constant support is found, as we have seen, in the writings of Fathers connected directly with the Church of Antioch. An objection may no doubt lie against it, because it must suggest to an uninstructed reader that the chief support for these readings is to be found in the Syriac versions; but in itself it is purely descriptive, and implies no judgment on the genuineness of the readings connoted by it.

26. 'Western' again, as Dr. Hort himself pointed out, is an inadequate title for readings which have early Greek, Syriac, and Egyptian support, as well as Latin. But he retained it because it was established by long usage, and there seemed no sufficient reason for obscuring the continuity of the development of the science of Textual Criticism by any unnecessary change in the accepted terminology. The name as he defined it connoted nothing more than the fact that this group of readings had first attracted the attention of scholars by the support that it receives in the great Græco-Latin MSS and in the Latin versions. There was nothing in the name to imply that no readings in this group could be regarded as genuine.

27. The name 'Alexandrian' was chosen simply because the authorities supporting it are, so far as we can judge, exclusively confined to Alexandria. It had, no doubt, already been applied to all non-Western pre-Syrian readings by Griesbach. Neither ℵ nor B was, however, accessible to Griesbach when he made his classification. And, now that in the light of the new evidence a further subdivision of Griesbach's Alexandrian family has become possible, no serious difficulty is likely to arise from appropriating to one division the name which belonged to the whole class before its elements were fully differentiated.

28. It would be difficult to devise a more scrupulously colourless name than the last on our list—the name 'Neutral.' It was chosen to express the fact that the authorities supporting it were habitually found in opposition to the 'distinctive' readings of both the 'Western' and the 'Alexandrian' groups. It is true that these 'distinctive' readings are, from the nature of the case, in the great majority of instances corruptions that have affected one particular line of transmission; so a group that has escaped them must be, so far as these corruptions are concerned, a relatively pure text. But there is nothing in the name to imply that all the readings attested by it must necessarily be genuine, or to exclude the possibility that the rival authorities may in any individual case have preserved the genuine text. To adopt the name 'Early Alexandrian' for this group, as Dr. Salmon suggests, on the strength of the number of names connected with Alexandria which appear among its most prominent constituents, would obscure the fact, to which attention must be called later, that the attestation to it is by no means confined to Alexandria, besides obscuring the clearly marked distinction between this group and the one last described. It is difficult, therefore, to see what question any one of these names as defined by Dr. Hort can be supposed to beg.

29. It will be noticed that the points suggested for consideration in the notes, as likely to afford a presumption either for or against the genuineness of the different variants, are exclusively of an internal character. This limitation is deliberate, because at this stage of the investigation our purpose must be simply to determine which reading in each case has the best claim to be regarded as original, apart from any preconceived theory as to the weight to be attached to the authorities by which it is attested. Some minds are, no doubt, constitutionally impatient of this class of considerations, and profoundly sceptical of any conclusions which are based on them. And, no doubt, there would be far less room for difference of opinion, and far less need of patient study and careful and exact scholarship in Textual Criticism, if we could start with some external standard, and so dispense with internal considerations altogether. Nothing, for instance, can be easier, if one may assume that the mass of authorities must always be right, than to prove that a numerically insignificant group of dissentients must be worthless, just because the evidence of 'the many' can always, ex hypothesi, be described as 'overwhelming.' But when the precise question at issue is the relative weight to be attached to the rival groups, no amount of erudition can conceal the fact that a demonstration constructed on these lines has no logical value; it does 'beg the question.' It is well, therefore, to realize from the outset that the element of personal judgment can never be eliminated from the processes of Textual Criticism. A clear realization of this fact is necessary if we are to understand the importance of a careful study of the laws which must regulate the use of the critical faculty, and of the different methods which other workers in the same field have found useful as safeguards to minimize the dangers arising from unconscious caprice or personal idiosyncrasy. The criteria for testing the internal evidence of Readings are of two kinds: Intrinsic Probability, or 'the consideration of what an author is likely to have written,' and Transcriptional Probability, or 'the consideration of what a copyist is likely to have made him seem to have written.' No doubt, taken separately, they are, as Mr. Miller calls them,[*] 'weak pillars.' But, when they combine in favour of any variant, their testimony is overwhelming. Such cases are indeed comparatively rare. They are numerous enough, however, to enable us to form, first a provisional, and then a more carefully balanced estimate of the characteristic excellences and defects of each authority with which we have to deal. They enable us—that is, in cases where the internal evidence of the readings is ambiguous—to appeal to the internal evidence of the Documents by which the different variants are attested. But even this is not enough. The same document may be of very different value in different parts.

30. We have therefore still to inquire what methods are available when, as in the case of most of the MSS of the NT, whether uncial or cursive, the documents are of a very mixed character, and considerations derived from internal evidence alone are in consequence unusually precarious.[†]

It is at this point that the real importance of the principle of Genealogy comes full into view. It is based on the obvious fact that our documents, to quote the words of Dr. Hort to which Mr. Miller has called special attention, 'are all fragments, usually casual and scattered fragments, of a genealogical tree of transmission, sometimes of vast extent and intricacy.' It is true, as Mr. Miller points out, that the analogy with human relationship which the word suggests is not complete. There is a variability in the transmission of acquired characteristics in human heredity which is lacking under normal conditions in derivation by a process of copying. But this difference is all in favour of the textual critic, and enables him to tread securely even in cases where the normal conditions of transmission are disturbed by the presence of 'mixture,' i.e. when the scribe at work on a particular MS embodies either constantly or occasionally readings derived from more than one exemplar. For the process depends on the principle, which it is encouraging to notice that Mr. Miller accepts without reserve, that 'identity of reading implies identity of origin.'

31. The consequences that follow from the acceptance of this principle and the careful application of this method are far-reaching. Its chief importance lies in this, that it opens a field for strictly historical investigation into facts which can be brought to definite tests. These tests no doubt require the greatest delicacy and skill in their application, but the facts are in themselves concrete and quite independent of subjective considerations.

It has, however, one or two subsidiary consequences to which we may call attention before we pass on. We may notice, first, that it justifies at once the treatment of groups of documents, which are found constantly associated in the support of the same variants, as approximately constant units: to this point attention has already been called. It also suggests the explanation of one of the paradoxes of Textual Criticism which has puzzled Dr. Salmon (p. 55). It is certainly strange that the evidence of two witnesses should be lowered in value by being associated with, rather than opposed by, a third; that, for instance, more weight should be assigned by Dr. Hort in the Pauline Epistles to $B+D_2-G_3$, than to $B+D_2+G_3$. As long as each document is regarded as an independent witness, it is clearly impossible to assign a negative value to its evidence. But when we realize that each document has a composite character determined by its ancestry, and that in consequence we have to determine in each case which strain is represented in any particular reading before we can estimate the value to be assigned to its evidence, the paradox disappears. The value of any group is simply the value of the element common to all the members composing it. Thus B in the Pauline Epistles is largely 'Neutral' with a decided 'Western' element: D_2 is Western with a decided 'Neutral' element: G_3 is almost purely 'Western' with a Syrian admixture. The combination $B+D_2$ may therefore be either Neutral or Western, both elements being present, though in different proportions, in each document. And the reading attested by G_3 can be either Western or Syrian. But a reading supported by $B+D_2+G_3$ in opposition to all other authorities must be distinctively 'Western.'

32. One further remark may be allowed before we leave this paradox. It is, no doubt, tempting to illustrate different stages in the critical process by comparison with the everyday procedure of the Law Courts, especially when one's object is to interest Englishmen in the minutiæ of a dry and technical study. But the habit is a dangerous one. The legal and the scientific methods are fundamentally distinct, and, in consequence, serious fallacies, as this paradox shows, may lurk even in the most specious analogy. But the worst effect of yielding to it is that it tends insensibly to merge the critic himself in the advocate, and to make him 'the champion of an opinion,' for whom

[†] The mixed character of the text in the uncials will be obvious from the study of any App. Crit. If any one wishes to realize the mixed character of the text even in the cursives, he cannot do better than study Mr. Hoskier's admirably thorough examination of the codex 604. The only surprising thing is that he should imagine that the facts he has observed disturb any of the results at which Dr. Hort arrived. Compare also the introduction to Scrivener's collation of 20 MSS with Tregelles' remarks upon it (Horne, Intr. p. 145).

the value of an argument is measured by its immediate effectiveness rather than 'the single-hearted lover of truth,' who knows that there is no influence against which he must guard more resolutely than the influence of the popular prejudices which tend to warp his own judgment, and which respond most readily to a rhetorical appeal.

33. Dr. Salmon suggests in another place (p. 43) that the dogmatic tone of WH's Introduction is due to the influence of the established Cambridge method of mathematical teaching. A closer parallel would seem to be provided by ordinary text-books in any department of Natural Science. We expect to find in them a description of the methods, and a classified record of the results, of an investigation into a series of phenomena which the student is no doubt expected to take on trust, but only until he has repeated the experiment and verified the result by his own observation. The extraordinary insight and skill in classification which the Introduction reveals, reflect the expert botanist more than the mathematician.

34. The last consequence of the acceptance of the principle of 'Genealogy' to which we wish to call attention, is the light that it throws on the radical unsoundness of any system of Textual Criticism which bases itself directly on a numerical calculation of the attesting documents, before the significance of the numbers has been checked and interpreted by descent. It is, no doubt, a remarkable fact that one of the types of text which were current side by side in the fourth century is represented to-day in extant MSS by a progeny 'like the stars of heaven in multitude';* while the representatives of the others are few and for the most part fragmentary. But the principle of Genealogy reminds us that, however numerous the progeny of any MS may be, their united value can never be higher than that of their common original. And it has yet to be seen whether that common original can, in the case of distinctively Syrian readings, be traced back beyond the 4th century. The facts which we have already noticed in the history of the text of one of the Pauline Epistles prove that the answer to that question cannot be taken for granted. We must not forget that, if 'identity of reading' implies 'identity of origin,' identity in a demonstrably wrong reading, except in the case of a primitive error, implies a common original later than the autograph. And in such cases it becomes of primary importance to determine as precisely as possible the date of the common original.

35. We can now pass on to consider what light is thrown by our examination of the variants in Mk 1$^{1-28}$ on the character of the witnesses by which they are supported. We must begin with those variants that are the exclusive property of the Traditional Text, and by which in consequence the value of the authorities supporting it can be most effectively tested. We have included provisionally as belonging to it all the readings which are attested by none of the five MSS, ℵBCD or L. Further examination will show which, if any, of these readings have a claim to be regarded as belonging also to one or other of the alternative texts. Sixteen examples occur. The points affected are in almost every case extremely trivial, but they are none the less significant as indications of documentary relationship.

36. Now, it is surely remarkable that in no single one of these cases does the internal evidence, taken as a whole, point unequivocally in favour of the Traditional reading. In many cases it seems to be definitely adverse. Again, it is surely remarkable that even in this short passage five of the readings, vv.$^{4.\ 13.\ 16.\ 19.\ 27}$, admit of a ready explanation on the supposition that they were produced by combining, with more or less modification, two alternative readings which were at one time current independently. In other words, they suggest the presence of Conflation as a factor in the production of the Traditional Text. This hypothesis is rendered distinctly more probable by the observation which rests on a wide induction of undisputed facts, that the normal tendency of scribes in all ages is towards addition and not subtraction.* The exceptions to this rule, which spring from purely accidental causes, e.g. 'Homoeoteleuton,' are clearly not in point here. Nor, again, can we logically give any weight here to the charge of a deep-seated tendency to omission brought against the scribes of all our oldest authorities: because again and again the only evidence adduced in support of it is that the text they attest is habitually shorter than the Traditional, and we are looking for an assurance that the Traditional Text itself is free from addition.

It is true that there is evidence that some scribes, the originators of the 'Western' readings, did in the course of their extraordinarily rash recasting of the text omit a word here and there without introducing an equivalent. But there is no evidence to show that a tendency to omit affected a large proportion of their work. And the common ancestor of ℵ and B was, so far as we can judge, entirely unaffected by 'Western' influence.

37. The suspicion of Conflation is deepened when we indicate to the eye, as has been done in the passage as printed above, the relation in which the Traditional Text stands to the earlier texts out of which on this hypothesis it must have been constructed. The passage certainly illustrates with remarkable vividness the phenomena which Dr. Hort's description would have led us to expect. His words run as follows:—

'To state in a few words the results of examination of the whole body of Syrian readings, distinctive and non-distinctive, the authors of the Syrian Text had before them documents representing at least three earlier forms of text, Western, Alexandrian, and a third. Where they found variation, they followed different procedures in different places. Sometimes they transcribed unchanged the reading of one of the earlier texts, now of this, now of that. Sometimes they in like manner adopted exclusively one of the readings, but modified its form. Sometimes they combined the readings of more than one text in various ways, pruning or modifying them if necessary. Lastly, they introduced many changes of their own where, so far as appears, there was no previous variation. When the circumstances are fully considered, all these processes must be recognized as natural' (§ 165).

* See Tregelles, The Printed Text of the NT, p. 184.

When the whole text has the appearance of being conflate, individual readings combining elements which can be proved to have existed independently are more naturally accounted for on the hypothesis of Conflation than on any other. It would seem impossible to determine a priori what proportion of such readings we should expect to find in a passage of any given length. Mr. Miller is probably right when he says, 'I venture to think that, supposing for a moment the theory to be sound, it would not account for any large number of variations, but would at the best only be a sign or symptom found every now and then of the derivation attributed to the Received Text.'* This is exactly the impression that an attentive reader would receive from Dr. Hort's carefully measured language in reference to them.†

38. The last point to be examined in regard to these readings is the presence or absence of ante-Nicene Patristic support. What has already been said on the principle of Genealogy will put us at the right point of view for appreciating the significance of this part of our investigation. For it is clear that, unless we can discover some evidence external to the MSS for locating and dating the readings contained in them, we shall find it difficult, if not impossible, to make sure of the direction actually taken by the different streams of textual change. The primary source of such evidence is provided by fully verified and tested Patristic quotations.

39. We must not, however, hide from ourselves the difficulty of the task. Even at the risk of some repetition, we must remind ourselves that it is always necessary, in cases where the text of a Father appears to agree with the Traditional Text, to make allowance for the possibility that that agreement would disappear if we had access to his autograph, even though there is no variation in the printed editions or in any of the extant MSS of his work. No conclusions can be based on such evidence unless the correctness of the reading is guaranteed by the context.

40. Again, in a passage like the one before us (Mk 1^{1-28}), which has parallels throughout either in one or in both of the other Synoptics, and in which a considerable proportion of the variants suggest the influence of assimilation, it is clearly unwise to build any conclusions on a Patristic reference to the text in its assimilated form, unless the writer gives us independent means of determining the particular Gospel from which he is quoting.

41. Again, in applying the knowledge derived from such evidence, after it has passed all our tests, to the interpretation of the facts of textual history as indicated by the groups into which the MSS are observed to fall, we have to bear in mind that it is impossible on MS evidence alone to determine precisely what readings, other than 'conflate,' are to be classed as distinctively Traditional—i.e. are to be regarded on the Critical hypothesis as having originated with the 'Syrian' revisers, and not merely been adopted by them from some pre-existent text. For, as the evidence of the Latin, Syriac, and Egyptian versions shows, the preservation of at least the 'Western' types of text in Greek MSS is incomplete and fragmentary. So that it is practically certain that some of the readings which are at present attested only by MSS of a markedly Traditional type are not really the exclusive property of the Traditional Text. They must have belonged also, at one time, to one or other of its rivals. We must be ready, therefore, to make allowance for the possibility that some of the readings in our provisional list, and in any other list drawn up on the same rough-and-ready principle, may be 'Western,' 'Alexandrian,' or even 'Neutral,' as well as 'Syrian.'

42. Ante-Nicene evidence is quoted by Tischendorf or Tregelles on one side or the other in 7 out of the 15 readings in our list. In the first case (v.^{1}), the insertion of τοῦ before θεοῦ, the ante-Nicene evidence disappears on close examination. The passages in Irenæus which contain the clause are extant only in Latin, and are therefore indecisive. The clause is wanting in the one passage where we have access to the Greek of Irenæus, and in Origen. We may note, however, that Severianus (fl. 400) and Victor of Antioch (d. 430) both omit the article. Cyril Alex. (d. 444) is the earliest authority quoted in support of it. The second reading τοῖς προφήταις for Ἠσ. τῷ προφ. finds a place as No. 14 in Mr. Miller's select 30 (Trad. Text, p. 108), and is also discussed at length by Dean Burgon (Causes of Corruption, p. 111 ff., cf. Trad. Text, App. iv.). So in this case we have the advantage of a full statement of the evidence that can be put forward on behalf of the Traditional reading. It will be instructive to examine this statement in detail.

43. Only a summary of the evidence is given in Trad. Text, detailed references being promised in Causes of Corruption. In the summary, 6 names appear as supporting τοῖς προφ.: Titus of Bostra, Origen, Porphyry, Irenæus (p. 205), Eusebius, Ambrose. 7 names appear on the other side: Irenæus (p. 191), Origen (Cels. ii. 4; in Joan. i. 14), Titus of Bostra (adv. Manich. iii. 4), Basil (adv. Eunom. ii. 15), Serapion, Victorinus of Pettau (in Apoc. Joh.), Epiphanius (twice over—the second time with a ref. adv. Hær. II. i. 51). When we come to Causes of Corruption we are met by a statement that Tischendorf quotes 13 Fathers against the Traditional reading: Irenæus, Origen, Porphyry, Titus, Basil, Serapion, Epiphanius, Severianus, Victor, Eusebius, Victorinus, Jerome, Augustine. We are then told that 'from this list serious deductions must be made. Irenæus and Victor of Antioch are clearly with the Textus Receptus. Serapion, Titus, and Basil do but borrow from Origen, and with his argument reproduce his corrupt text of Mk 1^2. . . . Victorinus and Augustine, being Latin writers, merely quote the Latin version, which is without variety of reading. There remain Origen (the faulty character of whose codices has been remarked upon already), Porphyry the heretic (who wrote a book to convict the Evangelists of mis-statements, and who is therefore scarcely a trustworthy witness), Eusebius, Jerome, and Severianus. Of these, Eusebius and Jerome deliver it as their opinion that the name of "Isaiah" had obtained admission into the text through the inadvertency of copyists. Is it reasonable, on the slender residuum of evidence, to insist that St. Mark has ascribed to Isaiah words

* Causes of Corruption, p. 270.

† As curious misapprehensions are current on this point, it may be well to quote the sentences in full, italicizing the significant phrases. The reff. are to paragraphs in the Introduction. § 133, 'The clearest evidence . . . is furnished by conflate readings, where they exist; and in the case of some of the primary groupings of the textual documents of the New Testament they are fortunately not wanting.' In § 165, already quoted, notice the words, 'Sometimes they combined the readings of more than one Text in various ways, pruning or modifying them, if necessary.' In § 185, 'Occasionally also the readings of two of the antecedent Texts were combined by simple or complex adaptations.' We may also compare the language used in the short statement of the principles of Textual Criticism printed at the end of the volume containing the text (p. 548, ed. minor). 'The priority of two at least of the three Texts just noticed to the Syrian Text is further brought to light by the existence of a certain number of distinctively Syrian readings, which prove on close examination to be due to a combination of the Western with the Neutral readings.' The number of readings in Mk 1^{1-28} that have a claim to be considered as 'conflate' is distinctly larger than this language would have led us to anticipate. But we must not forget that the genealogical antecedents of the component elements are in some cases obscure.

confessedly written by Malachi?' The passage concludes with a lecture on the duty of 'carefulness' and 'honesty.'

44. If, in the light of this statement, we come back to the summary in Trad. Text, the result is startling. Of the 6 names quoted on behalf of the TR, the evidence of the first 3 in favour of the rival reading is discussed and discounted. But no hint is given of any justification for the appearance of their names on the opposite side. Of the other 3, Ambrose is left unnoticed; Irenæus, whose name appeared in the summary, like the names of Origen and Titus, on both sides, is boldly claimed exclusively for the TR. Of Eusebius we gather that he is usually quoted in favour of the opposite side, but that he felt the difficulty of that reading so much that he regarded the text as corrupt. (It is difficult to see how he could have failed to refer to a difference of reading among MSS on the point had he been conscious that any such difference existed). A reference to the Latin version of Irenæus is rather a 'slender residuum' from the original 6, even when supplemented by a claim to Victor of Antioch, whose date no doubt excluded his name from the summary. This result, we may notice in passing, does not inspire confidence in the accuracy of the summary, or in the conclusions built on it. But that is not the point immediately before us.* We must turn to a closer examination of the details of the evidence in the light of Dean Burgon's comments upon them.

45. The earliest witness is Irenæus. Three passages in his writings (pp. 187, 191, 205) come up for consideration. Two (pp. 187, 205) are extant only in Latin; but, as Grabe showed (see note in Stieren), there is no reason to question the accuracy of the translation. The reading 'in prophetis,' for which they vouch, cannot have come in through the Latin version, and it is, besides, strongly, though not quite conclusively, confirmed by the context (p. 205). The passage on p. 191 is, fortunately, extant both in Greek and Latin. The Latin reads 'in Esaia propheta' with no recorded variant. The Greek is attested in various ways. It is found in an extract from Irenæus preserved by Anastasius of Sinai. Here the reading is certainly ἐν 'Ησ. τῳ προφ. The only recorded variant is ἐν βίβλῳ λόγων 'Ησ. τοῦ προφ. in a Florentine MS containing an extract from Anastasius. This independent confirmation of the reading of the Latin version makes the fact that Irenæus in this passage wrote ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ. practically certain. Nor does it stand alone. The same passage of Irenæus is quoted in an anonymous scholion preserved in Evv. 237, 238, 259 (Matthäi's d, e, a). And in each case, according to Matthäi, the reading is ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ. It is therefore not a little difficult to understand how Dean Burgon, in a note expressly based on a reference to the scholion in Ev. 238, should print 'in the prophets.' If his translation is based on an independent examination of the MS, it was unkind of him not to give a hint that Matthäi's transcript was in error. If not, we have another illustration of the danger of trusting to printed texts when they agree with TR.

Mk 1^2 is quoted also in a short introduction to St. Mark, attributed in some MSS to Cyril Alex. and in others to Victor of Antioch, in the same form ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ. printed in Combefis, i. p. 436. It is true that Germanus (Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 715), who has drawn on this same passage of Irenæus, writes ἐν τοῖς προφ. But the natural suspicion that he has in this case assimilated the text of his author to the text with which he was himself familiar, is confirmed by the observation that this same Germanus, a few lines earlier, in his extract, writes τοῦ δὲ 'Ιησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἡ γέννησις in a quotation by Irenæus of Mt 1^{18} in accordance with TR, though, in view of the special stress laid by Irenæus on the point in a well-known passage (p. 204), there can be no doubt that the Latin version 'Christi autem generatio' preserves the text as Irenæus wrote it.

We may fairly, therefore, claim Irenæus as a witness to both readings in Mk 1^2. It is, no doubt, strange that he should have gone from one codex to another and back again in less than 20 pages, but a similar phenomenon with regard to the reading in v.^{1} shows that something of the kind must have happened. The difficulty, such as it is, would disappear if we might accept Dr. Hort's suggestion (App. in loc.) that the whole of the peculiar passage (p. 191) was derived by Irenæus from an earlier writer. As the passage contains the well-known argument proving from 'the nature of things' that the number of Gospels cannot be more or less than four, the conclusion has consequences of wider interest than can attach to the solution of any merely textual problem. If this strange argument was already traditional in the time of Irenæus, it throws back the evidence as to the closing of the Gospel Canon, which is rightly felt to be involved in its very strangeness, into the generation that preceded him.

46. The next authority in point of date is Origen. Tischendorf gives 4 references. Mr. Miller's summary is content with 2. In one passage Origen deals expressly with the problem of the composite quotation. He does not regard the difficulty as serious. He writes (4^{126}): δύο προφητείας ἐν διαφόροις εἰρημένας τόποις ὑπὸ δύο προφητῶν εἰς ἓν συνάγων πεποίηκε· καθὼς γέγρ. ἐν 'Ησ. His evidence is discounted by Dean Burgon on the ground that his codices were bad. As this condemnation is based mainly on the fact that his quotations constantly support 'the few' against 'the many,' it need not delay us at this stage. The significant fact for us is that the MSS used by Origen at different periods during the long course of his literary activity (d. 248) in different centres of Church life read uniformly 'Ησ. τῷ προφ.

47. The next witness is Porphyry, the Neo-Platonist philosopher, a leading opponent of Chris-

* Mr. Miller's 30 passages are meant to supply materials for comparison between the Patristic evidence to be derived from writers who died before A.D. 400 to the Traditional and the 'Neologian' texts respectively. It is impossible to discover the principle which underlies this selection. He professes to choose passages in which 'evidence is borne on both sides.' But in 8 out of the 30 he can find no Patristic evidence on the 'Neologian' side.

The selection is certainly not regulated by any consideration of the distribution of MS authority. 24 out of the 30 are supported by one or more members of the group ℵBCDL. Nor, again, is any care taken to choose passages where the Patristic evidence is free from the uncertainty caused by the presence of Synoptic parallels. The only element common to all the 30 is that they are printed in thick type by Scrivener in the Cambridge Greek Testament, i.e. each of them has, at one time, been adopted by one or more of the critical editions collated at the foot of Scrivener's pages.

It is equally difficult to see the bearing of this evidence on the point at issue. It is true that at the beginning of the chapter a vague reference is made (p. 95) to a statement of Dr. Hort's, and it is assumed at the end that his contentions have been shown to be baseless. But we are left to divine, as best we may, how the collection of reff., reaching to the end of the 4th cent., relating to readings four-fifths of which are obviously not distinctively Syrian, affects Dr. Hort's position that there are no historical signs of the existence of distinctively Syrian readings before the middle of the 3rd cent. There is no excuse for this flagrant ignoratio elenchi. Dr. Hort's position was precisely formulated in words which called special attention to the fundamental importance of the fact which he claimed to have observed. The passage reads as follows (Int. § 162): 'Before the middle of the third century, at the very earliest, we have no historical signs of the existence of readings, conflate or other, that are marked as distinctively Syrian by the want of attestation from groups of documents which have preserved the other ancient forms of text. This is a fact of great significance, ascertained as it is exclusively by external evidence, and therefore supplying an absolutely independent verification and extension of the results already obtained by comparison of the internal character of readiugs as classified by conflation.'

tianity from the standpoint of philosophic paganism, who endeavoured, among other things, to confute Christians out of their own Gospels. These facts must, of course, be taken into consideration in estimating his evidence, and no doubt they would make him 'scarcely a trustworthy witness' on a question of Christian doctrine. But it is difficult to see that they invalidate his testimony on a simple question of fact. Indeed the character of the work in which the quotation occurs offers the strongest possible guarantee that he found ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ. in his copy of the Gospels. It is impossible to suppose that he invented it in order to create a difficulty. The retort to which he would have exposed himself would have been too obvious and too crushing. As it is, it is not easy to see how, if his opponents were familiar with the existence of the alternative reading, they should not have mentioned it in reply. Controversialists find it difficult to resist the temptation to accuse an opponent of corrupting the text, when he follows a reading to which they are unaccustomed. However easy, therefore, it may be, after the approved style of forensic oratory, to discredit the character of this witness, if one find his evidence inconvenient, we have in this instance a strong guarantee that he gives a true report of what he has seen, and the most venerated names in Church history can do no more. Dean Burgon himself has no scruples about appealing to this same extract from Porphyry for evidence in support of a Traditional reading (Trad. Text, p. 286). It would not be easy to find a better illustration of the fact that the help to be derived from Patristic quotations in elucidating the course of Textual History has nothing whatever to do with the personal 'respectability' of the writer from whom it is taken. It is determined entirely by the more tangible considerations of his locality and his date.

48. The other authorities quoted on this text are not included in the chronological limits within which our examination is at present confined. So we must not delay upon them, except to notice that, when a later writer embodies in his own work thoughts derived from one of his predecessors, his evidence is not necessarily worthless. If he repeats an argument which deals directly with the difficulty inherent in a particular reading, the adoption of the argument will be evidence of the continued prevalence of the reading. In any case, we shall have a fresh assurance that the text of his predecessor has been accurately preserved. For instance, Victor of Antioch, as preserved in the catena edited by Possinus, adopts Origen's explanation of the difficulty caused by the reading ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ. 'ἐπιτεμόμενος οὖν ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς ὡς ὑπὸ 'Ησαΐου εἰρημένας τὰς δύο χρήσεις παρέθηκεν.' The fact that in the same catena the text of Victor's quotation from St. Mark contains the reading ἐν τοῖς προφήταις (Trad. Text, p. 285), is therefore only a fresh instance of the necessity for caution in accepting any reading which reproduces the Traditional Text. Again, Basil's words seem to Dean Burgon to reflect Origen. They present also remarkable affinities with Irenæus. In either case, and especially in the latter, the confirmation of his predecessor's text should not be overlooked.*

49. The next point of reading that we have to consider is the presence or absence of ἔμπροσθέν σου. The omission is supported by Irenæus. The passage (p. 187) is known only in Latin. But there is evidence in the context to show that the translator is at any rate not mechanically substituting the Latin version, with which he must have been familiar, for the Greek text in front of him. For this is the first of the two passages in which he gives 'in prophetis,' when the uniform reading of the Latin versions is 'in Esaia propheta.' We may fairly therefore assume that ἔμπροσθέν σου was wanting also in the Greek of Irenæus. Origen in one place (4^{126}) calls special attention to the absence of the words from the quotation as given by St. Mark. We are quite justified, therefore, in refusing to accept the reference to St. Mark as printed on the preceding page (4^{125}) in support of the inclusion of the words. Of the 2 other passages in Origen quoted in favour of the words, one (3^{769}) is really a direct quotation from the prophet, in the other (1^{389}) there is nothing in the context to decide whether the words did or did not stand as part of the quotation as Origen made it. The passage in Eus. $^{\text{dem } 430}$, which is also quoted on the same side, is really indecisive. He gives the quotation at length from the prophet, and then tells us that Mk. makes use of it. He does not write out Mk.'s text at length.

50. In no other case is any ante-Nicene evidence alleged in favour of the Traditional side of any of our 16 readings. In v.^{4} the 'Western' Text is supported by Eus$^{\text{dem}}$. In v.^{5} Origen $4^{130.\,126}$ Eus$^{\text{dem}}$ are quoted against the TR, and in v.^{9} Origen and in v.^{12} Origen and Eus$^{\text{dem}}$ reappear against it. In 8 out of the 16 no ante-Nicene evidence is alleged on either side.

To sum up our results. The comparative weakness of the Trad. Text in ante-Nicene support is obvious at the first glance. The only support it can muster that will stand examination is Irenæus in 2 places out of 3 on v.^{2}, and possibly one passage in Origen on v.^{3}.

51. Before we can decide whether this support is wholly lacking to the 'distinctively Syrian' readings, we shall have to consider more closely the attestation and the internal characteristics of the readings in v.^{2} and v.^{3}. In regard to v.^{2}, it is certainly remarkable that the reading ἐν τοῖς προφ., if not genuine, must be a deliberate emendation of the text, of a bolder type than the other readings of the group, and quite in the 'Western' spirit. When we add to this that Irenæus is one of the most constant supporters of the 'Western' Text, it will not seem unreasonable to class this reading provisionally as an early 'Western' reading of exceptionally limited circulation, which was afterwards taken up into the 'Syrian' Text. We shall thus cease to regard it as 'distinctively Syrian.' In v.^{3}, if the reading in Orig. 1^{389} be accepted, there would be nothing unnatural in classing it as Alexandrian. It is attested by Δ, one of the small group which, as we shall see, have a large Alexandrian element in this Gospel. It also may disappear from the 'distinctively Syrian' list.

So much then for the ante-Nicene evidence. The passages clearly do not afford sufficient ground for any wide generalization. But enough has been said to illustrate the method of investigation which has to be followed, and the results as far as they go are in general agreement with what Dr. Hort's words would lead us to expect.

52. We have now completed our examination of

---

* The passage in Basil runs as follows: ὁ μὲν Ματθαῖος τῆς κατὰ σάρκα γεννήσεως ἐξηγητὴς γέγονεν ὡς αὐτός φησιν· Βίβλος γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ υἱοῦ Δαβίδ, υἱοῦ Ἀβραάμ. Ὁ δὲ Μάρκος ἀρχὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τὸ Ἰωαννοῦ πεποίηκε κήρυγμα εἰπών· Ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καθὼς γέγραπται ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ. Φωνὴ βοῶντος, κ.τ.λ. In Irenæus we read: Ματθαῖος δὲ τὴν κατὰ ἄνθρωπον αὐτοῦ γέννησιν κηρύττει λεγων· Βίβλος γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ υἱοῦ Δαβείδ, υἱοῦ Ἀβραάμ. καὶ Τοῦ δὲ [Ἰησοῦ] Χριστοῦ ἡ γέννησις οὕτως ἦν· ἀνθρωπόμορφον οὖν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦτο . . . Μάρκος δὲ ἀπο τοῦ προφητικοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἐξ ὕψους ἐπιόντος τοῖς ἀνθρώποις τὴν ἀρχὴν ἐποιήσατο λέγων· Ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ὡς γέγραπται ἐν 'Ησ. τῷ προφ.

It should be noticed that Basil here passes straight from the mention of the prophet's name to the quotation which is taken from him—omitting the intervening quotation from Malachi. In this he is supported by Epiphanius and Victorinus. It seems not unlikely that this represents another attempt to escape the difficulty.

the distinctively Syrian readings under the different heads suggested by Dr. Hort's analysis, §§ 132–168. And we have before us examples which will help to give 'actuality' to most of the different classes of phenomena to which he calls attention. We are therefore in a position to estimate to some extent the strength of the case against the Traditional Text. If this passage be, as there is no reason to doubt, a fair specimen of the general character of that text, as indicated by the internal evidence of its 'distinctive readings,' if some of those readings are 'conflate,' if they prove on careful examination to be destitute of ante-Nicene support, we can understand why critics should be driven to the conclusion that, in spite of the vast number of witnesses that support Traditional readings, the true text must be sought elsewhere. We can see also in its true proportions the nature of the issues at stake between the rival schools. In the vast majority of cases the differences relate to points in themselves exceedingly minute and trivial — the loss or the preservation of delicate distinctions in style and phraseology between different Evangelists, the question whether a particular saying of our Lord is recorded by one witness or by two; at the highest, whether narratives of incidents or recorded words which admittedly embody traditions of the Apostolic period, and have the sanction of centuries of ecclesiastical use, were or were not actually incorporated by the Evangelists themselves in the Gospels that they wrote.[*]

53. Again, a careful comparison of these readings with their rivals will help us to understand why it has now come to be admitted on both sides that the differences between the Traditional Text and the 'Neutral' or the 'Western' cannot be explained as due merely to the normal accidents of transmission. The changes bear too clearly stamped upon them the marks of method and deliberation, and have been carried out too consistently, not to be the result of design. Dr. Hort expressed his opinion on this point with remarkable boldness and precision, asserting that a thorough examination of the facts pointed not to one only, but to two careful revisions under editorial supervision—the first after the death of Origen, and the second about the middle of the 4th century. This second revision he saw reason, as has been already pointed out, to connect with the Church of Antioch. None of his conclusions has roused so much scorn and indignation among his opponents, or has been so unsparingly denounced as groundless and visionary. But time and further study under the stimulus of controversy have brought a more intelligent appreciation of the phenomena. Dean Burgon (Trad. Text, p. 234), though 'not so simple as to pretend to fix the precise date and assign a definite locality to the fontal source, or sources, of our perplexity and distress,' yet suspects 'that in the little handful of authorities which have acquired such a notoriety in the annals of recent Textual Criticism, at the head of which stand Codices B and ℵ, are to be recognized the characteristic features of a lost family of (once well-known) 2nd or 3rd cent. documents, which owed their existence to the misguided zeal of some well-intentioned but utterly incompetent persons who devoted themselves to the task of correcting the Text of Scripture, but were entirely unfit for the undertaking.' Mr. Miller sees reason to place this editorial activity at an even earlier period (Causes of Corr. p. 22, note); 'I am inclined to believe that, in the age immediately succeeding the apostles, some person or persons of great influence and authority executed a Revision of the NT, and gave the world the result of such labours in a "corrected Text." The guiding principle seems to have been to seek to abridge the Text, to lop off whatever seemed redundant, or which might in any way be spared, and to eliminate from one Gospel whatever expressions occurred elsewhere in another Gospel. Clauses which slightly obscured the speaker's meaning, or which seemed to hang loose at the end of a sentence, or which introduced a consideration of difficulty,—words which interfered with the easy flow of a sentence, — everything of this kind, such a person seems to have felt at liberty to discard. But, what is more serious, passages which occasioned some difficulty, as the pericope de adultera; physical perplexity, as the troubling of the water; spiritual revulsion, as the agony in the garden,—all these the reviser or revisers seem to have judged it safest simply to eliminate. It is difficult to understand how any persons in their senses could have so acted by the sacred deposit; but it does not seem improbable that at some very remote period there were found some who did act in some such way. Let it be observed, however, that, unlike some critics, I do not base my real argument upon what appears to me to be a not unlikely supposition.'

54. When we add to this that the result of the revision was to produce 'a Thucydidean compactness, condensed and well pruned according to the fastidious taste of the study,' 'exactly that which does not in the long-run take with people who are versed in the habits of ordinary life' (Trad. Text, p. 291), we have a picture of the characteristic differences between the rival texts, the main outlines of which it would be difficult to improve, blurred though they are in parts by a failure to discriminate between features peculiar to the Western and features belonging to both the Western and the Neutral types. Students may safely be left to decide for themselves between the rival methods of explaining the character and accounting for the origin of these differences.

It is true that in neither case has any record of this work of revision survived in historical tradition. Mr. Burkitt,[*] however, has shown, by reference to a far more complete transformation in a biblical text—the exchange of the LXX version of Daniel for Theodotion's by the Church of Africa during the 3rd cent.—that no conclusion unfavourable to Dr. Hort's hypothesis can be based on this silence.

55. For the sub-Apostolic period, to which Mr. Miller would relegate us, historical evidence is at its scantiest, so that the absence of any allusion to the revision which he postulates has virtually no weight at all. Such writings, however, as have survived to show what manner of men the Church produced during that period do not indicate any very high degree of literary power or intellectual distinction. What a delightful surprise it would be, if among the Egyptian papyri even a fragment could come to light representing original work by some leading member of this early-second-century school of critics, who, unlike any other Greek writers of their time, loved Thucydidean

[*] Dr. Salmon seems hardly to do justice to the attitude of WH on this last point. It is true, in a sense, that, as he says (p. 155), they investigated the subject merely as a 'literary problem.' It is difficult to see how, if their work was to have any scientific value, and to provide materials on which a student of the Apostolic age can work with confidence, they could have done otherwise. All considerations of immediate edification had to be rigorously excluded. At the same time they would be the last people in the world to dispute Dr. Salmon's doctrine of 'the well-illuminated penumbra.' A highly developed literary conscience does not necessarily imply a rigidly mechanical theory of Inspiration.

The text adopted by the Revisers really represents that kind of compromise which Dr. Salmon's argument would desiderate. In it distinct recognition is given to 'prescriptive rights.' Passages like the pericope de adultera and Mk $16^{9\text{-}20}$ are retained in their familiar places for public use. At the same time, the student receives due warning of the difference in authentication between these passages and their surroundings.

[*] The Old Latin and the Itala, pp. 7, 8.

compactness of style, not wisely, indeed, if it betrayed them into tampering with the text of Scripture, but with a masterful power of reproducing it, and who anticipated by seventeen centuries modern scientific perplexities. It might do far more to shake the foundations of Dr. Hort's position than the discovery of the early history of the cursive script, which seems to Mr. Miller so clear a proof that the world is drifting away from his opponents (Trad. Text, p. 238 f.).

56. The points that remain under this head demand reverent handling. They belong to that side of the subject where the textual critic is bound to give an account of the position that he occupies on fundamental articles of Christian faith. Dean Burgon claims that faith in the Inspiration of Scripture carries with it, as a corollary, faith in a special Providence watching over the transmission of the text, and that the same ecclesiastical tradition which guarantees the list of books which are to be accepted as Canonical must be held also to guarantee the type of text which all believers in the authority of the Church are bound to uphold (Trad. Text, ch. i.).

57. Let us take these points in order. If there is one doctrine more than another that has in the Providence of God been forced on the attention of Christian students during the course of the last century, it is the doctrine of Inspiration. And if any result with regard to it may claim to be established by the trial through which God has seen fit to test and discipline the faith of those that believe in Him, it is surely this: that there is no subject on which a priori arguments are so liable to be upset when they are brought to the test of facts. Here as elsewhere we are forced to acknowledge that God's ways are not as our ways. The course of events has followed again and again a very different line from that which we should naturally have anticipated. And while we may, I think, confidently affirm that the result of this last century of freest discussion has been to deepen and strengthen the faith of men in the reality of the inspiration of the Prophets of the Old Covenant, and of the Apostles and Evangelists of the New, it has shown that there is no royal road to the discovery of the laws by which Inspiration works, except through the most patient and attentive study of the books which owe their form and their contents to its influence.

58. The Church in the 2nd cent. was led by processes, which we have no reason to distrust because they were to a large extent 'instinctive,' to make a provisional selection of the books that had a claim to be regarded as Canonical. The list of books 'of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church,' is amply sufficient as a standard by which we can estimate the claims of those whose credentials are less complete. Centuries of pious use and devout meditation, even if sometimes 'not according to knowledge,' have shown the rich stores of spiritual fruit which can be drawn from them. But the Church, as a whole, has never attempted to put forward an authoritative definition of Inspiration. This being so, we are clearly not in a position to formulate any theory with regard to the course which the Providence of God may be assumed to have followed in regard to the preservation, in literal exactness through the ages, of the text as it left the hands of the inspired writers. Even the languages in which the books are written are living languages no more. Not one Christian in 10,000 can read either Testament in the original. We have therefore no grounds a priori to expect that kind of accuracy in the Traditional Text which Dean Burgon would postulate for it.

59. 'But,' it will be said, 'you must at least admit that the claims of the Traditional Text on our acceptance rest on the same Church authority that guarantees the Canon.' Supposing the contention to be true, the patent differences which exist to-day in point of actual content between the Greek, Latin, Syriac, and English Bibles would show that we must expect to find in Textual Criticism, as we find in regard to the contents of the Canon, many questions which cannot be foreclosed by an appeal to 'authority.' The text recognized by the most explicit conciliar decision as alone authoritative for the Latin part of Western Christendom is fundamentally distinct from that for which Dean Burgon claims the prescriptive sanction of undisputed and universal possession. But the contention itself will not bear examination. The differences of use between the different centres of Christendom in regard to the contents of the Canon at the beginning of the 4th cent. were perfectly definite, and the problems arising out of the differences claimed immediate and special attention. The Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius is a permanent memorial of the interest taken in them, and of the general principles that were applied, at least in some quarters, to their solution. But there is nothing even remotely parallel to this in regard to the development of thought on the problems of Textual Criticism. If it is true, as Dean Burgon asserts (Trad. Text, p. 11), 'that in the time of Origen the first principles of the science were not understood,' it would hardly be rash to hazard the assertion that Origen at least shows more interest in the subject, and takes more pains to compare the readings of different MSS, and to mention any variants that he found existing, than all the Greek Fathers from Athanasius to Chrysostom put together.*

It would indeed be strange if, in the stress of the battles which they had to fight for the defence and elucidation of the fundamental verities of the Christian faith, the great protagonists of the Nicene period and of that which immediately succeeded it, had had time to spare for such comparative minutiæ. And, unless it can be proved that they ever took more than an occasional and passing interest in the question, what is it but a gross abuse of a great principle to appeal to their authority in a matter like this, as if it stood on the same level as their authority on the great problems which we may well believe they were raised up by God to solve for the guidance, not of their own generation only but of all the generations that were to come after them?

60. We must pass on now to examine such specimens as the same passage (Mk 1^{1-28}) provides of characteristic readings belonging to the other, and, if the conclusion we have reached with regard to the Traditional Text be right, presumably earlier types of text.

The first of these to attract attention is the 'Western.' It will be worth while to print the list in extenso, marking the readings which it shares with other types.

(1) V.^{2} ὡς for καθώς, also Syrian.
(2) om. ἐγώ, also Neutral. Ins. Syr. and Alex.
(3) V.^{3} τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν or ὑμῶν for αὐτοῦ, with further addition from the prophet in c.
(4) V.^{4} ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ βαπτίζων καὶ κηρύσσων for ὁ β. ἐν τῇ ἐρ. κηρ.

* The prima facie grounds for this assertion are strong enough to justify its being put forward for examination. Unfortunately, no systematic collection has yet been made of the materials by which it could be tested. The list of reff. to passages in the Fathers in which express reference is made to ἀντίγραφα, which Nestle has compiled (Intr., Appendix ii.) from Tischendorf's Apparatus Criticus, is a preliminary step of great importance. It is much to be hoped that the matter will not be allowed to rest there.

(5) V.^{5} ἐν Ἰορδάνῃ for ἐν τῷ Ἰ. ποτάμῳ with transp. of ὑπ' αὐτοῦ.
(6) V.^{6} δέ for καί, also Syrian.
(7) Vv.$^{6-8}$ completely recast (see above). Chiefly assimilation to parallels in other Gospels. Note, however, δέρρην (= δέρριν) for τρίχας.
(8) V.^{9} ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις for ἐκ. τ. ἡμ.
(9) V.^{10} om. εὐθύς.
(10) V.^{10} ἠνυγμένους for σχιζομένους.
(11) V.^{10} εἰς for ἐπ', also Neutral. Against Syr. and Alex.
(12) V.^{11} om. ἐγένετο.
(13) V.^{12} add τὸ ἅγιον.
(14) V.^{12} ἐκβάλλει αὐτόν for αὐτ. ἐκβ.
(15) V.^{13} ἡμέρας τεσσαράκοντα for τεσσ. ἡμ. Assimilation.
(16) V.^{14} καί for δέ, also Neutral. Against Syr. and Alex.
(17) V.^{14} add τῆς βασιλείας, also Syr. Assimilation.
(18) V.^{15} λέγων perhaps for καὶ λέγων.
(19) V.^{15} πεπλήρωνται οἱ καιροὶ for πεπ. ὁ καιρός.
(20) V.^{16} αὐτοῦ for Σίμωνος.
(21) V.^{18} πάντα for τὰ δίκτυα. Assimilation.
(22) V.^{20} ἠκολούθησαν αὐτῷ for ἀπῆλθον ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ.
(23) V.^{21} εἰσεπορεύοντο for εἰσπορεύονται.
(24) V.^{21} add αὐτούς after ἐδίδασκεν.
(25) V.^{22} om. καί.
(26) V.^{23} om. εὐθύς.
(27) V.^{23} om. αὐτῶν.
(28) V.^{25} om. ὁ Ἰησοῦς.
(29) V.^{25} τοῦ ἀνθρώπου for αὐτοῦ.
V.^{25} add πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον.
(30) V.^{26} Recast (see above). Note κράξας (cf. Syrian) for φωνῆσαν, and ἀπό for ἐξ.
(31) V.^{27} πρὸς αὐτούς, with Syrian and perhaps Alex.
(32) V.^{27} τίς ἡ διδαχὴ ἐκείνη ἢ καινὴ αὕτη ἡ ἐξουσία for τί ἐστιν τοῦτο; διδαχὴ καινὴ κατ' ἐξουσίαν.
(33) V.^{28} om. πανταχοῦ, with Syrian.

To these we should probably add, as we have seen—

(1^{b}) V.^{2} ἐν τοῖς προφήταις for ἐν Ἠσ. τῷ προφ.

61. The difference in general character between these readings and the 'distinctively Syrian' series is obvious. Without for the most part seriously affecting the sense, they yet show, if we take the Neutral text as our standard, a remarkable freedom in altering the form of expression, 'the love of paraphrase,' which Dr. Hort's description (§ 173 f.) would have led us to anticipate. And in most cases, as we have seen, there is little doubt that the change was made by the 'Western' scribe. This fact will help us to realize the true character of a reading such as δέρριν in (7), which, if it stood alone, or was supported only by one or two carefully chosen examples, might quite easily appear unquestionably original, or, at least, a correction due to the author himself. It is in itself remarkably vigorous and appropriate. And, if we were dealing with the work of scribes of a normal type, we should say at once that they could not have had either the inclination or the capacity to invent it. But the matter presents a different aspect where we find in the same company readings like (29) τοῦ ἀνθρώπου for αὐτοῦ, (20) αὐτοῦ for Σίμωνος, (21) πάντα for τὰ δίκτυα, (22) ἠκολούθησαν for ἀπῆλθον ὀπίσω, (30) κράξας for φωνῆσαν, (10) ἠνυγμένους for σχιζομένους. There is no such ground for attributing these to the hand of the author. And a scribe capable of introducing them may well have been capable of changing τρίχας to δέρριν if the word occurred to him. This assumption is strengthened when we note that this spirit of licence has affected not single words only but whole sentences, e.g. (7) (30) (32); where, in like manner, it would seem impossible to attribute the readings to a revision by the author himself.

This case, we may notice in passing, is a good example of the importance of attending to what Dr. Hort called the 'Internal Evidence of Documents,' before deciding finally on particular readings. No conclusion can safely be built on a mere selection of readings, however striking in themselves.*

62. The general character of these readings, then, is not such as to inspire confidence. It is not likely that any editor will be found to accept them as a whole, and construct his text throughout from the documents that contain them. Editions, indeed, like Professor Blass's edition of the Acts and St. Luke, which enable the two recensions to be studied side by side, supply a real need. At the same time, the character of these readings, and the very early date at which they must all have originated, will ensure for them a large share of attention. Certainly, the most fruitful work that has been done in this department of Textual Criticism in recent years, if we except the closely kindred work done by Professor Sanday and Mr. Burkitt on the early history of the Latin Version, is work that has been devoted to the investigation of their origin. The first step was taken by Mr. Rendel Harris in the 'Study of the Codex Bezæ,' printed in the series of Cambridge Texts and Studies in 1891. The thesis of this stimulating but inconclusive essay was that the origin of the peculiar readings in the Greek text of Codex Bezæ, the primary authority for the Western Text in its Greek dress, can be traced to the influence of the Latin version that accompanied it in various stages of its history. At the same time, he claimed to trace the Latin version, in the form in which it has accompanied D, back to Carthage early in the 2nd century. One direct result of his work was the publication of two vols. by Dr. Chase on 'The Old Syriac element in Codex Bezæ' and 'The Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels,' in which he collects the evidence in support of the thesis that the true source of the peculiar elements in the Bezan text is to be found, not in Latin but in Syriac. And he emphasized, following a suggestion thrown out by Dr. Sanday in a review of Rendel Harris, the claims of Antioch as the centre from which this influence had spread. It is difficult to doubt that the swing of the pendulum will ultimately bring us back to a simpler, if more commonplace, solution, and we shall be content to believe that the bulk of the Western readings originated in Greek, excepting those which may fairly be regarded as individualisms of D. The influence of Syriac can hardly have been more than occasional and spasmodic. If the suggestion with regard to Antioch can be established, important consequences will flow from it. It would be rash, perhaps, to say more at present.† In any case, it is in striking agreement with the opinion expressed by WH (§ 153): 'On the whole, we are disposed to suspect that the "Western" Text took its rise in North-Western Syria or Asia Minor, and that it was soon carried to Rome, and thence spread in different directions to North Africa and most of the countries of Europe. From North-Western Syria it would easily pass through Palestine and Egypt to Ethiopia. But this is at present hardly more than a speculation; nor do any critical results depend upon it.' It is interesting, however, to notice that, as Mr. Lake has pointed out in his little book on the Text of NT (p. 89), this view

---

* This caution is specially necessary in judging of any list of readings which from the nature of the case can consist only of specimens: e.g. in Blass's article on 'The Western Text of St. Mark,' and in Nestle's 'Critical Notes on various Passages.'

† See esp. Chase, Syro-Latin Text, p. 141.

would at the same time satisfactorily account for most of the phenomena in the remarkable series of interpolations in Acts which Prof. Ramsay has sought to elucidate.

63. A further question, of some importance with regard to this class of readings, still remains. Even if it be granted that, as a whole, the 'Western' represents an aberrant type of text, 'it does not follow,' as WH themselves point out, (§ 237), 'that none of its distinctive readings are original.' The special class of 'Western non-Interpolations' to which they called attention may or may not be regarded as favourable specimens.[*] At any rate they show that WH did not start, as Dr. Salmon's humorous illustration might lead the unwary to conclude, with an invincible prejudice against any reading that might be called 'Western.' The fact is that their uniform habit, in their preliminary examination of the text of each book of NT, was to make a list of all the Western readings that were not obvious corruptions. In Mk. more than 200 such readings were tabulated. The list so made was then subjected to repeated revisions, and no reading of any interest was passed over without full consideration. In Mk. more than 60 of these readings were recorded in their first edition under one form of notation or other on the same page as the text. In the smaller edition 12 rank as strictly alternative readings, 51 are printed as Noteworthy Rejected Readings in a list at the end of the volume. Whether this list would have received large additions had they had access to Syr-sin is an interesting question on which something must be said presently. The only point which it is worth while to emphasize at this stage is this. They state expressly that they were not prevented by any genealogical considerations from accepting any 'Western' reading. Only, they found very few that seemed to them commended by internal evidence (§§ 269–273).

We must postpone for the present the question, raised by Mr. Burkitt,[†] whether we are bound to attach such weight to the demonstrable antiquity of the readings supported by a combination of the earliest Syriac and the earliest Latin authorities as to enable us to dispense with the necessity of applying the test of 'the Internal Evidence of Documents' to the readings of this as of any other group, before taking it as the foundation for a reconstruction of the text.

64. The Alexandrian readings in our passage are few, but thoroughly representative of the class. They include—

(1) The insertion of καὶ before κηρύσσων in v.^{4}.

(2) The omission of εἰσελθών, with various rearrangements of the words in v.^{21}.

(3) The insertion of Ἔα in v.^{24}.

(4) οἴδαμεν for οἶδα in the same verse.

To these we should add—

(5) V.^{2} ins. ἐγώ, also Syrian.

(6) V.^{14} δέ for καί, also Syrian.

(7) V.^{27} πρὸς αὐτούς, perhaps Alex. as well as Western and Syrian.

These readings are relatively far less numerous and less startling than the 'Western,' and in consequence their identification by WH as a distinct class was a triumph of delicate and patient analysis,[‡] and writers who are not alive to the necessity for finding a clue through the maze of the concordia discors of the small group of demonstrably early authorities, still find it possible and convenient to despise the evidence on which this part of WH's classification rests. No one, however, who will be at the pains to study the readings of the group ℵCLΔ through the rest of the Gospel will doubt either the soundness or the importance of the conclusion. WH tabulate upwards of 70 examples, printing 11 either in text or margin; see $1^{21.\,24.\,45}$ $3^{6.\,7}$ 4^{8} $8^{21.\,25}$ 10^{43} 11^{11} 15^{1}. The readings similarly treated, 3^{17} 4^{22} 5^{23} $6^{14.\,23.\,33}$ $9^{9.\,30}$ 12^{30} 15^{44}, seem to differ from these only by the fact that they were adopted by the Syrian revisers. We must not, however, forget that these are all picked specimens, and cannot be fairly judged apart from their companions.

65. The results of our examination were not favourable to the genuineness of any of the 6 (or 7) examples that are immediately before us. Our study will, however, help us to appreciate the accuracy of WH's sketch of the general characteristics of the class (§ 183). 'The changes made have usually more to do with language than matter, and are marked by an effort after correctness of phrase. They are evidently the work of careful leisurely hands, and not seldom display a delicate philological tact which unavoidably lends them at first sight a deceptive appearance of originality.' 'Some of the modes of change described above as belonging to incipient paraphrase occur as distinctly here as in the Western texts, though as a rule much more sparingly; and the various forms of assimilation, especially harmonistic alteration and interpolation in the Gospels, recur likewise, and at times are carried out in a very skilful manner.'

The example in v.^{4} is an excellent specimen of the class referred to in the closing sentence of § 184: 'The most instructive distributions, as exhibiting distinctly the residual pre-Syrian text, which is neither Western nor Alexandrian, are those produced by the simultaneous aberration of the Western and Alexandrian texts, especially when they severally exhibit independent modes of easing an apparent difficulty in the text antecedent to both.'

66. The subsidiary attestation that they receive both from versions and from ante-Nicene Patristic quotations is remarkable.

In (1) they have the support of the Bohairic.

In (2) (in one form or another) of Boh Syr-sin and some old Latin MSS, besides Origen in 4 places.

In (3) they are supported by Origen and Eusebius.

In (4) by Boh Orig^{2} Eus^{4}, besides Orig$^{\text{int }1}$ Iren$^{\text{int }1}$ Tert.

In (5) by Orig $\frac{3}{6}$ Eus.

In (6) by Orig Eus.

67. We come now to the last and in many respects the most difficult part of our task—the examination of the evidence for 'the residual pre-Syrian Text, which is neither Western nor Alexandrian,' and to which in consequence WH gave, as we have seen, the name 'Neutral.' The specimens before us, with the authorities attesting them, are these—

68. The internal evidence, as we have seen, is strongly in favour of the 'Neutral' Text in many of these cases. In none is it clearly unfavourable. What are we to say of the documents by which it is supported?

The first point that will strike us as we go through the list is the variation in size in the attesting groups. At times, e.g., (1) we have an array as strong and varied in its contents as we could desire, including 7 good MSS, all the early Versions, and abundant ante-Nicene Patristic evidence. Side by side with this we find in (3) only one uncial and one cursive. In fact the only constant supporter of the whole series of readings is the single uncial MS, B. Clearly we must test our ground most carefully if we are to rest securely on evidence that is liable from time to time to be reduced to such slender proportions.

69. What, then, is the real foundation for the authority which WH claim for B?

First and foremost it rests, they tell us, on 'Internal Evidence of Readings.'[*] They claim that the great majority of readings, even when but slenderly supported, approve themselves as genuine after repeated examination. The 25 examples before us certainly tend to confirm this judgment. The case does not, however, rest purely on internal considerations. It is confirmed, so far as the evidence at our disposal will enable us to speak, by 'genealogy.' In this connexion the reading in v.^{4} is once more most instructive. It supplies us with a clear proof of the existence of a third type of text distinct alike from the Western and Alexandrian, and presenting a reading which may well explain the origin of both, and it helps us to appreciate the significance of the fact that in other cases the same MS, which in cases like this is seen to preserve a text independent of both the other early groups, supports now one and now the other of these groups against its rival. In other words, except in the comparatively rare cases in which both the Western and Alexandrian text have gone astray in the same place, B has uniformly the support of one set of authorities or the other, i.e. it would naturally rank both as an early Western authority as compared with the Alexandrian group, and as an early Alexandrian authority against the Westerns. Or, to put the same thing from the other side, both the Western and the Alexandrian texts are fundamentally 'neutral' in a large proportion of their readings. And the further back we can trace either of them, and more especially the Western, where the evidence, though still far from complete, is yet relatively abundant, the more closely do its readings as a whole approximate to the 'Neutral' Text.

70. In the light of this fact we may estimate more truly the extent of the confirmation which the text of B receives from other primary authorities. E.g. in the passage before us it is supported by ℵ in 19, by L in 18, by 33 in 12, by D in 9 out of the 25 cases. C is extant in 10, and supports B in 3. Latin evidence of one kind or another supports B in 16, the Bohairic in 13, Syr-sin in 2 out of 8 passages where it definitely supports one or other of the variants (in 3 passages Syr-sin presents us with a new variant). Origen, who in some cases supports the rival reading as well, is quoted in support of B in 8 cases, and Irenæus in 2. These results correspond closely with the anticipations which Dr. Hort's words in § 235 would have led us to form.

71. In the case of ℵ and the oldest form both of the Latin and of the Syriac Versions, it is important to examine the extent and the limitations of their support more closely.

Let us take first the relation of these two MSS of the Greek text to one another. The amount of agreement between ℵ and B in readings in which they stand almost or altogether alone is so great that there can be no doubt, on 'genealogical' grounds, that for a considerable part of their contents they preserve unchanged the text of a common original. What, then, we are forced to ask, is the length of the interval which separates each of them from this common ancestor? Or, in other words, to what extent are we justified in regarding their testimonies as 'independent'?

72. To Mr. Miller the case seems very simple. The MSS were certainly written in the same generation; in part, as it would seem, by the same scribe. What more is wanted, in view of their admitted agreement in a peculiar type of text, to prove that they are 'twin products of a lost exemplar,' and to justify us in quoting them as 'ℵ-B,' linked by a hyphen, as certain groups of cursives are linked, and as Mr. Cronin (JTS vol. ii. p. 590) has proved that the Codices Purpureæ (N-Σ-Sinop) should be linked, because they are all derived directly from one and the same MSS?

Dean Burgon was more cautious. His minute comparison of the two MSS had impressed him very strongly with the extent not only of the agreement, but of the differences between them. He writes of them (Trad. Text, p. 33) as 'closely resembling one another, yet standing apart in every page so seriously that it is easier to find two consecutive verses in which they differ than two consecutive verses in which they entirely agree.' And, though he would have it that the 'idea of fixing the date of the common ancestor of B and ℵ is based upon pure speculation' (groups of attested variations being for some unexplained reason excluded from the category of facts), yet he was perfectly well aware that the differences between the two MSS required 'several generations' of transcription to account for them. Only he was able to persuade himself that, at a time when the demand for fresh copies must have been very great, these generations could 'have been given off in two or three years' (ib. p. 73).

73. The treatment of the problem in WH (Intr. §§ 287-304) is very different in character. Few better examples could be found of Hort's inexhaustible fertility in conceiving hypotheses which might fit the [*] Dr. Bernhard Weiss has published in various numbers of Texte und Untersuchungen a careful examination of the text of the leading uncials as determined exclusively by a study of 'the Internal Evidence of Readings.' His results are summarized conveniently in Kenyon's Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the NT, p. 264 f. They supply a striking and entirely independent corroboration of WH's estimate of the relative purity of the text of B.

---

The present writer is glad of this opportunity of calling attention to Dr. Kenyon's Handbook. It contains, besides other matter which none but so expert a palæographer could supply, a statement of the questions at issue in the present state of Textual Criticism which is eminently clear and fair.

facts by which he was confronted, and the patient consideration which he was prepared to give to each before he pronounced judgment on it. The passage is too long to extract, and too condensed already to admit of further condensation. It cannot, however, be too earnestly commended to the consideration of all students.

Far too many of the theories that have been recently put forward have been framed without reference to the facts to which these paragraphs call attention. Meanwhile we must content ourselves with the summary of his conclusions, given by Hort himself (ed. min. p. 559): 'If B and ℵ were for a great part of their text derived from a proximate common original, that common original, whatever might have been its own date, must have had a very ancient and a very pure text. There is, however, no tangible evidence for this supposition; while various considerations, drawn from careful comparison of the accessory attestation of readings supported by ℵB together, by B against ℵ, and by ℵ against B respectively, render it morally certain that the ancestries of B and of ℵ diverged from a point near the autographs, and never came into contact subsequently; so that the coincidence of ℵB marks those portions of text in which two primitive and entirely separate lines of transmission had not come to differ from each other through independent corruption in the one or the other.'

74. The passage of Mark already before us will supply material by which we can at once illustrate and test the force of the argument on which this conclusion rests. We have already examined the most remarkable of the readings in which ℵ and B agree in the course of our study of the 'Syrian,' 'Western,' and 'Neutral' texts in these verses; and certainly the standard of excellence which the two MSS reach in combination is very high. Whatever the date of their common original, 'it must,' judging by internal considerations in those parts of it which we can at once restore with confidence, 'have had a very pure text.' The accessory evidence for a large proportion of these readings makes it clear at the same time that it is also 'a very ancient' text.

75. The following list of readings in which the two authorities disagree will give us examples of the 'various considerations' to which Dr. Hort alludes, and so enable us to appreciate the rest of the passage:—

(1) V.^{1} + υἱοῦ θεοῦ, ℵ^{a}BDL etc.: Iren $\frac{2}{3}$ Orig^{int}.

(14) V.^{18} ἠκολούθουν, B. ἠκολούθησαν, ℵ etc.

(15) V.^{19} ὀλίγον, BDL 1 a b ff^{2} Syr-vg (sin) Boh.
ἐκεῖθεν, ℵ* (33).

(16) V.^{21} εἰσελθών, ABD etc.
– ℵ (C) L (Δ) (33 69) (c) (Syr-sin-vg) (Boh).

(17) V.^{24} σύ, ABΔΓ (a curious instance of accidental coincidence in an itacism).
σοί, ℵ etc.

(18) V.^{24} οἶδα, ABCD etc. οἴδαμεν, ℵLΔ: Iren^{int} Orig Eus Tert.

(19) V.^{25} + λέγων, B etc. om. ℵ* (A*?): Dam.

(20) V.^{26} – $\overline{\textit{πνα}}$ τό, B by homœoteleuton. + ℵ etc.

(21) V.^{28} + εὐθύς, B etc.
– ℵ* 1 33 b c e ff$^{1.2}$ (g^{1}) Boh Syr-sin.

(22) V.^{28} Γαλιλαίας, ABCD etc. Ἰουδαίας, ℵ* (cf. 28 s^{scr*}).

76. From this list we may at once eliminate (17) and (20), which are clearly only slips of the pen; and (4), (14), (22), as possibly individualisms. In a certain number of the cases that remain—(2), (5), (12), (16), (18), where, as we have seen, the readings may be classed as either Alexandrian, or Alexandrian and Syrian—it is possible that the variants might have come in together, if the archetype of ℵ had been collated with a MS containing a strongly-marked Alexandrian text. There remain, however, 12 variants, even in these 28 verses, supported on both sides by early evidence, and by no means the same evidence in the different cases, which can only have come into the aberrant text, whichever it is, at different times in the course of an eventful history. We can see, then, what kind of evidence is available in support of Dr. Hort's 'various considerations.' Further evidence will be forthcoming from the investigation which we have yet to make, into the relation in which these two primary MSS of the Greek text stand to the two earliest Versions—the Latin and the Syrian.

77. A complete examination of this, the most important problem that still awaits solution in Textual Criticism, is not as yet possible. Mr. Turner has recently reminded us (JTS vol. ii. p. 602) that the 'African Latin' had a history before Cyprian. The evidence of k, priceless as it is, is only part of the evidence that will become available in due course as the result of the work at present being carried on at Oxford under the direction of Prof. Sanday on the text of Irenæus and kindred subjects. Similarly, we must not forget that the history of the 'Old Syriac' did not begin with Syr-sin. The total amount of evidence for enucleating this history is still lamentably small, and inaccessible to those who are not themselves good Syriac scholars. Students, however, have long been cheered by the announcement that Mr. Burkitt has in hand an edition of the Syriac Gospels which, they have good reason to know, will leave nothing to be desired that wide reading, accurate scholarship, and brilliant genius can supply.

78. Meanwhile something can be done with the evidence already accessible. Dr. Sanday contributed a valuable essay on the Greek text underlying k to the Oxford edition of that MS.* The various lists are, unfortunately for our present purpose, admittedly incomplete. Still they afford a sufficiently wide basis for the experimental investigation, which is all that can be attempted here. A collation of Syr-sin with the readings tabulated by Dr. Sanday supplies a list of upwards of 200 cases in which the evidence of the 4 authorities is simultaneously available for comparison. These may well be taken as samples of the ore which this mine will supply.

It is worth while to tabulate and print these examples in full, as the tables will need to be carefully checked and supplemented by better equipped scholars; and no merely numerical summary of results can give even an approximately true impression of the facts.

80. List I. contains 44 passages in which all four authorities are agreed. Generally (not always) they form the nucleus of a small group of authorities in opposition to the bulk of later evidence. In no case do they stand quite alone. Of course this list represents only a small part of the total amount of agreement between the four texts. The most noteworthy reading in the list is the omission of Mk 16^{9-20}—verses which must on internal grounds, as even their most strenuous supporters are now prepared to admit, have had an origin in some respects different from that of the rest of the Gospel. See, e.g., Trad. Text, p. 305.

Lists II.–V. contain passages in which each of the four stands in turn unsupported by any of the rest. Lists VI.–VIII. represent the various combinations of the authorities taken two together.

B stands alone in 5 places.

ℵ stands alone in 14. In 4 of these Syr-sin has a reading of its own differing both from ℵ and B k.

Syr-sin stands alone in 44 places.

k stands alone in 56. In 15 of these Syr-sin presents a third alternative, ℵ in 2.

B and Syr-sin range against ℵ k in 7 places (besides the 4 closely connected readings referring to the cock-crowings in Mk.).

B and k oppose ℵ Syr-sin in 6 places.

ℵB oppose k Syr-sin combined in 31 cases, besides 4 cases in which k and Syr-sin offer divergent alternatives.

210 passages in all come before us. In five-sixths B is supported by ℵ, in three-fourths it has the support either of k or Syr-sin. And, what is even more remarkable, B (and in a less degree ℵ) is decidedly more nearly allied to both k and Syr-sin than k and Syr-sin are to one another.

81. What, then, shall we say of the significance of these facts?

First, surely, that they amply vindicate Hort's contention that the 'Neutral' text was by no means confined to Alexandria.

Next, that they demonstrate the absurdity of supposing that the text of ℵB was in any sense the result of a 'recension' by Origen.[*] At least five-sixths of their characteristic readings are demonstrably at least a century older than his time. Even if, as must no doubt have been the case, his judgment on a reading, as expressed in his commentaries, affected the opinions of some of the scholars and scribes—notably, e.g., Pamphilus—who came after him, his influence in the case of the readings where ℵB are opposed by k Syr-sin would as often have led away from as towards ℵB.

Thirdly, since both B and ℵ, as we have already seen, are more nearly allied to k than Syr-sin is, judging by the standard of k, B and ℵ are better than Syr-sin. Similarly, judging by the standard of Syr-sin, B and ℵ are both better than k. So it would seem that, on the evidence of the Versions themselves, the value either of ℵ or of B, and a fortiori the value of the two combined, is distinctly higher than that of either version separately.

82. It only remains to consider the problem which arises when the two versions combine against the two MSS. Their very divergences would seem to reinforce Mr. Burkitt's argument from geography, and to lend a peculiar weight to their evidence in the readings in which they are found to agree. As we have already seen, even if these readings are to be regarded as distinctively 'Western,' genealogical considerations offer no insuperable objection in the way of their acceptance (WH, Intr. § 237). It is true that Hort had had to examine a closely kindred group, k Syr-cu in Mt., and had not found reason to reject outright any of the readings of ℵB in their favour. Still he would have been the first to insist on a careful re-examination of the whole evidence in the light of any new discovery, not to speak of a discovery of such primary importance as Syr-sin. He would, however, have approached the question from a point of view different in many important respects from Mr. Burkitt's. It would clearly have been no surprise to him to learn that fuller knowledge brought into clearer light the fundamentally 'Western' character of Clement's biblical text (Intr. § 159). He would have needed no special exhortation to come out of 'the land of Egypt,' because he had said from the first that the 'Neutral' text in remote times was not confined to Alexandria (§ 178); and the fresh evidence that has come to light since he wrote, esp. the discovery of Syr-sin, has brought abundant fresh confirmation in support of his original contention. On the other hand, he would no doubt have been inclined to question very seriously the assumed independence of 'East' and 'West,' of 'Carthage' and 'Edessa,' on which so much of the force of Mr. Burkitt's appeal depends.[†] Mr. Turner may no doubt be quite justified in contending (Journal of Theol. Studies, vol. ii. p. 602) that 'the agreement—when they do agree—of the two great pillars of the "Western" text, the African Latin and the Sinai Syriac, can hardly be explained away as due to any identity of their immediate source. Both may have first seen the light, it is true, in some part of Northern Syria, and both may have been produced within the limits of the same generation; but that is the only extent to which a common origin can be ascribed to them, and it is not enough to qualify seriously the weight of their consentient testimony.' It is, however, more than enough, if any part of Northern Syria is really to be regarded as the birthplace of the Latin Version, to weaken considerably the force of Mr. Burkitt's argument. For the agreement of two parts, even allowing them to be different parts, of Northern Syria, is a very poor substitute for the agreement 'of East and West, of Carthage and Edessa.' We shall require at least some clear internal evidence to induce us to go to 'some part of Northern Syria' for a surer foundation than ℵB for the text of the Gospels. In fact the ultimate appeal must lie, as Dr. Hort's words (§ 373) indicate, and Dr. Westcott's words[*] (Intr.^{2} p. 328) state expressly, to the Internal Evidence of the Readings of the opposing groups. Judged by this standard, if the readings of List VIII. prove, as the present writer thinks they will, to be a fair sample of the whole, it is extremely unlikely that more than a very few of the readings of k Syr-sin will ultimately make good their claim to a place in the text. E.g. Mk 10^2 the omission of φαρισαῖοι may with considerable probability be regarded as genuine, but hardly any other in the whole list, least of all the insertion of εικῆ, Mt 5^{22}.

83. On the whole, then, there seems no reason to anticipate that the present revival of interest in the early history of the 'Western' text will in the end be found to upset the estimates formed by WH of the relative importance of the different groups of textual authorities, or to modify in more than a mere handful of passages the judgments which they formed on individual readings.

84. As this article is drawing to its conclusion the news comes in rapid succession of the deaths of the two last surviving protagonists in the textual controversies of the nineteenth century. Fundamentally as the present writer differs from the position taken up by Prebendary Miller in his published works on Textual Criticism, and strangely as he seems to him to have overlooked or failed to understand the plainest statements put forward on the other side, he must not close this article without a warm tribute of admiration for his unwearied industry, his enthusiasm for his subject, and his profound conviction of the sacredness of the cause which he felt called to defend.

The loss of Dr. Westcott will naturally be felt most keenly in spheres of Christian thought and activity that are of deeper, broader, and more universal interest than Textual Criticism. But it may be permitted to call attention here to the witness borne to the intrinsic importance of the study by the fact that it occupied so large a share of the time and attention of such a man. The fact that the writing of the Introduction fell to Dr. Hort has prevented scholars generally from realizing the nature and the extent of Dr. Westcott's share in that wonderful monument of the labour of 28 years. The minds and methods of the two fellow-workers were remarkably distinct, and well fitted to check and complement each other. And their work is in the strictest sense the resultant of their combined forces, and not, as in weaker hands work on the same principle might tend to become, a mere compromise appreciably feebler and weaker than either scholar would have produced independently.

[*] It is interesting to notice that Koetschau ('Bibelcitate bei Origenes,' Z. f. w. Theol. p. 321 ff.) has recently expressed his agreement with the opinion of Griesbach and Hort (Intr. § 249; cf. Nestle, Intr. p. 185 ff.) that Origen 'never made anything like a recension of the New Testament.'

[†] Intr. to Barnard's Clement, etc. p. xviii: 'Let us come out of the land of Egypt, which speaks (as Clement's quotations show) with such doubtful authority, and let us see whether the agreement of East and West, of Edessa and Carthage, will not give us a surer basis upon which to establish our text of the Gospels.'

[*] His words are: 'The discovery of the Sinaitic MS of the Old Syriac raises the question whether the combination of the oldest types of the Syriac and Latin texts can outweigh the combination of the primary Greek texts. A careful examination of the passages in which Syr-sin and k are arrayed against ℵB would point to this conclusion.' The best comment on the last sentence is supplied by the specimens of Dr. Westcott's habitual method of working, as shown in the introductions to his commentaries on the Gospel and Epistles of St. John, and on the Epistle to the Hebrews. It does not, as Nestle seems to think (Intr. p. 923), involve a surrender at discretion to the authority of Syr-sin and k. It simply calls for a systematic comparison of the distinctive readings of the rival groups before a final judgment is passed on their respective merits.

All the time the present writer was engaged on this article he was looking forward to the day when he could present it to Dr. Westcott as some acknowledgment, however unworthy, of a debt of gratitude that has been accumulating for 24 years, and gather from his kind but searching criticism what measure of success had attended this attempt to expound and illustrate the principles on which he and his great collaborator had worked. Now he can only inscribe it with reverence and affection to their memory. Christian scholarship will for all time be the richer for the example of their 'implicit confidence in all truth' and their 'guileless workmanship' (Intr. § 425).

VERSIONS (ENGLISH).—Owing to the length of the subject, it may be found convenient to divide it into the following sections: (i.) Anglo-Saxon; (ii.) Anglo-Norman; (iii.) Wyclifite; (iv.) Reformation period; (v.) Puritan; (vi.) Elizabethan; (vii.) Roman Catholic; (viii.) The 'Authorized' and its successors; (ix.) The 'Revised'; (x.) The 'American Revised.'

i. ANGLO-SAXON.—At the head of this period it is usual to place Cædmon († c. 680), although he did not, properly speaking, translate any part of the Bible. The work ascribed to him is an alliterative poem, in which he paraphrases the Scripture account of the chief events in Genesis, Exodus, and Daniel. A continuation of the poem, now imperfect, treats of portions of the life of Christ. His story is picturesquely told by Bede (HE IV. xxiv.),—how, from a servant, he became a monk in the mixed monastery under St. Hilda; and how, when bidden to exercise his newly found gift of song, he burst forth into a hymn of praise of the great Creator. Bede gives in Latin the substance of this hymn. On the margin of some MSS of Bede a short West-Saxon poem of nine lines is found, purporting to be the original. At the end of the Moore MS (Camb. Univ. Lib. Kk. v. 16) the verses are found in the Northumbrian dialect; and, as this would be Cædmon's own tongue, it has been considered to be the older form. But whether any of these is the original vernacular of Cædmon, or only a retranslation from Bede's Latin, cannot be pronounced with certainty. The hymn bears only a general resemblance to the beginning of the poems, and hence doubts have been thrown on the Cædmonian authorship of the latter.[*] The poems exist, so far as is known, in one manuscript only (Bodleian, Junius xi.). It was given by Archbishop Ussher to Francis Dujon, or Junius, librarian of the Earl of Arundel, and by him bequeathed to the Bodleian. It was printed at Amsterdam in 1655, and was edited with an English translation by Benjamin Thorpe in 1832, and again published by Grein in his Bibliothek in 1857. A short passage from Thorpe's literal rendering, on the subject of Nebuchadnezzar's chastisement, will give some notion of Cædmon's style—

> 'To thee shall not be meal-meat, > save the mountain's grass, > nor rest assigned:
> but thee the rain's shower > shall waken and chastise.'

Bede († 735) himself is known to have translated portions of Scripture into his native tongue. Purvey, indeed, in his General Prologue,[*] asserts that 'if worldli clerkis loken wel here croniclis and bokis, thei shulden fynde, that Bede translatide the bible.' No authority, so far as is known to the present writer, can now be found for this statement. But Bede expressly says, in a letter to Bishop Ecgbert (c. v.), that he had often translated the Creed and Lord's Prayer for uneducated priests.[†] And the touching passage is familiar to all, in which his biographer Cuthbert describes the end of his life approaching, before he had finished his version of St. John.[‡] It is a matter for regret, that not even this version should have escaped the ravages of time.

King Alfred († 900) added to his other titles to the name of Great an expressed conviction that his code of civil laws must be based upon the revealed law of God. Acting on this conviction, he prefaced his code of Saxon laws with a free translation of the enactments in Ex 20–23, and of the letter sent by the apostles in Jerusalem, contained in Ac 15. His reason for the addition, at first sight apparently singular, of this passage from the NT, was to show how the harshness of the Hebrew lex talionis was modified by the teaching of Christianity. In king Alfred's translation there are some noticeable peculiarities. In Ex 20^{11} 'for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth,' for 'Lord' (Dominus) he puts, not Dryhten, the usual word, but Crist:—'forðam on .VI. daʒum crist ʒewohrte heofonas ⁊ eorðan.' The explanation is that, in a contemporary Anglo-Saxon poem, Christ is made to describe how He created the earth; and Dominus, in the Vulgate of the NT, is of course frequently used of Christ. Another singular change is his transposition of a clause in the Fifth Commandment. He places 'which the Lord thy God giveth thee' directly after 'thy father and thy mother,' apparently wishing to take 'land' in the general sense of earth, and so removing the limitation. A third alteration is made at the end of Ac 15^{29}. In the Latin text followed by him there is an interpolated clause: 'et quod vobis non vultis fieri, non faciatis aliis.' This is duly rendered: '⁊ þæt ʒe willen þæt oðre men êow ne don, ne doð ʒe ðæt oþrum monnum'; 'and what ye would that other men should not do to you, that do ye not to other men.'[§]

Besides these, there are extant various MSS by unknown authors, containing Anglo-Saxon versions of the Psalms and of the Gospels. One such version of the Psalter, contained in a MS found in the National Library of Paris about the beginning of this century, has been thought to be, in part at least, the work of Aldhelm († 709), bishop of Sherborne. If so, it would be as early as the 7th century. There seems, however, no evidence that it is his work, or as early as his time. In this version the first fifty Psalms are rendered into prose, the remainder into verse. It was published by Benjamin Thorpe in 1835.[*] Two other versions were published—one edited by Spelman in 1640, and the other by Stevenson in 1843.[†]

[‡] See Appendix ii. to vol. i. of Plummer's edition. A difficulty is caused, as the editor points out, by the reading of the St. Gallen MS, which appears to make Bede's translation extend only to Jn 6^{19}. Such a limitation spoils the sequel of the story; unless we understand it to mean that the translator had got no further, when the premonitory symptoms of his illness came upon him.

Of the Gospels, in like manner, three Anglo-Saxon versions were published, from MSS—one by Archbishop Parker, in 1571; another by Marshall, rector of Lincoln College, in 1665; and the third by Thorpe, in 1842.[‡] It had been a complaint of scholars that no proper estimate could be formed, from these detached publications, of the relative value of the original MSS, or their relation to one another.[§] This cause of complaint has now been removed. In the edition of the Gospels just referred to, put forth by Skeat,[‖] not only is a larger number of MSS brought into requisition, but their comparative date and value are ascertained. Two well-known 'glosses' are also included in this collection—the Lindisfarne, or Durham Book, and the Rushworth. In these the Latin is interlined with a verbatim rendering in Anglo-Saxon. The date of the Latin text of the Lindisfarne is, roughly speaking, about A.D. 700; that of its 'gloss,' the work of a priest named Aldred, some two and a half centuries later. The gloss in the Rushworth MS (so called from its donor) is derived from the Lindisfarne. In a note at the end of St. John's Gospel the names of the two makers of the gloss (in this case little more than transcribers) are given: Færmen, or Farman, a priest of Harewood in Yorkshire, and Owun.[¶] It is obvious that, from the nature of its construction, a word for word gloss can scarcely be called a translation.

Before leaving the Anglo-Saxon period, a brief mention should be made of the metrical version, with many abridgments and omissions, of the Pentateuch, and the books of Joshua, Judges, Kings, Esther, Job, Judith, and Maccabees, the work of Ælfric, Abbot of Peterborough in 1004, and Archbishop of York in 1023. What remains of this version was published in 1698 by Edward Thwaites, at Oxford, under the title Heptateuchus, Liber Iob, et Evangelium Nicodemi, etc. It was reprinted by Thorpe in 1834, in his Analecta Anglo-Saxonica, and still more recently by Grein in his Bibliothek. This version, like all those previously mentioned, is from the Latin.[]

It is a characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon idiom, in the versions described, that it prefers rendering foreign words, even though clumsily, to retaining and assimilating them. Thus 'centurion' becomes 'hundred-man,' 'disciple' 'leorning-cniht,' 'parable 'bigspel,' 'sabbath' 'reste-dæg,' 'treasury' 'gold-hórd,' and so on.[*] It will be borne in mind, also, that the Latin text from which these versions have been made is not the Vulgate as we have it, but in some cases the earliest of Jerome's revisions, in others the Vetus Itala.[†]

ii. ANGLO-NORMAN.—During the three centuries that elapsed after the Conquest, the changes going on in the national life and character were not favourable, at any rate for a time, to the spread of vernacular translations. Apart from the sudden disruption in government, and the diversion of men's thoughts to war rather than religion or literature, the infusion of Norman-French, with its swifter current, into the slower English speech, like the influx of the Rhone into the Saône, would tend to check the formation of a common literary tongue. The native strength of the invaded language prevailed in the long run; but for a while, as all know, the Norman-French remained the language of the court, the school, the bar, while its rival held possession of the farmhouse and the cottage. A collateral result of this state of things was, that the educated classes were the more readily satisfied with Latin, as the language for religious use; while the need, or the possibility, of devotional books in one common native tongue was less and less thought of.[‡]

Yet even in this period, as Forshall and Madden have pointed out, the Anglo-Normans had translated into their own dialect, before the year 1200, the Psalter and Canticles of the Church in prose.[§] More remarkable still, they are said to have executed in this country a prose translation into their own tongue of the entire Bible.[‖] Metrical paraphrases of Scripture stories, such as are found in the Ormulum,[¶] would help to keep alive a knowledge of Holy Writ.

It will suffice, however, here to give a short account of two works, both belonging to the first half of the 14th cent.; of one of which it is said that it is 'the earliest version in English prose of any entire book of Scripture.' Both are prose versions of the Psalms. The author of the first is commonly believed to be the William of Shoreham (de Schorham), of whom we have a number of English poems remaining. William himself was probably a monk of the priory of Leeds in Kent. Shoreham, presumably his native place, is between four and five miles from Sevenoaks. When the rectory of Chart Sutton, in Kent, was impropriated by Walter Raynolds, Archbishop of Canterbury from 1313 to 1327, to Leeds priory, William of Shoreham became its first vicar.[] In this capacity, like an earlier George Herbert, he poured forth his soul in verse. So far as is known, his poems are contained in one solitary manuscript,* which also contains a prose version of the Psalter in English of this period. Whether the two productions are to be referred to the same author, has been made a matter of question. That the poems are the work of William of Shoreham, is not doubted. His name is found in the colophon to some of them. And it might be thought sufficient evidence of unity of authorship, under the circumstances, that the handwriting is the same throughout. But Konrath argues, on the other side, that the dialect in which the version of the Psalter is written is not Kentish, as 'Schorham's' would naturally be, but Midland.†

[] These particulars are taken from the Preface to The Religious Poems of William de Shoreham, edited for the Percy Society by Thomas Wright, 1849. Wright's text is criticised in many passages by Konrath in his Beiträge zur Erklärung und Textkritik des W. von Schorham, Berlin, 1878.

The subjoined extract, containing the opening verses of Ps 56 (in the Latin Bible 55), will enable the reader to judge of the style of the version :—

Miserere mei, deus, quoniam conculcauit me homo : tota die impugnans diabolus tribulauit me. Haue mercy on me, god, for man haþ defouled me. Þe fende trubled me, feȝtand alday oȝayns me. Conculcauerunt me inimici mei tota die, quoniam multi bellantes erant aduersum me. Myn enemys defouled m[e] alday, for many were feȝtand oȝains me. Ab ascendine diei timebo te : ego uero in te sperabo. Y shal drede þe fram þe heȝt of þe daye : Y for soþe shal hope in þe. In deo laudabo sermones meos in deo speraui : non timebo quid faciat michi humana caro. Hii shal hery my wordes, what manes flesshe doþ to me. Tota die mala uerba mea execrabantur : aduersum me omnes cogitaciones eorum in malum. Alday þe wicked acurseden myn wordes oȝains me : alle her þoutes ben in iuel. Inhabitabunt in inferno & abscondent se ibi. ipsi calcaneum meum obseruabunt. Hii shul wonen in helle, and þer hii shul hiden hem, and hii shul kepen mid fouleinges. Sicut sustinuerunt .i. temptauerunt animam meam, pro illo saluos faceres eos & in ira tua populos istos constringes .i. aduersabis. Whatever doubt there may be as to the authorship of the version of the Psalter known as Shoreham's, there is none regarding that assigned to Richard Rolle of Hampole († 1349). Richard was a native of Thornton, near Pickering, in Yorkshire, and was sent to Oxford by Thomas de Nevile, archdeacon of Durham. At the age of nineteen, obeying an inward impulse, he left the university, and became a hermit at Hampole, near Doncaster.§ His commentary is devotional and mystical, and, as such, is often quoted by Adam Clarke in his notes on the Bible. The following specimens will show his method, which is to set down, after each verse of the Latin in order, a literal rendering of it, and then to add his own comments :—

Ps 135^1 Confitemini Domino quoniam bonus : quoniam in eternum misericordia eius. ¶ Shrifis til lorde for he is gode : for withouten end the mercy of him. ¶ Grete louyng of this psalme is shewyd in paralypomenon,‖ where it is red. that when the sunnys of israel began to loue god and sey confitemini domino. the ioy of god fulfilde goddis hous. also nere is the presens of goddis grace, if hit be purly seyd. loue we god here that we may loue him with aungels : his louying is our fode. for no delite is like it.

Ps 136^1 Super flumina babilonis illic sedimus & fleuimus : dum recordaremur syon. ¶ Abouen the flodes of babilon thar we sat and gret : whils we vmthouȝt* of syon. ¶ fflodis of babilon are all thinges that are lufid here. and passis, that holy men beholdis and forsakes, sittand abouen thaim. & gretis thair oun pilgrymage & thair synne. that are rauysht in til the flodis. whils thei thynk of syon. that is, of heuen, where nothing rennys, bot all that ioy is to gedur. worldis men gretis. bot nouȝt bot for tynsil of thair godes or thair frendis. as thei ioy nouȝt bot in thair welth. ilk man shal grete. bot thinkand of syon.

iii. WYCLIFITE.—To understand aright the Biblical labours of Wyclif and those who worked with him, we must take a brief survey of the events amidst which he grew up, and try to discern their general drift.

The reign of Edward III. is often described as one of outward glory and prosperity. It was so in part, but it was much more (the latter part of it, at least) a period of upheaval and slow-working revolutionary movements. It was a period in which the sentiment of national independence became more strong and definite, both in civil and religious matters. In 1338 the German electors asserted their right to choose a king, whose title should not need confirmation by the pope.† The 'captivity' of the papacy itself, when from 1378 to 1409 an anti-Rome was fixed at Avignon, tended materially to strengthen this sentiment. The claims of a spiritual sovereignty, the visible seat of which was at a spot just outside the French frontier, became perceptibly weakened, as regards England at least, in a country which regarded France as its natural enemy. Evidence of the growth of this anti-papal feeling was shown in the passing of the Statute of Provisors in 1351, of the Ordinance of Præmunire in 1353, and of the formidable statute bearing that name in 1393. The great battles of the reign, and its great calamity of the Black Death, both, rightly interpreted, taught the same lesson. At Creçy and Poitiers it was the national militia of England that overthrew the feudal chivalry of France ; the yeoman's cloth-yard shaft that unhorsed the mail-clad noble. After the Black Death of 1348–49, which ceased only after it had swept away half the entire population, those of the working classes who were left, whether as labourers in the fields or handicraftsmen in the towns, were masters of the situation. No statutes of labourers could prevent them from demanding and obtaining higher wages. For the next thirty years the struggle went on between the forces of upheaval, on the one hand, and repression on the other, till it culminated in the Peasant Revolt, and in the scenes of riot at Bury and St. Albans.

This spirit of the age is seen reflected in the two poets who, with Wyclif, are the greatest names in its literature. William Langland, born about 1332, took for the hero of his discursive poem, no noble, but a peasant, Piers the Plowman, who 'rises, in the poet's conception, from being only a representative English labourer, to the type of Christ himself.'‡ And of the many characters who grew into life under the creative hand of Chaucer, the one drawn with the finest and most loving touch, the 'poure persoun of a toune,' was a ploughman's brother.

Of John Wyclif himself, at least for the earlier part of his life, but few facts are known with certainty. He was a Yorkshireman, and, according to Leland,§ came from the village of Wyclif-on-Tees. That he entered Oxford is certain ; and, as he was afterwards Master of Balliol College, a college founded not long before by a neighbouring family, the Balliols of Barnard Castle, it may be reasonably concluded that this was the place of his education. In 1360 he became, as has just been said, Master of Balliol; and in 1361 he was presented to the rectory of Fillingham in Lincolnshire, resigning his Mastership soon after. This living he exchanged, in 1368, for that of Ludgershall in Buckinghamshire, probably as being nearer Oxford. Whether he was the John Wyclif appointed by Archbishop Islip, in 1365, warden of his secularized foundation of Canterbury Hall, is doubtful.[*] In 1366 his pen was employed in the service of Parliament, which had rejected the claim of pope Urban V. for payment of arrears of the annual tribute first imposed on king John. On this occasion he terms himself 'peculiaris regis clericus.'[†] In 1371 he advocated the proposal that the revenues of the Church should be subject to the general taxation. In 1374, being by this time a Doctor of Divinity, he was nominated on a commission appointed to confer with the pope's representatives at Bruges about the exercise of papal Provisions.[‡] In his protracted stay on the Continent his mind may well have been stirred by what he saw, to speculate 'de optimo statu ecclesiæ,' as More's was, when on a similar mission on secular business, in the same region, to speculate 'de optimo statu reipublicæ.' The embassy was a fruitless one. Possibly as a reward for his services, Wyclif was presented, in 1374, to the Crown living of Lutterworth; where, having resigned Ludgershall, he remained till his death.

In 1377 came the first open attack made upon him by the authorities of the Church. He was cited to appear before Convocation, assembled at St. Paul's on Feb. 19th. But the prosecution was really a political one, aimed at John of Gaunt, through Wyclif, and the proceedings came to nothing. Papal bulls then arrived, requiring his prosecution on nineteen specified articles. For a time these were suspended owing to the death of Edward III. in June of the same year. But in the spring of 1378 he appeared at Lambeth to stand his trial. Once more, however, the prosecution was arrested, this time by the influence of the Princess of Wales, widow of the Black Prince.[§] In 1382 he had a stroke of paralysis, from which he partially recovered. But on Innocents' Day, 1384, he was again struck down, while engaged in Divine service, and died on the last day of that year.

Such are the bare outlines of Wyclif's life. It would seem that one of the subjects most in his thoughts, suggested in part, no doubt, by the events through which he lived, was that of lordship or dominion. By what title did the pope, the abbot, the secular governor, claim the power he exercised? Was that 'lordship' dependent, in any way, on his own personal character? Did it involve a reciprocity of service? The theories he formed appear to have been suggested by the de Pauperie Salvatoris of Richard Fitz Ralph, archbishop of Armagh, who died in 1360.[‖] But in the mind of Wyclif they did not remain mere speculative theories, but became actively aggressive principles. One of his propositions was: 'Quod ad verum dominium seculare requiritur iustitia dominantis, sic quod nullus in peccato mortali est dominus alicuius rei.'[*] From this great principle, which Wyclif intentionally made a prelude to his Summa in Theologia, the line of action he subsequently followed may in large measure be deduced. His life was a rebellion against what he believed to be unjust dominion—a rebellion analogous to the national one going on in more than one country of Europe at the time.

As a justification of this course of conduct, since ecclesiastical authority was adverse to him, he fell back upon the teaching of Holy Scripture. The Word of God, he believed, would support him in his position, though the religious orders might assail him, and archbishops condemn. Hence he began to lay stress on the importance of a study of the Bible, and the necessity that people should be able to read it in their own tongue. In his tract on the Pastoral Office, probably written not later than 1378,[†] he pleads for an English translation. After instancing the gift of tongues at Pentecost, and the fact of St. Jerome's making a translation of the Bible, he continues: 'Also the wurthy reume of fraunse, not-with-stondinge alle lettingis, hath translatid the bible and the gospels with othere trewe sentensis of doctours out of lateyn in-to freynsch, why shulden not engliysche men do so? as lordis of englond han the bible in freynsch, so it were not ayenus (against) resoun that they hadden the same sentense in engliysch; for thus goddis lawe wolde be betere knowun & more trowid for onehed of wit (believed for unity of meaning), & more acord be be-twixe reumes.'[‡]

At what precise date Wyclif began himself to supply this want, we have not the means of knowing. No doubt, his thoughts had long been turned to it. But the genuineness of what is commonly cited as his first work in this field, a Commentary on the Apocalypse, with translation, has been called in question. At any rate, by the year 1380 he was busily occupied with the task of translating the NT, while a fellow-worker, Nicholas of Hereford,[§] was engaged upon the OT. Hereford's work, of which the original MS is extant, breaks off abruptly in the middle of a verse, Bar 3^{20}. The cause of this sudden interruption has been conjectured to be a summons to appear before a synod of preaching friars, served upon Hereford in 1382, followed by an adjourned trial held at Canterbury, which ended in his being excommunicated on July 1st. Who continued and finished the OT[*] we do not know. It would no doubt be under Wyclif's superintendence; but it was in this year that he had his first seizure of illness, and it is difficult to believe that he could, single-handed, have finished his own NT work, and also what was wanting of Hereford's. It is usual, however, to assign to him the whole of the NT translation and the remainder of the OT.

[*] F. D. Matthew inclines to the view that he was. See the Introduction as before, p. iv, n. Sir E. M. Thompson, in the account of Wyclif prefixed to the Guide-book before referred to, thinks the evidence for it conclusive.

In another tract, on the Office of Curates, probably not by Wyclif himself, but by one of his school (ib. p. 141), the language used is very decisive. Speaking of the opposite party, the writer says: 'thei crien opynly that seculer men schullen not entirmeten (meddle) hem of the gospel to rede it in heir modir tonge, but heere her gostly fadris preche & do after hem in alle thingis; but this is expresly ayenst goddis techynge.'

[‡] Mr. Matthew suggests (p. 530) that the French translation referred to in this passage may be that described by M. Paris. See above, p. 237^{b} note ‖. Bender, in his Der Reformator Johann Wicklif, 1884, pp. 11–20, collects the passages, from Foxe and others, which seem to indicate the existence of vernacular Bibles in England before Wyclif's time. But if any such had been known to Wyclif, his argument in the text would have lost its force.

[§] Nicholas of Hereford was an Oxford man, and Fellow of Queen's, with which college Wyclif also is said to have been connected. He was implicated in the confession of John Ball in 1381. Throughout the Lent of 1382 he was preaching zealously at the University Church in support of Wyclif's doctrines; but on June 15th was suspended from all public functions. On July 1st, failing to appear at his trial, he was excommunicated. From this sentence he appealed to the pope, and set out for Rome. Hence probably the sudden termination of his manuscript work, before referred to. More than once he narrowly escaped being handed over to the secular power. At length, after being, according to Foxe, grievously tormented in Saltwood Castle, he recanted, probably in 1391. He afterwards himself sat in judgment on heretics, was treasurer of Hereford Cathedral in 1397, and died in the Carthusian monastery of St. Anne, Coventry, somewhere about 1420.—See R. L. Poole's article in the Dict. of Nat. Biography.

The want of uniformity perceptible in the work, added to the defects naturally attending a first attempt, rendered a complete revision necessary. This was at once taken in hand; but, before it could be finished, death removed the master mind. A faithful disciple of Wyclif, John Purvey,[†] carried on the work, and, somewhere about 1388, the whole task of revision was accomplished.

In a lengthy 'Prolog' to the OT thus revised, Purvey states the principles by which he had been guided. Out of a charitable desire, he says, 'to saue alle men in our rewme (realm), whiche God wole haue sauid, a symple creature hadde myche trauaile, with diuerse felawis and helperis,[‡] to gedere manie elde biblis, and othere doctouris, and comune glosis,[§] and to make oo Latyn bibel sumdel (somewhat) trewe.' He then describes the process of revision, as the workers compared the version made with 'the glose,' and other doctors, 'and speciali Lire[‖] on the elde testament, that helpide ful myche in this werke.' A third time their performance was tested, by a reference to grammarians and early writers, in order to settle the precise use and meaning of words and phrases. And yet once again there was a final scrutiny, by a committee, as we should say, when there were present 'manie gode felawis and kynnynge at the correcting of the translacioun.'[*]

That the work, after so much preliminary care, was well and thoroughly done, need not surprise us. Purvey's revision appears to have aimed chiefly at making the rendering more idiomatic, both in respect of the vocabulary and the construction of sentences. In particular, too close an imitation of the participial construction of the Latin had often led the earlier translators into difficulties. 'Wyclif's own part,' says a competent judge,[†] 'offends less in this respect than Hereford's; but the work of each needed anglicizing or englishing; and this was the improvement Purvey set himself to carry out.' A few examples will make this clearer. It should be premised that not only was the Vulgate the sole authority for the translation, but that, as Purvey himself says, the text of the Vulgate was then in a bad state. 'The comune Latin biblis,' he declares, 'han more nede to be correctid, as manie as I haue seen in my lif, than hath the English bible late translatid.' This was particularly the case with the Psalms, St. Jerome's version of which was not used in the services of the Church, 'but another translacioun of othere men, that hadden myche lasse kunnyng and holynesse than Jerom hadde.'

In Ex 7^{22} the malefici of the Vulgate is rendered 'the clepers of deuels to doon yuel' by Hereford; 'witchis' by Purvey.

Jos 10^{17} 'lurking in the spelunk of the cite' (H.); 'hid in the denne of the citee' (P.).

Jg 5^{23} Maledicite terræ, 'curse ye to the loond' (H.); 'curse ye the lond' (P.).

Ps 77 $(78)^{70}$ De post fetantes accepit eum, 'fro the after berende blet he toc hym' (H.); 'he took hym fro bihynde scheep with lambren' (P.).

Ps 113^{4} 'The maumetis of Jentilis syluer and gold' (H.); 'The symulacris of hethene men ben siluer and gold' (P.).

Lk 14^{15} 'Whan sum man of sittinge at the mete had herd' (H.); 'And whanne som of hem that saten togider at the mete had herd' (P.).

Ro 13^{11} 'And we witinge this tyme, for hour is now, vs for to ryse of slepe' (H.); 'And we knowen this tyme, that the our is now, that we rise fro sleep' (P.).[‡]

Besides the general 'Prolog' already spoken of, there are separate prologues, some of them very short, to most of the books of the OT and NT. These are usually translated from St. Jerome. The order of books in the main follows the Vulgate, but 'Deeds' (Acts) stands between Hebrews and James. The Epistle to the Laodiceans, inserted after Colossians in the first version, was left out by Purvey.[§] The later version has also a number of marginal glosses or notes in place of the short textual insertions common in the earlier. These glosses, it may be remarked, whether textual or marginal, are not of a controversial nature. They are simply explanatory. There does not appear to be any desire to use them for party purposes. Thus, on the passage relating the institution of the Lord's Supper, a subject on which Wyclif's views were elsewhere so strongly pronounced, there is no note at all. Neither is there on Mt 16^{17}, with the exception of a textual gloss, explaining Bariona as 'the sone of euluer' (a dove).

[*] It should be remembered that, according to the arrangement of the books of the OT in the Vulgate, the portion remaining after Baruch is not large—Ezekiel, Daniel (with its continuations), the Minor Prophets, and 1 and 2 Maccabees.

[†] The important part taken by Purvey in Wyclif's great work makes some particulars of his life desirable. He is said to have been a native of Lathbury in Buckinghamshire, born about 1354. Wyclif, it will be remembered, was at one time rector of Ludgershall in that county. During Wyclif's residence at Lutterworth, Purvey was closely associated with him, and, after his master's death, went, as one of the itinerant preachers, to Bristol, a city in sympathy with the new movement. Proceedings were taken against him by the Bishop of Worcester, and in 1390 he was imprisoned. In 1400–1 he was brought before Convocation, and recanted. In August 1401 he was presented to the vicarage of West Hythe in Kent; but, his mind being ill at ease, he resigned it in Oct. 1403. In 1421 we find him again imprisoned by Archbishop Chicheley. He was alive in 1427, after which nothing seems known of him.—See the article by J. W. Hales in the Dict. of Nat. Biography, vol. xlvii. p. 52.

[‡] Who these helpers were we can only conjecture. The three following were noted adherents of Wyclif at the time, and it is not improbable that one or more of them had a hand in the work:—John Aston, or Ashton, is said to have been of Merton College, Oxford. If Wyclif was seneschal of Merton, this might account for their friendship. In 1382 he was conspicuous as one of Wyclif's itinerant preachers. In that year, along with Lawrence Bedeman, Nicholas Hereford, and Philip Repyngdon, he was summoned to appear at Blackfriars, in London, before Archbishop Courtney. By a royal patent, July 13th, he was expelled from his university. On Nov. 27th he recanted, but we find him again denounced as a Lollard, and prohibited from preaching.

Lawrence Bedeman, otherwise Stevine, was an Oxford man, like his companions, being of Stapeldon Hall, afterwards Exeter College. It fared with him, in 1382, as with Aston. Brantingham, Bishop of Exeter, took proceedings against him for his conduct as an itinerant preacher in Cornwall. After making his submission, he became rector of Lifton, Devonshire, and was there as late as 1410.

Philip of Repyngdon was probably a native of Repton. He was educated at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, and before 1382 was an Augustinian canon of St. Mary de Pré, Leicester. Like Hereford, he was a vigorous upholder of Wyclif's tenets in sermons at Oxford. When exposed to the same trial, he appears to have succumbed at once, becoming afterwards a great favourite with Henry IV., with the style of 'clericus specialissimus domini regis Henrici,' and in 1404–5 being made Bishop of Lincoln. On Sept. 18th, 1408, he was created a cardinal by Gregory XII., and died in 1424.—See the articles by C. L. Kingsford and R. L. Poole in the Dict. of Nat. Biography.

[§] The glossa ordinaria, or 'comune glose,' was the work of Walafrid Strabo, about A.D. 840. The interlinear gloss was later.

[‖] Nicolaus de Lyra, so called from the place of his birth in Normandy, was a converted Jew. Hence the special value attached to his commentary on the Old Testament. He died at Paris in 1340.

[*] Forshall and Madden, vol. i. p. 57. The General Prologue fills 60 pages in this edition. It is strictly a prologue to the OT, hardly mentioning the NT, to which Purvey may have intended to prefix a similar prologue.

[†] J. W. Hales, in the article before quoted. By the publication in a convenient form of The Book of Job, Psalms, . . . etc., from Hereford's version as revised by Purvey (Oxford, 1881, 8vo), Skeat has made it easy for the ordinary reader to form an opinion of Hereford's style, though not as he originally wrote.

[‡] The list of such passages may be easily extended from Eadie or Mombert.

[§] As none of the volumes in Forshall and Madden's great edition has a table of contents, Skeat was at the trouble to compile one for a paper read by him at a meeting of the Philological Society, June 5th, 1896. He distinguishes the different MSS used by the editors in each part of their work. See the Transactions of the Philological Society, 1896, p. 212 ff.

This being the case, one is perplexed to know on what ground Sir Thomas More should inveigh so bitterly against Wyclif's translation :—'In which translacyoun he purposely corrupted the holy text, malycyously placyng therin suche wordys as myght in the reders erys serue to the profe of such heresyes as he went about to sow; which he not only set forth with his own translacyon of the byble, but also with certayne prologes and glosys which he made ther vpon.'[*] Such prologues and glosses as we have do not answer this description. 'The ecclesiastical authorities in England' at the time, writes an unexceptionable witness,[†] 'most certainly approved of various copies of the actual versions now known as Wyclifite.' Some of these extant copies are shown, by the autographs and inscriptions they bear, to have belonged to high personages in Church and State. What is the explanation? A very daring one has been started by Father Gasquet.[‡] He endeavours to prove that the versions of which we have been speaking, those we call the Wyclifite, are not Wyclifite at all; that we have been under a delusion all these years; that the heretical translation of the Bible due to Wyclif and his followers, if it ever existed, has completely disappeared; and that what we possess under that name is neither more nor less than an authorized Catholic translation of the Bible. The existence of such orthodox versions is attested by the evidence of Sir Thomas More, who declares that 'the whole byble was longe before his (Wyclif's) dayes by vertuous & well-lerned men translated into the englysh tonge, & by good and godly people with deuocyon & sobernes well & reuerently red.'[§] In another well-known passage he speaks of having seen 'Bibles fair and old.' It is to be observed that More speaks of such orthodox versions as were made long before Wyclif's days. The Bibles he has seen are old. That no authorized version was made at, or after, Wyclif's time, follows plainly, it would seem, from another passage a little later on in this same Dyaloge. 'And surely howe it hathe happed that in all this whyle god hath eyther not suffered or not prouyded that any good vertuous man hath had the mynde in faythfull wyse to translate it, and ther vpon eyther the clergy or at the lest wyse some one bysshop to approue it, this can I nothynge tell.'[‖]

If, then, the orthodox English versions seen by More were old ones; if, as he implies, no fresh ones were made by authority from Wyclif's day to his own, how is the fact to be explained that the Bible, now suddenly claimed as Catholic, while found, wholly or in part, in nearly 200 MSS, should be found nowhere but in MSS written in or soon after Wyclif's time? Why should the style, in every instance, fix the composition to the last quarter of the 14th century? What can have caused this sudden and prolific growth of orthodox Bibles just then, when no link is visible to connect them with an earlier stage?

Father Gasquet's paradox is a bold one, and, it need not be said, ingeniously and forcibly defended. But, if it is proved untenable, the resorting to it will be one more testimony to the candour and good faith of the Wyclifite translation.[¶]

iv. REFORMATION PERIOD.—The century that intervened between the death of Wyclif and the birth of Tindale has been rightly called a century of preparation. For a time the spread of Lollard opinions was checked. The passing of the Act de hæretico comburendo in the reign of Henry IV., and the condemnation of unauthorized versions of the Bible in the Synod at Oxford in 1408, threatened to be a deathblow to the hopes of Wyclif's followers. But the wave which had retreated for a while was soon to return with redoubled force. The fall of Constantinople in 1453 threw open to the Western world the treasures of Greek literature. The invention of printing, about the same period, furnished the means of spreading abroad the results of the new learning. In 1466 [] was born one destined to be perhaps the greatest exponent of that new learning, Desiderius Erasmus. Hitherto authority had triumphed against conviction: it was now to be seen whether it would triumph against conviction allied with knowledge.

Between the years 1480 and 1490, possibly in the same year that Luther was born at Eisleben, William Tindale first saw the light, it is believed, in the little village of Slymbridge, Gloucestershire.[*] Foxe says that 'from a child' he was brought up in the University of Oxford. If so, as he did not take his Bachelor's degree till 1512, nor his Master's till 1515,[†] it would seem that his first years there were spent, not in college but in school. And with this agrees the statement that he entered Magdalen Hall, then known as Grammar Hall, the school preparatory to the great foundation of William of Waynflete. As a boy there, he may have seen Colet, who was probably of Magdalen; but Colet left Oxford on being appointed Dean of St. Paul's in 1505, and it is not likely that Tindale could have come, in any direct manner, under his influence. 'Spying his time,' says Foxe, Tindale presently left Oxford for Cambridge. The exact year of this migration we do not know, nor the immediate cause of it. It is natural to connect it with the presence of Erasmus in the sister university, where he was Lady Margaret professor from 1511 to 1515. But here, again, the date of Tindale's M.A. degree is a difficulty.

After leaving the university, about 1521, as we may suppose, he became tutor in the family of Sir Thomas Walsh, a knight of good position and well connected, at the manor house of Little Sodbury, not far from the place of his birth. Here he remained till the latter part of 1523. The need of reform in matters ecclesiastical in Gloucestershire may be inferred from the fact that from 1512, when Sylvester de Giglis returned to Rome, to 1535, when Hugh Latimer was consecrated, there was no resident bishop of Worcester. The see was held by Italians; one of them being afterwards Clement VII. As men's thoughts were turned to such abuses, we can hardly wonder that a blunt, free-spoken man like Tindale occasionally got into heated arguments with the local clergy and others who frequented the manor house. These he silenced by a translation of the Enchiridion of Erasmus; but, beginning to preach in an irregular manner to the neighbouring villagers, he was summoned to appear before a clerical tribunal, presided over by Parker, chancellor of the diocese.

Though no proof of heretical teaching was established against him, Tindale began to turn his thoughts to another scene. The idea of an English Bible had been long present to his mind. In London the idea might become a fact. He would address himself to the Bishop of London, Tunstall, the friend of More, a man of repute as a statesman and a scholar. Armed with a translation of Isocrates to be his introduction to the bishop, and a letter from his patron to Sir Harry Guildford, he came to London. The reception he met with from Tunstall, though not surprising to us, and the disappointments he experienced in other quarters, convinced Tindale, as he sorrowfully owns, 'not only that there was no rowme in my lorde of londons palace to translate the new testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all englonde.'[‡]

During his short stay in London he met with one faithful friend. This was Humphrey Monmouth, afterwards an alderman and sheriff, and knighted, who chanced to hear him preach in the church of St. Dunstan in the West. Monmouth took him into his house as chaplain, at a stipend of £10 a year.[*] For this he afterwards got into trouble; and his petition to Cardinal Wolsey, between four and five years later, is valuable for the picture it gives us of Tindale's manner of life while in his house. After relating his first acquaintance with him, Monmouth continues: 'So I took him into my house half-a-year; and there he lived as a good priest as methought. He studied most part of the day and of the night at his book; and he would eat but sodden meat by his good will, and drink but small single beer.'[†]

[‡] Preface to the Pentateuch.

At the table of Monmouth, a merchant who had travelled, and visited Rome and Jerusalem, Tindale would be sure to meet with men who could tell him of the doings abroad, and especially of Wittenberg and Luther. Determined at length, as the safest course, to entrust his contemplated work to a foreign printer, he made choice of Hamburg, and in or about the month of May 1524 set sail for that busy city. As Hamburg is said to have possessed no printing-press at this time, it is a matter of dispute whether or not Tindale stayed there till his translation was ready for printing. He may have gone to visit Luther at Wittenberg, as is implied in statements of More and others. If so, he returned to Hamburg, to receive his remittance from Monmouth, and then went on to Cologne, to arrange for the printing of his English Testament at the press of Peter Quentel. Three thousand copies of the work, in small quarto size, were to be struck off. The printing had advanced as far as signature K, when the authorities of the city unexpectedly gave orders for the work to be stopped, and the printed sheets confiscated. An enemy, Cochlæus,[‡] had been dogging the footsteps of the English scholar, and from him came the information given to the senate. Tindale and his companion Roye[§] hastily caught up what they could of their materials, and took passage up the Rhine to Worms, where they would be in less fear of interruption. From the difficulty of matching Peter Quentel's type at the press of Peter Schoeffer (son of the partner of Faust), Tindale seems to have given up the thought of completing the 4to edition; and instead to have had his work printed in small 8vo, without notes or glosses. But, not to waste the copies of the sheets printed in 4to at Cologne, he sent them on to England. In this way, about March 1525–26, there appeared the first English New Testament ever printed, the one in 8vo, complete, and the portion of the one in 4to. Of this latter, the first printed in point of time, only one solitary fragment is known to remain; and of the former, only two copies, neither of them complete.[||]

Before pausing to consider these translations in detail, we must briefly conclude the story of the author's life.

The summer of 1526 was probably spent by Tindale at Worms, in making arrangements for the transmission of his books to England.[*] Obstacles in the way of their reception soon began to appear. Besides the warning given by Cochlæus, Edward Lee, the king's almoner, afterwards Archbishop of York, wrote from Bordeaux on Dec. 2nd, 1525, to report what he had heard of the suspected work in his journey through France. One active agent in the distribution of the books was Simon Fish, author of The Supplicacyon for the Beggars, then living near the White Friars. Standish, bishop of St. Asaph,[†] was the first to bring the matter under the cognizance of Wolsey. The great cardinal was disposed to make light of it, but Tunstall was urgent for the condemnation of the anonymous version, and it was ordered that the books should be burnt, wherever found. To make the condemnation more impressive, a public burning was appointed, to follow a sermon by the Bishop of London at Paul's Cross.[‡] A mandate to the like effect was issued by Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, on Nov. 3rd; and by the end of the year the part taken by Tindale and Roye came to be publicly known, and an active search was made for them. West, a priest of the community to which Roye belonged, was sent abroad to track them, and letters from him and Hermann Rinck, during 1528, give an account of their efforts. Tindale and Roye, however, had separated, and their machinations were thus baffled. In 1527, or thereabouts, Tindale went to Marburg in Hesse, the seat of a university, and there, towards the end of 1528, was joined by Frith. At Marburg (anglicized in his colophons as 'Marlborow') he printed several of his controversial works, and, what more concerns us, the first instalment of his long-meditated version of the OT. The Pentateuch was here printed by Hans Luft, and published Jan. 17th, 1530.[§] Several copies of this exist, but only one (now in the Grenville Library) in a perfect condition. It is remarkable for the 'piebald' appearance of the printing; Genesis and Numbers being in Gothic letter; Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, in Roman. The explanation probably is that the books were prepared for separate issue, the five having no collective title-page. The following year Tindale printed, at [‡] John Dobenek, who latinized himself as Cochlæus, was born about 1503 in a village near Nürnberg. He was a violent opponent of Luther. As he was himself passing a book through Quentel's press at the time, he had peculiar opportunities for learning the business of the two Englishmen. See the letters from him in Arber's First Printed English New Testament, 1871, pp. 18–24.

[§] William Roye, who had been an Observant Friar at Greenwich, was acting as Tindale's amanuensis. As would be guessed from his poem, he was an uncongenial spirit, and Tindale was glad to get rid of him as soon as he could.

[||] The fragment in 4to is now in the Grenville Library of the British Museum, No. 12,179. It consists of 31 leaves, and goes to the end of sheet H, ending abruptly with the words 'Friend, how camest thou in hither, and' (Mt 22^{12}). It has been photo-lithographed, with an Introduction, by Mr. Arber. Of the 8vo edition there is an imperfect copy in the Library of St. Paul's Cathedral, and a perfect one (all but the title-page) in the Library of the Baptist College, Bristol. The singular vicissitudes through which this last book has passed are told by Demaus, p. 126.

[*] It is a mystery whence the money was obtained for defraying the first cost of these editions. 3000 copies of the 8vo edition are said to have been struck off at Worms. Whether the 4to edition was completed there, is disputed. No trace of such a complete edition is left, beyond the fragment printed at Cologne. Still, even the existence of this was not known till 1834.

[†] For this person, see Erasmus' Letter to Justus Jonas (Eng. tr. 1883, p. 42).

[‡] As need hardly be said, this buying up and burning the copies of Tindale's first edition proved the readiest means of providing money for a second. But it is not fair to call Tindale, as Dore does, a 'participator in the crime' because he let the books be sold, knowing to what purpose they would be put. The motives of the two parties were different. The bishops wished to destroy this translation; Tindale wished to replace it by a better. See Dore, Old Bibles, 1888, p. 26.

[§] Genesis alone has the colophon: 'Emprented at Marlborow in the lande of Hesse, by me Hans Luft, the yere of oure Lorde M.CCCCC.XXX. the xvij dayes of Januarij.' From the peculiarity of 'Marlborow' as an equivalent for Marburg, and from an impression that Hans Luft never had a printing-press there, Mombert endeavoured to prove that the Pentateuch was really printed at Wittenberg, and that 'Marlborow' was a pseudonym. 'It is painful,' says one writer, accepting this as proved, 'to think that an intentional misstatement should be on the imprint of the first part of the English bible ever issued' (Dore, Old Bibles, 1888, p. 67). The pain may fortunately be relieved, and the fair fame of Tindale cleared, by observing the evidence furnished by an able reviewer of Mombert in the Athenæum, Apr. 18th, 1885, to show that Hans Luft really had an itinerant press at Marburg at this time, and that in fact one publication of this very year, the Compendious olde Treatise used by Foxe, bears the colophon: 'Emprented at Marlborow in the lāde of Hessen by me Hans Luft.'

Antwerp most probably, his translation of the Book of Jonah.* Antwerp was a dangerous retreat, but it was conveniently situated for communicating with England. Here accordingly he resided from 1533, if not earlier, to his arrest in 1535. The last two years of his life were years of great literary activity. In 1534 appeared at Antwerp his revision of the Pentateuch, Genesis being the only book in which any changes were made;† and in November of that year his revised NT.‡ This is commonly called the second edition, and it is strange that nine years should have elapsed before Tindale himself published one.§ But if there had been any delay, there was none now. Two editions appeared in 1535. These must be carefully discriminated. The first is entitled: The newe Testament dylygently corrected and compared with the Greke by Willyam Tindale, and fynesshed in the yere of oure Lorde God A.M.D. and XXXV.‖ No place or printer's name is given, but it is considered to be from the press of Hans van Ruremonde at Antwerp. It is in 8vo. A striking peculiarity of this edition is the curious misspelling of English words, such as 'faether' for father, 'stoede' for stood, and the like. This gave rise to the fancy that Tindale had adapted his version to the pronunciation of the Gloucestershire farmers. But the more rational explanation is that Dutch or Flemish compositors were employed upon this edition; and that in fact it was not superintended by Tindale at all, but a private enterprise of Dutch printers, who had observed the censure passed on Joye's unauthorized production of the previous August, and wished to anticipate the final revision which Tindale was understood to be preparing.¶

This last revision, in which 'yet once again' Willyam Tindale addressed the reader, has two titles, the first bearing date 1535, the second 1534; denoting, we may suppose, the times of publication and printing. It is in 8vo size, with black letter type, and has a calendar prefixed. While bearing no printer's name, or place, it has a printer's mark with the initials G. H. These were conjectured by Stevens to denote Guillaume Hychyns, a form of the translator's name; but the late Henry Bradshaw has shown convincingly that they are the initials of the Antwerp publisher, Godfried van der Hagen, who latinized himself as Dumæus. The printer he employed was frequently Martin Emperour, who was probably the printer of this last revision.††

We must hasten to the close. On the 23rd or 24th of May 1535 Tindale was entrapped and carried off from Antwerp to the fortress of Vilvorde, where he was strangled and burnt on Oct. 6th, 1536. Even in his imprisonment he was not idle. In the touching letter‡‡ to the governor of the fortress, the Marquis of Bergen-op-Zoom, in which he petitions for warmer clothing, he asks also for a Hebrew Bible, grammar, and dictionary. And it is said that he finished in prison a translation of the books Joshua to 2 Chronicles inclusive.* His last words at the stake were: 'Lord, open the king of England's eyes!'

The influence exercised by Tindale's version on subsequent ones will be best considered later on. But it seems proper to notice here a question that has been raised as to his competence for the work of translating. Was he able to form an independent judgment on his Greek and Hebrew originals, or did he take his Pentateuch from Luther, and his New Testament from Luther and Erasmus?† It may be admitted at once that Tindale availed himself freely of the labours of both those scholars. His object being what it was, he would probably have thought it mere perverseness not to do so. But he did not borrow as one who could not pay back. Even in the prologues, he sometimes not only differs from, but argues against, the German translator, as in the case of the prologue to James. Tindale's great aptitude for languages is shown by various testimonies. That of Herman von dem Busche‡ would be thought high-flown if we did not know that it came from one not likely to be imposed upon. As regards Hebrew, in particular, one of the seven languages that von dem Busche declared Tindale to be at home in, it is not likely that he would have found it difficult to obtain instruction in it at Cologne, or Worms, or other cities where he stayed.

The question is one that, after all, can be settled only by an induction of passages on a sufficiently large scale. For that there is no room here. We give a few, taken almost at haphazard from the NT; some of which will show Tindale's obvious indebtedness to previous versions. But the general impression conveyed by them will be, we think, that he used these helps as a master, and not as a servant.§

Lk 2^{49} An nesciebatis, quod in his quæ patris mei sunt, oportet me esse?
Wissent ir nit, das ich seyn muss in dem das meins vatters ist?
Wist ye not that I must goo aboute my fathers busines? (Compare, as showing Tindale's freedom, the Rhemish of 1582, closely following the Latin, 'I must be about those things which are my father's').

Ac 9^{15} Vade, quoniam organum electum est mihi iste.
Gang hyn, deñ diser ist mir ein ausserwelet rüstzeüg.
Goo thy wayes: for he is a chosen vessell vnto me ('vessell' representing the Greek σκεῦος more closely than the Latin or German).

Ac $27^{30.31}$ Nautis uero quærentibus fugere e naui . . . sub prætextu uelut e prora ancoras extensuri, dixit Paulus centurioni . . .
Da aber die schiffleutt die flucht suchten . . . vnd gaben fur, sy wolten ancker auss dem hinder schiff auss strecken, sprach Paulus zu dem vnderhauptman . . .
As the shipmen were about to fle out of the ship . . . vnder a coloure as though they wolde have cast ancres out of the forshippe: Paul sayd vnto the vnder captayne . . . (Compare 'hinder schiff' with 'forshippe.' The term 'vnder captayne,' for centurion, seems clearly due to the German).

Ro 2^{18} . . . institutus ex lege; vnd weyl du auss dem gesetz vnderricht bist; in that thou arte informed by the lawe (κατηχούμενος ἐκ τοῦ νόμου. Note 'by' instead of 'out of').

1 Co 9^{19} . . . quo plures lucrifaciam; auff das ich ir vil (=ihrer viel) gewinne; that I myght wynne the moo (more). (The comparative is rightly kept, with the Greek and Latin, against the German).

* Copies of this had so completely disappeared, that some began to doubt its ever having existed. But in 1861 Lord Arthur Hervey discovered a copy, bound up in an old volume with other pieces, in his library at Ickworth.

‡ The newe Testament, dylygently corrected . . . by Willyam Tindale. It was printed in Gothic letter by Martin Emperour, in 8vo. This is the edition used in Bagster's Hexapla. In Fry's Bibliographical Description it is No. 3. The copy in the British Museum is marked C. 23. a. 5.

§ This is not taking count of surreptitious editions, such as Dore gives instances of (op. cit. p. 27), nor of Joye's unauthorized edition in August 1534. For this last, see Westcott, General View, 1872, pp. 46–49.

* The English version of these nine books in 'Matthew's' Bible is not Coverdale's, and reasons are given to show that it was by Tindale. See Moulton, p. 127.

† The reviewer in the Athenæum before referred to (May 2nd, 1885) holds very strongly that he did both. Admitting that Tindale possessed a fair knowledge of Greek, he yet insists that the wholesale borrowing of Luther's prologues and marginal notes, in the first Cologne fragment, justifies the charge that the work was adapted from Luther. If this was done with a Greek original, and with Erasmus' Latin rendering as an assistance, what would be done with a Hebrew original? Where could Tindale, travelling about from place to place, and busy with the publication of his treatises, find opportunities of acquiring a sound knowledge of so difficult a language? The reader will find in Eadie, i. pp. 143, 209, a collection of passages from various writers, conveying this imputation more or less directly.

‡ For this writer, sometimes latinized as Dumæus, see the 'Index Biographicus' to Böcking's edition of the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum, to which he was one of the contributors. His biographer, Hermann Hamelmann, speaks of him as the friend of Colet, More, and Fisher. Erasmus was one of his correspondents.

§ The editions used for this comparison are the third of Erasmus' Novum Testamentum, Basle, 1522; Luther's Das neue Testament, 'zu Basel, durch Adam Petri,' 1522 (the first edition of all came out, we believe, in September 1522, at Wittenberg); and Tindale's New Testament of 1534, as reprinted in Bagster's Hexapla.

2 Co 4^{7} Habemus autem thesaurum hunc in testaceis uasculis; in irdischen gefessen; in erthen vessels. (Probably Tindale took 'erthen,' that is, of earthenware, from the German. Wyclif's 'britil' preserves one side of the Latin testaceis, ὀστρακίνοις, as referring to Gideon's pitchers).

Ph 1^{20} secundum expectationem; wie ich endlich wartte; as I hertely loke for. (Tindale seems to catch the force of ἀποκαραδοκίαν, the 'earnest expectation' of one looking out eagerly for news).

Ph 1^{27} . . . adiuuantes decertantem fidem euangelij; vnnd sampt (sammt) vns kempfft (kämpfet) über dem glauben des Euangeli; labouringe as we do, to mayntayne the fayth of the gospell.

Ph 2^{7} . . . semetipsum inaniuit; hat sich selbs geeüssert; made him silfe of no reputacion (literally 'emptied himself.' Note the freedom of the rendering).

Ph 4^{3} . . . compar germana; mein artiger geferte (mein trewer geselle, 1534); faythfull yockfelowe. (Wyclif has: 'Also I preie & the german felowe').

Ph 4^{5} . . . modestia uestra; euwere lindigkeit; youre softenes. (Here probably the term used is suggested by the German).

Ph 4^{10} . . . quod iam tandem reuiguit uestra pro me sollicitudo; das ir der mals eyns wider ergrunet seyt von mir zu halten (das ir widder waeker worden seid, fur mich zu sorgen, 1534); that now at the last ye are revived agayne to care for me.

Ja 1^{23} . . . faciem natiuitatis suæ; sein leiplich angesicht; his bodyly face.

Ja 3^{5} Ecce, exiguus ignis quantam materiam incendit; Sihe, ein klein feür, welch einen walt zündet es an; Beholde how gret a thinge a lyttell fyre kyndleth.

When we turn to the Old Testament there is, so far as the present writer can pretend to judge, less evidence of originality in Tindale's translation; but instances are not wanting to show that he did not follow blindly either Luther or the Vulgate. Sometimes he differs from both. In many cases he sides with one as against the other; sometimes mistakenly, but quite as often, we think, taking the right side. A few examples will suffice:*—

Gn 3^{14} inter omnia animantia; vor allem viech; of all catell. (Tindale's of is nearer to the original 'out of,' 'from among'—see RVm—than the others).

Gn 4^{21} pater canentium cithara et organo; die mit harpffen vnd pfeyffen vmbgiengen; all that excercyse them selves on the harpe and on the organs. (Here it would have been better to render 'pipe' instead of 'organ,' with the German).

Gn 21^{23} et posteris meis stirpique meæ; meine kinder . . . meyne näffen; my childern nor my childern's childern. (Tindale, alone of the three, appears to aim at keeping the alliterative cast of the Hebrew).

Gn 30^{11} Dixit: Feliciter, et ideirco vocavit nomen ejus Gad; da sprach Lea, Rustig, vñ hiess in (ihn) Gad; Then sayde Lea: good lucke; and called his name Gad. (Compare the rendering in AV).

Gn 35^{19} hæc est Bethlehem; die nũ heist BethLehem; which now is called Bethlehem. (The words are now held to be a gloss. Tindale plainly followed Luther).

Gn 37^{3} fecitque ei tunicam polymitam; vnd machet im einen bundten rock; and he made him a coote of many coloures.

(The rendering 'of many colours' is retained even in the RV, though in the margin 'a long garment with sleeves' is given. The LXX supports the former, having ποικίλον; and probably the same meaning was meant to be conveyed by 'polymitam' (πολύμιτον), 'of many threads,' in the sense of damasked).

Ex 3^{14} Ego sum qui sum; Ich werde seyn der ich seyn werde; I wilbe what I wilbe. (See RVm).

Ex 12^{6} ad vesperam; zwischen abents; aboute euene. (The German is the most literal).

Ex $15^{14.\,15}$ (Tindale has the past tense, along with the Vulgate and Luther; the AV has the future).

Ex 16^{15} Dixerunt ad invicem, Manhu? quod significat, Quid est hoc? Das ist Man, denn sie wysten nicht . . . They said one to another: What is this? for they wist not . . .

Ex 39^{1} Fecit vestes, quibus indueretur Aaron; amptkleider zu dienen in Heyligthum; the vestimentes of ministracion to do seruyce in. ('Vestments of ministration' is as literal as the AV 'cloths of service,' and more dignified).

Lv 19^{20} . . . vapulabunt ambo; das sol gestrafft werden; there shalbe a payne vpon it (RV 'they shall be punished'; lit. 'there shall be an inquisition.' Tindale gives the sense, though not pointedly. AV 'she shall be scourged' conveys a wrong impression).

Tindale's last words were a prayer that the Lord would open the king of England's eyes. It is remarkable that the English version of the Bible made by the next translator we have to treat of, bore, in one of its forms, that king's imprimatur.

Miles Coverdale was born in 1488, probably in Richmondshire, in the North Riding of Yorkshire. He studied at Cambridge, where he entered the convent of Augustinian Friars. In 1514 he took priest's orders. Though senior to George Stafford and Bilney, he probably fell under the same influences as they. When Barnes, who became prior of the Augustinians in 1523, was arrested and conveyed to London, Coverdale attended him, and helped him to prepare his defence. About this time he laid aside his conventual habit. In 1529 he is said by Foxe to have assisted Tindale in his work at Hamburg. In 1551 he was consecrated bishop of Exeter, but deprived in 1553, on the accession of Mary, and imprisoned. His deliverance is said to have been due to the intercession of the king of Denmark, whose chaplain, Dr. John Macbee, was his wife's brother-in-law. After living abroad in Denmark and Geneva, he returned to England in 1558, and died in Feb. 1569, at the age of 81.*

What first turned Coverdale's thoughts to the translation of the Bible is uncertain. It seems to have been, at least in part, the encouragement to undertake the task given by Thomas Cromwell, with the knowledge, if not the express approval, of Sir Thomas More.† The earliest document of Coverdale's we possess is a letter addressed by him to Cromwell, undated, but probably written in 1527, in which he reminds him of the 'godly communication' that Cromwell had held with him in the house of Master More.‡ As he goes on to speak of now beginning to 'taste of holy scriptures,' of being 'set to the most sweet smell of holy letters,' and of needing books for his work, the natural inference is that he was then engaged in the task of Bible translation. At any rate there appeared, as the result of his labours, two issues in 1535, followed by later ones, of the first complete translation of the Bible into English. The titles present an interesting, but perplexing, variety—

'Biblia | The Bible, that | is, the holy Scripture of the | Olde and New Testament, faith|fully and truly translated out | of Douche and Latyn | in to Englishe. | M.D.XXXV.' (followed by texts).

'Biblia | The Byble: that | is, the holy Scrypture of the | Olde and New Testament, | faythfully translated in | to Englyshe. | M.D.XXXV.' (texts). The title of an edition of 1536 varies from this last only in the spelling of one word. That of an edition of 1537 is: 'Biblia | The Byble, that | is the holy Scrypture of the | Olde and New Testament, fayth|fully translated in Englysh, and | newly ouerseene & corrected. | M.D.XXXVII.' (texts). 'Imprynted in Sowthwarke for James Nycolson.' The word 'Biblia' in all is in Roman capitals, the rest in black letter, occupying the central compartment of a page within a border of figures.§

On comparing these titles, two important differences will be noticed. Before 1537 no place of publication is given; and in the first alone is it specified that the translation is made 'out of Douche and Latyn.' With regard to the place, while there can be no doubt that the editions of 1535 and 1536 were printed abroad, opinions differ as to the claims of Antwerp and Zürich. In favour of the former is a statement of Symeon Ruytinck, in his Life of Emanuel van Meteren, 1618, that Jacob van Meteren of Antwerp, the printer, employed 'un certain docte escolier, nommé Miles Coverdal,' on the work of an English translation of the Bible.[*]

§ See Plates i.–iv. of Fry's The Bible by Coverdale, 1867. No perfect copy of Coverdale's Bible is known. In the British Museum (C. 18. c. 9) is a fine copy, with titles in facsimile by J. Harris. The size of leaf is 11¾ in. × 7½. The dedication, 'Unto the most victorious,' etc., begins near the top of leaf ♣ 2, and ends on the obverse of leaf ♣ iiij. In line 13 it speaks of 'your dearest iust wyfe and most vertuous Pryncesse, Quene Anne.' On the reverse of ♣ iiij. begins the 'Prologe,' 'Myles Couerdale vnto the Christen reader,' ending on obv. of ♣ 7. On the reverse of this last begins a list of 'The Bokes of the hole Byble,' ending on obv. of leaf viii., and on rev. of this begins 'The first Boke of Moses, called Genesis.'

On the other hand, certain peculiarities of type point to Zürich; and Westcott, supported by Ginsburg, is convinced that Froschover of Zürich was the printer. As to the description of the sources from which the version was made, it is most natural to suppose that the words 'out of Douche and Latyn' were omitted after the first issue, as likely to offend some English supporters of the undertaking. The mention of 'Douche' (German), in particular, might suggest a Lutheran bias. But the description was an accurate one, and in his Dedication and Prologue Coverdale openly acknowledges it. He had 'purely and faithfully translated,' he says, 'out of five sundry interpreters.' And again: 'To help me herin, I have had sondrye translacions not only in latyn, but also of the Douche interpreters, whom (because of theyr synguler gyftes and speciall diligence in the Bible) I have been . . . glad to folowe.' What the 'five sundry interpreters' were is a question of much interest. Coverdale's indebtedness to the Vulgate, the Latin version of Sanctes Pagninus (first published at Lyons in 1528), Luther, the Zürich Bible (the work of Zwingli, Leo Judæ, Pellicanus, and others, 1524–29), and Tindale, are unmistakable.[†] But, as he specifies only 'Douche and Latyn' on his title-page, he may not have meant to include Tindale as one of the five; and if so, the fifth source may have to be sought for in some other Latin or German interpreter. In any case, the perfect candour of Coverdale's declaration in his Prologue is apparent. He had not sought the work; but when it was put upon him he had executed it with the best helps he could obtain. One or two short specimens will show the style of his translation—

Gn 49[22-25] The frutefull sonne Joseph, that florishinge sonne to loke vpon, the doughters go vpon the wall. And though the shoters angered him, stroue with him, and hated him, yet his bowe bode fast, and the armes of his handes were made stronge by the handes of y^e^ Mightie in Jacob. Of him are come herdmen & stones in Israel. Of y^e^ fathers God art thou helped, of the Almightie art thou blessed, with blessynges of heauen from aboue, with blessynges of the depe that lyeth vnder, with blessynges of brestes and wombes.

2 K (i.e. 2 S) 5[6-8] And the kynge wente with his men to Jerusalem, agaynst the Jebusites, which dwelt in the londe. Neuertheles they sayde vnto Dauid: Thou shalt not come hither but the blynde and lame shal dryue y^e^ awaie. (They thoughte planely, that Dauid shulde not come in). Howbeit Dauid wanne the castell of Sion, which is the cite of Dauid. Then sayde Dauid the same daye: Who so euer smyteth the Jebusites, and optayneth the perquellies, the lame & the blynde, which (Jebusites) Dauids soule hateth. Herof commeth the prouerbe: Let no blynde ner lame come in to the house.

Jer 38[7-11] Now when Abdemelech the Morian beynge a chamberlayne in the Kynges Courte, vnderstode, that they had cast Jeremy into the dongeon: he went out of the Kynges house, and spake to the kynge (which then sat under the porte off Ben Jamin) these wordes: My lorde the kynge, where as these men medle with Jeremy the prophet, they do him wronge: Namely, in that they haue put him in preson, there to dye of honger, for there is no more bred in the cite. Then the kynge commaunded Abdemelech the Morian. . . . So Abdemelech toke the men with him, & went to y^e^ house of Amalech, & there vnder an almery he gat olde ragges & worne cloutes, and let them downe by a corde, in to the dongeon to Jeremy.

The tender beauty of Coverdale's translation has never been surpassed. In the Psalms especially this characteristic is noticeable. In 1662, at the last revision of the Book of Common Prayer, while the Gospels, Epistles, and other portions of Scripture made use of, were directed to be taken from the newer version, the Psalter was left unchanged, the older version being regarded as more rhythmical for singing. Hence it is that, if the majesty or the pathos of the Psalms has sunk deep into myriads of English hearts, to Coverdale above others their debt of gratitude is due.

Coverdale's Bible had not been more than two years in circulation when there appeared what purported to be a new version, printed in 1537. To this version, commonly known as Matthew's Bible, some mystery attaches. The title runs:[*] '¶ The Byble | which is all the holy Scrip-|ture: in whych are contayned the | Olde and Newe Testament truly | and purely translated into En|glysh by Thomas | Matthew. | Esaye i. | ☞ Hearcken to ye heauens and | thou earth geaue eare: for the | Lorde speaketh. | M·D·XXXVII.' Across the page at the bottom is, 'Set forth with the Kinges most gracyous lycẽce.' This may accordingly be termed the first Authorized Version. On the reverse of the title is a notice of various additions made, including 'many playne exposycyons,' in the margin, 'of svch places as vnto the symple and vnlearned seame harde to vnderstande.' A calendar and similar matter fills the next two leaves. The fourth leaf begins with 'An exhortacyon to the studye of the holye scrypture gathered out of the Byble,' and has at the bottom I. R. in large floriated capitals. The rev. of this leaf and obv. of next have, 'The summe & content of all the Holy Scrypture . . . ,' and on the rev. of the fifth leaf is the dedication 'To the moost noble and gracyous Prynce Kyng Henry the eyght, kyng of England and of Fraunce . . . Defender of the faythe: and vnder God the chefe and supreme head of the church of Engeland . . .' This ends on rev. of sixth leaf with, 'So be it. Youre graces faythfull & true subject Thomas Matthew,' followed by H. R. in capitals. The seventh leaf, signed * *, has an address 'To the Chrysten Readers,' followed by an alphabetical 'Table of the pryncypall matters,' ending on rev. of eighth leaf. This 'Table' shows a strong controversial bias—e.g. 'Abhomynacyon. Abhomynacyon before God are Idoles & Images, before whom the people do bowe thẽ selues, Deut. vii. d.' 'Confessyon. Judas, which confessed hym selfe to the prestes of y^e^ lawe, and not to God, is damned, Mat. xxvii. a.' 'Cursynge. God doth curse the blessynges of the preastes, and blesseth their curssyng, Mal. ii. a.' The ninth leaf has 'The names of all the Bokes of the Byble,' with a full-page woodcut of the Garden of Eden. With the tenth leaf a regular system of numbering the leaves begins. The first of the four sections into which the Bible is here divided closes on fol. cxlvij with 'The Ende of the Ballet of Ballettes of Salomon, called in Latyne Canticum Canticorum.' Following this is a leaf, unsigned, forming the title of the second section, or prophetical books. This title has on the obv. a centre-piece, surrounded by a woodcut border in sixteen compartments; and on the rev. a centre-piece (the seraph touching Isaiah's lips), with four large floriated capital letters at the four corners—R. G. along the top, and E. W. along the bottom. With Isaiah the numbering by folios begins afresh, and ends with Malachi on rev. of leaf xciv. Underneath are two capital letters, W. T. The Apocrypha follows, with similar title (but only fifteen compartments in border), and extends to lxxvi leaves. The New Testament in like manner is numbered to cxi leaves; and a leaf not numbered completes the work, with the colophon: '¶ To the honour and prayse of God | was this Byble prynted and fy|nesshed in the yere of oure |

Lorde God a. | M·D·XXXVII.' There is nothing to show where the book was printed, though the woodcut on the title, and that of Adam and Eve before mentioned, have been traced to the blocks used for a Dutch Bible printed at Lübeck in 1533. The most probable place is Antwerp; 'the larger types being apparently identical with those of Martin Emperour in the edition of Tyndale's N.T., 1534.'* While passing through the press, the sheets appear to have been bought by the London printers, Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch, whose names are not obscurely indicated by the capital letters R. G. and E. W. Grafton, in a letter to Archbishop Cranmer (Strype's Cranmer, App. 20), speaks of having invested £500—a large sum for those days—in the production of the work, and mentions that the impression would consist of 1500 copies. To prevent infringement of his rights as publisher, Grafton prays the archbishop to use his influence with Cromwell to the end that the king's licence might be obtained for the publication. Cranmer, who was probably already interested in the project, exerted himself so effectually that the king's licence was soon granted for the new translation 'to be bought and read within this realm.'† To this English version, then, as has been said, the term 'Authorized' may first be properly applied.‡

Three other points require elucidation: the meaning of the capital letters I. R. subscribed to the 'Exhortacyon,' of W. T. at the end of the Old Testament, and of the name Thomas Matthew on the title-page. The initials may be taken, with all but absolute certainty, to denote John Rogers and William Tindale. Rogers, a native of Deritend, near Birmingham, where he was born about 1500, after graduating from Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, the college of Whitgift, Bradford, and Ridley, had gone out, at the end of 1534, to be chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp. There, according to Foxe (Acts and Mon. vi. 591), he came under the influence of Tindale and Coverdale to such an extent as to join them 'in that painful and most profitable labour of translating the Bible into the English tongue, which is entitled "The Translation of Thomas Matthew."' As Rogers moved on to Wittenberg soon after 1536, it is doubtful whether he could have had much personal intercourse at Antwerp with Coverdale; but it is highly probable that Tindale, who suffered October 6th, 1536, may have given his manuscript versions and the like into the hands of Rogers at his first arrest. John Rogers, it may be added, was the first to suffer in the Marian persecution, being burnt at Smithfield, February 1555.

Why, assuming that the Bible before us was edited by John Rogers, it should have been put forth under the name of Thomas Matthew, is not easy to explain. Some have supposed it to be a disguise for William Tindale, whose name, if openly given as the author of the greater part of the version, would have roused opposition in high quarters. Others, that it was the real name of a sharer in the work. Both suppositions seem negatived by the fact that, in the register recording the arrest of John Rogers later on, he is described as John Rogers alias Matthew. The same motive that made him veil the name of Tindale under initials, might lead him to suppress his own.

An examination of the contents of the book shows that the Pentateuch and NT are certainly Tindale's, with slight variations, the latter having been taken, as Westcott has shown (pp. 183, 184), from the revised ed. of 1535. With equal certainty the books from Ezra to Malachi inclusive, and the Apocrypha (excepting the Prayer of Manasses), may be assigned to Coverdale. The books from Joshua to 2 Chronicles inclusive present a difficulty. It might have been expected that they would be taken from Coverdale's version, that being the only English version as yet extant in print. As a matter of fact, however, they are evidently not so taken. And it has been shown, by a comparison of renderings of identical words found in Tindale's Pentateuch and 'Epistles,' as well as in these historical books, that the version must almost certainly be Tindale's. It has already been mentioned as probable that Tindale, at or before his arrest, would consign his unfinished translations, and the like, to the care of John Rogers.

As to the Prayer of Manasses, which was omitted by Coverdale, the translation may very well be set down to Rogers himself. It owes much to Olivetan's rendering in the French Bible of 1535. Rogers executed his task of general supervision as editor well and carefully.* But the controversial character of his annotations, and his inclusion, almost unaltered, of Tindale's Prologue to Romans, were probably among the causes which led to the production of the 'Great' Bible.

Taverner's Bible.—In the same year as the Great Bible, 1539, appeared a new edition, which, from its close relation to Matthew's, it will be convenient to examine first. Its title runs:† 'The most | sacred Bible, | whiche is the holy scripture, con|teyning the old and new testament, | translated in to English and newly | recognised with great diligence | after most faythful exemplars by Rychard Taverner. | Harken thou heuen . . . Esaie i. | Prynted at London in Fletestrete at | the sygne of the sonne by John Byd|dell for Thomas Barthlet. | Cum privilegio . . . M·D·XXXIX.'

The title is followed by 15 leaves, not numbered, of which the first has on the recto an Address to Henry VIII., on the verso 'an Exhortacion'; the next 'the Contentes of the Scripture,' and the remainder 'The names of the Bokes,' etc., followed by 'A Table of the principall maters conteyned in the Byble.' From Gn 1 the numeration of leaves begins, ending with 'Salomons Ballet' at ccxxx. The prophets are numbered afresh, to the end of Malachi, at lxxxxi. The Apocrypha and NT have each a separate title-page, and number lxxv and ci leaves respectively; three unnumbered leaves of 'Table' completing the work.

In the Address to Henry VIII. the king is described as 'in erth supreme heed immediately vnder Chryst of the churche of England'; and among all his services to religion it is declared that none is greater than his sanction of the English Bible. Being essentially a 'new recognition' of Matthew's Bible, we do not look for much originality in Taverner's work. But he gives himself a much freer hand than some suppose. The more violent controversial remarks in his predecessor's notes are softened down, or omitted. Thus, in the 'Table of the principall maters,' Matthew began his section on Altars with the words, 'An aulter was neuer commaunded to be made, but only to God,' and ended with, 'So we have no aulter but Christ.' Taverner begins, 'An aulter was commaunded to be made to God,' and leaves out the concluding sentence. Under 'Purgatorye' Matthew wrote, 'He then that wyl pourge hys synnes through fyer or by any other meanes then by the passyon of Christ, denyeth hys sayd passyon . . . and shal be greuously punyshed, because he hath despysed so greate a grace.' Taverner omits the section altogether. The last chapter of Acts ends on leaf liiii; Romans begins on lxi. The inference naturally is that an intermediate sheet of six leaves had been meant to contain Tindale's Prologue to Romans, but had been cancelled.

A few examples will indicate the nature of the changes made in rendering. It will be seen that they are chiefly due to (a) the seeking after a plainer, more idiomatic rendering, (b) the influence of the Vulgate, (c) a better knowledge of Greek.

His acquaintance with the Greek article does not, however, save him from such oversights as a pinnacle (Mt 4^{5}), a candlestick (5^{15}), a prophet (Jn 7^{40}), can faith saue him? (Ja 2^{14}). In Jn 7^{40} 'vndoubtedly' is not an improvement on the earlier 'of a truth.' Dore (Old Bibles, p. 148) asserts that the translation of 3 Esdras, at least in part, is original. But, so far as the present writer has examined it, it agrees with the one in Matthew.

Richard Taverner was a client and pensioner of Cromwell, who in 1536 appointed him clerk of the Privy Seal. The fall of his patron in 1540 put a stop to his literary work, and made his position unsafe. For a time he was committed to the Tower. He succeeded, however, in regaining the royal favour, and under Edward VI., in 1552, received a general licence to preach, though a layman. He died in 1575.[*]

The Great Bible.—Before the execution of Cromwell, on July 28th, 1540, that statesman had just time to see brought to a successful issue one great scheme on which he had set his heart. This was the production of an amended version of the Bible in English. Circumstances seemed to favour Cromwell's project. Coverdale, on whom he chiefly relied for an improved translation, was in Paris, where, in 1538, he had brought out an edition of the New Testament in Latin and English, printed by Regnault. Paper and printing were both better at that time in Paris than in London. Francis I., so long as his relations with Henry kept good, was willing, upon certain conditions, to sanction the work of Coverdale and Grafton and the French printer Regnault.[†] No private opinions were to be introduced. The work was to be 'citra ullas privatas aut illigittimas opiniones.' Bonner, shortly to be made Bishop of Hereford, was transferred from the court of the emperor to that of Francis, and charged 'to aid and assist the doers thereof in all their reasonable suits.' So far, at least, he seems to have regarded the translating of the Bible without disfavour. For a time, therefore, matters went smoothly. But in December 1538 the French king inclining more and more to the side of the emperor, the Inquisition was allowed to interpose, and the printers and others engaged in the enterprise had to flee for their lives. According to Grafton's own statement (Abridgement of the Chronicles, etc., 1564, sub anno 29 Hen. VIII.), eighty finished copies were 'seased and made confiscat.' If this was so, no copy of the eighty, which would have Paris as the place of publication, appears to have escaped destruction. Foxe is the authority for a story that 'four great dry vats full' of the printed sheets were rescued from a haberdasher, who had purchased them 'to lay caps in.' But Kingdon (p. 63) discredits the statement, on the ground that the materials seized, for the restitution of which Cromwell and Bonner were making constant efforts, would be in the custody of the university. However this may be, Cromwell succeeded in getting most of the plant transferred to London, and there, from the press of Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch, newly housed in the vacated precinct of the Gray Friars, appeared, in April 1539, the first edition of the Great Bible.

The name 'Great Bible,' as being 'of the greatest volume' (both terms being used by Grafton himself), is a convenient one by which to denote the seven editions of this work issued during the years 1539–41. Of these the second and subsequent ones had a preface by Cranmer, and the name 'Cranmer's Bible' may be properly applied to them. But it is not correct to use it, as is often done, of the first edition as well, in the preparation of which the archbishop had no direct share. The dates of the seven are as follows:—(i.) April 1539; (ii.) April 1540; (iii.) July 1540; (iv.) ready in November 1540, but kept back till the following year, on account of the fall of Cromwell in July 1540; (v.) May 1541; (vi.) November 1541; (vii.) December 1541. Though no two issues are identical, the family likeness is so strong that it will suffice to describe the first, and to indicate briefly the features by which later ones may be identified. The title of (i.) is:[*] 'The Bible in | Englyshe, that is to saye, the con | tent of all the holy scrypture, bothe | of y^{e} olde and newe testament, truly | translated after the veryte of the | Hebrue and Greke textes, by y^{e} dy | lygent studye of dyuerse excellent | learned men, expert in the forsayde | tonges. ¶ Prynted by Richard Grafton & | Edward Whitchurch. | Cum priuilegio ad imprimen | dum solum | 1539.' This title, in black and red letters, is surrounded by a singularly spirited woodcut, bearing no artist's name or mark, but commonly believed to be by Holbein. In the centre at the top, a king, his crown laid aside, is prostrate on the ground before a figure of the Saviour appearing in the clouds. Lower down the central line, the same king, seated on his throne, and now easily recognizable as Henry VIII., is giving a clasped volume lettered verbum Dei to a group of ecclesiastics on his right, headed by Cranmer, and to a corresponding group of lay nobles and others on his left, headed by Cromwell. Beneath, on the dexter side, a preacher, not unlike Colet (who, however, had been dead twenty years), is addressing a mixed multitude on the words of 1 Ti 2^{1}. Labels, with suitable inscriptions in Latin, issue from the mouths of the chief characters. Some little boys, too young to have learned Latin, cry 'God save the king' in English.[†] Five more leaves of preliminary matter follow, containing (1) 'The Kalender,' ending with 'an Almanach for xix years'; (2) 'An exhortacyon to the studye' . . . ; (3) 'The summe and content of all the holy scripture' . . . ; (4) 'A prologue' . . . ; (5) 'A descripcyon and successe of the kynges of Juda' . . . ; (6) 'With what iudgement the bokes of the Olde Testament are to be red.' Genesis begins on the seventh leaf, marked 'fo. 1.' It is worth while to give some extracts from the Prologue, 'expressynge what is meant by certayn signes and tokens that we have set in the Byble. First, where as often tymes ye shall fynde a small letter in the texte, it sygnifyeth that so moche as is in the small lettre doth abounde and is more in the common translacyon in Latin, then is founde ether in the Hebrue or in the Greke. . . . Moreouer, where as ye fynde this figure ○✤ it betokeneth a dyuersyte and difference of readynge betwene the Hebrues and the Chaldees in the same place. . . . We haue also (as ye maye se) added many handes both in the mergent of thys volume and also in the text, vpon the which w^{e} purposed to haue made in the ende of the Byble (in a table by themselues) certen godly annotacions: but for so moch as yet there hath not bene soffycient tyme minystred to the Kynges moost honorable councell for the ouersyght and correccyon of the sayde annotacyons, we wyll therfore omyt them, tyll their more conuenient leysour. . . . God saue the Kynge.' The colophon is: 'The ende of the new Testamẽt : | and of the whole Byble, ffynisshed in Apryll, | Anno M.CCCCC.XXXIX.* | A Dño factũ est istud.'

[*] The copy used is that marked C. 18. d. 1 in the Library of the British Museum. It is a singularly fine copy, the leaves measuring 15 × 10 inches. A sumptuous copy on vellum, meant for Cromwell himself, is in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge. In this the title is somewhat abridged.

[†] A full description of the woodcut is given in Moulton, pp. 138, 139, and in Mombert, pp. 204, 205.

Peculiarities by which the various issues of the 'Great Bible' may be distinguished one from another have been minutely tabulated by Fry (Description of the Great Bible, fol. 1865). The first three editions alone have the ☞ as a reference for Coverdale's intended 'annotacyons,' the 'conuenient leysour' for which never came. The same three editions also are the only ones which present Cromwell's coat of arms, in Holbein's woodcut, unerased. After his attainder and execution, July 28th, 1540, the circle containing his arms is left blank. Cranmer's Prologue, as was said, is prefixed to the second and following editions. In it he distinguishes two classes of people: some being too slow, and needing the spur; others too quick, and needing the bridle. 'In the former sorte be all they that refuse to read the scripture in the vulgar tongue. . . . In the latter sorte be they which by their inordinate reading, vndiscrete speaking, contentious disputing, or otherwyse by their licentious living, slaunder and hynder the worde of God. . . .' The Introduction to the Apocryphal Books, for which, however, Cranmer is not in the first instance responsible, has a curiously confused account of the term 'Hagiographa,' by which for some reason they are described:—'because they were wont to be reade, not openly and in comen, but as it were in secret and aparte.' The mistake was repeated in the editions of April and July 1540, and of May and December 1541. In the fourth of the seven, the first which shows Cromwell's arms erased, the title presents, by way of compensation, the names of Cuthbert [Tunstall], Bishop of Durham, and Nicholas [Heath], Bishop of Rochester, as those by whom the work was 'ouersene.' In the title to this edition, also, the king is styled 'supreme heade of this his churche and Realme of Englande.'

Who were the 'dyuerse excellent learned men,' expert in Hebrew and Greek, who helped Coverdale, we are not informed. But traces of their work may perhaps be seen in the translation of musical terms in the Psalms, and in the retention of the Hebrew titles of some of the books of the OT. Thus the first book is described as 'called in the hebrue Bereschith, and in the latyn Genesis.'

If we take it for granted that Coverdale was the working editor of the Great Bible, we shall be prepared to find that he reproduces in it very much of his own earlier version of 1535, as well as of what had been incorporated with Tindale's work in 'Matthew's' Bible of 1537. But in the OT there is evidence that this reproduction was carefully revised by the help of an edition of the Hebrew text, published at Basle in 1534–35, with a new Latin rendering by Sebastian Münster. 'Thus,' Westcott goes so far as to say (Hist. p. 187), 'Coverdale found an obvious method to follow. He revised the text of Matthew, which was laid down as the basis, by the help of Münster. The result was the Great Bible.' This is too unqualified a statement. For instance, in the opening chapters of Genesis, a book the version of which in Matthew's Bible was by Tindale, we find not a few examples of Coverdale's own rendering in 1535 being preferred, or of a fresh rendering being made. A very few specimens must suffice—

'Then of the euening and the morning was made one day' (C.); 'And the euening . . . one day' (G. B.); 'And so of the . . . was made the fyrst daye' (T.); 'Et fuit uespera . . . dies unus' (Münster); 'Factumque est . . . dies unus' (Vulg.).

'And God set them in the fyrmament' (C. and G. B.); 'put them' (T.).

'And all the hoost of them' (C. and G. B.); 'apparell' (T.). The Vulg. here has ornatus, Münster exercitus.

'The Lorde God shope man, euen of the moulde of the erth' (C. and T.); . . . 'of the dust from of the grounde' (G. B.).

'In Eden towarde y^{e} east' (C.); 'from the begynnynge' (T.); 'eastward from Eden' (G. B.). The Vulgate, followed by T., has a principio; Münster ab oriente.

The version of Isaiah in Matthew is by Coverdale. But that this was diligently revised for the Great Bible, a few examples from the first two chapters will show—

'An oxe knoweth his LORDE' (M.); 'The oxe hath knowne his owner' (G. B.).

'Like a watchouse in tyme of warre' (M.); 'lyke a beseged cytie' (G. B.).

'Ye tyrauntes of Sodoma' (M.); 'ye Lordes of Sodoma' (G. B.).

'Cease from doinge of evell & violence' (M.); '& violence' omitted (G. B.).

'Leade' (M.); 'tynne' (G. B.).

'Al heithen shal prease vnto him (M.); 'all nacyons (G. B.).

'So that they shal breake . . . to make . . . & sawes therof' (M.); 'They shall breake theyr swerdes also in to mattockes . . . to make sythes' (G. B.).

In the NT the relation of the version found in the Great Bible of 1539 to those of Tindale (1534) and Coverdale (1535) may be conveniently traced by the parallel passages from St. Matthew, 52 in number, set down by Westcott (pp. 174–176), for the purpose of comparing the two latter. If the Great Bible be compared with these it will be found to agree with Tindale in 5 places, with Coverdale in 33, and to differ from both (though on the whole nearer to Coverdale) in the remaining 14.

As regards the relation of the text found in the Great Bible of April 1539 to that of the succeeding editions, Westcott has shown, by a full induction of passages, that while in the OT there is little change in the versions of the Pentateuch and the earlier historical books, a careful revision of the Hagiographa and the prophetical books is apparent in the issue of April 1540. The authority most relied on for the changes thus made is Münster. A curious circumstance pointed out by Westcott is the fact that, instead of the alterations being progressive, the text of Nov. 1540 shows a tendency to recur to that of April 1539; so that practically two groups or recensions may be recognized:—(1) April 1539, Nov. 1540, May 1541, Nov. 1541; (2) April 1540, July 1540. In the NT Erasmus occupies the position which Münster has done in the OT. A single example will show the deference paid to Erasmus—

Ja 1^{13} 'Deus enim intentator malorum est: ipse autem neminem temptat' (Vulg.).
'For Gode cannot temte vnto euyll, because he tempteth no man' (G. B., Apr. 1539).
'Nam Deus ut malis tentari non potest, ita nec ipse quemquam tentat' (Eras.).
'For as God cannot be tempted with euyll, so neither he himself tempteth any man' (G. B., May, Nov. 1540).

In the Preface to the Book of Common Prayer it is noted that 'the Psalter followeth . . . the translation of the great English Bible, set forth and used in the time of King Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth.' This arrangement, which was unavoidable in 1549, was left unaltered in 1662, the rhythm of Coverdale's version, and its greater fitness for singing, having in the meantime endeared it to the people. The present text of the Pr. Bk. Psalter does not, however, represent the text of any edition of the Great Bible exactly, and it contains some misprints (e.g. 'sight' for 'light' in Ps 38^{10}). See Preface to Driver's Par. Psalter, and esp. the elaborate collation in M'Garvey's Liturgiæ Americanæ (1895), pp. 1*–51*.

Though Bishops Tunstall and Heath had allowed their names to stand on the title-pages of several editions of the Great Bible, and Bonner, after the royal proclamation of 1540, had duly caused six copies of the Bible to be set up for public reading in St. Paul's, it is plain that the Episcopal bench generally were only half-hearted as yet in the work of translating the Scriptures into English. A motion was brought forward in Convocation, in 1542, for undertaking a fresh version, but was shelved by Gardiner, who stipulated for the transliteration, not translation, of many words of the original, such as ecclesia, pœnitentia, pascha, zizania, didrachma; including even some of which the meaning was obvious, as simplex, dignus, oriens. To have constructed a version on these principles would have been to anticipate the worst faults of the Rheims and Douai translations.

* Kingdon (Grafton, p. 63), following in this Strype's Cranmer, i. p. 120, endeavours to show that the impression of 2000 copies, seized in Paris, was intended to appear in April 1539, and dated accordingly; but that, when the embargo was removed, and the copies got over to London, they were not actually published there till 1540.

v. PURITAN.—Meantime, however, while the bishops at home were hesitating, the work of a new version, or rather of a vigilant revision of existing ones, was being actively carried on abroad. The result was the Genevan Bible.*

When, on the accession of Mary Tudor, in 1553, the leaders of the Reforming party sought safety on the Continent, Frankfort became for a time a centre for the refugees. But when dissensions on the subject of the English Liturgy broke out between the moderate section, headed by Cox, afterwards dean of Durham, and the more violent spirits, who followed John Knox, the latter withdrew to Geneva. Among them was William Whittingham, a native of Chester, who in 1545 had been made Fellow of All Souls', Oxford, and Senior Student of Christ Church in 1547.† In 1557 he published anonymously at Geneva a new version in English of the NT in small 8vo, bearing date 'This x of June.' This was a prelude to a greater work, an English version of the whole Bible, on which some of the exiles were engaged. The news of queen Mary's death, in 1558, drew most of these back to England; but Whittingham remained at his post, to finish the work, and with him, as Anthony a Wood tells us, there remained 'one or two more.' These 'one or two' were probably Anthony Gilby, of Christ's Coll., Cambridge, who afterwards became rector of Ashby-de-la-Zouche; 'a fast and furious stickler against Church discipline,' as he is called by Fuller, but a good scholar; and Thomas Sampson. Sampson had entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, but apparently had not taken any degree. After refusing the bishopric of Norwich in 1560, he was made dean of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1561. Beza gives him the character of being of 'an exceedingly restless disposition.'

By the labours of these men, and of others whose names have not come down to us, there was issued from the press of 'Rovland' Hall, at Geneva, in 1560, an English Bible, commonly called, from its place of publication, the Genevan, which was destined to attain lasting popularity. Its title was: 'The Bible | and | Holy Scriptvres | conteyned in | the Olde and Newe | Testaments. | Translated accor|ding to the Ebrue and Greke, and conferred With | the best translations in diuers langages. | With moste profitable annota|tions vpon all the hard places, and other things of great | importance as may appeare in the Epistle to the Reader.' Below is a woodcut of the Israelites crossing the Red Sea, bordered by texts in small italic character. On the reverse of the title is a list of the books of the Bible, including the Apocrypha (ending with 2 Mac.). Leaves ii and iii are occupied by a Dedication to 'the moste vertvous and noble Qvene Elizabeth,' from her 'humble subjects of the English Churche at Geneva.' Leaf iiii is filled on both sides with an Address 'to ovr Beloved in the Lord, the Brethren of England, Scotland, Ireland, &c.,' dated 'from Geneua, 10 April, 1560.' The regular foliation begins on the fifth leaf, and ends with the close of the Apocrypha on f. 474. The NT begins with fresh foliation, and ends on f. 122, being followed by 12 unnumbered leaves, containing proper names, with interpretation, and chronological tables. A map, folded into two leaves, is placed next after the title of the NT.

If we inquire into the causes which made the Genevan Bible so long a favourite one (Hoare estimates that 160 editions of it appeared between 1560 and the outbreak of the Civil War in England), they are not far to seek. The mere shape and size of the volume as it first appeared, a handy 4to,* was a recommendation as compared with the ponderous folios of the Great, or the Bishops', Bible. It was printed throughout in Roman and italic, not Gothic, letter. It adopted the division into verses, first introduced by Stephen in 1551, and followed by Whittingham in his NT of 1557. It retained the marginal notes, Calvinist in tone, but generally free from offensive asperity, of the NT of 1557, with the addition of similar notes for the OT,—the Apocrypha being but slenderly furnished with them. It indicated by marks of accent the pronunciation of proper names. It had woodcuts,† and convenient maps and tables.

The version of the OT is substantially Tindale's; that of the NT Whittingham's; but both are vigilantly revised. A comparison of the Genevan version of a passage from Ac 27^{13}–28^{4} with that of Whittingham,‡ and with that of the Bishops' Bible in 1568, will suffice to show this—

Ac 27^{13}	W.	lowsed nearer (ἄραντες ἆσσον).
	G.	losed nearer.

* A series of useful articles on this subject, by N. Pocock, will be found in vols. ii. and iii. of the Bibliographer, 1882–83. See also an essay on 'The English Bible from Henry VIII. to James I.,' by H. W. Hoare, in The Nineteenth Century for April 1899.

† He is said to have been Calvin's brother-in-law; but this is disputed by A. F. Pollard in his art. on W. Whittingham in the Dict. of Nat. Biography.

* The size of page in the copy before the present writer (Brit. Mus. C. 17. h. 8) is 9¾ by 6⅝ inches.

† Some of these are said to be from the French Bible of A. Davodeau, published at Geneva earlier in the same year.

‡ Whittingham's translation is included in Bagster's English Hexapla, from which we quote it.

A few peculiarities of spelling may be noticed. The desire to economize space, as shown in the frequent contractions, even of short words like 'mā' (man), 'rā' (ran), has led to the reduction of double consonants and diphthongs—in many instances, to single letters. Thus we find 'delt,' 'hel,' 'wildernes,' 'confunded,' 'thoght,' and many more of a like kind.

A 4to edition of the Genevan Bible, printed at Geneva in 1570, by John Crispin, professes to be the second edition; but Pocock has shown that this title really belongs to one issued at Geneva in folio without any printer's name, the OT being dated 1562 and the NT 1561. The first edition published in England was one in small folio, with Roman type, issued in 1576 by Richard Barkar (sic). An edition of the metrical version of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins was prepared for binding up along with this. Later on, in 1578, we find the Book of Common Prayer, somewhat garbled, printed in the same volume with the Genevan Bible.

No other change need be noticed, except the partial displacement of the Genevan NT by a fresh version, made in 1576, by Laurence Tomson, a private secretary of Sir Francis Walsingham. Tomson closely followed Beza, putting 'that' for the ille by which Beza had rendered the Greek article. Thus, in Jn 1^{1}, we have 'that Word' for 'the Word.' Tomson's notes were more pronouncedly Calvinistic than before. His NT was often bound up with the Genevan OT, and, as a separate book, is said to have been preferred to the other.

vi. ELIZABETHAN.—The Bishops' Bible.—It was not to be expected that the Elizabethan bishops should acquiesce in the popularity of the Genevan version. Its Calvinism, if we may judge from Whitgift's example later on, might have been tolerated by them, but not its hostility to their office. Accordingly, a move was made by Archbishop Parker for a new translation, or rather for a fresh revision of that contained in the Great Bible. The steps taken can be followed, with fair certainty, in the Parker Correspondence. There is extant a letter, dated Nov. 26, addressed by the archbishop to Sir William Cecil. This is referred, in the Calendar of State Papers, to the year 1566. But if, as Pocock suggests, it should be placed a year earlier, it would present to us one of the first acts in the proceedings. For in this letter the archbishop not only acquaints Cecil with his plans, but asks the busy statesman (out of compliment, we may well suppose) to undertake some portion of the translation. The general principle on which the work was to be carried out, was for certain books to be assigned to individual bishops, or other biblical scholars, who should work on the text of the Great Bible as their basis, and transmit their portions, when finished, to the primate, for his final revision.

The defects of such a scheme were obvious. There was no meeting together for the discussion of various renderings. No provision was made to secure uniformity of style. The final revision to be expected from one with so much business on hand as Archbishop Parker, one not specially distinguished as a scholar, and one who had, moreover, reserved certain books as his own particular share, was not likely to be thorough, even if deputed in part to other learned men. Accordingly, we are not surprised to find traces of haste, if not of negligence, in the work. Thus the revision of Kings and Chronicles was despatched by Bishop Sandys in about seven weeks. As an incentive to diligence, the initials of each contributor were to be printed at the end of the books undertaken by him. Comparing these with a list sent by Parker to Cecil, Oct. 5th, 1568,[*] we can identify nearly all the workers with fair certainty.

According to this list, the archbishop himself undertook, besides Prefaces and other introductory matter, Genesis, Exodus, Matthew, Mark, and 2 Cor.–Hebrews inclusive. Andrew Pierson, prebendary of Canterbury (a conjectural expansion, supported by the initials A. P. C., of the single word 'Cantuariæ'), had Leviticus, Numbers, Job, and Proverbs. The Bishop of Exeter (Wm. Alley) had Deuteronomy. The Bishop of St. Davids (Rd. Davies) had Joshua–2 Kings.[†] The Bishop of Worcester (Edwyn Sandys) had 3 and 4 Kings and Chronicles. Andrew Perne, Master of Peterhouse and Dean of Ely (a conjectural inference, like the former, by help of the initials A. P. E., from 'Cantabrigiæ'), had Ecclesiastes and Canticles. The Bishop of Norwich (John Parkhurst) shared the Apocryphal books with the Bishop of Chichester (Wm. Barlow). The Bishop of Winchester (Rt. Horne) had Isaiah–Lamentations; the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (I. Bentham) taking the rest of the Greater Prophets. The Minor Prophets fell to the Bishop of London (Edmund Grindal). The Bishop of Peterborough (Ed. Scambler) took Luke and John; the Bishop of Ely (R. Cox) Acts and Romans; the Dean of Westminster (Gabriel Goodman) 1 Corinthians; and the Bishop of Lincoln (N. Bullingham) the General Epistles and the Revelation.

It will be noticed that Parker's list omits the Book of Psalms. The initials appended to this book in the Bible itself are T. B., supposed by Strype to designate Thomas Becon, formerly one of Cranmer's chaplains, afterwards a prebendary of Canterbury. The Psalms had in fact been originally assigned to Edmund Geste, Bishop of Rochester; and if the revised rendering had been made by him on the principles he does not scruple to avow,[‡] the work might well need to be sent on to some other scholar for correction. A difficulty is also caused by the fact that the initials at the end of Daniel, T. C. L., do not appear to correspond with the 'I. Lich. and Covent.' of the list. But the explanation of Burnet is a plausible one, that Thomas Bentham, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (1560–1580), is meant in both cases, the confusion of I. and T. being easy; and that he was accustomed to sign himself 'Covent. and Lich.,' reversing the usual order.

By these united efforts there was produced, in 1568, from the press of Richard Jugge, dwelling in St. Paul's Churchyard, what well deserved the designation by which it was often known, 'the Bible of largest volume.'[§] The title-page is chiefly occupied by an ornamental border, having within it, on an oblong label at the top, 'The holie Bible,'[||] and in the centre, within an oval, a portrait of queen Elizabeth: above it, the royal arms; beneath, in three lines, the text Non me pudet . . . credenti from Ro 1^{16}. The next three leaves have 'A Preface into the Bible folowynge,' by Archbishop Parker. The fifth, sixth, and part of the seventh leaves are taken up with Cranmer's 'prologue or preface.' Other preliminary matter follows, extending to the twenty-sixth leaf, Genesis beginning on the twenty-seventh. One interesting point among the subjects treated of in the Introduction, peculiar, we believe, to this Bible, is the caution to ministers against heedlessly reading aloud words or phrases which might sound objectionable. Certain 'semy circles' are used as marks to denote what 'may be left vnread in the publique reading to the people.'[¶] This scrupulousness, which would have satisfied Selden, might well have been extended to the designs used for initial letters; some of which (notably that at the beginning of Hebrews in the ed. of 1572) would be more appropriate for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses than for an English Bible. Besides the copperplate engraving of Elizabeth already mentioned, there is one of the Earl of Leicester at the beginning of Joshua, and another of Sir Wm. Cecil (to represent king David?) at the beginning of the Bk. of Psalms.

The 'other perusal,' of which Parker had assured Cecil that the travail of the Revisers would have the benefit, showed itself in an amended edition, published by Jugge, in 4to, the following year, with the brief title, 'The holi Bible.' But only negligent use had been made of the criticisms called forth. Some interesting specimens of these, by a schoolmaster named Laurence, have been fortunately preserved by Strype,[*] and the way in which they were incorporated in the edition of 1569 shows strikingly the want of care exercised. Two examples must suffice. In Mt 28^{14} the traditional rendering of ἀμερίμνους, namely 'harmless,' had been retained. Laurence pointed out that 'careless' (in the sense of securus) was rather the word. But he must have been surprised to find himself taken so literally that in 1569 the rendering appeared, 'We will make you careless.' Again, in Mt 21^{38} the Revisers, following the Great Bible in preference to the Genevan, had rendered κατάσχωμεν 'let us enjoy' instead of 'let us take' (RV). Laurence found fault with this, on the ground that the original signified 'let us take possession or seysyn (seizin) upon.' In the edition of 1569, and in every subsequent one, this appeared as 'let us season upon his inheritance' ('sease on' in AV of 1611).[†]

The most singular part of the matter is that, while corrections (of whatever value) were freely admitted into the second edition of 1569, the third of 1572 went back in many particulars to the first. A few examples will make this clear. For brevity, the editions may be denoted by A, B, C.

In Gn 36^{24} in A Anah is a woman: 'she fedde'; in B, correctly, a man: 'he fedde;' C goes back to 'she.'—In Jg 5^{10} A reads, 'ye that dwell by Middin' (RV 'that sit on rich carpets'); B 'ye that syt vppermoste in iudgment'; C goes back to A.—In Mt 15^{5} A has 'by the gyft that [is offered] of me, thou shalt be helped'; B 'what gift soeuer shold haue come of me'; C agrees with A.—In Lk 2^{2} A has 'and this first taxing was made'; B 'this taxing was the first and executed when,' etc.; C goes back to A.—In Ac 1^{1} A and C have 'O Theophilus'; B 'deare Theophilus.'—In Ac 7^{34} A and C have 'I haue seene, I haue seene'; B 'I haue perfectly sene.'—In 1 Ti 1^{2} A has 'a natural sonne'; B 'his naturall sonne'; C goes back to A.

The edition of 1572, moreover, exhibited two versions of the Psalms in parallel columns: that of the Revisers themselves, and that from the Great Bible. Many subsequent editions appeared. Dore (Old Bibles, p. 239) enumerates nineteen in all, from 1568 to 1606 inclusive; Pocock seventeen, speaking doubtfully also of one of these, as never seen by him, an alleged folio of 1606. The British Museum Catalogue does not show this last, nor yet an 8vo (included by Dore) of 1577.

The Bishops' Bible appears never to have received the royal sanction. Parker, indeed, in his letter of Oct. 5th, 1568, before quoted, tried to procure, through Sir Wm. Cecil, such a mark of recognition. 'The printer,' he writes, 'hath honestly done his diligence. If your honour would obtain of the Queen's Highness that this edition might be licensed and only commended in public reading in churches, to draw to one uniformity, it were no great cost to the most parishes, and a relief to him for his great charges sustained.' But, so far as is known, the application was unsuccessful. Accordingly, the claim to be 'set foorth by aucthoritee,' made by the editions of 1574 and 1575, must be referred to the sanction of Convocation, given in 1571. The Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical of that year expressly ordain that 'every archbishop and bishop should have at his house a copy of the holy Bible of the largest volume as lately printed at London.' A like injunction was laid upon cathedrals; and, 'as far as it could be conveniently done,' upon all churches.[*]

vii. ROMAN CATHOLIC.—It was not likely that English Roman Catholics should continue unmoved by this untiring work in translating the Bible. Every fresh version made by scholars of the Reformed Church was a tacit reflexion on them for making none. Accordingly, it was resolved by the leading members of the newly founded English College at Douai, that this reproach—so far as they admitted it to be a reproach—should be wiped away. The moving spirit in this undertaking, as in the foundation of the college itself, was Dr. William Allen,[†] made cardinal afterwards in 1587. But the actual work of making the new translation devolved almost entirely on Dr. Gregory Martin, a native of Maxfield in Sussex, who had been one of Sir Thomas White's first batch of students at St. John's College, Oxford, in 1557. Having chosen to forsake Oxford for Douai, he was made by Allen the teacher of Hebrew and Biblical literature there.[‡] Dr. William Reynolds, formerly of New College, Oxford, Richard Bristow, a Worcester man, and others, took a share in the work of revision.

Amid such circumstances, recalling in some measure the origin of the Genevan version, the translation known as the Rhemes and Doway took its rise. The entire Bible appears to have been ready for issue together. But, owing to want of funds, a portion only could be published at a time. The NT was properly given the preference, and appeared in 1582 with the following title:—

'The | Nevv Testament | of Iesvs Christ, trans|lated faithfvlly into English | ovt of the authentical Latin, according to the best cor|rected copies of the same, diligently conferred vvith | the Greeke and other editions in diuers languages: vvith | Arguments of bookes and chapters, annota|tions, and other necessarie helpes, for the better vnder|standing of the text, and specially for the discouerie of the Corrvptions of diuers late translations, and for | cleering the Controversies in religion, of these daies.—In the English College of Rhemes. . . . Printed at Rhemes | by John Fogny | 1582 | cum privilegio.'

The volume is in a convenient 4to size,[§] printed in clear-cut Roman type, no black letter being used. In some respects the arrangement of the RV is anticipated. The text is broken up into paragraphs, not verses. But the verse numeration is given in the inner margin, an obelus being prefixed to the beginning of each verse. Quotations from the OT are printed in italics. At the head of each chapter is an 'Argument,' and 'Annotations' at the end.

Of the preliminary matter, the long Preface to the Reader, occupying leaves a ij–c iv, well merits attention. The writers address themselves to three special points: (1) the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the vernacular, and, in particular, into English; (2) the reasons why the present version is made from the Vulgate; (3) the principles on which the translators have proceeded. They do not publish their translation 'vpon erroneous opinions of necessitie that the holy scriptures should alwaies be in our mother tongue, or that they ought or were ordained of God to be read indifferently of all . . . . but vpon special consideration of the present time, state and condition of our country.' Holy Church, while not encouraging, had not absolutely forbidden such versions. Using the freedom thus left, divers learned Catholics, since Luther's revolt, had already translated the Scriptures into the mother tongues of various nations of Europe; yet still repudiating the notion that all people alike might indifferently read, expound, and talk of them.

[§] In the copy before the present writer (Brit. Mus. 1008. c. 9) the page measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ by $6\frac{1}{8}$ inches.

That the Latin Vulgate should have been taken as the basis of their work, in preference to any Greek text, is defended on the ground of its antiquity, of its freedom from the discrepancies visible in MSS of the Greek, and of its having been defined as exclusively authentic by the Council of Trent. Usually it would be found that the Vulgate agreed with the received text of the Greek; and where that was not so it would probably be found in accord with readings relegated to the margin, but not necessarily of less authority on that account. The issue, we think, within ten years of the date of this Preface, of the Sixtine edition of the Vulgate in 1590, and the Clementine in 1592, with the momentous corrections of 'preli vitia,' as Bellarmin called them,[*] must have been a shock difficult for these apologists to withstand.

As regards the style of their translation, the Rhemists profess to have had one sole object in view. This was, without partiality and without licence, to express the sense of the Vulgate with the least possible change of form; 'continually keeping ourselves as near as is possible to our text, and to the very words and phrases which by long use are made venerable . . . [not doubting] that all sorts of Catholic readers will in short time think that familiar which at the first may seem strange.' In carrying out this principle it is inevitable that some felicitous phrases and turns of expression should be hit upon in the course of a long work. 'A palpable mount' (He 12^{18}) is better than 'the mount that might be touched' of the AV. In the first chapter of James alone it is to the Rhemish version that we owe 'upbraideth not' ($v.^{5}$), 'nothing doubting' ($v.^{6}$), 'the engrafted word' ($v.^{21}$), 'bridleth not' ($v.^{26}$).[†] As Plumptre has pointed out, so great an authority as Bacon (Of the Pacification of the Church) goes out of his way to praise the Rhemists for having restored 'charity' to the place from which Tindale had ousted it in favour of 'love.' In particular, the closeness with which the translators kept to the Vulgate helped to save them from that needless variation in the rendering of the same or cognate words, which is an undoubted blemish in the AV. Thus, while δικαιοῦν is correctly rendered in our version 'to justify,' δίκαιος and δικαιοσύνη are more often than not represented by 'righteous' and 'righteousness.'[‡] Once more, the antiquity of the MSS from which the Vulgate translation was made causes its readings at times to accord with the results of the highest critical scholarship. It will follow that the Rhemish version occasionally comes nearer our RV than does that of king James. Thus in Mt 5^{44} the clauses, interpolated from the parallel passage in St. Luke, which find no place in the RV, are partially omitted in the Rhemish. So, too, this latter agrees with the RV in reading 'Christ' for 'God' in 1 P 3^{15}.

But, when every allowance of the kind is made, the fact remains that, to ordinary English readers, the translation in question must often have seemed one into an unknown tongue. What else could have been thought of such specimens as these: 'I wil not drinke of the generation of the vine' (Lk 22^{18}); 'the passions of this time are not condigne to the glorie to come' (Ro 8^{18}); 'For our wrestling is . . . against Princes and Potestats, against the rectors of the world of this darkenes, against the spirituals of wickedness in the celestials' (Eph 6^{12}); 'But he exinanited himself' (Ph 2^{7}); 'Yet are they turned about with a little sterne, whither the violence of the director wil' (Ja 3^{4})?[*]

In 1593 the English College returned from Rheims to their old quarters at Douai, and completed their biblical labours by the issue, in 1609 and 1610, of two volumes, containing the OT and Apocrypha. In size, type, and general execution, they closely resemble the volume of the NT published nearly thirty years before. The title is: 'The | Holie Bible | Faithfvlly trans-|lated into English, | ovt of the avthentical | Latin | Diligently conferred with the Hebrew, Greeke, | and other Editions in diuers languages. | With Argvments of the Bookes, and Chapters: | Annotations: Tables: and other helpes, | for better vnderstanding of the text: for discouerie of | corrvptions in some late translations: and | for clearing controversies in Religion.| . . . . Printed at Doway by Lavrence Kellam, | at the signe of the holie Lambe. | M.DC.IX.' The first volume extends to the end of Job. The second volume, bearing a similar title, and the date M.DC.X., comprises from Psalms to 4 Esdras. A preface to 'the right welbeloved English Reader' goes over much the same ground as that prefixed to the Rhemes NT, but more cursorily, being only about half the length of the other. The hindrances, which had delayed the appearance of the work, had all proceeded from 'one general cause, our poore estate in banishment.' The arguments for translating from the Vulgate are re-stated. The retention of Latinisms, or original forms of words, is defended. If English Protestants keep 'Sabbath,' 'Ephod,' 'Pentecost,' 'Proselyte,' and the like, why not 'Prepuce,' 'Pasch,' 'Azimes,' 'Breades of Proposition,' 'Holocaust,' and others of the same kind?

This uncompromising principle gradually gave way. In 1749–50, and again in 1763–4, editions of the Doway OT and the Rhemes NT, each edition in five vols. 12mo, were published by Richard Challoner, Bishop of Debra, in partibus, with the assistance of William Green, afterwards President of the College at Douai, and Walton, afterwards Vicar Apostolic of the northern district of England.[†] As thus revised, it is substantially the version used at the present day by English-speaking Roman Catholics. In Cardinal Wiseman's opinion, 'though Challoner did well in altering many too decided Latinisms, he weakened the language considerably by destroying inversion . . . and by the insertion of particles where not needed.'[‡]

The nature and extent of these changes may be judged of by a comparison of a few passages from the older and newer versions, side by side with the RV of 1885:—

[‡] Cotton, Rhemes and Doway, p. 49 n., specifies, as an additional fault, Challoner's excessive fondness for 'that' as equivalent to 'who,' 'whom,' 'which.'

viii. THE 'AUTHORIZED.'—The so-called Authorized Version of 1611 had its origin in the Hampton Court Conference, held on Jan. 14th, 16th, and 18th, 1604. On the second of these days, one of the four representatives of the Puritan party, Dr. John Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, a learned and temperate divine, 'moved His Majesty that there might be a new translation of the Bible,'[] alleging in support of his request the presence of many faults in the existing ones. It is not likely that much would have come of the motion, but for its happening to chime in with the mood of the king. The caustic remark of Bancroft, Bishop of London, that 'if every man's humour should be followed, there would be no end of translating,' probably indicates the spirit in which the proposal would have been received by his party generally. But, while they were content to let the matter drop, James was thinking out his plans for carrying Dr. Reynolds' suggestion into effect. By July of that year we find him writing to the Bishop of London, informing him that he had made out a list of fifty-four learned divines, to whom the work he had at heart might be suitably entrusted. He also drew up, for the guidance of the workers, a paper of instructions, too long to be given here in full,[†] but containing some sensible rules. In this he requires the bishops to see that provision be made, where necessary, for those engaged on the task of translation. The king's letter, dated July 22nd, 1604, was communicated by Bishop Bancroft[‡] to his brother prelates on the 31st. In this letter king James speaks of having already appointed 'certain learned men, to the number of four and fifty, for the translating of the Bible.' But, for some unexplained reason, the scheme did not come into operation till 1607. Possibly the death of some of those selected, or the difficulty of providing for the maintenance of others, may have caused the delay. However, by 1607 all was in working order. A list of the companies of revisers was issued, together with a paper of rules to be observed in the conduct of the work. Bancroft, no doubt, had a hand in drawing up both these documents. The most important of the rules were the following:[]—

I. The ordinary Bible read in the church, commonly called 'the Bishops' Bible,' to be followed, and as little altered as the truth of the original will permit.

III. The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, videlicet, the word 'church' not to be translated 'congregation,' etc.

VI. No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words . . .

VIII. Every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters, and having translated or amended them severally by himself, where he thinketh good, all to meet together, confer what they have done, and agree for their parts what shall stand.

As each company finished one book, they were to send it to the other companies for their careful consideration. Where doubts prevailed as to any passage of special obscurity, letters were to be sent to 'any learned man in the land' for his judgment. Finally, 'three or four of the most ancient and grave divines in either of the universities, not employed in translating,' were to be 'overseers of the translations as well Hebrew as Greek.'

It will be seen at once how much more effectual were the provisions made for securing accuracy and thoroughness in the work than those devised by Parker and his coadjutors for the Bishops' Bible.

The lists of translators which have been preserved offer some difficulties. The king, in his letter before referred to, speaks of the workers appointed as numbering fifty-four. Burnet's list, which he obtained from the papers of one of the company engaged in the work, gives only forty-seven names. The discrepancy may be accounted for by the death of members (as in the case of Mr. Lively, who died in May 1605), or some of the other changes to be looked for in a period of three years. Wood supplies two additional names—those of Dr. John Aglionby, Principal of St. Edmund's Hall, and Dr. Leonard Hutton, Canon of Christ Church. Others may still remain to be discovered.[†]

The entire body was divided into six groups or companies, of which two held their meetings at Westminster, two at Cambridge, and two at Oxford. Some uncertainty being allowed for, the lists are as follows:—

FIRST WESTMINSTER COMPANY.

(Genesis—2 Kings).

(1) Dr. Lancelot Andrewes, Dean of Westminster; Master of Pembroke Hall, Camb., 1589–1605; Bishop of Winchester, 1619–26. (2) Dr. John Overall, Dean of St. Paul's; Master of St. Catherine's Hall, Camb., 1598–1607; Regius Professor of Divinity, 1596–1607; Bishop of Norwich, 1618–9. (3) Dr. Hadrian à Saravia, best known as the friend of Hooker; b. at Hesdin in Artois, 1531; made Professor of Divinity at Leyden, 1582; incorporated D.D. at Oxford, 1590; Prebendary of Canterbury, 1595; d. 1613. (4) Dr. Richard Clerke, Fellow of Christ's Coll., Cambridge; one of the six preachers at Canterbury, 1602; d. 1634. (5) Dr. John Leifield, or Layfield, Fellow of Trin. Coll., Camb., 1585–1603; 'Lector linguæ Græcæ,' 1593; Rector of St. Clement Danes, 1601–17; d. 1617. Noted for his skill in architecture (Collier, Eccl. Hist. ed. 1852, vii. 337). (6) Dr. Robert Teigh, or Tighe, Archdeacon of Middlesex, 1601; incorporated at Oxford from Trin. Coll., Cambridge, where he graduated in 1582; d. 1616. (7) 'Mr. Burleigh,' probably Dr. Francis Burley, one of the earliest Fellows of King James's College at Chelsea. (8) 'Mr. King,' probably Geoffrey King, Fellow of King's Coll., Cambridge; succeeded Dr. Robert Spalding as Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1607. (9) 'Mr. Thompson,' taken to be Richard Thompson, of Clare Hall, Cambridge; called, from the land of his birth, Dutch Thompson; the friend of Casaubon and Scaliger. (10) 'Mr. Beadwell,' taken in like manner to be William Bedwell, scholar of Trin. Coll., Oxford, 1541; Rector of St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate Street, 1601; tutor of Pocock.

[‡] Bancroft was appointed to the see of Canterbury at the latter end of 1604. Whitgift having died in February of that year, Bancroft discharged in the interval some of the archiepiscopal duties.

[*] They will be found in Cardwell's Synodalia, ed. 1844, ii. pp. 145, 146. Cardwell took them from Burnet, who 'himself took his list from a copy belonging originally to Bishop Ravis.'

[†] Mr. J. S. Cotton has kindly referred the present writer to Clark's Register of the Univ. of Oxford (Oxf. Hist. Soc. 1897, ii. 141), where a dispensation from the statutable exercises for the degree of D.D. is granted to Arthur Lakes, 14th May 1605, 'because engaged on the translation of the NT in London.' Arthur Lake, or Lakes, was at this time Master of St. Cross, afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells. A similar dispensation, for a like reason, dated 6th May 1605, is granted to John Harmar. In the Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, under 11th Apr. 1605, mention is made by Bishop Bilson, writing to Sir Thomas Lake, Sec. of State, of Dr. George Ryves, Warden of New College, as a translator. This ref. also we owe to Mr. Cotton. The names of Lakes and Ryves are new. The three dates given are interesting as furnishing evidence that some of the translators, at least, had got to work as early as the spring of 1605.

First Cambridge Company.

(1 Chron.—Ecclesiastcs).

(11) Edward Lively, Fellow of Trin. Coll., 1572–8; Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1575;[*] d. 1605. (12) Dr. John Richardson, successively Master of Peterhouse, 1609, and Trinity, 1615; Regius Professor of Divinity, 1607–17; previously Fellow of Emmanuel. (13) Dr. Laurence Chaderton, first Master of Emmanuel Coll., 1584–1622; previously Fellow of Christ's Coll. One of the four Puritan representatives at the Hampton Court Conference. (14) Francis Dillingham, Fellow of Christ's Coll., 1581. Praised for his knowledge of Greek. (15) Thomas Harrison, Vice-Master of Trin. Coll., 1611–31. (16) Dr. Roger Andrewes, brother of the bishop, Master of Jesus Coll., 1618–32. (17) Dr. Robert Spalding, Fellow of St. John's Coll., 1593; succeeded Lively as Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1605; d. 1607?. (18) Dr. Andrew Byng, Fellow (?) of Peterhouse; Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1608. About 1605 a stall in the cathedral church of York to be kept for him; d. 1651.

First Oxford Company.

(Isaiah—Malachi).

(19) Dr. John Harding, Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1591–8 and 1604–10; Canon of Lincoln, 1604; President of Magdalen Coll., 1607; d. 1610. (20) Dr. John Rainolds, or Reynolds, Dean of Lincoln, 1593; President of Corpus Christi Coll., 1598; d. 1607. His share in the Hampton Court Conference has been already mentioned. (21) Dr. Thomas Holland, Fellow of Balliol, 1573; Regius Professor of Divinity, 1589; Rector of Exeter Coll., 1592; d. 1612. (22) Dr. Richard Kilbye, Rector of Lincoln Coll., 1590; Prebendary of Lincoln Cathedral, 1601; Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1610; d. 1620. (23) Dr. Miles Smith, student of Corpus Christi Coll., about 1568, afterwards of Brasenose; Canon of Exeter, 1595–9; Bishop of Gloucester, 1612–24; d. 1624. To him, along with Bishop Bilson, the final revision of the work was entrusted, and he wrote the Preface. (24) Dr. Richard Brett, Fellow of Lincoln Coll., 1586; Rector of Quainton, Bucks, 1595; d. 1637. Praised as an Orientalist. (25) Mr. Richard Fairclough, scholar of New Coll., 1570; incorporated at Cambridge, 1581; Rector of Bucknell, Oxon, 1592.

Second Cambridge Company.

(The Apocrypha).

(26) Dr. John Duport, Fellow of Jesus Coll., 1580; Master, 1590; Prebendary of Ely, 1609; d. 1617. (27) Dr. William Branthwait, Fellow of Emmanuel, 1584; deputy Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity; Master of Caius Coll., 1607; d. 1620. (28) Dr. Jeremiah Radcliffe, Fellow of Trin. Coll. (29) Dr. Samuel Ward, Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, 1623; Master of Sidney Sussex Coll., 1610. Had previously been scholar of Christ's and Fellow of Emmanuel. One of the English representatives at the Synod of Dort; d. 1643. (30) Mr. Andrew Downes, Fellow of St. John's Coll., 1571; Regius Professor of Greek, 1585–1628; d. 1628. He corresponded in Greek with Casaubon. (31) Mr. John Bois, Fellow of St. John's Coll., 1580; Greek Lecturer, 1584–95; Prebendary of Ely, 1615. When the Apocrypha was finished, he joined the first Cambridge company at their urgent request. (32) Robert Ward, of King's Coll., Prebendary of Chichester; Rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hampshire.

Second Oxford Company.

(Gospels, Acts, Revelation).

(33) Dr. Thomas Ravis, Dean of Christ Church, 1596–1605; Bishop of Gloucester, 1605; of London, 1607; d. 1609. (34) Dr. George Abbot, Master of University Coll., 1597; Dean of Winchester, 1600; Archbishop of Canterbury, 1611–33; d. 1633. (35) Dr. Richard Edes, student of Christ Church, 1571; Dean of Worcester, 1597; d. 1604. As he died thus early, some have thought that Dr. James Montague, who succeeded him in the Deanery, was the 'Mr. Dean of Worcester' in Burnet's list. Wood gives, in place of Edes, Dr. John Aglionby, who was Principal of St. Edmund Hall, 1601; d. 1610. (36) Dr. Giles Thompson, matric. from University Coll., 1575; Fellow of All Souls', 1580; Dean of Windsor, 1602: Bishop of Gloucester, 1611; d. 1612. (37) Sir Henry Savile, Warden of Merton Coll., 1585; Provost of Eton, 1596; editor of St. Chrysostom, 1610–13; founder of the Savilian Chairs of Geometry and Astronomy; d. 1622. (38) Dr. John Perrinne, or Perne, Fellow of St. John's College, 1575; Regius Professor of Greek, 1597–1615; Canon of Christ Church, 1604–15; d. 1615. (39) 'Dr. Ravens,' assumed to be Dr. Ralph Ravens, Fellow of St. John's Coll.; Rector of Great Easton, Essex, 1605; d. 1616. In his stead Wood gives the name of Dr. Leonard Hutton, Canon of Christ Church. (40) Dr. John Harmar, Fellow of New College; Regius Professor of Greek, 1585–90; Head-Master of Winchester, 1588–95; Warden of Winchester, 1596–1613; d. 1613.

Second Westminster Company.

(Romans—Jude).

(41) Dr. William Barlow, Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 1590; Dean of Chester, 1602-5; Bishop of Lincoln, 1608–13; d. 1613. (42) 'Dr. Hutchinson,' taken to be Mr. William Hutchinson, of St. John's Coll., Oxford; Archdeacon of St. Albans, 1581; Prebendary of St. Paul's, 1589; d. 1616. (43) Dr. John Spenser, President of Corpus Christi Coll., Oxford, 1607–14; Chaplain to James I., and Fellow of Chelsea College; d. 1614. (44) Dr. Roger Fenton, Fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge; Preacher of Gray's Inn, 1599; Prebendary of St. Paul's, 1609; d. 1616. (45) 'Mr. Rabbet,' identified with Michael Rabbet, B.A., of Trinity Coll., Cambridge, 1576; incorporated at Oxford, 1584; Rector of St. Vedast's, 1604–17; d. 1630. (46) 'Mr. Sanderson,' identified in like manner with Thomas Sanderson, Fellow of Balliol, 1585; Archdeacon of Rochester, 1606–14; Canon of St. Paul's, 1611; d. 1614?. (47) Mr. William Dakins, Fellow of Trinity Coll., Cambridge, 1594; Professor of Divinity in Gresham Coll., 1604; d. 1607.

With such machinery prepared, the work went on apace. From an expression in the Translators' Preface we may infer that their task took something less than three years in completion. Contrasting their own labours with those bestowed on the Septuagint version, finished, according to tradition, in seventy-two days, they say, 'The work hath not been huddled up in seventy-two days, but hath cost the workmen, as light as it seemeth, the pains of twice seven times seventy-two days and more.' Of the method of procedure we have an interesting glimpse left us by Selden.[*] 'The Translation in King James' time,' he writes, 'took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given to him who was most excellent in such a tongue (as the Apocrypha to Andrew Downes), and then they met together, and one read the Translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned Tongues, or French, Spanish, Italian, &c.: if they found any fault they spoke; if not, he read on.' The final preparation for the press seems to have been entrusted to six delegates, two from each centre.[†] Dr. Downes and Bois are mentioned by name as of the party, and the time thus occupied is said to have been nine months.

At length, in 1611, the volume appeared from the press of Robert Barker, with this title: 'The | Holy | Bible, | Conteyning the Old Testament, | and the New: | Newly Translated out of the Originall | tongues, & with the former Translations | diligently compared and reuised, by his | Maiesties speciall cōmandement. | Appointed to be read in Churches. | Imprinted at London by Robert | Barker, Printer to the Kings | most Excellent Maiestie. | Anno Dom. 1611.' The title occupies the centre of a copperplate engraving, being flanked, right and left, by figures of Moses and Aaron, and having the four Evangelists at the corners. Above is the Paschal Lamb, surrounded by Apostles; and below is a pelican, symbol of piety. At the summit, in Hebrew characters, is the sacred name of God; on either hand the sun and moon; the Holy Dove beneath; and at the bottom of the plate the artist's signature, 'C Boel fecit in Richmont.'

The NT has a separate title, within a woodcut border, representing, down one side, the tents and badges of the twelve tribes of Israel, and down the other the twelve Apostles. At the corner are the four evangelists with their emblems.

The second title runs: 'The | Newe | Testament of | our Lord and Sauior | Jesvs Christ | ¶Newly translated out of | the Originall Greeke: and with | the former Translations diligently | compared and reuised, by his | Maiesties speciall Com | mandement. | Imprinted | at London by Robert | Barker, | Printer to the | Kings most Excellent | Maiestie. | Anno Dom. 1611. | cum Priuilegio.'

The first, or general, title is followed by the 'Epistle Dedicatorie' (A 2–3), and this by 'The Translators to the Reader' (A 3 verso to B 4 verso). Calendars, Tables to find Easter, and the like, occupy the remaining preliminary leaves. The text of this editio princeps is in black letter. Headlines and summaries of the contents of chapters (the latter by Dr. Miles Smith) are in Roman letter. Words supplied, which would now be in italics, are in small Roman.[*] Various head-pieces, initial letters, and other embellishments, from the Bishops' Bible, the further reprinting of which was discontinued after 1606, were used again in this edition. The figure of Neptune is now found at the beginning of St. Matthew, and the crest and arms of Walsingham and Cecil are left on in the Psalms.[†] By what warranty the clause 'Appointed to be read in Churches' was inserted in the title is not easy to determine, seeing that there can be found for it, so far as is known, 'no edict of Convocation, no Act of Parliament, no decision of the Privy Council, no royal proclamation.'[‡] The true explanation probably is that, as the new revision was meant to supersede the old Bishops' Bible, it naturally took the place, and succeeded to the privileges, of that work. But, as has been before mentioned, the Bishops' Bible was ordered, by the Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical of 1571, to be placed in all cathedrals, and, so far as it was practicable, in all churches. Thus the new version was simply the heir of the old. It may be remarked, in passing, that the clause is not found in the NT title of the editio princeps, nor at all in the first 8vo and some other early editions.[§] It will be observed also that the OT and NT are spoken of in the general title as 'newly translated out of the original tongues'; and the Preface is headed 'the Translators to the Reader.' This might be thought a disregard of the very first of the king's instructions. But we must bear in mind how the alternative word revised was then used, as for instance in this very title. And the 'Translators' themselves, while content to use this designation in their Preface, make it quite clear what their conception of their duty was in this respect. 'But it is high time to leave them,' they say, referring to Romanist objectors, 'and to shew in brief what we proposed to our selves, and what course we held in this our perusall and survey of the Bible. Truely (good Christian Reader) we never thought from the beginning, that we should need to make a new Translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one . . . but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones, one principall good one, not justly to be excepted against; that hath been our indeavour, that our mark.'

Whether or not the translators reached their mark, is now no matter of opinion: history has spoken. Especially as a well of English undefiled, drawing its waters in part from yet older springs, it has solaced the heart, and satisfied the taste, of peasant and scholar alike. One well entitled to be heard (the late Bishop Lightfoot), writing on a subject which made him rather a severe critic than a willing eulogist,[*] speaks of the 'grand simplicity' in which the language of our English Bible 'stands out in contrast to the ornate and often affected diction of the literature of that time.' Another, than whom few, if any, have studied the text of Holy Writ with minuter care, marvels at 'the perfect and easy command over the English language exhibited by its authors on every page.'[†] And yet another, whose testimony may be of the greater value from the fact that, when he gave it, he had ceased to be in the communion of the English Church, pays a generous tribute to the benefits derived from listening, in the course of public service, to the 'grave majestic English,' in which are enshrined 'the words of inspired teachers under both Covenants,' and from associating religion with 'compositions which, even humanly considered, are among the most sublime and beautiful ever written.'[‡]

But it is of more importance, especially as bearing on the question of subsequent revision, to form a just estimate of the defects of the AV than to record the language of panegyric. Some specimens of these defects, taken almost at haphazard, are accordingly given. But it must be borne in mind that their cumulative force loses its effect when a short list only can find place.

Gn 15^{2} 'And the steward (r. possessor, or inheritor) of my house'; 20^{16} 'Thus was she reproved' (r. And so thou art cleared); 25^{18} 'And he died' (r. settled); 49^{5} 'Instruments of cruelty,' etc. (variously emended); 49^{6} 'digged down a wall' (r. houghed oxen); 49^{14} 'between two burdens' (r. between the cattle-pens); Ex 13^{4} 'This day came ye out' (r. go ye forth); 15^{2} 'prepare him an habitation' (r. praise, or glorify him); 32^{25} 'had made them naked' (r. had let them loose); 33^{7} 'tabernacle of the congregation' (r. tent of meeting—distinct in use from the tabernacle); Nu 11^{25} 'and they did not cease' (r. but they did so no more); 21^{18} 'by the direction of the lawgiver' (r. with the sceptre; but variously rendered); Jg 5^{16} 'for the divisions' (r. by the brooks, or watercourses—see also vv.$^{10. 13\text{-}15. 17}$); 8^{13} 'before the sun was up' (r. from the ascent of Heres); 1 S 13^{1} 'Saul reigned one year' (r. Saul was [thirty] years old when he began to reign—see margin of RV); 1 K 20^{38} 'with ashes upon his face' (r. with his headband over his eyes); 22^{38} 'and they washed his armour' (r. now the harlots washed themselves); 2 K 11^{15} 'without the ranges' (r. between the ranks); 11^{16} 'they laid hands on her' (r. made way for her); 21^{6} 'observed times' (r. practised augury); 2 Ch 22^{6} 'because of' (r. of); Job 36^{33} 'the cattle also concerning the vapour' (r. concerning the storm, or concerning him that cometh up); Is 29^{16} 'Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay' (r. Ye turn things upside down! Mt 25^{8} 'are gone out' (r. are going out); 26^{55} and elsewhere 'a thief' (r. a robber); Mk 6^{27} 'an executioner' (r. a soldier of the guard); Lk 1^{59} 'called' (r. were calling, or would have called); 19^{13} 'occupy' (r. trade, or do business); 22^{56} 'by the fire' (r. in the light of the fire); Jn 4^{27} 'with the woman' (r. with a woman); 10^{16} 'one fold' (r. one flock); Ac 19^{38} 'the law is open, and there are deputies' (r. court days are held, and there are proconsuls; or the courts are sitting, and there are magistrates); 1 Co 14^{23} 'one place' (r. the same place); 2 Co 9^{13} 'experiment' (r. proof); Eph 4^{12} 'for the work of the ministry' (r. to a work of ministration,—removing the comma after 'saints'); Ph 3^{21} 'our vile body' (r. the body of our humiliation); 4^{2} 'Euodias' (r. Euodia); 2 Ti 4^{6} 'I am now ready to be offered' (r. I am already being offered); He 2^{16} 'He took not on him the nature of angels' (r. it is not of angels that he taketh hold, i.e. to succour or support); 4^{8} 'Jesus' (r. Joshua—so also in Ac 7^{45}); Ja 1^{17} 'gift . . . gift' (r. giving . . . gift); Rev 4^{4} 'seats' (r. thrones).

If we knew with certainty what were the original texts chiefly relied on by the translators, we should be better able to account for some of the flaws in their work. So far, indeed, as the OT is concerned, the variations found among different editions of the Hebrew Bible then printed are less material than might have been supposed. And for this part of their work the translators had good helps. Besides the Latin version of the Hebrew Bible made (1575–9) by Immanuel Tremellius (a converted Jew, who became Professor of Divinity at Heidelberg), revised by his son-in-law Francis Junius, who added a similar version of the Apocrypha, 'an interlinear Latin translation of the Hebrew text, based on that of Pagninus,'[*] had been appended in 1572 to the Antwerp Polyglott by the Spanish scholar, Arias Montanus. The Complutensian Polyglott had been available since 1517. Moreover, in the interval, versions into several modern languages had appeared:—a revised edition of the French Bible, in 1587–8, at Geneva; an Italian translation by Diodati, in 1607, also at Geneva; and two Spanish versions, one by C. Reyna, Basle, 1569, and the other, based on it, by C. de Valera, Amsterdam, 1602.[†] But, as regards the NT, the translators fared worse. The great MSS of the Greek Testament, with which scholars are now familiar, were then unknown. The science of biblical criticism was not yet competent to deal with them, had they been available. The third edition of Robert Stephen, 1550, furnished a textus receptus, representing what was best in the Complutensian and Erasmus. To supplement this, the translators had the several editions of Beza's Greek Testament with his Latin version, preferably the fourth, of 1589. It may be going too far to assert, with Hartwell Horne,[‡] that 'Beza's edition of 1598 was adopted as the basis' of the Authorized Version. But even Scrivener, who combats the assertion, admits that, out of 252 passages examined, the translators agree with Beza against Stephen in 113 places, and with Stephen against Beza in only 59; the remaining 80 being cases in which the Complutensian, Erasmus, or the Vulgate were followed in preference to either.

Poor, however, as was the apparatus criticus at the command of the translators, they had an advantage, which it would not be easy to overestimate, in the existence of previous English versions. Some of these the king's letter of instructions had specially directed them to consult. Two others, not named in those instructions, they consulted frequently, and with the greatest benefit to themselves. These were the Geneva Bible and the Rhemish NT. The Douai OT appeared just too late to be of use, not being issued till 1610. It would be exceeding our limits to enter into the statistical calculations, by which it has been sought to apportion aright the indebtedness of the AV to each of its two rivals. It must suffice to say that its obligation to both was great;—to the one for principles of interpretation, to the other for an enriched vocabulary. At the same time its independence was never sacrificed. 'It differs from the Rhemish Version in seeking to fix an intelligible sense on the words rendered: it differs from the Genevan Version in leaving the literal rendering uncoloured by any expository notes.'[§]

The gradual efforts that have been made from time to time to emend and perfect this noble translation will be most fittingly noticed when we come to speak of the Revised Version of 1881. A few words remain to be said on the relation in which the first edition of 1611 stands to its immediate successors; and mention must be made briefly of some of the most conspicuous among the almost countless descendants of king James's Bible.

That the edition described above as the first was really the editio princeps of the AV, few scholars will be found to deny.[*] But, when we come to inquire which of the others is to be placed next to it, we are met by a difficulty. A number of Bibles are in existence, the first, or general, title of which agrees in wording with that of the assumed first edition, but differs slightly in the division of lines, and also in not having for border Boel's copperplate engraving, but a woodcut, similar to the NT border of A.[†] For date, the first title of B has 1613 (sometimes 1611); while the second, or NT title, has regularly 1611, and has also, what that of A has not, the words (in italics) 'Appointed to be read in Churches.'[‡] In what relation, now, do A and B stand to each other? It has been held that they represent 'two contemporary issues . . . separately composed and printed, for the sake of speedy production, in 1611.'[§] But this supposition is negatived by the fact that in both these Bibles—and indeed in all the black-letter folios of the AV, save only one of 1613, in smaller type—the printing is so arranged that every leaf ends with the same word. The sheets, notwithstanding many internal differences, could thus be interchanged, and in point of fact are often found so interchanged in copies of the editions dated 1611, 1613, 1617, 1634, 1640. It follows that no two could have been set up simultaneously from two corrected Bishops' Bibles used as 'copy' by separate compositors. They could not by accident have brought their leaves to end uniformly at the same word. The alternative remains of supposing B derived from A, or A from B. Of these Dr. Scrivener chooses the latter. He considers B 'to have been printed first, and rejected by the translators on account of its inaccuracy in favour of the more carefully revised A edition; but to have been ultimately published, by a kind of fraud on the part of the printers, after the translators were dispersed.'[‖] Notwithstanding the learning and ability with which this opinion is defended by its author, it will hardly gain the credit of being more than a brilliant paradox, with those who weigh impartially the evidence furnished by the errors and corrections observable in the two volumes.

In endeavouring to single out the more noticeable in the almost endless list of editions of the AV that have appeared since 1611, our attention is first arrested by those which are conspicuous for the number of errors admitted, or for the efforts made to eliminate previous errors. A few preliminary words thus become necessary on the responsibility of printers in the 17th century.

It is a mistake to suppose that the appointment of King's or Queen's Printer, then or formerly, implied any obligation to greater vigilance in ensuring accuracy of printing. It was simply a matter of purchase. In this way Robert Barker's father, Christopher, had bought, in 1577, a patent granted by Elizabeth a few years before to Sir Thomas Wilkes, and thus became Queen's Printer. In this capacity he opposed the claim of Cambridge, in 1583, to maintain a university press. In 1627 the Barkers assigned their rights to Bonham Norton and John Bill. But in 1635 Robert Barker's second son, of the same name, bought back the reversion of the patent; and it continued in their family till 1709, having had a run of 132 years. The subsequent stages, through Thomas Baskett, need not be particularized. In 1799 a fresh patent was granted to George Eyre, Andrew Strahan, and John Reeves; and so we come to the present distinguished firm of Eyre & Spottiswoode.[*]

It is obvious that purely business transactions, such as these, would not of necessity give rise to any lofty ideal of responsibility in a King's Printer. He would feel it his first duty to recoup himself for the sums laid out. Any higher standard of work must be prompted by his own sense of noblesse oblige. Accordingly, we are not surprised to find traces of bad workmanship multiplying in editions of the AV, as the years roll on. A flagrant example of such negligence is to be seen in the 8vo edition of 1631,[†] printed by Robert Barker and the assignees of J. Bill. In this, besides many other mistakes, the 'not' is left out in the Seventh Commandment (Ex 20^{14}). For this, it is fair to say, the printers were fined in the then substantial sum of £300 by the Court of High Commission, with Laud at its head. With the proceeds of the fine, Laud, it is said, designed to purchase a fount of Greek type for the university press of Oxford; but it does not appear that payment of the money was ever enforced.

The universities, to which we are now accustomed to look for accuracy and beauty of typography, were late in the race. Cambridge, as we have seen, had pleaded the privilege of its press as far back as 1583. But in point of fact no English Bible issued from it till 1629; nor from that of Oxford till 1673–5. The Cambridge folio of 1629, printed by Thomas and John Buck, is a creditable piece of work, and shows traces of careful revision. But it is the first to exhibit a misprint, which held its ground, it is said, till 1803—'thy doctrine' for 'the doctrine,' in 1 Ti 4^{16}.

In 1638 a still more serious attempt at revision was made by a little band of Cambridge scholars, at the command, we are told, of Charles I. Their names are preserved in a manuscript note, made in a copy of the Bible in question, by a contemporary Master of Jesus College. They were Dr. Goad, Rector of Hadleigh in Suffolk, an old Eton and King's man; Dr. Ward and Mr. Boyse (Bois), both already spoken of in the lists of translators; and Mr. Mead, more familiar to us as Joseph Mede. Dr. Scrivener, while speaking favourably of their work as a whole, points out some fresh errata due to them: among these the substitution of 'ye' for 'we' in Ac 6^3, foolishly believed by some to be not an accidental misprint, but a deliberate change, made under Nonconformist influences.

Of other editions of the AV, an 8vo, printed at Edinburgh in 1633, may be noticed as the first printed in Scotland; the earliest in Ireland not appearing till 1714, and in America not till 1752.[‡] A 12mo of 1682, professing to be printed in London, but in all probability from a press in Amsterdam, may be taken as a specimen of a number of editions, produced in Holland, but counterfeiting the imprints of London publishers, with the object of imposing upon English readers. They are mostly full of errors. Conspicuous for the magnificence of their typography are the noble folios of John Baskett (Oxford, 1717) and John Baskerville (Cambridge, 1763). In the former of these, however, a misprint of 'vinegar' for 'vineyard' (or 'vinegarth'?) in the headline over Lk 22, has caused it to be commonly known as 'The Vinegar Bible.'

Passing over the folio of 1701, revised by Bishop Lloyd, in which for the first time dates, taken in the main from Ussher, were added in the margin, we come to two editions which, from their proximity of date and similarity of aim, may be conveniently studied together. These are (1) an edition in folio and one in quarto (2 vols.), printed by J. Bentham at the Cambridge University Press in 1762, revised by Dr. Thomas Paris, Fellow of Trinity College; and (2) an edition, also in folio and quarto, issued from the Clarendon Press at Oxford in 1769, revised by Dr. Benjamin Blayney. The fame of Dr. Paris has to some degree suffered eclipse; partly from the later editor having his predecessor's work to improve upon, and partly from the accident of a fire at Dod the bookseller's having destroyed the greater part of the impression of 1762.[*] Yet competent judges have pronounced the work of Dr. Paris to be at the least not inferior to that of his successor. There is extant a report, dated Oct. 25th, 1769,[†] addressed by Dr. Blayney to his employers, the delegates of the Clarendon Press, in which he states the principles by which he, and by implication Dr. Paris, had been guided. The restoration of the exact text of 1611, where not itself corrupt; the modernizing of the spelling; the weeding-out of references to passages in no way parallel, and the replacing of them by fresh ones; the making clear the allusions contained in Hebrew proper names by adding their English equivalents in the margin; the rectification of the use of italics; the reform of the punctuation,—such were some of the objects aimed at. Oxford has done honour to Dr. Blayney, by making his two revisions of 1769 the standard text for its university press. Dr. Scrivener associates the work of Dr. Paris with his as deserving of equal praise, pronouncing their labours to be 'the last two considerable efforts to improve and correct our ordinary editions of Holy Scripture.' With these, accordingly, the present section may fitly close. But a parting word of tribute must not, in justice, be withheld from the work of Dr. Scrivener himself, whose Cambridge Paragraph Bible (in 3 parts, 1870–3) is a model of care and laborious exactness.[‡]

[†] Scrivener, Authorized Edition, p. 25 n., gives 1632 as the date, and speaks of one copy only as known to be in existence, namely at Wolfenbüttel. Mr. Henry Stevens (Cat. of the Caxton Celebration, 1877, p. 114) shows both these statements to be incorrect. The name 'Wicked Bible' originated with Mr. Stevens in 1852.

[‡] We have not considered it within our province to notice versions of detached portions of Holy Scripture. But an exception seems properly made in favour of Sir John Cheke's translation of St. Matthew and part of the first chapter of St. Mark. This singular work is in a fragmentary state, and there is nothing to show how far the author meant to carry it. The MS, in Cheke's beautiful handwriting, is preserved in the Library of Corpus Christi Coll., Cambridge. It is unfortunately defective, having lost a leaf containing Mt 16^{25}–18^7 inclusive, wanting also the last ten verses of ch. 28. It ends abruptly with the words 'Capernaum, and' in Mk 1. Marginal notes are added, dealing chiefly, as befitted the scholar who 'taught Cambridge and king Edward Greek,' with the wording of the original. Cheke's translation, though probably made about 1550, lay unpublished till 1843, when it found a competent editor in the Rev. James Goodwin, B.D. Its chief peculiarity lies in the attempt deliberately made to exclude words of foreign origin, and like Barnes, the Dorset poet, to use solely, or as nearly so as possible, words of native growth. Thus for 'captivity' he writes 'outpeopling'; for 'lunatic,' 'mooned'; for 'publicans,' 'tollers'; for 'apostle,' 'frosent'; for 'proselyte,' 'freschman'; for 'crucified,' 'crossed.' His principles in this respect were the opposite of those held by Gardiner and his school. Sometimes he is not consistent. Thus in Mt 3 (he adopts the division into chapters, but not into verses) he uses 'acrids' for locusts; but in Mk 1 he retains 'locustes,' putting ἀκρίδας in the margin. Sometimes his system reduces him to hard shifts, as when for 'tetrarch' he gives 'debitee of y^e fourth part of y^e contree.' His method of spelling is interesting, from the light it throws on the pronunciation of the time. To indicate that a vowel is

ix. THE 'REVISED' VERSION.—It must be constantly borne in mind that the work of 1611 was not a new translation, but a revision of an old one. In any such case the thought is readily suggested that the revision may itself need revising. If in nothing else, the revisers may have erred in excess or defect: they may have changed too much or too little. Nor can men who have undertaken to correct the faults of others reasonably complain if their own performance is subjected to unsparing criticism. So it fared with the AV and its authors. Even before the work had seen the light, it became evident that, in certain quarters, it would meet with a hostile reception. And the origin of this hostility is instructive to notice, as disclosing the mixed motives by which men may be influenced under such circumstances.

The leader of the attack was the learned Hebraist, Hugh Broughton; a scholar whose erudition would have fully justified his inclusion in king James's company, but whose lack of judgment and impracticable temper would have made it impossible for him to work with the rest. Rainolds and Lively were old antagonists of his. Moreover, he had himself projected a fresh translation of the Bible. In a letter to Lord Burleigh, dated 21st June 1593, he explained what his plan was. He proposed to have the assistance of five other scholars; to make none but necessary changes; and to add short notes. His views on the subject he further set out in 'An Epistle to the learned Nobility of England, touching translating the Bible from the Original,' published in 1597.[*] And when the AV was in preparation he showed his determination even yet to have a say in the matter, by writing an 'Advertisement how to execute the translation now in hand, that the first edition be onely for a triall, that all learned may have their censure.'[†] We can understand that, when at length the revised translation appeared without his co-operation being asked or his advice attended to, his indignation knew no bounds. A copy of the finished work was sent him for his opinion, and he gave it. Writing to a 'Right Worshipfull Knight attending upon the King,' he passionately exclaims: 'Tell his Majesty that I had rather be rent in pieces with wild horses, than any such translation by my consent should be urged upon poor churches.' It 'bred in me,' he had just said, 'a sadnesse that will grieve me while I breath. It is so ill done.'[‡] The reader will judge how far this was prompted by personal feeling; and how far, as Broughton's learned editor contends, the words were spoken 'in zeal and vindication of the truth.'[§]

As time went on, the faults which Broughton had detected, or thought he could detect, in the AV, were supplemented by an ever-lengthening list of errors due to the carelessness of printers. After the breaking out of the Civil War more especially, learning, and its handmaid, the art of printing, became held in less esteem; and the presses of Holland found their account in doing what the king's printer, or an English university, should have done. But the editions of the Bible thus imported were, it need hardly be said, in most cases extremely incorrect. So serious was the mischief judged to be, that, as early as 1643, the Assembly of Divines made a report to Parliament on the subject. In it they complained of the faultiness of these Dutch editions. To substantiate their charge, they were content with three instances only; but these, it must be admitted, were enough:—Gn 36[24] 'found the rulers' for 'found the mules'; Ru 4[13] 'gave her corruption' for 'gave her conception'; Lk 21[28] 'your condemnation' for 'your redemption.' The Assembly's report was followed up by an appeal from the learned Dr. John Lightfoot. In a sermon preached before the Long Parliament, Aug. 26th, 1645, he urged upon the members the necessity for a 'review and survey of the translation of the Bible,' that by this means people 'might come to understand the proper and genuine reading of the Scriptures by an exact, vigorous, and lively translation.'[*]

It does not appear that either report or sermon produced any immediate effect. There exists, indeed, the draft of a bill, proposed to be brought before Parliament in 1653, authorizing the appointment of a committee 'to search and observe wherein that last translation appears to be wronged by Prelates or printers or others.'[†] But the spirit which prompted the motion for such an inquiry was too obvious, and nothing came of it. There were, in truth, vested interests at stake, and abuses connected with them, not easy to reform, even under a Protectorate.

Henry Hills and John Field (who had obtained his patent from Cromwell) were the licensed printers to the University of Cambridge. But the fact that they had to pay for their privilege a yearly bribe of £500 to certain persons in power,[‡] prepares us to expect from them little conscientious work. Accordingly, when, in 1659, William Kilburne, Gent., printed at Finsbury his Dangerous Errors in Severall Late printed Bibles: to the great scandal and corruption of sound and true Religion, it was chiefly against these two printers that his attack is directed. The longer title, or Advertisement, of the tract[§] describes it as 'discovering (amongst many thousands of others) some pernicious erroneous & corrupt Erratas Escapes & Faults in several Impressions of the Holy Bible and Testament within these late years commonly vended & dispersed, to the great scandal of Religion, but more particularly in the Impressions of Henry Hills and John Field, printers . . .' Kilburne brings heavy charges; but he fully justifies them. Two specimens must suffice. Both are from pocket Bibles printed by Field, in 1656 and 1653 respectively:—Jn 7[39] 'this spake he of the spirits' for 'this spake he of the Spirit'; 1 Co 6[9] 'the unrighteous shall inherit' for 'the unrighteous shall not inherit.'

The improvement which authority, regal and republican alike, had seemed powerless to effect, was brought about by private effort and the slow but unvarying growth of public opinion. If any one will take the trouble to go through a list of editions of English Bibles, and parts thereof, which have appeared from about the middle of the 17th to the middle of the 19th cent., he can hardly fail to be struck with the steady increase, first, of paraphrases, and then of new or emended versions of separate books of Holy Scripture. The names of Edward Wells and Zachary Pearce, of Chandler, Harwood and Gilbert Wakefield, of Archbishop Newcome and Bishop Lowth, not to mention many others, will meet him at every turn in this field of inquiry. Or let him apply a simple numerical test to the first fifty years of the 19th cent., taking Cotton's List of Editions as a con-long, he doubles it. Thus we have 'taak' (take), 'swijn' (swine), 'ameen,' 'propheet,' 'Herood,' and the like. 'Church' (p. 67) is said to be sounded 'moor corruptly and frenchlike' than the north-country 'Kurk.' Speaking generally, the value of the work is philological rather than biblical.

venient basis for his calculation. He will find that there are only nine years out of the fifty in which there has not appeared some fresh translation, or new edition of such translation, of some or all the books of the Bible. And Cotton's List is not exhaustive.[*]

Whatever might be the merits or defects of these versions—and some of them are very defective, especially in point of style[†]—they had the effect of keeping alive an interest in the subject. Men were constantly reminded that the revision of 1611, with all its high qualities, could not be accepted as final. Moreover, by the labours of Brian Walton, Kennicott, Mill, Bentley, and others, the only sure foundation for the reviser's work had been laid, or had at least begun to be laid, in fixing, on sound principles, the original texts.

Forces were thus slowly gathering, which culminated during the middle third, or nearly so, of the last century. Many causes contributed to bring about this result. The after-swell of the Reform Bill agitation and of the Oxford movement was still felt, making men less satisfied with things as they were, simply because they were. It was the period of the biblical labours of Tischendorf and Tregelles, of Wordsworth and Alford, of Trench and Scrivener, of Lightfoot, Westcott and Hort. Public attention had been called afresh to the subject of revision by a series of pamphlets and reviews. In 1849 appeared the third and enlarged edition of Professor Scholefield's learned Hints for an improved Translation of the New Testament. In October 1855 an Edinburgh reviewer, discussing the merits of an Annotated Paragraph Bible, published by the Religious Tract Society two years before, in which corrections of the AV had been freely introduced, expressed the conviction, not only that 'our Common Version requires a diligent revision, but that the great body of the people are aware of it; and that their trust in its perfection, which has been so long opposed against any suggestion of improvement, can no longer be alleged as a pretext for delaying the attempt.'[*] On March 1st, 1856, Canon Selwyn brought the matter before the notice of the Lower House of Convocation, and followed this up, in the autumn of the same year, by the pamphlet just cited. In July 1856 Mr. James Heywood, M.P. for North Lancashire, moved in the House of Commons an address to the Crown, 'praying that Her Majesty would appoint a Royal Commission of learned men, to consider of such amendments of the authorized version of the Bible as had been already proposed, and to receive suggestions from all persons who might be willing to offer them, and to report the amendments which they might be prepared to recommend.'[†] After a short discussion the motion was withdrawn. But its author did not let the subject drop; publishing The Bible and its Revisers in 1857, and the State of the Authorized Bible Revision in 1860. In 1857 a good pattern of what such a revision should be was set in the publication of The Gospel according to St. John . . . revised by five clergymen. In 1863 a remark by the Speaker of the House of Commons (J. Evelyn Denison, afterwards Lord Ossington), suggested the undertaking of the 'Speaker's' Commentary, one express object of which was 'a revision of the translation.'

Not to dwell longer on preliminary matters, by the spring of 1870 things were ripe for action. On February 10th of that year, the Bishop of Winchester (Dr. S. Wilberforce), anticipating a motion which Canon Selwyn had prepared to introduce into the Lower House, moved in the Upper House of Convocation of the Southern Province, 'that a Committee of both Houses be appointed, with power to confer with any Committee that may be appointed by the Convocation of the Northern Province, to report upon the desirableness of a revision of the AV of the NT, whether by marginal notes or otherwise, in all those passages where plain and clear errors, whether in the Hebrew or Greek text originally adopted by the translators, or in the translation made from the same, shall, on due investigation, be found to exist.'[‡] The Bishop of Llandaff (Dr. A. Ollivant) carried an amendment, to include the OT in the terms of the motion. When the motion, thus amended, had been agreed to, it was sent down to the Lower House (Feb. 11), where it was accepted without a division. In pursuance of it, a joint Committee, consisting of eight members of the Upper House and sixteen of the Lower, was formed. The Convocation of the Northern Province had in the meantime declined to co-operate. They admitted the existence of blemishes in the AV. They were 'favourable to the errors being corrected.' But they 'would deplore any recasting of the text.' Notwithstanding, the work went on; and on May 3rd a Report of the joint Committee, embodied in five Resolutions, was laid before both Houses of the Southern Convocation. The Resolutions affirmed—

> '1. That it is desirable that a revision of the AV of the Holy Scriptures be undertaken.
> 2. That the revision be so conducted as to comprise both marginal renderings and such emendations as it may be found necessary to insert in the text of the AV.
> 3. That in the above Resolutions we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible, or any alteration of the language, except when in the judgment of the most competent scholars such change is necessary.
> 4. That in such necessary changes the style of the language employed in the existing version be closely followed.

[*] A good summary of the steps finally leading to the revision of 1881, so far at least as the year 1863, is given in Professor Plumptre's article on the Authorized Version in vol. iii. of Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. A list of works, bearing more or less directly on the revision of the AV, beginning with Robert Gell's Essay, fol., 1659, will be found in the App. (pp. 216–9) to Trench's On the AV of the NT, 1859.

[†] It is almost a slaying of the slain to quote Dr. Edward Harwood (A Liberal Translation of the NT, 2 vols. 8vo, 1768), who thus begins the parable of the Prodigal Son: 'A gentleman of a splendid family and opulent fortune had two sons. One day the younger approached his father, and begged him in the most importunate and soothing terms to make a partition of his effects betwixt himself and his elder brother. The indulgent father, overcome by his blandishments, immediately divided all his fortunes betwixt them.' Ja $2^{2.3}$ appears thus: 'For should there enter into your assembly a person arrayed in a magnificent and splendid dress, with a brilliant diamond sparkling on his hand, and should there enter at the same time a man in a mean and sordid habit; Your eyes being instantly attracted by the lustre of this superb vest, should you immediately introduce the person thus sumptuously habited into the best seat,' etc. A revised version of the Bible by J. T. Conquest, M.D. (2nd ed. 1846), purports to contain 'nearly twenty thousand emendations.' The following are a few brief specimens:—

Is 9^{1-3} 'Nevertheless the darkness shall not be such as was in her anguish
When at first he rendered contemptible
The land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali,
So shall he confer honour upon them
By the way of the sea, beyond the Jordan, in Galilee of the nations.
The people who walked in darkness, have seen a great light:
Those who dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them the light shineth.
Thou hast multiplied the nation,
Whose joy thou didst not increase. . . .'
1 Co 15^{12} 'How say some among you, that there is no resurrection and future existence of the dead?'

> 5. That it is desirable that Convocation should nominate a body of its own members to undertake the work of revision, who shall be at liberty to invite the co-operation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they may belong.'

This Report was unanimously adopted by the Upper House, and eight bishops were at once nominated, in accordance with the terms of the last Resolution, to be its quota towards the new joint Committee. On May 5th the report was discussed in the Lower House. Some opposition was there shown to the principle embodied in the last clause of the fifth Resolution; but, on a division, the adoption of the Report was carried, with but two dissentients. On May 6th eight of their own body were chosen, to co-operate with the others in forming the new Committee. This new, or second, joint Committee held its first meeting on May 25th, 1870. It then passed a series of Resolutions, indicating the lines on which the work should be carried out. In substance these were as follows, the more important ones being quoted in full:—

I. Committee to separate into two Companies—one for OT, the other for NT.
II. Names of the members of Convocation, nine in all, forming the OT Company.
III. Names as before, seven in all, for the NT Company.
IV. OT Company to begin with Pentateuch.
V. NT ,, ,, ,, Synoptical Gospels.
VI. Names of 'Scholars and Divines' (18) to be invited to join the OT Company.
VII. Names of 'Scholars and Divines' (19) to be invited to join the NT Company.[*]
VIII. That the general principles to be followed by both Companies be as follows:—
    '1. To introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the Authorized Version, consistently with faithfulness.
    2. To limit, as far as possible, the expressions of such alterations to the language of the Authorized and earlier English versions.
    3. Each Company to go twice over the portion to be revised, once provisionally, the second time finally, and on principles of voting as hereinafter is provided.
    4. That the Text to be adopted be that for which the evidence is decidedly preponderating; and that when the Text so adopted differs from that from which the Authorized Version was made, the alteration be indicated in the margin.
    5. To make or retain no change in the Text on the second final revision by each Company, except two-thirds of those present approve of the same, but on the first revision to decide by simple majorities.
    6. Cases in which voting may be deferred.
    7. Headings of chapters, etc., to be revised.
    8. Permission to consult learned men, 'whether at home or abroad.'
IX. The work of each Company, on completion, to be communicated to the other, to secure, as far as possible, uniformity in language.
X. 1. 2. 3. 'Bye-rules' as to the mode of making corrections.

The invitation given in accordance with Resolutions VI. and VII. was declined by Canon F. C. Cook, Dr. J. H. Newman, Dr. Pusey, and Dr. W. Wright of the British Museum. The last-mentioned, however, subsequently joined the OT Company. Of those who accepted it, Dr. S. P. Tregelles was prevented by ill-health from joining in the work, while Professor M'Gill was removed by death in 1871. Dean Alford, one of the original members appointed by Convocation, died in the same year. Two other members of like standing, Dr. Chr. Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln, and Dr. Jebb, Dean of Hereford, resigned their seats at an early stage of the proceedings. Seven new members were chosen in their stead, of whom one, Dean Merivale, resigned in 1871. Others were added subsequently. The lists of members were accordingly as follows:—

MEMBERS OF THE OT REVISION COMPANY.[†]

The Rt. Rev. Connop Thirlwall, Bishop of St. Davids (Chairman till 1871).
The Rt. Rev. E. H. Browne, Bishop of Ely, afterwards of Winchester (Chairman from 1871).

[*] The names in Resolutions II., III., VI., VII. are included in the final lists given below.

[†] This and the following list are drawn up, in the main, from those prepared by Dr. Philip Schaff for his Companion to the Gr. Test. 1883. It will be noticed that the present list contains 37 names, Dr. Schaff's only 27. There is no real discrepancy. The difference of 10 is made up by including those who were removed by death or resignation during the progress of the work. If they had sat as members, for however short a time, it seemed fair to include them. The losses by death in the OT Company up to 1875, after which year no new names were added to the list, were 7, and by resignation 3. Under the former head come Bishop Thirlwall, Archdeacon Rose, Canon Selwyn, Principal Fairbairn, and Professors M'Gill, Weir, and Davies. Under the latter, Bp. Wordsworth, Canon Jebb, and Professor Plumptre.

[*] Dr. Schaff's list (exclusive of the Secretary, the Rev. John Troutbeck) contains 24 names; the present one, 28. The difference is accounted for by the presence or absence of the names of Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Alford, and Professor Eadie (removed by death), and of Dean Merivale (resigned).

The Rev. W. G. Humphry, Prebendary of St. Paul's.
Dr. B. H. Kennedy, Canon of Ely; Regius Professor of Greek, Cambridge.
Dr. J. B. Lightfoot, Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge; afterwards Bishop of Durham.
Dr. W. Milligan, Professor of Divinity, Aberdeen.
Dr. W. F. Moulton, afterwards Master of The Leys School, Cambridge.
Dr. S. Newth, Principal of New College, Hampstead.
Dr. Alexander Roberts, Professor of Humanity, St. Andrews.
Dr. F. H. A. Scrivener, afterwards Vicar of Hendon.
Dr. G. Vance Smith, afterwards Principal of the Presbyterian Coll., Carmarthen.
Dr. C. J. Vaughan, Master of the Temple; Dean of Llandaff.
Dr. B. F. Westcott, Canon of Peterborough; Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge; afterwards Bishop of Durham.

The two Companies, thus constituted, began their labours in June 1870. On the morning of June 22nd the members of the NT Revision Company met together in Henry VII.'s Chapel, to join in Holy Communion, as the best preparation for the work then to be begun. The OT Company first assembled for business on June 30th. One of the NT Revisers, Dr. Newth, has left us a minute and interesting description[*] of the mode of procedure observed in the Company to which he belonged. Much of what he says will apply equally to both Companies; but want of space forbids all but the briefest extracts. The place of meeting was the historic Jerusalem Chamber, placed at their disposal by Dean Stanley. Here, on four consecutive days of every month in the year, except August and September, the NT Revisers met. The session lasted from eleven to six, with half an hour's interval for lunch. The ordinary routine is thus described:—Preliminary matters over, 'the Chairman invites the Company to proceed with the revision, and reads a short passage as given in the AV. The question is then asked whether any textual changes are proposed; that is, any readings that differ from the Greek text as presented in the edition published by Robert Stephen in 1550. If any change is proposed, the evidence for and against is briefly stated, and the proposal considered. The duty of stating this evidence is, by tacit consent, devolved upon two members of the Company, who, from their previous studies, are specially entitled to speak with authority upon such questions—Dr. Scrivener and Dr. Hort. . . . After discussion, the vote of the Company is taken, and the proposed reading accepted or rejected.' The reading being thus settled, questions of rendering followed, and were dealt with in a similar way.

It is evident that, with such methods, progress would necessarily be slow. In fact, at the close of their ninth sitting the NT Company had finished the first revision of not more than 153 verses, or an average of 17 a day.[†] It was even proposed, for more expedition, to divide the Company into two sections; one beginning the Epistles, while the other proceeded with the Gospels. Fortunately, the proposal was negatived.

Meantime an event occurred which, while promising to make the work more thorough, seemed likely to render it still more protracted. This was the association with the English[‡] Revisers of two Companies of American biblical scholars. The arrangements were not completed till Dec. 7th, 1871, and work was not actually begun by the American contingent till Oct. 4th, 1872, after they had received from England the first revision of the Synoptic Gospels.[§] But there is evidence that such co-operation had been thought of, almost from the very first. 'On July 7th, 1870, it was moved in the Lower House of Convocation by the present Prolocutor (Lord Alwyne Compton) that the Upper House should be requested to instruct the Committee of Convocation to invite the co-operation of some American divines.' This was at once assented to by the Upper House.[*] Difficulties naturally arose, but were overcome by patience and tact, and by the good feeling displayed on both sides. A visit of Dr. Angus to New York in August 1870, and of Dr. Schaff to this country in the following year (when he was present, unofficially, at one of the meetings of the English NT Revision Company and observed their methods), helped to smooth the way. A representative Committee of American scholars and theologians was formed, with Dr. Schaff for President, and this resolved itself into two Companies, as follows:—

Old Testament Revision Company (American).

Dr. W. H. Green (Chairman), Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.
Dr. G. E. Day (Secretary), Divinity School of Yale College, New Haven, Conn.
Dr. C. A. Aiken, Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.
Dr. T. W. Chambers, Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, N.Y.
Dr. T. J. Conant, Brooklyn, N.Y.
Dr. J. de Witt, Theological Seminary, New Brunswick, N.J.
Dr. G. E. Hare, Divinity School, Phila.
Dr. C. P. Krauth, Vice-Provost of the University of Pennsylvania, Phila.
Dr. T. Lewis, Professor Emeritus of Greek and Hebrew, Union College, Schenectady, N.Y. (d. 1877).
Dr. C. M. Mead, Theological Seminary, Andover, Mass.
Dr. H. Osgood, Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y.
Dr. J. Packard, Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va.
Dr. C. E. Stowe, Hartford, Conn.
Dr. J. Strong, Theological Seminary, Madison, N.J.
Dr. C. V. A. Van Dyck, Beirût, Syria (consulting member on questions of Arabic).

New Testament Revision Company (American).

Dr. T. D. Woolsey, New Haven, Conn. (Chairman).
Dr. J. H. Thayer, Theological Seminary, Andover, Mass. (Secretary).
Dr. Ezra Abbot, Divinity School, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass
Dr. J. K. Burr, Trenton, New Jersey.
Dr. Thomas Chase, President of Haverford College, Pa.
Dr. Howard Crosby, Chancellor of New York University, N.Y.
Dr. Timothy Dwight, Divinity School, Yale College, New Haven, Conn.
Dr. H. B. Hackett, Theological Seminary, Rochester, N.Y. (d. 1876).
Dr. James Hadley, Professor of Greek, Yale College, New Haven (d. 1872).
Dr. Charles Hodge, Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J. (d. 1878).
Dr. A. C. Kendrick, University of Rochester, N.Y.
The Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, Bishop of the Diocese of Delaware.
Dr. M. B. Riddle, Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn.
Dr. Philip Schaff, Union Theological Seminary, N.Y.
Dr. Charles Short, Columbia College, N.Y.
Dr. E. A. Washburn, Calvary Church, N.Y. (d. Feb. 1881).

It will be noticed that four members of the above Company died before seeing the fruit of their labours, but not before they had each taken part, for a longer or shorter time, in the work. Two names are not included—those of Dr. G. R. Crooks of New York, and Dr. W. F. Warren of Boston—both of whom accepted the invitation to join the Company, but found themselves unable to attend. The place of meeting was the Bible House, New York. Owing to the start they had gained, the English Companies had finished the first revision of the Synoptic Gospels, and been twice over the Pentateuch, respectively, by the time their American brethren were ready to begin. The manner in which their fellow-work was then carried on is described in the Preface to the Revised NT.

'We transmitted to them from time to time,' say the English Revisers, 'each several portion of our First Revision, and received from them in return their criticisms and corrections. These we considered with much care and attention during the time we were engaged on our Second Revision. We then sent over to them the various portions of the Second Revision as they were completed, and received further suggestions, which, like the former, were closely and carefully considered. Last of > all, we forwarded to them the RV in its final form; and a list of those passages in which they desire to place on record their preference of other readings and renderings will be found at the end of the volume.'

The first revision of the entire NT occupied six years of labour; the second, about two years and a half. What was to some extent a third revision, together with various necessary details, prolonged the task of the English Company till Nov. 11th, 1880, 'on which day, at five o'clock in the afternoon, after ten years and five months of labour, the revision of the NT was brought to a close.'[*] The Preface bears that date. But further causes of delay intervened; and it was not till Tuesday, May 17th, 1881, for London, and Friday, May 20th, for New York, that the actual publication took place. The scene in each city on both those days—the congestion of streets in the booksellers' quarter, the stoppage of all other traffic, the night-and-day labours of the work-people employed—will not soon be forgotten by those who witnessed them. Dr. Schaff computes that at least three million copies of the Revised NT were sold, in this country and the United States together, within the first year of its publication.

Meantime the revision of the OT was advancing, on similar lines, but more slowly, from the greater extent of ground to be covered. The Revisers in this case were more conservative than their fellow-workers on the NT, and their version differs less in proportion from the Authorized than does the other. The Preface, dated July 10th, 1884, speaks of the revision of the OT as completed in eighty-five sessions, ending on June 20th, 1884, having occupied 792 days, usually of six hours each. The day of actual publication, May 19th, 1885, was marked by little of the excitement which attended the publication of the NT four years before. The Revised Bible, in its complete form, bore the title:—'The | Holy Bible | containing the | Old and New Testaments | Translated out of the Original Tongues | Being the Version set forth A.D. 1611 | Compared with the most ancient Authorities and Revised. | Printed for the Universities of | Oxford and Cambridge | Oxford [or Cambridge] | At the University Press | 1885.'

No mention has thus far been made of any revision of the Apocrypha. Such an extension of the work does not appear to have been contemplated by Convocation. That it was finally included in the scheme was a result of the negotiations about copyright. In the course of 1872 an agreement was entered into between the Committee of Convocation and the representatives of the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge, by which the latter, on condition of acquiring the copyright of the RV, when completed, agreed to provide a sum sufficient to cover the bare cost of production, including the travelling expenses of members of the Companies; whose labour, in other respects, was a labour of love.[†] It was then for the first time stipulated by the University printers, that the Apocrypha should be included in the scheme of revision. This was assented to.

In pursuance of the compact thus made, it was arranged between the two English Companies of Revisers (the Americans not joining in this part of the work), that, as soon as the NT Company should have finished its task, it should resolve itself into three committees for the purpose of beginning the revision of the Apocrypha.[‡] These were to be called, in imitation of their predecessors of 1611, the London, Westminster, and Cambridge Committees. The first of the three had assigned to it the Book of Sirach; the second had 1 Mac., to which were afterwards added Tobit and Judith; the third was to take Wisdom and 2 Maccabees. The London Committee began work on May 11th, 1881, and finished the second and final revision of Sirach on May 25th, 1883. The Westminster Committee completed their second revision of 1 Mac. on Nov. 3rd, 1881, and the remainder of their task on Oct. 11th, 1882. The work of the Cambridge Committee lasted from the spring of 1881 to the summer of 1892. During this comparatively long interval space was found for giving the difficult Book of Wisdom a third revision.

The OT Revision Company having in the meantime (July 1884) come to the end of their own proper labours, passed a resolution, appointing six of their number a committee for revising the remaining books of the Apocrypha. Of these six, two were unable to take any part in the work; and Dr. Field, one of the OT Company, whose co-operation had been invited for the settlement of the text, died in April 1885. A small committee of four members—Professor Lumby, Professor Robertson Smith, Mr. Bensly, and Mr. W. Aldis Wright—had thus the task of revising what remained of the Apocrypha, comprising 1 and 2 Esdras, Ad. Esther, Baruch, Song of the Three Children, the History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, and the Prayer of Manasses. For one of these books (2 Esdras) they had the benefit of Bensly's careful reconstruction of the text, and were thus able to give a translation of the 'missing fragment' (7^{36-105}). In the other instances no critical settlement of the existing text was attempted. The revised Apocrypha was published early in 1895. It bore the title: 'The | Apocrypha | Translated out of the | Greek and Latin tongues | Being the Version set forth A.D. 1611 | Compared with the most ancient Authorities and | Revised A.D. 1894 | Printed for the Universities of | Oxford and Cambridge | Oxford [or Cambridge] | At the University Press | 1895.'

In endeavouring to form a just estimate of the merits of the RV, it will be convenient to take the component parts of it in the order in which they appeared. The NT, moreover, challenges our attention first, because of its surpassing importance, because the changes made in revising it were relatively much more numerous than in the case of the OT, and because the attack and defence were here the most strenuous. As was not unnatural, the strife grew fiercest about the form in which the Lord's Prayer was now set forth. In both its forms (Mt 6^{9-13}, Lk 11^{2-4}) alike it was now without the doxology. The form in Luke was much curtailed. For 'Our Father which art in heaven' it had simply 'Father.' It lacked altogether two petitions—'Thy will,' etc., and 'Deliver us from evil.' These changes were made on MS authority, believed to be the highest; and the clauses omitted were duly noted in the margin. So far, the Revisers were within their rights. But a further alteration of 'from evil' to 'from the evil one' could not be so easily defended. It was understood to have been accepted mainly through the influence of Bishop Lightfoot. A chief argument for the change, the alleged fact that ῥύσασθαι ἀπό, as distinguished from ῥύσασθαι ἐκ, denotes deliverance from a person, not a state, was controverted by other scholars; and we cannot but wish that, in this instance, the renderings in the text and margin could have changed places.[*]

[‡] Preface to the Apocrypha in the RV, from which most of the particulars immediately following are taken.

[*] See, for an outline of the controversy, the Bishop of Durham's three letters in the Guardian of Sept. 7th, 14th, and 21st, 1881, reprinted in A Fresh Revision of the NT, 3rd ed. 1891, and Canon F. C. Cook's A Second Letter to the Lord Bishop of London, 1882.

Fault was also found with the change—the uncalled-for change, as it seemed to many—in the order of the words in the familiar Song of Simeon. What was gained, men would ask, by thus re-grouping the well-remembered lines—

> 'Now lettest thou thy servant depart, O Lord,
> According to thy word, in peace'?

A more perfect parallelism, it might be replied, and a closer adherence to the order of the original. But the further question might be pressed: How far is this latter quality essential to a good idiomatic translation?

More irritating, however, than such changes in important passages as we have noticed, were the incessant alterations in small particulars, which tripped up the reader at every turn.[*] One accustomed to 'Jesus stood on the shore,' in Jn 21^4, could not take kindly to 'Jesus stood on the beach,' even though assured that the rendering of αἰγιαλός was thus kept uniform. Nor would one who knew how deeply the phrase 'vials of wrath' was embedded in our language, fail to demur, if he read Rev 15, at having 'bowls of the wrath of God' substituted for the familiar expression. The Revisers of 1611 and those of 1881 both equally admitted that no two words in different languages cover precisely the same ground. But from this common axiom they proceeded to opposite conclusions. The older translators felt justified by it in varying the rendering of the same word in the original. They even made a merit of doing so. 'We have not tied ourselves,' they say in their Preface, 'to an uniformity of phrasing or to an identity of words, as some peradventure would wish that we had done. . . . That we should express the same notion in the same particular word; as, for example, if we translate the Hebrew or Greek word once by purpose, never to call it intent . . . thus to mince the matter, we thought to savour more of curiosity than wisdom.'

The liberty thus claimed is freely used in the AV, and, it must be admitted, deserves at times rather to be called licence. The translation may gain in spirit and buoyancy, but at the cost of losing other qualities yet more precious. How much is lost, for instance, by the capricious alteration of 'destroy' to 'defile,' in 1 Co 3^{17}?—'If any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy.' Nothing but the love of variety for its own sake could have prompted the double rendering of διαιρέσεις in 1 Co 12^{4-6} by 'differences' and 'diversities,' and of ἐνεργημάτων and its cognate verb by 'operations' and 'worketh.' Hardly less injurious to the sense, in many passages, is the converse fault of using the same English word to translate different words in the original. Thus 'light' serves as the equivalent of φῶς, φωστήρ (Ph 2^{15}), φωτισμός (2 Co 4^4), φέγγος (Lk 11^{33}), λύχνος (Mt 6^{22}); 'know' of οἶδα, γινώσκω, ἐπιγινώσκω, and ἐπίσταμαι. The Revisers of 1881 were fully alive to the difficulties placed in their way by this peculiarity of their predecessors' labour, and speak in their Preface of the principles on which they endeavoured to solve the problem thus presented to them. They discriminated, as far as possible, between 'varieties of rendering which were compatible with fidelity to the true meaning of the text' and 'varieties which involved inconsistency, and were suggestive of differences that had no existence in the Greek.' To the former class they professed themselves lenient. Some have thought that they would have acted more wisely if they had made this class more comprehensive, instead of sacrificing so much for a uniformity of rendering, not always attainable even by themselves.[*]

It may be well, as helping the reader to form a judgment for himself, to set down a short list of passages from the NT in which the rendering of the RV is generally admitted to be an improvement, followed by another of passages in which the changes made are considered by many to be for the worse.

[*] Professor Plumptre computes the number of variations in rendering from the AV of the NT to be more than 35,000. Others make them 36,000. See Canon Cook's Second Letter, p. 6 and n. Cook further estimates that the deviations from the Greek text of 1611 in that adopted by the Revisers exceed 5000. Edgar (The Bibles of England, 1889, p. 342) agrees, making the exact number 5002. The Greek text used by king James's translators, so far as it could be ascertained, was published at Cambridge by Scrivener, and had, as footnotes, the readings preferred by the Revisers. A similar work, but with converse arrangement of text and notes, was published at Oxford by Archdeacon Palmer. The calculation was thus made easy.

[*] See the examples of inconsistency in rendering in the RV collected by Edgar, p. 362. διδάσκαλος is 'teacher,' 'doctor,' 'master'; κύριος has four equivalents; παράκλησις and σπλάγχνα each five. Of course, some of these are AV renderings allowed to remain.

The Revisers of the OT had a task before them in some respects more difficult, in others easier, than that which the NT Revisers had had to face. On the one hand, their subject was a much longer one; more varied in its contents, and hence requiring more diversified knowledge in those who dealt with it; beset, moreover, with greater obscurities, and not illustrated by the light shed from many quarters upon the NT. On the other hand, the confessed obscurity of many passages formed a justification of the Revisers' work; fewer persons were competent to criticise their work; and they had the advantage of an interval of four years after the appearance of the revised NT, in 1881, in which to profit by the verdict passed by public opinion upon the performance of their colleagues. Above all, they were not hampered by the constant necessity of deciding between rival texts of the original. Very wisely, we think, they came to the conclusion, as stated in their Preface, that 'as the state of knowledge on the subject is not at present such as to justify any attempt at an entire reconstruction of the text on the authority of the Versions, the Revisers have thought it most prudent to adopt the Massoretic Text as the basis of their work, and to depart from it, as the Authorized Translators had done, only in exceptional cases.'

Being carried out on the same lines as the revised NT, we find in the present work the same improvements in the arrangement of the English text: the grouping by paragraphs, the indication by spaces of a change of subject, the clearer marking of quotations, the system of parallelism adopted for poetical books and passages, and the like. As in the NT, the direction of Convocation is obeyed, that no change of reading be admitted into the English text if not approved, at the final revision, by a majority of at least two-thirds of the Revisers present. Hence it may often be the case that a particular reading in the margin is one which a majority—though not the requisite majority—of the Revisers would have wished to see inserted in the text. It is permissible to conjecture that an example may be found at the outset in Gn 1^{2}, where 'the spirit of God moved upon' is left undisturbed, but the margin offers the alternative rendering 'was brooding upon' (cf. Dt 32^{11}). As in the case of the NT also, another rule of Convocation is not observed—that, namely, which directed that the revision should extend to 'the headings of pages and chapters.' Both classes of headings have been omitted altogether; with the twofold advantage that space is gained, and the province of the commentator is not encroached upon.

In passing to the more important subject of the merits of the revised translation itself, the first question that will occur to many minds is, whether the changes made are proportionately as numerous as in the NT. Is there, in particular, so frequent an infringement of the rule laid down by the Committee of Convocation 'to introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the AV, consistently with faithfulness'? The prevalent opinion is that there is not. But to give a decisive answer is less easy than might be supposed; partly from the extent of the ground to be covered, and partly from the fact that the language of the OT is in general less familiar to most persons than that of the NT.* Thus in Jon 4^{6} we had 'to deliver him from his grief'—a vigorous and appropriate expression at the time, although it may well be asked how many modern readers are acquainted with the old meaning of 'grief.' Instead of this, we now have 'to deliver him from his evil case'—a rendering which, while closer to the

* Query, used here as a superlative? μείζων is so used in Mt 18^{1} and elsewhere. The tendency of the superlative form of adjs. to disappear in NT Greek (noticed by Rutherford in the Pref. to his new translation of Romans, 1900) is illustrated by the fact that μέγιστος is only found once in the NT (2 P 1^{4}).

§ 'Difficulty' not found in AV. 'Secure,' as a verb, only in Mt 28^{14} (ὑμᾶς ἀμερίμνους ποιήσομεν), where the Revisers have substituted 'rid you of care.' As a rendering of περικρατεῖς γενέσθαι in the present passage, 'secure' is inappropriate, unless (as is probable enough) the RV uses it as simply equivalent to 'get hold of.'

‖ The 'for' refers to a thought suppressed, by a common Gr. idiom. Rutherford thus supplies the ellipse: 'I say barely conceivable, not wholly inconceivable; for,' etc. As left in the text the words are scarcely intelligible.

¶ 'Actually' in this sense is a modernism.

 Burgon (The Revision Revised, p. 147) quotes Bp. Wordsworth of Lincoln as saying that the statement thus put forth, with 'save' instead of 'but,' or 'but only,' 'is illogical and erroneous, and contradicts the whole drift of St. Paul's argument in that Ep. and in the Ep. to the Romans.'

†† πάντων τῶν, not παντοίων, is 'all,' not 'all kinds of.' With ῥίζα, anarthrous as predicate, Field (in loc.) aptly compares (after Wetstein) Athen. vii. p. 280 A, ἀρχὴ καὶ ῥίζα παντος ἀγαθοῦ ἡ τῆς γαστρός ἡδονή.

‡‡ εἰς has undoubtedly better authority than εἰ. But, with this allowance, let the two versions be compared simply as English.

§§ Gr. ὁ τρόπος. 'Let your manners be without auarice' (Rhemish). It must be admitted, however, that the AV is very unintelligible here, or, if intelligible, gives a totally false sense to a modern reader.

* A writer in the Church Quarterly Review (Oct. 1885, pp. 190, 191) reckons that there are about 830 changes in Judges, 684 in Pss 1–41, 335 in Hosea, and 1389 in Job, 'the most difficult book in the OT.' In the Edinburgh Review of the same date, p. 483, similar results are obtained. The reviewer notes 2094 changes in the entire Book of Psalms, 1278 in Jer., 1550 in Ezekiel. On an average of nine books, the changes marked 'important' number about one-sixth of the whole. But it is obvious that opinions might differ widely as to what changes were important.

Hebrew,[*] lacks the spirit and force of the other. Objection has been taken, again, to the substitution of 'my provocation' for 'grief' in 1 S 1^{16}, where Hannah pleads: 'Out of the abundance of my complaint and grief [but is this the meaning of the Heb. כַּעַס ?] have I spoken hitherto.'

The OT Revisers made it a principle not to depart from the Massoretic Text save in 'exceptional cases.' One such case occurs in Jg 18^{30}, where are described the idolatries of the tribe of Dan, and the participation in them of Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son—as we now read—of Moses. The AV in place of Moses has Manasseh. The explanation is simple. To save the great lawgiver from the reproach of having an idolatrous descendant, the Massoretes suggested a corruption of the text in the passage in question, by writing a 'suspended N' over and between the M and S in Moses, thus converting it, so far as the consonants are concerned, into Manasses.[†] The Revisers have rightly restored Moses, which is also the reading of the Vulgate.

To take another example. In Ps 24^{6} the AV reads: 'This is the generation of them that seek him, that seek thy face, O Jacob'; with the marginal variant, 'O God of Jacob.' All attempts to make sense of the former reading being, to say the least, far-fetched, the Revisers have wisely placed in their text that supplied by the margin; in which they have the support of the LXX, the Vulgate, and the Syriac.

The advantage gained by forsaking the received text for the ancient versions being in these and some other instances[‡] indisputable, it is perhaps to be regretted that the Revisers did not use the term 'exceptional' with a greater latitude of meaning. To have done so might have saved them at times from the necessity of encumbering their margin with variants (as in the case of Pss 2^{12} and 22^{16}), only perplexing the reader, and leaving him to reconcile conflicting renderings as best he can.

A word must be said in passing on the treatment of archaisms by the OT Revisers. The principle they lay down in their Preface appears at first sight to be a sound and consistent one. 'Where an archaic word or expression was liable to be misunderstood, or at least was not perfectly intelligible,' they have changed it for another. Where, 'although obsolete,' it 'was not unintelligible,' they have suffered it to stand. Thus, to take their own illustration, 'to ear' (1 S 8^{12}) and 'earing' (Gn 45^{6}) are replaced by 'to plow' and 'plowing,' as being now not only obsolete, but misleading. On the other hand, 'bolled' is retained in Ex 9^{31} ('the flax was bolled'), as the word is still occasionally met with in country parts, and has no English equivalent to express its meaning—that of 'podded for seed.' But, as often happens, a principle, good in itself, is here found to work imperfectly in practice; the reason in this case being, that words and phrases intelligible to one class of readers are unintelligible to another, and hence it is difficult to know where to draw the line. The result is at best a compromise. 'Artillery' is gone from 1 S 20^{40}; but 'bravery,' in the sense of adornments or beauty,[§] is retained in Is 3^{18}. Cain is now a 'wanderer,' not a 'vagabond'; the inlets of the shore, where Asher abode, are 'creeks,' not 'breaches'; the question of Achish (1 S 27^{10}) is made clear by the simple change of 'road' to 'raid.' But we still meet with 'occurrent' for 'occurrence' (1 K 5^{4}), 'chapmen' for 'traders' (2 Ch 9^{14}), 'sith' for 'since' (Ezk 35^{6}). In 1 S 17^{22} 'carriage' is properly changed to 'baggage,' as in Is 10^{28} and elsewhere; and in 2 K 23^{17} 'title' (from the Vulgate) is in like manner replaced by 'monument.'[*] Yet the house in which the leper king Azariah dies is still called a 'several,' instead of a 'separate,' house (2 K 15^{5}); and, yet more strangely, the Latinism 'desired' for 'regretted' is still found in the description of the death of Jehoram (2 Ch 21^{20}).

In spite, however, of defects and inconsistencies, of which only a very few specimens have been given, it is but just to the OT Revisers to admit that they have corrected many a faulty rendering, and by so doing have thrown light on a multitude of obscure passages. In 2 S 1^{18}, for instance, David's bidding 'the use of the bow' to be taught to the children of Judah has always been felt to be out of place at the beginning of the dirge. By the simple change of use to song, as the word to be supplied, it is seen that the dirge itself, 'the song of the bow,' was the thing enjoined to be taught. The inconsequent statement in Is 10^{22}, 'though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea, yet a remnant of them shall return,' is made logical by reading 'only' for 'yet'; both words being alike in italics. Much improved also is the rendering of the next verse. In the AV it stands: 'For the Lord God of hosts shall make a consumption, even determined. . . .' In the RV it is: 'For a consummation, and that determined, shall the Lord. . . .' 'The ships of Tarshish,' in the older rendering of Ezk 27^{25}, by a poetical but not very intelligible metaphor, 'did sing of thee in thy market.' Now, in simple prose it is: 'were thy caravans for thy merchandise.' In a very obscure passage, Hos 5^{2} 'the revolters are gone deep in making slaughter' can at least be understood, which is more than can be truly said of the earlier version: 'are profound to make slaughter.' Hab 1^{11} gains much in terseness, not to say fidelity, by the rendering 'whose might is his god,' in place of 'imputing this his power unto his god.' Other examples crowd upon the memory, but these will suffice.

As we try to view the work of the Revisers upon the two Testaments as a finished whole, the question inevitably arises: Is their work a failure or a success? Will the Bible, in the form in which they leave it to us, become the Bible of the English-speaking people, or will it be quietly laid aside, to be referred to occasionally as a useful commentary on the older version? Fortunately, we are spared the necessity of replying, as time alone can give the answer. We do not forget how slowly, for a long while, the AV itself won its way to general acceptance; and how the Psalter it contains has not even yet displaced the older version in the Book of Common Prayer.[†] Knowing as we do the long and unselfish labour bestowed by the Revisers upon their task, we cannot but sympathize with the aspirations with which their Prefaces close. But as it is a hazardous undertaking to attempt to restore—not renovate—an ancient building, so is it perilous to apply the touch of any but the most loving and cautious, as well as skilful, hands to the venerable structure of the Version of 1611. For its 'marvellous English,' to recall a familiar passage of F. W. Faber, 'lives on in the ear like a music that never can be forgotten. . . . Its felicities seem often to be almost things rather than mere words.' The makers of that version erred, no doubt, in many places. Small credit is ours, if, with the added knowledge of nearly three centuries, we can discern their faults. But great will be the praise of that scholar, or that band of scholars, who shall be judged to have removed the blemishes of their handiwork, without marring its beauties.[*]

[†] See some remarks on this by Scrivener, Authorized Edition, p. 139. Professor Cheyne, who quotes the passage (Expositor, 3rd ser. vol. v. p. 304), justly urges in reply the claims of sense as against sound. But in a translation of poetical books both must be studied. As a passing illustration, let the reader call to mind two sentences from the older version of Ps $147^{9. 18}$ 'Who giveth fodder unto the cattle,' and 'He bloweth with his wind and the waters flow'; and ask himself what has been gained by the alteration of these in the RV.

The revision of the Apocrypha was, as before said, an afterthought. It was simply a matter of agreement between the Revisers and the representatives of the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge. Moreover, whilst, in the Speaker's Commentary, the Apocr., issued in 1888, was included under the general title of 'The Holy Bible,' the title-page of the revised edition of 1895 makes no such claim. The Preface ends simply with the unassuming hope 'that it will be found helpful to the student, and acceptable to the general reader of the Apocrypha.' This seems to make a few words desirable on the position held by the Apocrypha in our English Bibles.[†]

The first printed English Bible containing the Apocrypha was that of Miles Coverdale, 1535. In a short prologue, Coverdale describes these writings as 'The bokes and treatises which amonge the fathers of olde are not rekened to be of like authorite with the other bokes of the byble, nether are they founde in the Canon of the Hebrue.' After giving a list of them, which agrees in order with our own as far as the end of Sirach, the translator adds: 'Unto these also belongeth Baruc, whom we haue set amonge the prophetes next vnto Jeremy, because he was his scrybe and in his tyme.' He then explains that these books 'are not iudged amonge the doctours to be of like reputacion with the other scripture, as thou [good reader] mayest perceaue by S. Jerome in epistola ad Paulinum. And the chefe cause therof is this: there be many places in them, that seme to be repugnaunt vnto the open and manyfest trueth in the other bokes of the byble. Neuertheles, I haue not gathered them together to the intent that I wolde haue them despysed, or little sett by, or that I shulde think them false, for I am not able to proue it.'

The above 'gathering together' of the Apocryphal books into one place, while it might seem an appropriate bridging over of the interval between the Old and New Testaments, undoubtedly tended to make deeper and more sharply cut the line dividing the canonical from the uncanonical books, and to diminish the esteem in which the latter were held. So long as these were interspersed among the canonical, as in the Greek and Latin Bibles, it was natural that, in the popular mind, the two classes should be indiscriminately regarded as Scripture. Even Colet, in his Ryght fruitfull Monicion, cites or refers to Sirach more frequently than any other book; and later still, in the two Books of Homilies (1547 and 1563), we find passages from the Apocr. quoted as 'Scripture written by the Holy Ghost,' or as 'the Word of God.'[*] But, when the Apocryphal writings were grouped together by themselves, the thought easily suggested itself, to the Puritan at any rate, that they might be dispensed with altogether. It is said that some copies of the Genevan Bible of 1576 were issued without the Apocrypha.[†] In any case, the practice of printing Bibles not containing the Apocr. must have continued, for in 1615 it was judged of sufficient importance by Archbishop Abbot to be prohibited, under pain of one year's imprisonment. This prohibition was of little avail in arresting the course of public opinion. In 1643 Dr. John Lightfoot, when preaching before the House of Commons, complained of the privilege, curtailed as it was, still enjoyed by the Apocryphal writings. He speaks of them not as connecting, but as separating, the Old and New Testaments. 'Thus sweetly and nearly,' he exclaims, 'should the two Testaments join together, and thus divinely would they kiss each other, but that the wretched Apocrypha doth thrust in between.' 'Like the two cherubins in the temple oracle,' he continues, the Law and the Gospel would touch each other, 'did not this patchery of human invention divorce them asunder.'[‡]

But in fact the concessions made to the Puritan party at the Hampton Court Conference itself, with regard to the use of the Apocr. in the Lectionary of the Church, and the large excisions then agreed to,[§] furnish evidence enough, if any were still needed, of the diminished esteem into which the Apocryphal books were falling, and help to explain the comparative carelessness with which these books were revised in 1611. That the revision of the Apocr. then made shows signs of less care and deliberation than was bestowed upon the canonical books, is certain. The task was assigned to the second Cambridge Company, a body which comprised perhaps fewer scholars of eminence than any of the others. They were the first to finish their allotted share of the work. 'For the rest,' says Scrivener,[||] 'they are contented to leave many a rendering of the Bishops' Bible as they found it, when nearly any change must have been for the better; even where their predecessor sets them a better example they resort to undignified, mean, almost vulgar words and phrases; and on the whole they convey to the reader's mind the painful impression of having disparaged the importance of their own work, or of having imperfectly realized the truth that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well.'

One peculiarity of the AV of the Apocr. could hardly fail to strike the reader, though it might not occur to him to ascribe it to its true cause—simple negligence. This is the scarcity of words in italics, or, in case of the early black-letter editions, in small Roman type. As first published, there were only fifty-four examples to be found in the whole Apocrypha. 'In fact only three instances occur at all later than Sir 45[4], after which [ ], or sometimes ( ), are substituted in their room.' *

[*] It will be instructive to note the progress made in a parallel revision movement—that concerned with the German Luther Bible. We are enabled to do this by a paper of Dr. Philip Schaff's in the Expositor, 3rd ser. vol. v. p. 468 ff. The work was begun, in 1863, by the Eisenach German Evangelical Church Conference, and the result of their labours appeared at Halle, in 1883, under the title: Die Bibel, oder die ganze Heilige Schrift des Alten und Neuen Testaments nach der deutschen Uebersetzung D. Martin Luthers. The revised NT had been already published separately. The Halle publication was regarded as a Probe-bibel, or specimen of what was proposed. The revision was carried out with extreme care, but in too conservative a spirit; as may be judged from the fact that, while the English revised NT contained some 36,000 changes, the German contained only 200. Failing to please either party —those who desired and those who deprecated change—'it was recommitted by the Eisenach Conference of 1886 for final action.' After being subjected to a second and more thoroughgoing revision, and kept back for the proverbial nine years, the Luther Bible was issued again at Halle in 1892. A Preface by Dr. O. Frick, Director of the v. Canstein Bible Society, gives an interesting account of the progress of the work, and the lines on which it had been carried out. Still more than in the English revision, the difficulty was how to steer judiciously between opposite extremes: to correct errors and remove archaisms, without needlessly disturbing the venerable 'rust' on Luther's handiwork; to keep in view the wants of school and congregation, while not forgetful of the more fastidious taste of scholars;—in short, to pacify alike those who would summarily recast the whole version, and those who would leave it altogether untouched—the large class of those whom Dr. Frick might have described as holding to the opinion of Magr. Petrus Lapp, in the Epp. obscur. Virorum: 'Sacra scriptura sufficienter est translata, et non indigemus aliis translationibus.'

Dr. Frick refers, for fuller information on the subject, to Das Werk der Bibelrevision, Halle, 1892. See also two articles by Dr. H. L. Strack in the Expositor, 3rd ser. ii. pp. 178–187; v. pp. 193–201; and Funck's Beurteilung der rev. Ausgabe d. N.T. 1892, . . . Cannstadt, 1896.

[||] Authorized Edition, p. 140. Scrivener notes that Dr. Robert Gell in his Essay, 1659, formed a like unfavourable opinion of the revision of the Apocr. in the AV.

It may be of service for forming a just estimate of the merits of the AV and RV respectively, so far as the Apocr. is concerned, to set down two or three short extracts, taken almost at random from the Bishops' Bible, and notice some of the changes made in the revisions of 1611 and 1895. The copy of the Bishops' Bible used is one of the 2nd ed. of 1572. The first passage taken shall be from the description of a friend in Sir 6. And here we are struck at the outset by the advantage the later Revisers have gained in recognizing, by a system of parallelisms, the poetical character of the book. The same remark applies to Wisdom. This in turn suggests the question: why, if the principle of stichometry was admitted in the case of the Sapiential books, it should have been ignored in other parts of the Apocrypha. Why should it not have been applied to portions, at least, of Baruch, to the psalmic Prayer of Manasses, and to the Song of the Three Children? The result, as we have it, seems to point to a want of uniformity of plan.

SIRACH 6 (Bishops' Bible, 1572).

[6] Holde frendship with many, neuerthelesse haue but one counseller of a thousande.

[7] If thou gettest a freende, prooue him first, and be not hasty to geue hym credence.

[8] For somme man is a freende but for his owne turne, and wyl not abide in the day of trouble.

[9] And there is somme freende that turneth to enmitie, and taketh part agaynst thee: and yf he knoweth any hurt by thee, he telleth it out.

[10] Agayne, somme freende is but a companion at the table, and in the day of neede he continueth not.

[11] But in thy prosperitie he wyl be as thou thee selfe, and deale plainely with thy householde folke.

[12] If thou be brought lowe, he will be agaynst thee, and wyl be hydden from thy face.

Here, in v.[6], for 'Holde frendship,' etc., the AV has, more literally, 'Be in peace with many'; the RV, still more exactly, 'Let those that are at peace with thee be many'—οἱ εἰρηνεύοντές σοι ἔστωσαν πολλοί. In v.[7], for 'If thou gettest' (Coverdale and Bish.) the AV and RV needlessly, 'If thou wouldest get.' It is exactly 'If thou art getting' (or 'acquiring'), εἰ κτᾶσαι. For 'to geue hym credence' (so, too, Cov.), the AV, not so well, 'to credit him.' The RV, more simply, 'to trust him.' In v.[8], for the cumbrous 'somme man is,' etc., retained by the AV, the RV has, more neatly, 'there is a friend that is so for,' etc. Not to delay over lesser matters, a more important question is, What is the friend referred to in vv.[11. 12]? Is it a faithful friend (so the Lat. 'Amicus si permanserit fixus,' followed by Coverdale, 'But a sure frende,' etc.), or is it the time-server of v.[10]? The Bish. and AV are undoubtedly right in taking the latter view, but obscure the sense by beginning v.[11] with 'But' instead of 'And.' The RV makes the meaning clear—

> 'And in thy prosperity he will be as thyself,
> And will be bold over thy servants:
> If thou shalt be brought low, he will be against thee,
> And will hide himself from thy face.'

'Be bold over' is not a happy rendering of παρρησιάσεται ἐπί, 'will be plain-spoken with.'

SUS [52] (Bishops' Bible, agreeing with Coverdale).

'When they were put asunder one from another, he called one of them, and sayd vnto hym, O thou olde cankarde earle, that haste vsed thy wickednesse so long, thyne vngratious deedes whiche thou haste donne afore, are now comme to lyght.'

In this passage the interest centres on the vigorous paraphrase ('O thou . . . long') of πεπαλαιωμένε ἡμερῶν κακῶν. The AV has the less forcible but terser rendering, 'O thou that art waxen old in wickedness,' and this is retained in the RV. At the same time it should be observed that παλαιοῦσθαι is not a mere synonym of γηράσκειν (cf. He 8[13]), but involves the notion of becoming stale, decrepit, worn out (Lk 12[33]). Nor is 'wickedness' quite adequate as a translation of ἡμερῶν κακῶν. On the other hand, the rendering in the RV of ἥκασι by 'are come home to thee' is excellent.

WIS 7[22-25] (Bishops' Bible, here differing much from Cov.).

[22] For Wisdome, whiche is the woorker of al thinges, hath taught me: for in her is the spirite of vnderstandyng, whiche is holy, one only, manifolde, subtile, quicke, moouing (marg. or liuely), vndefiled, plaine, sweete, louyng the thing that is good, sharpe, whiche can not be letted, dooing good.

[23] Kinde to man, stedfast, sure, free from care, hauyng al vertues (marg. or power), circumspect in (marg. or hauyng regard of) al thynges, and passing through al vnderstandyng, cleane and subtile spirits.

[24] For wisedome is nimbler than al nimble thinges, she goeth through and atteyneth to al thinges, because of her cleannesse.

[25] For she is the breath of the power of God, and a pure influence flowyng from the glory of the almyghty [God]; therefore can no defiled thing comme vnto her.

The spirit of Divine Wisdom is here described by a string of epithets, numbering in the Greek text twenty-one (7×3). The rendering of the AV is a great improvement on that of the earlier versions. In the RV, where further changes are made, there is a slight tendency to diffuseness. Thus νοερόν, 'intelligent' ('understanding,' AV), becomes 'quick of understanding'; εὐκίνητον, 'mobile' ('lively,' AV, with which compare the double sense of 'quick'), becomes 'freely moving'; τρανόν, 'penetrating,' 'distinct' ('clear,' AV), becomes 'clear in utterance,' as if to harmonize with the Lat. 'disertus.' The rendering of μονογενές by 'alone in kind' also seems doubtful. On the other hand, 'unhindered' is a terser rendering of ἀκώλυτον than 'which cannot be letted' (AV): and there are several others of this type.

One of the minor defects pointed out in the RV of the Apocr. is a want of consistency in the spelling of proper names. The Revisers, in their Preface, show themselves aware of this, and plead in mitigation the difficulty of securing 'uniformity of plan in the work of the four committees.' But the fault lies deeper. Inconsistencies are met with in the same verse. Thus in 2 Es 2[18], where the AV had consistently 'Esay and Jeremy,' the former is altered to 'Esaias' in the RV, while the latter is left untouched. In 1[40] of the same book, one solitary change is made in a string of proper names—that of 'Aggeus' to 'Aggæus'; and this is left betwixt such incongruous forms as 'Nahum and Abacuc, Sophonias, . . . Zachary and Malachy.' In Jth 8[1] 'Elcia,' as it is in the AV, is altered to 'Elkiah,' which represents neither the Hebrew form of the word (חִלְקִיָּה Ḥilḳiah), nor the Greek (Ἑλκειά), nor the Latin (Elai).

More serious is the charge brought against the Revisers of neglecting the help which the Oriental Versions were capable of affording them.* For example, in Sir 25[15] they are content to reproduce the meaningless rendering of the AV, 'There is no head above the head of a serpent,' without any hint of a better sense being procurable. Yet help is not far to seek. The Syriac version, as Edersheim points out, is literally 'there is not a head more bitter than the head of a serpent.' And this at once suggests—what Bissell and others had already perceived—that the Hebrew word, here rendered κεφαλή, 'head,' in the Greek, was probably ראשׁ, which in Dt 32[33] and elsewhere denotes 'venom.' The meaning then becomes simple and natural, 'There is no poison above (more virulent than) the poison of a serpent.'

Or, again, take Sir 51[10] 'I called upon the Lord, the Father of my Lord.' If the words had been written from a Christian point of view, they would have been unexceptionable. But such was not the point of view of Jesus Ben Sirach. 'The Syriac shows us,' writes Edersheim, 'that the original text signified, 'unto the Lord, my father, O Lord.'

It is but fair to add that, in two at least of the books, Wisdom and 2 Esdras, the Versions have been freely resorted to, and with happy effect. In 2 Esdras, more particularly, the Greek original of which is not extant, many passages have been corrected through this means. A single chapter will furnish sufficient instances. In 2 Es 3^{18} the AV has 'thou didst set fast the earth,' which does not suit the context. The verb in the Arabic version is rendered by Gildemeister concussisti, which justifies the translation of the RV, 'Thou . . . didst shake the earth' (as if ἔσεισας had been corrupted to ἔστησας). In $v.^{34}$ is a singular diversity of rendering: 'and so shall thy name nowhere be found but in Israel' (AV); 'and so shall it be found which way the scale inclineth' (RV). The Arabic again bears out the RV. In the Latin, as Hilgenfeld suggested, momentum may have got perverted to nomen tuum. Other examples will be found in $vv.^{21.\ 28.\ 30}$ of this same chapter. But, on the whole, the Oriental Versions might have been consulted with profit to a much greater extent than they appear to have been.

* Scrivener, ib. p. 72. Some have thought that in the RV the use of italics is overdone. See the point raised in the JQR, vol. viii. (1895-96), pp. 322, 323, where 'a Greek place of exercise' is censured as the rendering of γυμνάσιον in 2 Mac 4[9. 12]. In Sir 22[3] (wrongly cited as 12[3]) 'a foolish daughter is born to his loss,' the reviewer shows good cause for omitting foolish. But it is justified by the parallelism of the passage.

* In an able review of the revised Apocr., which appeared in the Times of Nov. 19, 1895, this charge is pressed home.

There are a few instances of conjectural emendation of the text, one or two of which deserve mention. One of the most felicitous is noted in the margin of 2 Mac 7^{36}. By the slight change of πεπτώκασι to πεπώκασι the construction is simplified, and the sense altered from 'having endured a short pain that bringeth everlasting life, have now died under God's covenant,' to 'having endured a short pain, have now drunk of everflowing life under God's covenant.' Another, the merit of which is assigned to Dr. Hort,[*] is admitted to the text of 2 Mac 4^{4}. It consists in reading Μενεσθέως, 'son of Menestheus' (as in $v.^{21}$) for the inappropriate μαίνεσθαι ἕως (or rather, ὡς), 'did rage as,' etc. In 2 Es 1^{38} the Revisers give 'O father' (pater, Cod. S) in place of 'brother' (AV). But neither is suitable, the speaker being God. Bensly suggested that the true reading in the Greek might have been περίβλεψον, circumspice, and that the contracted form of περί had got mistaken for one of πάτερ. But this conjecture, though ingenious, was not acted upon.[†]

Subjoined are some examples of changes of rendering made by the Revisers, which have met with approval, or the reverse:—

[†] On the value of Mr. R. L. Bensly's assistance in this section of the work, and the facts connected with his discovery of the 'missing fragment' of 2 Esdras, see a full and discriminating review of the revised Apocr. in the Guardian of 24th Dec. 1895.

[‡] The RV translates the text adopted by Bensly (Fourth Book of Ezra, 1896), in which, ex successione, the reading of Cod. C. displaces the meaningless excessiones of the Latin. The correction of noctis to notis is borne out by the Eastern versions.

[§] Gr. διαγωγὴν νόμων ξενίζουσαν παραλλάσσον.

[‖] κατάχρεω, oppignerato.

[¶] ῥυθμὸς ὕδατος πορευομένου βίᾳ. But is 'fall' a necessary part of the idea? The context seems to point to ῥυθμός being 'the measured sound' or cadence.

[] The construction of the second clause in the Greek—καὶ πίστιν ποιῆσαι εὐδοκίας—is disputed.

[*] ἥδιον κλαῦσον κ.τ.λ., Modicum plora (Lat.).

[†] ὡς θρόνον βασιλείας. For θρόνον some MSS read υἱούς (filios, Lat.), followed by the AV.

[‡] As the Revisers note in their Preface, the words 'God' and 'the Lord' never occur in the best Greek text of 1 Maccabees. See the point fully discussed in Fairweather and Black's ed. of 1 Mac. (Camb. Bible), 1897, Introd. p. 46.

[§] χρείας, 'office,' is a better supported reading than χώρας, 'country,' which has very little authority.

[‖] Ἀντιοχεῖς ἀναγράψαι. The rendering of the AV throughout this passage needs emending in several points. Thus δι' ἐντεύξεως ($v.^{8}$) is translated 'by intercession,'—a meaning which the word bears in 1 Ti 2^{1}, but inappropriate here. Data per congressum occasione is Wahl's explanation.

[¶] It is with some hesitation that this passage is placed among the improved renderings. As to the construction, the words τὴν ἐν τῇ B. should probably be connected, not with ἀντίληψιν, but with the following παράταξιν. The reading of several MSS, τὴν ἐν τῇ B. πρὸς τοὺς Γαλάτας γενομένην παράταξιν, supports this view. The marg. note, 'Gr. Galatians,' appended to 'Gauls,' is confusing. Γαλαται may mean Galatians; but, like Κέλται, it may also mean Gauls. The question is, which does it mean here? See Bissell's note on 1 Mac 8^{2}.

[] The Gr. says nothing about rewards: οὐκ ἔστι παρ' αὐτῇ . . . διαφορά. Truth 'indifferently ministers justice.'—Other passages in this book, where the rendering of the AV needs correction, are 2^{20} 'are now in hand' (ἐνεργεῖται, 'are being pushed on'), and 8^{91} 'children' (νεάνιαι, 'youths').

[††] The sense is obscured by this rendering. The fault is due (as was pointed out by a reviewer in the Times, before quoted) to the true parallelism not being observed. When properly arranged, the first two clauses refer to the Israelites, the last two to their enemies—

Then my lowly ones raised their battle-cry (ἠλάλαξαν),
And my weak ones gave a shout (ἐβόησαν, not ἐφοβήθησαν);
And they (the Assyrians) were affrighted,
They lifted up their voice (in fear) and were overthrown

[‡‡] The names of the four cardinal virtues, needlessly altered.

[§§] ἄλογα ἑρπετὰ καὶ κνώδαλα εὐτελῆ.—If 'creeping things' be substituted for 'serpents,' the rendering of this clause in the AV may perhaps be judged preferable.

[‖‖] The simile has no meaning. The Lat. couples velut taurus with Non te extollas, etc., preceding, and thus makes sense; but the reading differs widely from the Greek. Mr. Ball (Variorum Apocrypha, in loc.) suggests 'as by a bull'; comparing, for the construction, the LXX of Is 5^{17} and Jer 50^{11}.

[¶¶] The Vatican MS has ἐν αἰγιαλοῖς 'on beaches,' which the Revisers follow. But, as Edersheim pertinently remarks, 'palms are not supposed to attain any special height by the sea shore'; whereas En-gedi of the Amorites, as its other name Hazazon-tamar shows, was noted for its palm trees. The Cod. Sinait., by second-hand, has εν ενγαδδοις; the Lat. in Cades; the Arabic 'at the fountain of Gad.' Hence the AV is most probably right. Kautzsch (Apok. u. Pseud., 1900) accepts Engeddi.

On the whole, a study of the RV of the Apocr. cannot fail to make us aware of the great amount of work still to be done before such a translation as we desire to see can be produced: work in settling the text, in harmonizing proper names, in elucidating obscure passages.¶ But it cannot fail to make us conscious also of the vast amount of work done. That there are inequalities in the workmanship none will deny. Wisdom is better done than Sirach, 2 Mac. than 1 Maccabees. But let the fair-minded reader take any of these books, and compare carefully the rendering of a few consecutive chapters in them with that in the AV. He will meet, no doubt, with changes that he demurs to as uncalled for or even wrong. He will be perplexed, on the other hand, by the seeming neglect of alterations, where he had thought them necessary. But for one such case he will find a score, in which the new version is an improvement upon the old, in point of exactness, or finish, or consistency of diction. The Revisers have at any rate thrown down the gage, and may now say to their critics: Si non placebit, reperitote rectius.

x. THE 'AMERICAN REVISED' VERSION, 1900 and 1901.—With the completion of their work in 1885, the English members of the joint Revision Company regarded their corporate existence as at an end. The American members retained their organization. In assigning the copyright to the two University Presses, it had been stipulated that for fourteen years every copy issued from those presses should contain in an appendix the readings preferred by the Americans; and that the latter, for their part, should give their sanction to no other version for the same number of years. It became evident, however, as time went on, that the American Revisers would not be content with a version in which the renderings they preferred were permanently consigned to an appendix. Accordingly they continued their labours, it might almost be said without interruption from 1885; and the result has been a fresh recension of the RV of the NT in 1900, and of the whole Bible in 1901.

The book is well printed by Thomas Nelson & Sons, of New York. Each page has two columns. The space running down the middle of each is occupied by marginal references. Various readings printed in italics are grouped at the foot of each column, or in the side margins, according to the size of the book. Along the top of each page runs a headline summarizing the contents of that page. The Apocryphal books are not included. The titles present several noticeable variations from the customary form. The NT title-page begins: 'The New Covenant, commonly called The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour,' but the title of the whole Bible (there being no separate title of the OT) does not exhibit the word 'covenant.' 'S.' for Saint is not prefixed to the names of the writers of the NT. 'The Acts' is the sole title of the historical book; The Epistle to the Hebrews bears no author's name; the term 'general' is discontinued before the Catholic Epistles; and the last book is simply 'The Revelation of John.'

In their Preface the translators indicate with clearness the ends they chiefly desire to attain. The principal of these are: that the name 'Jehovah' be inserted, wherever it occurs in the Hebrew, instead of 'LORD' or 'God,' which had hitherto taken its place. That 'Sheol' in the OT and 'Hades' in the NT be used to express that unseen world which had been imperfectly or inconsistently denoted by 'the grave,' 'the pit,' 'Gehenna.' Throughout the NT they would replace 'Holy Ghost' by 'Holy Spirit.' The translators desire to bring the diction as much as possible into harmony with that in use at the present time. To this end they would always write 'who' for 'which,' when referring to persons; 'are' for 'be,' in using the indicative; and so on in many other instances.

It is obvious that in this last respect consistency cannot be ensured at once; and fault will no doubt be found with the new revision on the ground of want of uniformity.

To advert for a moment to the special objects first spoken of as desirable, there can be little doubt that the restoration of the name 'Jehovah' will be a gain, wherever special stress is laid on it as that of the God of the Hebrews, as in Ex $3^{14.15}$. But in many other passages, notably in the Psalms, the frequent repetition of the name cannot but be felt a burden—a result which was avoided under the old system by the use of two short but impressive words, 'Lord' and 'God.'*

Whether the words 'Sheol' and 'Hades,' one or both, will ever become naturalized in the English Bible is not easy to forecast. We have assimilated 'Sabbath' and 'Pentecost,' and many more such terms. Why, it may be asked, not these also? Experience alone can decide.

So in the case of 'Holy Spirit' and 'Holy Ghost.' There can be no question about the intrinsic merit of the former. The one great objection to making the change is that 'Holy Ghost' has become so deeply embedded in the creeds and formularies of the Church that it would be difficult to displace it. This holds good of the American Church as well as of our own.

---

* A comparison of vv.$^{25\cdot 27}$ shows that the similes are taken from rivers:—Pishon and Tigris, Euphrates and Jordan, x and Gihon. Hence, from considerations of symmetry, x should represent, not 'light,' or anything of the kind, but the name of a river. Edersheim thinks that the Greek translator had כָּאֹר before him, which in Am 8^{8} and elsewhere means not 'as the light,' but 'as the river' (i.e. the Nile), as if כַּיְאֹר; and that he wrongly took the former rendering.—See the review in the London Quarterly, before cited, p. 7.

† Gr. παιδαρίου νεωτέρου, 'a young lad' (Bissell). Cf. Jn 6^{9}.

‡ The RV follows the best-supported reading of the Greek. But Fritzsche, on the authority of some cursives, with the Complut. and the Aldine of 1518, inserts τοῦ ἐπιγράφειν ἐπ' αὐτῶν before τὰ ὁμοιώματα. Such a mode of desecrating the sacred books would be intelligible. Other explanations may be seen in Bissell. All that is here contended for is, that the RV takes no account of the plural in περὶ ὧν, makes ἐξηρεύνων do double duty for 'were wont to inquire, seeking,' and gives a very obscure sense.

§ The AV appears to have followed the reading of some cursives, ᾠήθη, 'he (Eleazar) supposed.' The RV adopts the common reading ὤφθη, better taken impersonally (see Grimm), 'it seemed that,' just as in the Lat., 'et visum est ei quod . . .'

‖ This is cited as an instance of the principle, very closely observed throughout this book, of paralaxis, or co-ordination, as distinguished from subordination, of clauses. By retaining this peculiarity, the Revisers have reproduced more exactly the form of the original, but at the cost of sacrificing English idiom.

¶ A help towards this has been gained by the introduction, in 1898, of marginal references throughout the RV.

 'The | Holy Bible | containing the | Old and New Testaments | translated out of the original tongues | being the version set forth A.D. 1611 | compared with the most ancient authorities and revised | A.D. 1881-1885 | newly Edited by the American Revision Committee | A.D. 1901 | Standard Edition | New York | Thomas Nelson & Sons.' |

* In Pss 1-41 the name 'Jehovah' occurs 272 times, and in Pss 90-150 it occurs 339 times (see Kirkpatrick, Psalms, Introduction, p. 55).

It will perhaps be most serviceable to the reader to set down a few passages in which the new recension may be instructively compared with its immediate predecessor. It will be noticed in how many instances the American Version reverts to that of 1611.

Ec 12^{5} 'desire shall fail' (Am. RV); 'the caper-berry shall fail' (RV). This would not be intelligible without the help of a commentator. It is explained that caper-berries were eaten before meals to give a whet to the appetite. If they failed to do so, it might be a sign of the coming on of old age.

Dt 32^{14} 'with the finest of the wheat' (Am. RV); 'with the fat of kidneys of wheat' (RV, retaining the Hebrew figure of speech, by which the choicest parts of an animal for sacrifice were taken to express what was finest in other objects. See Ex 29^{13}).*

Zec 4^{14} 'these are the two anointed ones' (Am. RV); 'the two sons of oil' (RV, retaining the Hebraism in its unmodified form).

Jer 17^{9} 'The heart is . . . exceedingly corrupt' (Am. RV); 'the heart is . . . desperately sick' (RV).

Jg 5^{12} 'lead away thy captives' (Am. RV); 'lead thy captivity captive' (RV).

Pr 13^{15} 'the way of the transgressor is hard' (Am. RV); 'the way of the treacherous is rugged' (RV).

Ac 17^{22} 'Ye men of Athens, in all things I perceive that ye are very religious' (Am. RV); 'somewhat superstitious' (RV). It is noticeable how the influence of the Vulgate has drawn all the English Versions, down to the AV inclusive, into rendering δεισιδαιμονεστέρους by some form of 'superstitious.' But it is certain that St. Paul would not have raised a prejudice against himself by using an offensive term at the very outset of his address. Hence 'religious' (a sense in which the word is used by Josephus) is wisely taken as its equivalent. But in prefixing 'very' the American translators obscure the delicate shade of meaning in the comparative.

Ph 2^{6} 'who, existing in the form of God, counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped' (Am. RV); 'who, being . . . counted it not a prize . . .' (RV). This rendering of ὑπάρχων by 'existing' is a distinct improvement on the 'being' of the RV. 'Prize' (RV) renders more neatly than the later equivalent the ἁρπαγμόν of the Greek, but not so literally (see Moule's note on the passage). 'Grasped' should rather be 'grasped at.'

1 Th 2^{6} 'might have claimed authority' (Am. RV); 'might have been burdensome' (RV, with 'claimed honour' in the margin). The Greek is ambiguous, δυνάμενοι ἐν βάρει εἶναι. The use of ἐπιβαρῆσαι in v.^{9} in the sense of 'prove a burden to,' seems to carry ἐν βάρει εἶναι with it. But, as Ellicott points out, this is counterbalanced by the close connexion of the clause with δόξαν, so that the American Revisers may be right.

2 Ti 2^{26} 'having been taken captive by him unto his will' (Am. RV); 'having been taken captive by the Lord's servant unto the will of God' (RV). In aiming at perspicuity the RV has given a comment rather than a translation. The Am. RV leaves an ambiguity in the pronouns 'him' and 'his.' A point would be gained if 'His' were written with a capital letter.

He 11^{5} 'for he hath had witness borne to him that before his translation he had been well-pleasing unto God' (Am. RV); 'before his translation he hath had witness borne to him that he had been well-pleasing unto God' (RV). The tenses speak for themselves.

He 11^{1} 'now faith is assurance of things hoped for, a conviction of things not seen' (Am. RV); 'now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen' (RV). The former of these renderings has been praised as much the better of the two. But, as Westcott points out, 'it is difficult to suppose that ἔλεγχος can express a state'; and he himself gives 'substance' and 'test' for ὑπόστασις and ἔλεγχος.

If, in the above examples, the advantage may be claimed for the American RV, the same can hardly be said in the case of those which follow:—

Ex 20^{13} 'thou shalt not kill' (Am. RV); 'thou shalt do no murder' (Prayer-Book Version and RV). It is interesting to observe that each of these newest renderings has gone back to an earlier pattern,—the RV to that in the Prayer-Book, and the Am. RV to that of 1611. There is this merit in the last, that it harmonizes with the word used in our Lord's summary of the Commandments (Mt 19^{18}). But the word 'kill' does not necessarily imply a criminal act, and in so far the rendering of the Am. RV is inadequate.

Ps 24^{6} 'This is the generation of them that seek after him, that seek thy face, even Jacob' (Am. RV); '. . . that seek thy face, O God of Jacob' (RV). The difficulty lies in supplying the ellipse 'O God of.' It is admitted that, if the Massoretic text be followed, the first of these renderings is the right one; but in that case, as Kirkpatrick points out, 'the construction is harsh; a vocative is needed after thy face; and Jacob does not by itself convey this sense.' His conclusion is that 'the AVm and RV rightly follow the LXX, Vulg., and Syr. in reading "O God of Jacob."'

Ps 148^{12} 'young men and virgins' (Am. RV); 'young men and maidens' (RV). What is gained by the change?

Lk 24^{26} 'Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?' (Am. RV). Except in the spelling of the first word this rendering repeats that of the RV, and is therefore open to the same objection. By retaining the coordinate construction with 'and' instead of the subordinate, the sense is missed. It should have been 'by suffering these things to enter into his glory,' or 'to suffer these things and so enter,' etc. This will be seen more clearly by comparing such a sentence as Mt 23^{23} 'these things ought ye to have done, and not to leave the others undone'; which would appear to charge the Pharisees with neglecting the ceremonial observances of the law. The sense requires: 'without therefore leaving the others undone.'

Ac 8^{32} 'The passage of Scripture' (Am. RV); 'The place of the Scripture' (RV). The change of 'place' to 'passage' has not been made by the Am. RV in Lk 4^{17}.

Gal 1^{10} 'am I now seeking the favor of men, or of God?' (Am. RV); 'am I now persuading men, or God?' (RV). While it is admitted that a verb of kindred meaning with πείθω should be supplied by zeugma to govern θεόν, it does not seem necessary that the meaning of πείθω with ἀνθρώπους should also be thus modified.

Tit 1^{8} 'given to hospitality' (Am. RV and RV) for the simple 'hospitable' (φιλόξενον).

He $9^{16.17}$ In this passage διαθήκη is rendered 'testament,' not 'covenant,' both by the Am. RV and the RV. But, as Westcott has shown, 'there is not the least trace of the meaning "testament" in the Greek Old Scriptures, and the idea of a "testament" was indeed foreign to the Jews till the time of the Herods.'

Ja 1^{17} 'every good gift and every perfect gift' (Am. RV, in this agreeing with the AV); 'every good gift and every perfect boon' (RV). This latter rendering fails because 'boon' is not a cognate word to 'gift,' as δώρημα in the original is to δόσις. The American Revisers, in making 'gift' serve for both these terms, confess themselves unable to surmount the difficulty.

Rev 2^{24} 'as they are wont to say' (Am. RV); 'as they say' (RV). The latter is preferable, the Greek being simply ὡς λέγουσιν.

The inference to be drawn from this brief comparison of renderings, as well as from a more general survey of the work, is that it is premature as yet to call it, as is done on the title-page, a 'standard' edition. It seems evident that, even if the principles of the latest Revisers be admitted, a considerable time must elapse before they can be thoroughly carried out in practice. An illustration taken from one single department of the subject will suffice. In the case of archaic or obsolete words much progress has been made. Many a 'howbeit' has given place to 'yet'; 'or ever' to 'before'; 'evil entreated' to 'ill-treated'; 'meat' to 'food'; and the like. But how many still remain! 'Gendereth' is altered to 'bringeth forth' in Gal 4^{24}, but left unaltered in Job 38^{29}. 'High-minded,' which is now an epithet of praise, is left in 1 Ti 6^{17} in the sense which it bore in the days of the Gunpowder Plot. 'Took knowledge of' for 'recognized' still remains in Ac 4^{13}. 'Nephews' is rightly changed to 'grandchildren' in 1 Ti 5^4; but 'piety,' in the Latin sense of the word, still remains in the same passage.

We may see from these few instances that it is vain to hope that a standard edition of the English Bible will be soon forthcoming; and still more vain to dream that the desired object has been attained already. That many improvements have been made upon the Revision of 1885, none would wish to deny. It is reasonable to anticipate that, when the next Revision is accomplished on this side the Atlantic, it may in its turn show a superiority in some respects over that of 1901. But the end to be kept in view is not that the scholars of the two countries should pass and repass each other 'adversi spatiis,' but that they should advance 'facta pariter nunc pace.' The aspiration to which utterance was given in the Preface to the Joint-Revision of the NT in 1881, is not yet, we trust, out of season—that the labours of the fellow-workers, 'thus happily united, may be permitted to bear a blessing to both countries, and to all English-speaking people throughout the world.'

⁂ In concluding this article, the writer desires to acknowledge his indebtedness to his sons (especially the Rev. J. M. Lupton, assistant master in Marlborough College) for much valuable help in the course of it.

DEVELOPMENT OF DOCTRINE IN THE APOCRYPHAL PERIOD.—

SOURCES.—

- B.C. 200–100: Sirach; Daniel; Ethiopic Enoch 1–36, 83–90, 91–104; Baruch 1–3^8; Tobit; Sibylline Oracles (part of Book iii.); Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (B.C. 140–A.D. 30); Book of Jubilees; Judith.
- B.C. 100–1: Ethiopic Enoch 37–70; 1 Maccabees; Psalms of Solomon; 2 Maccabees.
- A.D. 1–100: Assumption of Moses; Book of Wisdom; Philo; Slavonic Enoch; 4 Maccabees; Josephus; Apocalypse of Baruch; Book of Baruch (from 3^9 onwards); 2 (4) Esdras; Ascension of Isaiah; Shemoneh Esreh.

[In the above list of authorities the Targums are not included. They undoubtedly contain fragments as old as the time of John Hyrcanus; but as they were not published until, perhaps, the 3rd or 4th cent. A.D., they must obviously be used with caution as sources for estimating the development of Jewish doctrine during our period].

Literature.

Introduction.—1. The question stated.—Our first concern in discussing the subject of doctrinal development in the Apocryphal period is to get a clear conception of the true bearings of the question. The field over which our investigation is to extend consists practically of the intervening space between the Old and New Testaments. We have to deal with a transition period, to be considered with due reference both to what precedes and what follows; we are to look back on the OT, and forward to the NT. In short, we must have the OT basis from which to start, and the NT position to which we are to be led up, both in full vision. The question might be broadly stated, then, as the relation of Jewish views of theology at this time to the Old and New Testaments—the special point to be elucidated being whether and how far the Apocrypha and other non-canonical pre-Christian Jewish writings bridge the distance between them. They do so historically; do they do so doctrinally? Is there evidence of real doctrinal development?

The student of theology will hardly say there is no felt want of such a bridge. While the NT stands most intimately related to the OT, and would be a real enigma without it, it is yet true that the difference between them is of the most marked description. And many, instead of following the somewhat doubtful course of leaping from the one to the other, naturally prefer to tread the path, indistinct and curiously winding though it be, that undoubtedly leads through the gloom of these 400 years into the full-orbed light of the Christian era. They claim that amid much that is admittedly of questionable value, and amid much to which distinct objection can be taken in these Apocryphal writings, the latter nevertheless furnish stepping-stones by means of which it is possible gradually to climb the long ascent from Malachi to Matthew. Nor is there anything a priori extravagant in this claim. In virtue of its own inherent living power of growth, and in accordance with the divinely chosen method of its gradual delivery to man, revealed truth must have gained something, if not in actual content, at least in clearness of expression, during such a period. As a matter of fact we find that, in the two centuries immediately preceding the Christian era, Jewish literature, though obviously past its prime, has still a measure of vigorous life. It throbs with patriotic feeling, of which indeed (in the Books of Maccabees) it reflects perhaps the most signal instances on record. It shows also that during these 'Middle Ages of sacred history' the lamp of true piety continued to burn, and, so long as that was the case, scriptural doctrine could not altogether have stood still, but must of necessity have undergone some development in its application to the circumstances of the age. And this theological development must have made itself felt in the Jewish religious books of the period. As will be seen from the list of authorities given above, these numbered many more than those included in the OT Apocrypha. Among other extant works falling within the limits of our period are the remarkable and mysterious Palestinian Book of Enoch (preserved in Ethiopic), parts of which date from the 2nd cent. B.C.; the Græco-Jewish-Christian Sibylline Oracles, which, from a large Jewish nucleus issued from Alexandria towards the middle of the same century, grew first under Jewish and subsequently under Christian hands, into a 'chaotic wilderness' of fourteen books; the Book of Jubilees, assigned by the most recent scholarship to c. 130 B.C.; the Psalms of Solomon, dating from B.C. 70–40; and the Assumption of Moses, which appears to have been written practically at the dawn of the Christian era (A.D. 7–30). These and other pseudepigrapha dating from the early centuries of our era (e.g. the Apocalypse of Baruch and the Ascension of Isaiah) are mostly apocalyptic, and, while throwing a valuable supplementary light on the religious views of the Jewish people in the time of our Lord, do not take rank with the 'deutero-canonical' books. Although they are sometimes termed apocryphal (Iren. Hær. i. 20), they form no part of the OT Apocrypha properly so called, and perhaps we may take the latter as representing on the whole the continuity both of literature and dogma. At the same time, for the sake of completeness, it will be necessary to include in our historical survey material supplied by the pre-Christian Jewish literature generally, as well as by the writings of Philo and Josephus, which date from the 1st cent. of the Christian era.

The history of the Church, moreover, no less than the expansive power of Divine truth, leads us to expect that there should be such a bridge between OT and NT doctrine. Almost any 400 years of Church history have witnessed important new developments of doctrine; and every age has found occasion to sift and discuss many points that never suggested themselves to those of an earlier time. Our own religious perspective has distinctly changed within a relatively shorter period. And, mutatis mutandis, is it at all likely that the Jewish theology of the post-Prophetic period took no colour of its own from the special circumstances, struggles, and aspirations of the age? No doubt it is true, as Langen[*] points out, that the OT could never have developed itself into the NT, as the seed does into the plant, seeing that a new and miraculous fact which could not develop, but was accomplished by Divine statute at a definite moment (viz. the Incarnation), came in and sharply defined the boundary line between the old and new economies, and expressed their essential difference of character. But, though the term development be inapplicable here, it is otherwise as regards doctrine, which must always of necessity develop itself. This is a natural law in the spiritual world which will not be denied. Are we, then, to suppose that this organic development within the sphere of Jewish theology met with a sudden check after the issue of the books composing the Heb. Canon,—ceased, in fact, in order to the subsequent sudden appearance of quite new truths? Such a thing, to say the least, would be a great anomaly, and to many the Apocryphal books have furnished some tangible and valuable links in the chain of biblical truth.

Certainly, none can with reason refuse to believe that in the eventful period of Jewish history to which they owe their origin there was produced, and in these works preserved, something of significance for the universal Church of God. Yet they have been denounced as worse than worthless. Few will now accept the bitterly hostile verdict of the Edinburgh Bible Society in 1825, that 'the whole work (sic) is replete with instances of vanity, flattery, idle curiosity, affectation of learning, and other blemishes; with frivolous, absurd, false, superstitious, and contradictory statements.'[†] For while the Apocrypha admittedly do contain inaccuracies, offences against good taste, and even serious deviations from 'sound doctrine,' it is ridiculous to speak of the whole collection as 'bad in itself, bad in its effects, bad in every point of view,'[*] or as a 'miserable heap of fables and romances, of pitiful fooleries and base falsehoods, of vile impostures and gross immoralities.'[†] Such an estimate of the main portion of the religious literature of the centuries preceding the advent of Christ amounts to the negation of the great law of spiritual evolution, according to which utter stagnation in the matter of doctrinal development is a virtual impossibility. The developments of such a period may have been strange, retrograde, and misguided, as well as normal, progressive, and healthy; but development of some sort there must have been. And we must look for the reflexion of this, such as it was, in the Apocryphal literature as the written repository of the religious thought of the age. Reasonable as this view of the case appears to be, it has been too often either quite overlooked or vehemently rejected. By those who concede to these books no right save that of being anathematized, it will of course be considered monstrous to take account of them at all in connexion with biblical doctrine. And this class has had, and probably still has, its representatives in various quarters. For rooted aversion to the Apocrypha has not been confined to Scotland. A German writer[‡] rather wildly says, 'They tear asunder the code of Divine revelation'; but the real question, which we must not allow to be obscured by a statement of this sort, is, How does NT doctrine stand related to that of the Hebrew Canon? Is there any middle ground? And do these post-canonical books furnish us with that middle ground? Do they show us any doctrines in a transition stage of development between the OT and NT positions? 'Science,' says Reuss, 'can never ignore or neglect with impunity the regular succession and natural connexion of facts, and it acts under a singular illusion when it attempts to bring together the two ends, after cutting away the thread which unites them' (Apostolic Age, i. p. 70, Eng. tr.). May not the Apocrypha in this case be the uniting thread which some have been too eager to cut away?

2. Another interesting and important factor here enters into the discussion, viz. the relation in which the later Judaism stood to foreign systems of thought, for it was undoubtedly owing to the influence of these, combined with a certain decay of the older Hebraism itself, that it assumed its distinctive character.

The choice of Israel did not absolutely exclude the rest of the human race from being the objects of Divine regard (Jn 1^{9}). On the contrary, it was distinctly contemplated that they should ultimately be received into the larger Israel of the Christian Church (Mt 8^{11}, Jn 10^{16}). While the Jews were selected for the discharge of the missionary function of transmitting the Divine revelation to the world, God was also by His providence gradually and surely preparing the world for Christianity. Consequently, the idea of other nations making some contribution towards the sum-total of the religious knowledge attained in pre-Christian times is not one to be summarily rejected as unworthy of consideration. When in Jn 1^{9} Christ is designated 'the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world,' may we not warrantably trace to this source the reasonings and yearnings of a Socrates for a future and endless life, and the profound thoughts of a Plato concerning the immortality of the soul? After a struggle with his native Jewish prejudices, the Apostle Peter perceived that 'God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him' (Ac 10$^{34f.}$). That other nations besides the Jews had at least some measure of light is therefore a fact which should be thoughtfully acknowledged rather than grudgingly admitted. It can in no way derogate from the supreme honour due to the religion of Jesus Christ to recognize that Confucius taught obedience to parents; that Buddha based his system of morality on the notion of the equality of all, and enjoined the widest toleration; that Zoroaster, so far from being accurately described as a 'famous impostor' and 'very crafty knave,' was a teacher of monotheism and of many valuable ethical principles; or that in ancient Egypt men were familiar with the conceptions of immortality and eternity. These were only so many 'past stars getting light from the everlasting sun.' All that was true or good in these ancient faiths was derived from Jesus Christ. The providential shaking together of the nations which took place during the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era enabled each to pour what contribution it could into the great treasury of religious thought and sentiment. The fusion of the diverse tendencies and thoughts of East and West was not without its effect in developing in a forward direction (though not uniformly so) the truth that God had communicated to His people; and the constant intermingling of ideas that took place was, under God, destined to result in nothing less than the inbringing of a cosmopolitan religion, equally suitable for all climates and peoples, and capable of assimilating all that was noblest and purest in human aspiration and culture. Whatever of real advance in doctrinal development is anywhere traceable during this important and formative period is therefore still to be attributed to the revealing Spirit and guiding hand of Jehovah, and is not to be regarded as simply the product of human reason or philosophical speculation.

With the exception of certain modes of thought and expression, including perhaps the ponderous visionary style so much employed by Ezekiel, the patriotic Jew apparently brought back with him from Babylon no new literary possession. His religious borrowing was upon a still smaller scale: he had viewed the idolatrous practices of his captors with lofty scorn (Is 44^{9-20}). But his debt to Persian and Greek religious thought proved to be much more considerable.

(1) Persian influence.—The worship of the One Supreme God which was common to both Persians and Jews (Ormazd and Jahweh being to this extent practically identified) sufficiently accounts for the bond of religious sympathy which undoubtedly united the two peoples. They were at one in their repudiation of idolatry; both looked for the absolute reign of the good. That the final destruction of evil is well within the horizon of Zoroaster appears from the Gāthās, or hymns, the only part of the Avesta claiming to be from the prophet's own hand. (For further details, see art. ZOROASTRIANISM in vol. iv., and Cheyne in Expos. Times, ii. (1891) 202, 224, 248). Apart from the influence inevitably exerted on one another by men of diverse creeds who are brought by circumstances into close mutual relationship, these fundamental resemblances between their respective faiths naturally led to a certain interaction of belief in other directions also. For example, the Zoroastrians, like the Jews, expected a Saviour (Saoshyant, of the stem of Zoroaster) at whose advent the powers of evil were to be overthrown. Again, it need not be doubted that the Zoroastrian expectation of a glorious and happy future, in which the faithful, freed from all contact with evil, should enjoy eternal fellowship with Ormazd and his angels, led the Jews towards a clearer apprehension at least of the hitherto but dimly entertained and scarcely formulated doctrine of a personal immortality. Persian ideas have been traced in the OT itself (Dn $10^{13.20}$ 12^{1}); they are certainly present in the Apocr. (To 12^{15}); and seem to have passed through the earlier Jewish apocalyptic (En $90^{21f.}$) into the NT Apocalypse of St. John (1^{4} 8^{2}). A noticeable feature of Zoroastrianism is its artistic and lavish use of numbers and images. This tendency was specially developed in connexion with the doctrine of good and evil spirits, and is already reflected in the later canonical books of the OT (1 Ch 21^{1}, Zec 3^{9} 4^{10}), and still more, as we shall see, in the post-canonical literature. These foreign elements began to produce a freer play of the imagination within the sphere of things sacred than had been possible under the former limitations; they supplied the old faith with a new stock of names and images. That Jewish ritual as well as doctrine was affected by Persian influence appears not only from the institution of the Feast of Purim, but in connexion with such a matter as the saying of the first prayer (Shĕma') in the temple at daybreak.

(2) Greek influence.—The tide of Hellenism, which began to flow over the whole civilized world after the brilliant conquests of Alexander the Great, affected Palestine as well as other countries. During the period of the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ the Greek spirit took possession of the land; native customs and traditional ways of thinking everywhere yielded to this subtle overmastering force. In the purely Judæan district, however, the Hellenistic spirit was so far kept at bay. No new Greek cities sprang up within that essentially Jewish area, and when the rising wave of Hellenism dashed up against the rock of Judaism the latter was strong enough to withstand the shock. Only its sharper corners were worn off in the process, and this was necessary in order to the fulfilment of the function assigned in providence to the Heb. faith as the historic preparation for the world-wide religion of Christ. The influx of Greek culture was met by a fresh and resolute devotion to the legalistic ideal developed by the scribes. Such was the result of the conflict epigrammatically referred to by Zechariah in the words: 'Thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece' (9^{13}). Proudly conscious of their privileged position as the chosen people, and punctilious to the last degree with regard to their observance of the temple worship, the Jews gained rather than lost in national sentiment. But if the Hellenistic spirit was denied an entrance into the religious citadel of Judaism, it crept insidiously into every other department of life (1 Mac 1^{15}, 2 Mac 4^{9-14}).

Alexandria, and not Athens, was now the proud 'mother of arts and eloquence,' and it was in this Egyptian city that non-Palestinian Judaism came into closest contact with Hellenistic thought and culture. The spiritual atmosphere of the place was altogether peculiar, and charged with elements derived alike from the East and the West. Two such powerful and opposite streams of tendency could not meet without mutually influencing each other, and the world has profited by their fusion. The translation of the Heb. Scriptures into Greek made them the property of all nations, while the Greek language and philosophy provided the Jewish religion with splendid weapons for apologetic and missionary purposes. Judaism and Hellenism were thus complementary factors in creating a type of thought and life wider and fuller than either of them could have produced of itself. A distinctly religious conception of the universe had hitherto been as foreign to the Greek as the rules and abstractions of metaphysics had been to the Hebrew. But the Greeks were now provided with a direct Divine revelation, capable of filling with life every groove of their languishing philosophical systems; and the Jews, besides appropriating certain Greek conceptions, found the means of giving scientific expression to the contents of their religious consciousness. The result of this union of two great forces was seen in the rise and development of the Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy of religion. In this system, unfortunately, the literal meaning of Scripture was discarded in favour of allegorical interpretations. From the time of Aristobulus (2nd cent. B.C.), who maintained that the Greek philosophy had been borrowed from Moses, to that of Philo Judæus (c. 20 B.C.–50 A.D.), who still further developed the allegorical method, philosophers used the Bible largely as a prop for their own speculations. To Judaism the results were sufficiently serious, but it emerged at last from the keen battle which had to be waged as the price of its partnership with 'the wisdom of men,' if not without wounds, yet also enriched with spoil.

There were thus two great streams of influence flowing in upon the Jewish theology of this period, an Eastern and a Western, a Persian and a Greek. Of these by far the stronger was the Greek, though the Persian is as distinctly traceable. The one may be likened to an ordinary under-current, and the other to the Gulf Stream. The Persian current was that of Zoroastrianism; the Greek cannot be associated with a single name. Out of these two forces, which were new, or newly felt, acting upon the native Judaism of Palestine, which was old, was formed that third which we meet within the home Jewish theology of the period. But there was also, as we have seen, a Jewish theology outside of Palestine altogether. Not only did foreign influences flow in upon Judaism, but Judaism, now no longer confined to Palestine, went out to meet them. Thus the hitherto unbroken river of OT ideas and doctrines divided itself at this point into three separate streams. One, the main current, continued to flow on in Palestine; while on the east and west of it ran two other streams—the one through Persian territory, and the other through Greek. The tributaries of Persian and Greek ideas by which these streams respectively were fed necessarily caused their waters to be of a composite character, exceedingly difficult to analyze so as to say definitely, 'This is Jewish, that is Persian,' or 'This is Jewish, that is Greek.' These currents, however, into which Judaism was divided, and through which it was widened, were destined in some degree to find a meeting-point again in the religion of Christ, which assimilated what was good not only in Judaism, but also in the splendid creations of foreign philosophical and theological thought.

We find, then, that human speculation had a great function to perform in so acting upon OT dogma as to soften and widen it in the direction of the larger truths of the perfect revelation in Christ. This revelation was certainly the more easily received and apprehended that the Greeks had lived and thought. The contribution of the thinkers of the West to the universal religion was their philosophical culture and spirit. That, joined to the sacred depository of truth that composed the faith of the Hebrews, went to form a religion wide enough for every section of humanity. It wanted only the material force of Rome to fuse the nations into the outward and political union that was to consolidate the deeper union which the interchange of spiritual thought and feeling had already in great measure brought about.

3. Decay of the older Hebraism.—If, moreover, in the later canonical books we already find traces of the influx of foreign influences on the one hand, we also discover signs of the decay of pure Hebraism on the other. In particular, we can discern in Ezekiel and Zechariah distinct traces of the process by which the old supremacy of the prophet passed first into the hands of the priest, and subsequently into those of the scribe, the spiritual ancestor of the NT Pharisee. For instance, it is very significant that in the fifth vision of Zechariah the two 'anointed ones' who jointly sustain the spiritual life of Israel are the civil and priestly heads of the nation, and that the prophet is accorded no place by their side. Quite foreign, too, to the older prophecy is the way in which Zechariah introduces mediators to bridge the distance between men and Jahweh, who is conceived as reigning in the remote heaven and maintaining intercourse with the world through the medium of invisible messengers. In Malachi we detect not only a certain scholasticism of style that is new, but also, as contrasted with Isaiah and the other great prophets, a tincture of the legalistic spirit (4^4) which was destined to become so strong in the near future. 'Joel starts, like any older prophet, from the facts of his own day, but these hurry him at once into apocalypse; he calls, as thoroughly as any of his predecessors, to repentance, but under the imminence of the day of the Lord, with its supernatural terrors, he mentions no special sin and enforces no single virtue. The civic and personal ethics of the earlier prophets are absent. In the Greek period, the oracles, now numbered from the ninth to the fourteenth chapters of the Book of Zechariah, repeat to aggravation the exulting revenge of Nahum and Obadiah, without the strong style or the hold upon history which the former exhibits, and show us prophecy still further enwrapped in apocalypse.'* That the ceremonial had now taken precedence of the moral and the spiritual is also clear from a comparison of the historical books of this period with those of earlier times. The Chronicler is concerned chiefly about the outward holiness of Israel, and knows nothing of the ethical earnestness of the older prophets. In the Apocryphal literature of the Gr. period we see the spirit of Pharisaic Judaism altogether in the ascendant.

4. The foregoing considerations supply us with a convenient basis for the classification of the Apocrypha. They range themselves into three classes according to the national influences under which they were composed, and it will be important for our present inquiry to view them in that connexion, bearing in mind, of course, that no classification of this sort can be absolutely exhaustive, and that traces of Pers. influence, e.g., may be met with in books prevailingly Gr. or Pal. in their origin, and vice versâ. †

(1) The Persian-Palestinian books. These are characterized chiefly by their deep-seated horror of idolatry; by the extraordinary value they attach to alms-giving and other works of benevolence; by a very elaborate doctrine of angels, and especially of demons; by the prominence they give to the miraculous; by a distinct doctrine of immortality, and indications of belief in a future judgment; by the doctrines of the mediation of the saints and the efficacy of prayers for the dead; and by the sure hope of the resurrection of the just. To this class belong Tobit, Baruch, 2 Mac., and the Additions to Daniel. Here it will be observed, on the one hand, what a curious deviation there is in some particulars from OT doctrine, and, on the other, how marked an approximation there is on some other points towards the NT position.

(2) The pure Palestinian books, viz. Sirach, 1 Maccabees, and possibly Judith. These are distinguished by their keen attachment to Judaism, as seen in the way in which they magnify the Law, and celebrate the praises of Zion and the temple services; by the much smaller place given to the miraculous; by their defective ideas about a future life, the only immortality known to them being apparently that of being remembered; by their silence concerning the resurrection; and by their crude notions with respect to a Divine retributive judgment. Here we are in contact with the central stream of Judaism, and hence find no such decided deviations from OT doctrine as in those books written under Persian influence. There is, however, as might be expected, also less of real development towards NT positions. The Pharisaic party, we know, were dominant in Palestine, and did what they could to prevent foreign influences from being introduced. There was thus less violent collision between opposing elements, and hence less pronounced results were produced both in the normal and in the abnormal directions. Yet even here there was a gradual widening as generations passed, and as new influences forced themselves even into the citadel of Judaism.

(3) The Jewish-Alexandrian books. These include 1 Esdras, the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Prayer of Manasses. While also showing an attachment to Judaism, they lay more stress upon a holy life than upon the outward cultus of the Mosaic Law. But the chief peculiarity of this third class is that they bear distinctly the colouring of the Greek philosophy. Especially is this true of the Book of Wisdom. This important work is far from being an ordinary sample of Alexandrian theosophy, but neither is it conceived precisely in the spirit of the older Heb. literature. In passing from those OT books to which it bears the closest resemblance, viz. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, we are conscious of a certain change of atmosphere, and of the presence of a new element which gives a distinct tone to the whole. This new factor is none other than the subtle spirit of Hellenism. The work deals in an abstract and philosophical manner with such subjects as the creation, wisdom, man, history, etc. It also contains the Platonic doctrine as to the four cardinal virtues. In this division of the Apocr. we naturally again meet with more variation from OT doctrine. With regard to sundry points, it would be vain to attempt to reconcile the Canonical and Apocryphal statements. E.g., the position taken up in Wisdom as to creation and the soul of man is not that of the OT. These discrepancies arise apparently from an effort on the writer's part to harmonize the scriptural and philosophical positions. The general strain of the book, however, is thoroughly biblical, only the truths of revelation are viewed through the medium of Gr. learning. While the prevailing standpoint is essentially that of the OT, we not infrequently meet with passages conceived in the larger and freer spirit of the NT. For over against the variations mentioned we must place the fact that there is a clear advance upon some OT doctrines, notably with regard to that of immortality. Ewald says we have in this book 'a premonition of John' and 'a preparation for Paul' (HI v. p. 484). And, in fact, altogether apart from the claim that St. John's doctrine of the Logos is found in germ here, St. Paul's argument in Romans that men are inexcusable who do not find out to some extent from nature even the knowledge of God, his description of the Christian's armour in Ephesians, and the expressions used with reference to the Person of Christ in the anonymous Epistle to the Hebrews, are all embodied already in this Apocryphal work ($13^{1ff.}$ $5^{17ff.}$ 7^{26}).

While it is important to recognize the facts just mentioned, we must not put forward an extravagant claim on behalf of the post-canonical Jewish writings. 'These books belong to the decaying period of the nation's life. The earliest of them were written only at the close of the Persian dominion, and belong to a time when prophecy had ceased, and when men were looking not for what might be revealed, but to what had been revealed.'* The statement in 1 Mac 9^{27} that 'there was great tribulation in Israel, such as was not since the time that no prophet appeared unto them,' illustrates the prevailing feeling on this point. There was no longer any proper scope for prophecy as the medium of further revelation. A period when attention to legalistic details became the paramount tendency in religion was not one to call forth men filled with great ideas, and eager in the name of God to unfold them to the people. And, in fact, religious activity was practically confined to the expository handling by the scribes of the revelation already given in the Law and the Prophets. 'Fresh principles and truths were no longer developed, though of course this did not exclude development in the case of what had already found expression.'* The only further revelation now possible was that which was to burst through the limitations of Judaism and bring in a religion for man. The Maccabæan revolt, however, regenerated in a wonderful degree the religious life of the period, and gave rise to a literature of its own which really amounted to a renaissance of a very fruitful kind. Our claim, then, in regard to the Apocr. and other non-canonical Jewish writings of the period is, that, while forming no essential part of OT revelation, they yet supply a very welcome link between the OT and the NT, and contain not a little that is of value in their illustrations and applications and further developments of the principles already revealed. It has been too readily assumed that these books are wholly without 'evidences of the Divine Spirit leading on to Christ.'

i. THE DOCTRINE OF GOD.—The first thing that naturally demands attention when we come to look at the dogmatic of the Apocr. is the doctrine of God. Now here, perhaps, it was not possible as regards the general doctrine that there should be any advance, and we are rather concerned to ask, Is the lofty presentation of the OT, as given especially in Ex $34^{6f.}$, sustained? On the whole, there need be no hesitation in saying that it is, although in some of the Apocryphal books the conception of God is much higher than in others. It is at its lowest in Judith, and at its highest in Sirach and Wisdom. But in general, throughout the Apocr., one finds essentially the OT view of God, as that had been evolved during centuries of theocratic guidance.

1. The OT position.—While the general idea of God is everywhere expressed in the OT by the name El (also Elōăh, Elōhīm), the earliest conception of the Divine nature within the sphere of revelation is that conveyed in the name El Shaddai=(?) 'God Almighty.' Although probably of pre-Mosaic origin, it was only at a later stage of revelation (Ex 3^{14} $6^{2f.}$) that the name Jahweh came to be apprehended in its essential significance as the absolutely independent, faithful, and immutable covenant God of Israel. God was next conceived as the Holy One (Ex 15^{11}),—just (Dt 32^{4}, Ps $36^{6f.}$), and jealous (Ex 34^{14}), but also merciful and gracious (Ex 34^{6}). In the prophetic writings He is further designated as the Lord of Hosts (Is 1^{24} 2^{12}, Jer 10^{16}, Hab 2^{13} etc.), and in the Ḥokhma literature as the all-wise (Job 35^{5}, Ps 147^{5}, Pr 2^{6}, Sir 2^{26}). See, further, art. GOD (in OT) in vol. ii.

Precisely the same conception of the Divine Being predominates in the Apocrypha. The only point about which there could be any difficulty in maintaining this identity is the spirituality of God; and with regard to this we hope to show that in the Apocr. there is something that may not unfairly be described as intermediate between the perfect revelation of the NT and the more materialistic view of the OT. While the fundamental conception of God remains unchanged from that of the OT Canon, there is at the same time a decided movement towards a more spiritual conception of the Supreme Being.

2. The position of this doctrine in Jewish writings of the Apocryphal period.—(1) Of the Pal. books the most important here, and the oldest, is Sirach. This book (written in Heb. c. 180 B.C., translated into Greek B.C. 132) has much to say about God, especially about His relation to the world physical and moral. The fullest statement of God's relation to the material universe is found in 42^{15}–43^{33}; and what is distinctive of the writer's view as here expressed is his assertion that the mighty works of God's wisdom are beyond the power of His saints to declare (42^{17}). He is above all human praise (43^{30}). 'Who hath seen him, that he may declare him? And who shall magnify him as he is?' (43^{31}). There is no doubt that this represents a distinct step in the development of the doctrine of God. 'From the point of view of Ecclesiasticus,' says Nicolas, 'it is not only anthropomorphic representations which give false ideas of deity; not even the most elevated conceptions of the human spirit can declare it as it is. No feat of imagination, no effort of intelligence can reach it. Jesus, son of Sirach, has pronounced the word: the Eternal is incomprehensible in His essence by the limited faculties of man.'* The book also contains many statements regarding God's relationship to the moral world. There is a beneficent design in creation, 'for all things are created for their uses' (39^{21}). 'In the hand of the Lord is the authority of the earth,' and also 'the prosperity of a man' ($10^{4f.}$). 'Poverty and riches are from the Lord' (11^{14}), and 'he hath not given any man licence to sin' (15^{20}). God is represented as 'visiting' men; but 'as his majesty is, so also is his mercy' (2^{18}). Sometimes the contrast is drawn from the opposite side, as in 16^{12} 'As his mercy is great, so is his correction also; he judgeth a man according to his works.' As judge, there is with Him no respect of persons (35^{12}). In the assertion that 'the Most High also hateth sinners' (12^{6}) we have a deviation from the true biblical position that while hating sin God loves the sinner. The writer addresses God as 'Father and Master of my life' (23^{1}), and recognizes Him as the hearer of prayer (21^{5} 35^{16} 38^{9} etc.). A gracious Providence watches over the godly (34^{16}), but the sacrifices of the wicked are vain (34^{19}). God is regarded as specially the God of the Jews, but yet as the God of all, and loving all ($36^{1-5.\,17}$ 18^{13}). The relation of God to evil is thus laid down: 'Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell away; for thou shalt not do the things that he hateth. Say not thou, It is he that caused me to err; for he hath no need of a sinful man' ($15^{11f.}$). This passage is one of several in this book, the tenor of which is practically repeated in the Epistle of St. James ($1^{13f.}$). Except in the two particulars noted above, there is nothing in all this either in advance of, or at variance with, what is met with in the Canonical books of the OT upon the subject of the nature and character of the Supreme Being. The conservative instincts of the writer have even brought upon him the charge of adhering to 'a not so much untrue as antiquated form of religious belief.'†

In the various sections of Enoch the conception of God is practically that of the OT, although occasional divergences occur. E.g. the idea of God rejoicing over the destruction of the wicked (94^{10}) is quite foreign to the OT (cf. Ezk $18^{23.\,32}$ 33^{11}). This book employs a great multiplicity of titles for God. Of these, which are collected in the Index to Charles's edition, some of the most striking are, 'eternal Lord of glory' (75^{3}), 'God of the whole world' (84^{2}), 'Head of Days' (46^{2}), 'Honoured and Glorious One' (14^{21}), 'Lord of the sheep' (89^{16}), 'Lord of spirits' (37^{2}), 'Lord of the whole creation of the heaven' (84^{2}).

In the remaining Pal. books the conception of God undergoes little modification. According to the author of Jubilees, Israelites are God's children because physically descended from Jacob (1^{28}); but He is also the God of all ($22^{10.\,27}$ 30^{19} etc.). The idea of God presented in Judith is of the narrowest Jewish type. God is the God of Jews only. He ranks as the greatest of national deities, who will wreak vengeance on the foes of His people. Their misfortunes are due to their having departed from the law of Moses. God hears their prayers when they 'cast ashes upon their heads and spread out their sackcloth before the Lord' (4^{11}). 16^{16} is conceived in a higher strain; but apparently it is borrowed, like a similar passage in Sirach, from Ps 51. The general scope of the book, as regards the relation of the story to the character of God, detracts from the value of its separate statements. God is represented as countenancing the deceit practised by Judith in order to the deliverance of her nation, and by consequence the assassination of Holofernes. This book ranks fairly high as a literary work, but we cannot justify its morality without subscribing to the maxim that the end justifies the means. It contributes nothing to the doctrine of God beyond the general impression arising from the history, and that certainly is such as to convey a conception of Him far inferior to the lofty position maintained in Sirach. The First Book of Maccabees, being wholly historical, contains nothing to the point. Indeed, according to the true text, the name of God does not once occur in the book. Although inserted in several passages of the AV (2^{21} $3^{53.\,60}$ 4^{55} etc.), it is absent from the Greek text. In 3^{18} a few MSS do contain the word 'God,' but there is a preponderance of authority against the reading. While it breathes throughout a spirit of unfeigned faith in God as the defender and helper of His people ($4^{8ff.}$ 12^{15} 16^{3}), exhibits the deepest reverence for the Law and the temple worship (12^{9} 2^{21}), and recognizes the overruling providence of God (1^{64} 3^{18}) and His unfailing support of those who put their trust in Him (2^{61}), yet the general conception of the Divine Being, so far as presented in this book, is not that of Jahweh dwelling among His people, but that of God enthroned in the distant heaven (3^{50} 4^{10}). In Test. Levi 3, God is designated 'the Great Glory,' as in Enoch 14^{20} 102^{3}. 2 (4) Esdras, while presenting no distinctive doctrinal feature on this head, contains, besides an enumeration of the Divine attributes ($7^{62ff.}$) and a summary of much OT teaching about God, the striking invocation of 8^{20-23}.

(2) Of the Pers.-Pal. books Bar 1–3^{8} is perhaps the oldest. Baruch's idea of God is simply that He is the guardian of Israel (2^{11} $3^{1.\,4}$). In spite of disciplinary trials, they enjoy peculiar privileges (2^{15}). To them alone has the Divine wisdom been revealed; and had they not abandoned it, they would not have been in subjection to the heathen ($2^{1.\,4}$ 3^{8}). The Book of Tobit has a wider conception of God. The writer hopefully contemplates the time when 'all the nations shall turn to fear the Lord God truly, and shall bury their idols. And all the nations shall bless the Lord' ($14^{6f.}$). The Jews will be raised above all other nations, not, however, because they are Jews, as Baruch holds, but because they do the will of God. In this book we have an illustration of the post-exilic tendency to accumulate names for God. He is spoken of as 'the Most High' (1^{4}), 'the Lord of heaven and earth' (7^{18}), 'God of our fathers' (8^{5}), 'the Holy One' (12^{12}), 'our Lord,' 'our Father' (13^{4}), 'the Lord of righteousness,' 'the everlasting King' (13^{6}), 'the Lord God' (13^{11}), 'the King of heaven' ($13^{7.\,11}$), 'the Lord of the righteous' (13^{13}), 'the great King' (13^{15}). Those who fear God shall be recompensed (4^{14}); indeed the fear of God is the true standard of wealth (4^{21}). The burden of the book is to prove that God's favour is reached through good works, such as fastings, the giving of alms, and the burial of the dead ($12^{8ff.}$). In this distinctly unbiblical position (cf. Sir $3^{3.\,30}$, which, though pure Palestinian, comes under the exception noted above, p. 275) we may perhaps trace the influence of Zoroastrianism. According to that system, man's future destiny is determined by his life on earth, apart altogether from any idea of a Saviour. In the books of heaven every man is credited with his good deeds, while he is debited with his evil works. 'After death the soul arrives at the accountant's bridge over which lies the way to heaven'; a balance is struck, and according as the good or evil predominates so will his future be. In the case of equality between the good and the evil, the soul is relegated to an intermediate state until the last judgment, when his fate is finally fixed. The biblical doctrine of forgiveness is foreign to the system of Zoroaster, although it teaches that in view of man's ignorance, and his liability to be led astray by the powers of evil, Ormazd graciously resolved to send a prophet (Zoroaster himself) to point out to men the right way, and so rescue them from everlasting perdition. Still, in the last resort, this is essentially salvation by works—a doctrine propounded in Tobit, but utterly alien to Holy Scripture, the teaching of which on this head has been well voiced in two lines by Tennyson—

'For merit lives from man to man,
And not from man, O Lord, to Thee.'
(In Memoriam).

In the Assumption of Moses, a pure Pal. composition, the OT conception of merit is still adhered to (12^{7}), although in the Apoc. of Baruch, a composite book belonging to the first century of our era, justification by works is taught (51^{7} 67^{6}) just as in the Talmud.

(3) If some of the Jewish-Alexandrian writings contain little that is noteworthy, from our present standpoint, regarding the doctrine of God, there are others which furnish us with much that is germane to our purpose. In the second section of Bar. (3^{9} onwards) there occurs the following passage: 'This is our God, and there shall none other be accounted of in comparison of him. He hath found out all the way of knowledge, and hath given it unto Jacob his servant, and to Israel that is beloved of him. Afterward did she appear upon earth, and was conversant with men. This is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever: all they that hold it fast are appointed to life; but such as leave it shall die' (3^{35}–4^{1}). Owing to a misinterpretation, this was treated as a locus classicus in the Arian controversy; the reference in 3^{37} is not to the incarnation of the Logos, but to Wisdom personified, as in Sir 24^{10}. The really special feature of the passage is 'the view which it expresses of the sacred law. This wears the appearance of full creative originality. The Law is the final manifestation on earth of the wisdom of God Himself, which has taken a sort of bodily form, bestowing life and salvation on all who keep it. This constitutes a totally new combination of the older representation of wisdom as the revelation of God in the world with the deep veneration for the law which had recently arisen.'* In Baruch there is therefore no real development of the doctrine of God.

The Wisdom of Solomon, on the other hand, is here of first-rate importance. In this book we have the very highest conception of God, and are lifted entirely above the limitations of the Jewish idea. God 'is manifested to them that do not distrust him' (1^{2}); 'he visiteth his holy ones' (4^{15}). Men please him, not by their Judaism but by the purity of their life. God is described both in His relation to the physical and moral worlds, and also in regard to His nature and essence. His all-powerful hand created the world out of formless matter (11^{17}); by His word He made all things, and by His wisdom He formed man (9^{2}). But while 'He created all things that they might have being' (1^{14}), 'God made not death' (1^{13}). As 'sovereign Lord of all' (6^{7}), He exercises moral supervision over mankind in general: 'being righteous thou rulest all things righteously' (12^{15}). God's infinite resources are used in behalf of the righteous and against the ungodly ($5^{15.17}$ $11^{17ff.}$). Stern, however, as are the writer's delineations of the Divine judgments against sin, he is not oblivious to the correlative truth of the Divine mercy (11^{23} 12^{16} etc.). The sovereign Lord is also the lover of men's lives = souls (11^{26}), and 'the saviour of all' (16^{7}). Full recognition is accorded to the truth of God's gracious and sleepless providence (4^{17} 12^{13} $14^{5.3}$; 17^{2}). The philosophy of Israelitish history is explained by the fact that 'by measure and number and weight thou didst order all things' (11^{20}).

While the view of the Divine nature presented in Wisdom has manifestly much in common with that of the OT generally, it is also decidedly tinged with Hellenism. God is spoken of as 'the first author of beauty' (13^{3}), a designation which would never have occurred to a Heb. mind uninfluenced by Gr. thought. All wisdom is in His hand (7^{16}), and is the reflexion of His essential glory and goodness. In a noble locus classicus the author says: 'She is a breath of the power of God, and a clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty; therefore can nothing defiled find entrance into her. For she is an effulgence from everlasting light, and an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image of His goodness. And she, being one, hath power to do all things; and remaining in herself, reneweth all things: and from generation to generation passing into holy souls she maketh men friends of God and prophets' ($7^{25ff.}$). This is the language of the educated Greek as well as of the pious Jew. Such metaphysical abstractions and recondite conceptions are altogether alien to the genius of the unsophisticated Hebrew. What is distinctive in the idea of God presented here is that He is regarded not from the point of view of power and majesty, but from that of wisdom. The author's philosophy led him to value wisdom more than power. With him wisdom is the most excellent of all things, the noblest ideal that can be pursued, and the highest Being is necessarily the wisest Being. There is also something non-Hebraic about the following statements bearing on the spirituality and omnipresence of God:—'The spirit of the Lord hath filled the world' (1^{7}); 'thine incorruptible spirit is in all things' (12^{1}); 'verily all men by nature were but vain who had no perception of God, and from the good things that are seen they gained not power to know him that is' (13^{1}). On account of Ex 3^{14} we should perhaps exempt the last from this category, but the other passages look very like Jewish modifications of Gr. thought. The idea of the all-pervasiveness of the Divine spirit occurs also in Ps 139^{8}, but there is a difference in the mode of its presentation. In Wisdom the personality of God is kept more in the background, and is conceived in a vein of idealistic pantheism. With Plato, God is not a person but the all-comprehending idea of the Good, and our author's language seems to indicate a certain bias in this direction. But at the same time he emphasizes the spirituality of God; in the passages referred to we certainly have this apprehended in a very remarkable degree. If they lack the directness and finality of that great revealing word, 'God is spirit' (Jn 4^{24}), they nevertheless furnish an intermediate link between it and the more materialistic standpoint of the OT.

It will be necessary for us here, and at subsequent stages in our investigation, to take account of the theological position of the Jewish-Alexandrian philosopher Philo, whose views, as marking a notable development of Judaism intermediate between the Apocrypha and the NT, cannot reasonably be passed over. Although not the first, 'he is quite the most important representative of Hellenistic Judaism, and his writings give us the clearest view of what this development was and aimed at.'* One of its most cherished aims was the substitution of more abstract teaching for the numerous anthropomorphisms of the OT. And in this field Philo did extensive service. He held that grief, envy, wrath, revenge, etc., cannot be attributed to God, and that when He is represented as showing such emotions and affections the motives of the Divine activity are only being expressed in a way that specially appeals to the human mind. But, strongly influenced as he was by Gr. philosophy, Philo did not abandon Judaism. On the contrary, he did his best to propagate it. In opposition to the Stoic doctrine that God is the (impersonal) soul of the world, Philo declares Him to be essentially different from the world, of which He is the Creator and Preserver. And thus, in spite of such approximations to pantheistic thought as we meet with in his writings, and his free use of Gr. philosophical language and method, Philo stands firmly on theistic ground. Frequently, no doubt, he conveys the impression of sinking the concrete God in a conception of almost purely ideal content. According to this philosopher, God is pure Being, of whom no quality can be predicated, and it is only through the medium of an infinite multiplicity of Divine Ideas or Forces, distinct from his own proper being, that any active relation between God and the world is rendered possible. Regarding the nature of these mediating ἰδέαι or δυνάμεις, however, he has no very definite conception. He follows Plato in calling them Ideas, and the Stoics in also designating them Forces and Logoi, i.e. parts of the Reason which operates in the world; while at the same time he further identifies them with the Jewish Angels and the Gr. Dæmons, i.e. intermediaries between God and the world. It is not surprising that this vagueness of conception with regard to a fundamental theological distinction should involve him in a serious contradiction. Philo is unable to avoid the inconsistency of declaring on the one hand that the sum-total of Ideas, the κόσμος νοητός, is nothing more than the Reason of God as Creator, while yet on the other hand he represents these Ideas as so many distinct and independent entities. If God works in the world through the medium of His Ideas or Forces, then the latter cannot be separated from Him; but if He does not come into direct relationship with the world, then they must have an independent existence. See, further, art. PHILO in the present volume.

3. The extent to which foreign influences affected the doctrine of God as reflected in these writings.—How far, speaking generally, did external views modify the OT conception of this fundamental doctrine? As regards the influence of Persian thought, it must be said that, although traceable, it was yet in this connexion comparatively inoperative. The references in the visions of Zechariah to 'the seven eyes of Jehovah' (3^9 4^{10}) are probably derived from Zoroastrian imagery; but, if we except the idea that the favour of God is obtained through good works (To $12^{8ff.}$), there is hardly anything in the Apocrypha touching the doctrine of God which can be attributed to Persian influence. Allusion has already been made to the general identification of Jehovah with Ormazd. But, if there were points of union between the religion of the Persians and that of the Hebrews in their conception of the Supreme Being, there were also points of cleavage. E.g., unlike Judaism, Zoroastrianism starts from a dualistic scheme of the universe. In the persons of their representatives Ahura-mazda (Ormazd) and Angrô-mainyush (Ahriman) good and evil have existed from all eternity. These two spirits divide the world between them; and its history is the record of their contest for the possession of the human soul. Man has been created by, and is accountable to, Ormazd, but he is a free agent, and may, if he choose, become the abettor of evil. To do evil is to serve the interests of Ahriman; to live righteously is to advance the kingdom of Ormazd. The two original spirits wage war by means of their respective creatures. Thus Ormazd is practically an idealized Oriental monarch surrounded by his ministers or Amesha-Spentas (mod. Pers. Amshaspands) who execute his will. But for the pious Jew, after the Exile as before it, there is no such dual proprietorship of the world; on the contrary, there is one 'Creator of all' (Sir 24^8), 'the God of all' (Sir 50^{22}), and 'sovereign Lord of all' (Wis 6^7 8^3).

But, if the Pers. influence was slight, the Gr. influence on the OT conception of God was considerable. The necessary consequence of Judaism meeting Gr. thought appears in nothing more clearly than in the way in which the LXX translators habitually tone down anthropomorphic expressions about God. A few examples taken from only two OT books will suffice to illustrate this tendency. In Is 42^{13}, where the Heb. text reads, 'Jehovah shall go forth as a mighty man,' the LXX has 'The Lord God of powers (κύριος ὁ θεὸς τῶν δυνάμεων) shall go forth,' while in the same passage, as also in Ex 15^3, for His designation as 'a man of war' is substituted the general idea of 'stirring up war' (συντρίβων πολέμους). The statement of Ex 19^3 that 'Moses went up unto God, and J" called unto him out of the mountain' is modified as follows: 'Moses went up unto the mount of God, and God called unto him from heaven, saying,' etc. In Ex 21^6 it is said of the slave who prefers his master's service to freedom, 'his master shall bring him unto God' (RV), but the Gr. tr. runs, 'unto the judgment of God.' An obvious avoidance of the idea of seeing God occurs in Ex 24^{10}, where the Heb. text—'They saw the God of Israel'—is expanded into 'they saw the place where stood the God of Israel'; and in Is 38^{11}, where Hezekiah's lament, 'I shall not see the Lord in the land of the living,' becomes 'I shall not see the salvation of God,' etc. But, while in the case of the bolder anthropomorphisms used by the Heb. writers the LXX translators were thus careful to put more abstract language in their place, they did not of course go the full length of pantheism. That would indeed be a strange travesty of the OT which should attempt to represent J" as an impersonal Deity, devoid of self-conscious reason and will. All that can be affirmed is a distinct tendency to guard the idea of God from misconception, by making use of language studiously abstract and sober. The same tendency is observable in the Apocrypha. As the majority of these books were written originally in Greek, we cannot trace the process so visibly as in the case of OT books rendered into Greek, but it shows itself none the less in the much rarer employment of names of members of the human body (anthropomorphisms), and in the much rarer ascription of affections of the human mind (anthropopathies), to set forth the personal activity, moral freedom, and spirituality of the living God. Even Wisdom, however, is not wholly free from anthropomorphisms; it speaks of God's ear (1^{10}), and of His hand (5^{16} 7^{16} 10^{20} etc.); it contains the expression, 'them the Lord shall laugh to scorn' (4^{18}), and it 'retains a picture which was removed by the Targumist Jonathan as too anthropomorphic.'*

* Schürer, art. 'Philo' in Encyc. Brit.

Philosophy has often wavered between pantheism and the recognition of a personal Deity. The human mind has difficulty in uniting the two conceptions of the Absolute and concrete personality. Revelation, however, has done this, and has done it without detracting from the significance of either, or setting the one above the other. The personality of God is not, as in the more popular view, emphasized to the virtual exclusion of the conception of the Absolute, for it is expressly declared that the heaven of heavens cannot contain Him (1 K 8^{27}); nor, on the other hand, is the idea of the Absolute pressed, as in the strictly scientific view, to the exclusion of the individual personality, for God is represented as saying, 'I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God beside me' (Is 45^{5} etc.). In the Apocrypha likewise each of these conceptions gets its true position. This appears from such a passage as Wis 1^{7} 'The spirit of the Lord hath filled the world, and that which holdeth all things together hath knowledge of every voice.' Here the author pronounces against Greek pantheism by representing God as a living, personal Being; yet in the second half of the verse the attributes of omnipotence and omnipresence are predicated of the Divine spirit in the most abstract way. In short, God is presented as knowing and willing and actively working, just as in the OT, but He is spoken of in a more philosophical way. In another passage the writer excuses to some extent those who have been led to hold pantheistic views from the mistaken notion that personality is not compatible with absolute Godhead. At the same time, while giving them credit for diligent search after God, he laments that they should 'yield themselves up to sight, because the things that they look upon are beautiful,' and not 'sooner find the Sovereign Lord of these his works' ($13^{6ff.}$).

4. Popular superstitions regarding the name Jahweh.—Owing, perhaps, to their more figurative language, the Pal. Jews had not the same aversion as their Hellenistic brethren to representations of God which ascribed to Him visible features or human passions. But even they felt it necessary to harmonize the corporeal conceptions of the theophanies with the many biblical assertions of the spirituality of God. This they sought to do by the theory that God Himself did not appear to the patriarchs and to Moses; they saw only a manifestation of God—His word, His glory, His Shekinah. Persian ideas had as little to do with this attitude of the Pal. Jews as Greek, for Zoroastrianism did not concern itself with religious metaphysics. It was not due to any external influence. They had simply come to build their doctrine of God more upon the spiritual basis of such teaching as that of Ex 3^{14} 10^{28} etc. Unfortunately, they 'did not know how to retain it within the limits of spiritualism. It fell gradually into the excess of a gross theosophy of reveries and superstitions.'† Like the philosophers of Alexandria, the illiterate Jews of Palestine had arrived at the conclusion that God cannot be known to human intelligence. Unlike the former, however, they could not give philosophical expression to this idea, and held it only in the form of a superstitious belief that it is unlawful to utter the sacred name. The Kabbalists refer to it as 'the name of the four letters.' According to Jewish tradition, it was pronounced only once a year by the high priest when he entered into the Holy of Holies, and Simon the Just was the last who did this. He who knew how to pronounce this mysterious name was believed to have a magical power over the forces of nature, and was designated among the Rabbis בַּעַל שֵׁם = 'master of the name.' Mystic speculations upon the name of J" naturally led up to wild surmises regarding the essence of God and the origin of things, referred to possibly in Sir $31^{21f.}$, practised among the Essenes (Jos. BJ II. viii. 9), and embodied later in the Kabbala. The tendency of the period was towards an abstract conception of Deity. Starting from the principle that God was too pure to have immediate relations with created things, men were forced to have recourse to the theory that He governs the world through intermediary beings. And here the Jews of Palestine virtually joined hands with Philo.

5. The Christian doctrine of God.—In Palestine the strongest influence opposing the growth of the Hellenistic spirit was the partisan life which the people had come to lead. Samaritan separatism and Pharisaic pride gave the most determined resistance in their power to everything foreign. According to Dillmann ('Enoch' in Schenkel), the Book of Enoch was the first known attempt to defend the biblical conception of the world against the inroads of Hellenism. The work of the scribes in expounding and elaborating the Law helped still further to erect and strengthen the 'middle wall of partition' between Jew and Gentile. Yet it is plain that, when Christ appeared, the doctrine of God was very variously conceived. It was reserved for Him to clear away the heathen elements that, in spite of all efforts to the contrary, had clustered round it, and to reveal God as the loving Father of His creatures, by whom the hairs of our head are numbered, and the sparrows protected and fed (Mt $10^{29f.}$). Christ thus made God known to men as He had never been known before, and gave full expansion to OT glimpses of truth. And we know how in doing this He united the most popular expressions and modes of thought with the most abstract conceptions. His teaching 'joins, in the highest degree possible,' says Wendt (Teaching of Jesus, § ii. ch. 1), 'popular intelligibility and rich significance.' The truth is, both elements are necessary. The exclusive use of either the popular language of the imagination or the philosophical terminology of the schools must lead to a defective and one-sided conception of God. In the former case the concrete personality comes to clear expression, but the elaborate use of popular images may seriously interfere with the thought of essential spiritual Godhead. When, as in the OT, He is represented as writing, laughing, bearing the sword, etc., we are brought within measurable distance of such a humanistic conception. That the Israelites were constantly in danger of obscuring the conception of God as the Absolute is shown by their repeated lapses into idolatry, which really meant the putting of many separate deities in the place of the One. On the other hand, a conception of God that is limited to the philosophical language of the schools must always be deficient on the religious side. The free, personal life of Deity can become intelligible to us only when expressed in terms taken over from human life. Such language is of course figurative, but it sets forth the Divine activity in a way singularly fitted to impress us. Our minds cannot lay hold of God in His invisible Being; we need some tangible object on which to fix our thoughts. We see God's glory in the heavens, but we cannot live on abstract ideas of Being and Omniscience. We long for a Person whom we can love, to whom we can tell our sorrows, whom we can approach with confidence. Instinctively we cry, 'Show us the Father.' This great need of the human soul is fully supplied in the Person of Christ. He is the Word of life, whom men's eyes have seen, and men's hands have handled.

† Nicolas, Des Doc. Rel. des Juifs, p. 159.

Our conclusion, then, is that in at least one of the most important Apocryphal books, The Wisdom of Solomon, there is an appreciable development towards a more spiritual idea of God, and that what of grossness yet remained in the conception of Him was purged away by Christ. In the Christian doctrine of God we have also the true corrective to the exaggerated idealism of Philo, according to which God has no direct connexion with the world which He has made.

ii. THE DOCTRINE OF THE WISDOM.—Among Oriental nations in general, and among the Hebrews in particular (1 K $4^{30f.}$, Jer 49^{7}), there was a strongly marked tendency of mind known distinctively as 'wisdom,' and comparable to, though not identical with, the speculative philosophy of Greece. Whether indeed the Hebrews can be said to have possessed a philosophy at all, depends on the meaning ascribed to the term. Of metaphysical speculation about God and the world they had none, believing as they did that 'in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth,' but they had a 'sacred' philosophy of their own, which was, above all, religious and practical in its aims. Between secular philosophy and the human wisdom of Israel there was thus an essential difference. They differed in standpoint, in method, and in spirit. The Greek philosopher exercised reason upon the phenomena of the universe (τὸ πᾶν) as he found it, with the view of making it yield up its secret; the Hebrew philosopher had his ethical and religious principles to start with, and merely verified them in the actual occurrences of life.

1. Wisdom presented in OT not only as human but as Divine.—In its human aspect Wisdom is the ability to recognize, the capacity to understand, and the disposition to co-operate with the Divine purpose as it affects the physical world and the life of men. Theoretically and practically, 'the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom.' Moral and intellectual wisdom are seldom dissociated: the righteous man is the 'wise' man, and the ungodly is the fool (Ps 5^{5}, Wis 4^{17} 12^{23}). Among the people of Israel the human wisdom assumed different phases from time to time. From being a doctrine of Providence in the widest sense, according to which 'the LORD hath made all things answering to their end' (Pr 16^{4}), it came to be so in a narrower sense when the events of history appeared irreconcilable with the a priori principles contained in the Law (cf. Ps 37. 73, and the Bk. of Job). There came, too, 'a period of comparative quiescence in the presence of difficulties, which are themselves drawn into the general scheme, and shown, as parts of it, to have their own utility.' *

In the OT, however, Wisdom is presented not only as human, but also as Divine. By Divine Wisdom is meant the world in its totality as inhabited by God and expressing in its varied phenomena His mind and character and mode of working. As the unity of thought and force underlying the manifold forms of creation, it may be ideally differentiated from God. It is so, e.g., in the passage of most significance—the remarkable generalization of Pr 8. Wisdom is spoken of in such a way as to make it impossible to believe that only the Divine attribute of wisdom is meant. Nor perhaps can we regard this description of wisdom as 'certainly nothing more than a poetical personification of the Divine Intelligence.' † Rather is it here the active, organized, and conscious embodiment of the Divine principles empirically manifested in creation and providence. It is something outside of, yet standing alongside of, God, created by Him so as together with Him to fashion the world. God is the actual worker, but Wisdom is with Him as His workman and fellow. Realizing itself thus in the work of creation, Wisdom is further represented as 'playing' like a child before Jehovah in His habitable earth, in all the glow of conscious power, and as taking special delight in the sons of men. Such qualities are ascribed to it as to make it almost identical now with the Spirit, now with the NT Logos.

In different parts of the Heb. Scriptures God's revelation of Himself is attributed to His word. Gn 1 at once suggests itself in connexion with the idea of the Word as creative; God speaks, and the world starts into being. Later on, it appears as the regular medium of the prophetic oracles. In certain psalms (33^{6} 107^{20} 147^{15}) and in Isaiah (55^{11}) we find the Word personified and set forth as the agent and messenger of the Divine will. It came thus to be conceived as distinct from God Himself, force being perhaps lent to the distinction by the fact that nearly all Heb. words for speech include the notion of standing forth. The Word is essentially connected with the idea of mediation, and indeed the whole Jewish revelation is pervaded by the thought that God never manifests Himself except through a medium. He sends His angel, His word, His prophet, His only-begotten Son; but, as for Himself in His essential Being, 'no man hath seen God at any time.'

It is thus possible to find the germ of the doctrine of the Logos already in the opening verses of Scripture, which represent God as having called things into being by speech. But, doubtless, it was only in connexion with the later development of the Wisdom that the origin of the Logos doctrine was referred back to this source. The whole subject is beset with much difficulty. This is partly due to the variable meaning attached to the Wisdom by biblical writers. Sometimes it is conceived as a pure abstraction, sometimes as a simple personification of the Divine Intelligence, and sometimes as virtually a distinct person objective to God Himself. From Pr 8 it is clear, on the one hand, that to the writer Wisdom exists alongside of God in a special sense applicable to none of His attributes; and, on the other, that his picture of the perfectly harmonious coexistence of God and Wisdom excludes the hypothesis of a duality in the Godhead. The Logos is more than a simple personification of Wisdom, and yet is not altogether conceived as a distinct person. The conception is more than poetical, without, however, clearly passing beyond the poetical category. A very near approach is made to the idea of the hypostasis of the Logos, but there is no definite expression given to it. No other passage of the OT affords a deeper glance into the inner Divine life, and yet it is not easy to say what precisely we gain from it in this, to us, necessarily mysterious department of knowledge. Possibly Langen is right—although it may be difficult to reconcile such an opinion with a strict view of inspiration—when he says with regard to the statements of the sacred writer: 'It would really seem that in those expressions he has presented his own dark surmisings about the essence of his "Wisdom of God" rather than clear-cut thoughts' (l.c. p. 252).

2. Hellenizing of the Heb. Ḥokhma in the Alexandrian Wisdom of Solomon.—In Sirach the conception of Wisdom is often of the vaguest kind. Wisdom may be reason, or foresight, or knowledge, or virtue. He does use it, however, in a more definite sense. Objectively, it is that everlasting power by which God created and governs the world. Immanent from all eternity (1^4 24^9), it became active at the creation. It must therefore be conceived at once as an emanation from God and as standing alongside of God. Subjectively, it is the possession of the man who discovers the Divine Wisdom through the investigation of God's works in nature, and the knowledge of His will as revealed in the Law. The personification in Sir 24, although sharper and bolder than that of Pr 8, does not go beyond the latter in the direction of asserting a distinct personality. Wisdom is represented as a premundane creation of God (v.^{9}), which 'came forth from the mouth of the Most High, and covered the earth as a mist' (v.^{3}). All-embracing (v.^{5}), and with a footing in every nation (v.^{6}), it makes its home in Israel (vv.$^{8.\ 10f.}$), takes root, grows, blossoms, and brings forth fruit (vv.$^{12-17}$), and is enshrined in the Mosaic law (v.^{23}). To Wisdom is thus given the special aspect of the revelation of God in the Law and in 'the assemblies of Jacob.' But, although in this way it corresponds somewhat to the NT λόγος, there is no clear ascription to it of personality: 'the conception of it still floats, so to speak, "as a mist."'* Thus we find nothing in Sirach, or in Baruch who agrees with him (cf. $3^{12ff.}$), beyond a highly coloured personification after the manner of the OT writings. They stand, in spite of Greek influences, where the author of Pr 8 stood. But these influences told very strongly in 'that highly original synthesis of Jewish, Platonic, and Stoic elements,' the later Alexandrian Book of Wisdom.

† Godet (Prologue to St. John's Gospel), who adds: 'When combined, however, with the notion of the Angel of the LORD, this idea of Wisdom assumes the character of a real personality.' It is difficult to see what good purpose is served by thus mixing up the two ideas. A great deal is predicated of Wisdom that is not in the OT applied to the Angel of the LORD; they have, in fact, nothing in common beyond the notion of representing God to the chosen people.

Heraclitus, who was a pantheist, appears to have been the originator of the Greek doctrine of the νοῦς or λόγος. Matter, he said, is God, but the animating νοῦς gave it shape. Anaxagoras improved on this by his threefold system of Godhead, λόγος, and matter, holding that God as the highest Being made use of the λόγος or νοῦς = Divine Intelligence, as the regulative principle of the universe. To Anaxagoras belongs the merit of having asserted the ascendency of Mind, although his theory was much obscured by the attempt to adduce explanations from material causes. In opposition to the physical philosophers, and in continuation of the work of Socrates, Plato put forth his theory of Ideas, in accordance with which he maintained that the phenomena of the universe could be accounted for only by 'The good,' i.e. the Final Cause. This philosopher gave a further development to the views of Anaxagoras by holding that the λόγος or νοῦς which gave form and order to the world designed it after the pattern of its own perfections. A supreme Mind, he contended, must as Intelligence work with some end in view; but, as the perfect Intelligence can fittingly have for its object only that which is best, it must have reflected its own attributes in the shaping of the world. Thus 'God is the measure of all things' (de Leg. iv.). The νοῦς holds together the κόσμος νοητός, but, as regards its relation to God Himself, Plato is clear only in saying that it is not identical with Him. For, according to this greatest of Gr. philosophers, the Divine essence is to be sought, not in Intelligence but in the idea of the Chief Good; and, when he speaks of God as νοῦς, it is only as Creator of the world that He is so designated. Still, Plato does not go the length of representing the νοῦς as a distinct personality.

It is not difficult to see how the Alexandrian Jews found their Heb. חָכְמָה (Ḥokhma) in this Greek doctrine of the νοῦς. Not to take account of differences, Plato and Solomon—or the writer of Pr 8 it should perhaps rather be said—were agreed that Wisdom must be distinguished from God, that it nevertheless belongs to Him, and that through it as a medium He actively works. Here, then, was a distinct point of union; and it is only natural that in passing from Sirach to Wisdom, written in another country and at a later time, we should meet with a considerable development of the OT doctrine, which was still substantially repeated there. This development is in the direction of Hellenizing the Heb. doctrine of Wisdom.

The writer introduces his discussion of Wisdom with the remark that he will explain what it is, and how it arose (6^{22}). Further, the doctrine is set forth in the abstract terms of Platonism, and not in language current among the ancient Hebrews. There is in Wisdom 'a spirit quick of understanding, holy, alone in kind, manifold, subtil, freely moving, clear in utterance, unpolluted, distinct, unharmed, loving what is good, keen, unhindered, beneficent, loving towards man, stedfast, sure, free from care, all-powerful, all-surveying, and penetrating through all spirits that are quick of understanding, pure, most subtil' ($7^{22f.}$). This summation of the attributes of Wisdom in no fewer than 21 particulars is quite after the Hellenistic style. The computation is indeed moderate when compared with the 150 epithets applied by Philo to vicious men.* The whole description of Wisdom recalls the manner in which the Gr. philosophers were accustomed to speak of their νοῦς. In point of subtlety of thought and expression the passage is manifestly framed after the Gr. rather than the Heb. models. It is also worthy of note that this does not profess to be a description of Wisdom itself, but only of a spirit that is in her. In this connexion Langen says: 'There was a disinclination to transfer directly to Wisdom itself what the Greeks said of the νοῦς, because σοφία in the abstract is only a bare conception, and therefore in the case of such a transference the qualities mentioned ran the risk of being handed over from their more substantial bearer (νοῦς) to a purely ideal one. On this account the writer elevated σοφία into a substance, while investing it with a spirit (πνεῦμα). And hereby there was therefore also implied an actual doctrinal advance, inasmuch as the essential character (Wesenseigenthümlichkeit) of Wisdom came to clearer expression than was possible through the figurative language of Solomon (i.e. Pr. 8). Yet this advance can be treated only as formal and not material, since Solomon also, through his anthropomorphic presentation of Wisdom playing before God, had already plainly enough raised it above the purely ideal.'† As regards the description itself, it would seem that, when the writer speaks of Wisdom as 'a clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty,' 'an effulgence from everlasting light,' 'an unspotted mirror of the working of God,' and 'an image of his goodness,' he means to represent it as standing in a relation to God that is not shared by the Divine creations —a relation so close and peculiar as to constitute Wisdom the very image or reflexion of His own essential Being, in a sense in which man cannot be said to be so. Here at all events Wisdom is no mere personification, but a real essence of purest light, the image of the Godhead, streaming forth as a substance from God before the creation of the world. At the same time there is no sharp distinction of personality drawn between God and His Wisdom. While, in conjunction with the Gr. doctrine of the νοῦς, the Heb. doctrine of the Wisdom came to be more clearly conceived and expressed, it was not as yet, either in the mind of our author or of his contemporaries, hypostatized into a second and subordinate God, as it afterwards was by Philo. There is in more than the usual sense a personification of Wisdom, yet we are led only half-way to personality. As Schürer says, 'The author applies the term Wisdom of God to represent the notion of an intermediary hypostasis, so far as he entertains it' (HJP II. iii. p. 376 n.). It is, however, important to note that, as the result of the combination and interaction of the Greek and the Jewish mind, the Book of Wisdom marks a distinct step towards greater definiteness of conception and expression in reference to this doctrine.

In the Bk. of Wisdom the Heb. Ḥokhma is practically identified, however, not only with the Gr. νοῦς, but also with the Holy Spirit and with the Logos. In the OT, God's Holy Spirit is the giver of all good; so to the Alexandrian was Wisdom. It is not wonderful therefore that the author of our book virtually identifies the two, and attributes to Wisdom just what the OT (e.g. in Is 11^{2}) does to the Spirit of J". At all events, the idea of the Spirit of God is intermixed with that of Wisdom, for it is Wisdom that inspires the prophets (7^{27}). In one passage in particular (9^{17}) Wisdom and the Holy Spirit are spoken of in quite parallel terms as the sole avenues to knowledge of the Divine counsel. Although not known to most of the Apocryphal writers, the Holy Spirit is, beyond doubt, expressly mentioned here. See art. HOLY SPIRIT in vol. ii. In at least one passage there also seems to be an identification of the Wisdom with the Gr. λόγος. Regarding the destruction of the firstborn in Egypt it is said, 'Thine all-powerful word leaped from heaven out of the royal throne, a stern warrior into the midst of the doomed land, bearing as a sharp sword thine unfeigned commandment; and standing it filled all things with death; and while it touched the heaven it trode upon the earth' ($18^{15f.}$). The description here given of the λόγος inevitably suggests what the writer has already said of Wisdom as sharing God's royal throne (9^{4}); and besides, as Langen has pointed out, there is merely a transference to the λόγος of what was before said of Wisdom, viz. that it 'pervadeth and penetrateth all things' (7^{24}), and 'reacheth from one end of the world to the other' (8^{1}). In support of the view that God's Word is here only another name for His Wisdom, we have the general doctrine, otherwise clearly expressed in our book, that God executes His will through His Word (16^{12}). It can make no difference that in this case His will was to punish Egypt, and was not associated with any creative or healing purpose. A comparison of this passage with 10^{19} shows that what is here ascribed to the λόγος might equally well have been attributed to the agency of the Wisdom. Bretschneider, on the other hand, maintains (l.c. p. 254 f.) that λόγος here denotes the destroying angel, and that nowhere either in the Apocrypha or in the LXX is it the equivalent of חָכְמָה, which is always translated by σοφία. But can the epithet παντοδύναμος be fittingly applied to an angel? However this may be, it seems quite plain that the doctrine of Wisdom in the Apocrypha is intermediate between that of the OT and the Logos of Philo, just as in Philo again we have the transition from the Apocryphal to the Johannine doctrine. In the Book of Wisdom there is assuredly development of some sort, however we may be disposed to characterize it. If our author says no more than the OT, he certainly says it more clearly. If there be no material advance on the OT doctrine, we have that doctrine presented in a much fuller and more developed form, and this we may regard as the legitimate service of Greek thought. Hagenbach recognizes 'the more definite and concrete form which, at the time when the Apocryphal writings were composed, was given to the personifications of the Divine word and the Divine Wisdom found in the OT.'* And so good an authority as A. B. Davidson says, 'If in the Alexandrian Wisdom of Solomon a progress directly in advance of what is found in Proverbs viii. on the doctrine of Wisdom may be justly contested, there is certainly what may be called a progress round about,—the ideas about Wisdom are expanded and placed in new lights, and made to enter into new relations in such a way that a general approximation to the NT doctrine of the Logos is the result.'† See, further, the articles WISDOM and WISDOM OF SOLOMON in vol. iv.

3. The Logos of Philo.—Already in the OT (Pr 8) there had been drawn the distinction between God Himself and the Wisdom of God, and in connexion with the Platonic doctrine of the νοῦς a further development is traceable in the Apocrypha, particularly in the Book of Wisdom. The designation of the Wisdom as λόγος furnishes the transition to another notable development—that which we find in the teaching of Philo. According to this philosopher, the relation of the Wisdom to the Logos is that of the source to the stream; the Logos is just Wisdom come to expression. Sometimes, however, he identifies the two (de Profug. i. 56). The whole world of ideas is embraced in the single conception and supreme Idea of the Logos or Reason of God. All empirical knowledge of God is referred to the Logos, who ranks indeed as a second, but also secondary, God. It is he who created and who reveals himself in the world, while the true God is inconceivable, and 'hides Himself behind the impenetrable veil of heaven.' The Logos is not in himself God; he is, however, an emanation from God, His firstborn son, and formed in His image. He is the manifested reflexion of the Eternal—the shadow, as it were, cast by the light of God. He is at once the medium and the mediator between God and the world; as 'the many-named archangel' he is the bearer of all revelation; and in him as high priest God and the world are eternally reconciled. With striking vigour and originality of thought Philo built up a religious philosophy, in which the Logos is endowed with personality and represented as a hypostasis standing between God and the world. In thus raising the Logos from an impersonal power to the level of a mediatorial hypostasis he passes beyond the OT and the Apocrypha, and makes his Logos correspond exactly neither to the Jewish Wisdom nor to the Platonic νοῦς. His teaching under this head is, however, characterized by the same ambiguity that attaches to his doctrine of God. By no possible ingenuity can the Logos be consistently represented as at once the immanent Reason of God, and yet also as a distinct hypostasis mediating between the spiritual and the material, the Divine and the finite. And in general it may be said that, 'owing to the manifold relations in which Philo places the Logos,—to Divine powers, ideas, and angels, to the supersensual and to the visible world, to the thought, speech, and creation of God, and again to the human spirit, whose heavenly prototype he is,—a perfectly clear and consistent conception of this mythical figure is rendered a virtual impossibility.'‡ Moreover, the service done by Philo in giving clear expression to the personality of the Logos is seriously curtailed by his theory of subordination, which, although no doubt in his view necessitated by the pronounced monotheism of the OT, detracted from the position previously assigned to the Logos, and even anticipated in some measure the fashion of Gnostic polytheism.

4. The Memra of the Targums.—Before we come to consider the teaching of the NT regarding the Logos, reference may be made to a kindred expression which occurs very frequently in the Targums. The name given to the Logos in these writings (but never in the Talmud) is Memra = 'Word.'

Memra is not, however, always the equivalent, nor is it, strictly speaking, ever the precise equivalent, of Logos, which has the additional meaning of reason; and one result of the adoption of this narrower term was to give fresh significance to the statement that the world was created by the word of God (Gn 1^{3}, Ps 33^{6}). Still, the mediation of the Memra or Word is not, as in the OT and in Philo's theosophy, represented as specially connected with the creative activity of God; rather is it applied to the whole scope of His activity in the world. With the Targumists it stands in much the same relationship to God as the Ḥokhma or σοφία of the earlier Jews, only it is allowed a wider range. By His Word God enters into covenant with men and exercises guardianship over them; to His Word they pray, and by His Word they swear. There is, however, considerable vagueness in the use of the term. Sometimes anthropomorphisms are avoided by the introduction of word or glory. Thus in Gn 28 the glory of J″ appears to Jacob, who declares that the Word of J″ shall then be his God. But in some passages, when there can be no such motive, Memra or Word is used for the Spirit of J″, apparently to avoid referring directly to the Divine Being the processes of the inner life of Godhead. A distinction is made between the Word as spoken (Pithgama) and the Word as speaking or revealing Himself (Memra). E.g. in Gn 15^{1} 'After these things came the Pithgama of J″ to Abram in a vision (? in prophecy), saying, Fear not, Abram, my Memra shall be thy strength and thy exceeding great reward.' 'A critical analysis shows that in 82 instances in Onkelos, in 71 instances in the Jerus. Targum, and in 213 instances in the Targum pseudo-Jonathan, the designation Memra is not only distinguished from God, but evidently refers to God as revealing Himself.'*

From what has been said, it will be apparent that, while the Memra plays a rôle somewhat similar to it, it is not to be altogether identified with the Logos of Philo. In one respect, however, the Targumists are at one with the Alexandrian theosophy of which he became the leading exponent; the Deity Himself remained in the background, and everything that can be known by us about God's essential Being is transferred to the Word. This is shown, e.g., by their treatment of 1 S 26^{20}, where, instead of 'Let not my blood fall to the earth before the face of the Lord,' we have 'Let not . . . before the Word of the Lord.' Even affections are attributed to God only mediately through the Word (Gn 6^{6}, 1 S 15^{10}, Is 42^{1}). With the Alexandrians God is without qualities (ἄποιος); with the Targumists He is virtually unknowable. While, then, the Memra of the Targumists is not to be identified with the Logos doctrine of the Alexandrian school, the former being at bottom religious and the latter philosophical, the two conceptions are yet in some measure related. Indeed the difference between the position reflected in the Targums and the standpoint of the Book of Wisdom is most satisfactorily explained on the assumption that the Alexandrian doctrine of the Logos, as representing the knowable in Deity, was not unfamiliar to Pal. circles, at any rate so far as its general features and results were concerned. In all probability it was to a large extent welcomed and adopted as a ready-made and serviceable conception. This may be inferred from the fact that the expression Memra is used almost to excess, and in the most varied connexions. While really connoting much less than the Jewish σοφία = Gr. λόγος, it was given a far more extended application than is warranted by the doctrine of the σοφία as presented in the Book of Wisdom.

It was in keeping with the spirit of the age that the Targumists should hail a doctrine which made for the purification of the conception of God by excluding the ascription to God in His essential Being of all direct activity in the world or contact with man, and of all such affections of the soul as seemed to savour of the finite and human, and so to import a certain limitation and degradation of the Deity. They did not, however, like Philo, speculate about the position of the Word relatively to God. They were content to connect their generalizations with the OT representation of the creation of the world mediately through Wisdom. And as in the sacred writings the conception of Wisdom is not a fixed one, but appears now as merely a personified Divine attribute, now as virtually a distinct entity or hypostasis, they secured their object by the simple method of giving to it a wider scope. In the hands of the Targumists, however, the Logos doctrine underwent no essential development; they did nothing to give precision or clearness to the obscure and indeterminate position in which it is found in Proverbs and Wisdom, and also in the earlier writings of the Alexandrian school.

For generations thinking men had been grappling with the problems suggested by the OT doctrine of the Logos in conjunction with philosophical speculation, and it would appear as if at length by the first century of our era the hope of a satisfactory conclusion ever being reached had been to a large extent abandoned. Men were weary of wandering in what seemed an interminable maze. For while on the one hand there was a disposition to surmise that the unity of the Godhead was not in all respects absolute, on the other hand it was recognized that the phenomena of the inner life of Deity were secrets undecipherable by man's intellect, and only darkly hinted at even in revelation. Through the dense maze of subtleties and theorizings which had overrun the path of investigation Philo had boldly cut his way to clearer ground by ascribing to the Logos a distinct personality, albeit with the rank of an inferior God. Others went to the opposite extreme, and took no cognizance whatever of the subject. The writer of 2 (4) Esdras, e.g., ignores the whole development of the Logos doctrine. Although that doctrine was specially associated with the creation of the world, and had obtained in Palestine a new significance as Memra, the term 'Word' is used by the writer simply as denoting the spoken word, even where he speaks of God as having created heaven and earth by His Word. All mystery is eliminated from the doctrine, and no consciousness betrayed of the existence of the many enigmas which had gathered round it.

5. NT conception of the Logos.—But the whole position with reference to this doctrine was about to undergo a development of the utmost consequence through the promulgation of the Christian idea of the Logos. This is set forth in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel. Here we are taught that the Logos is a Divine personal Subsistence, and, as such, exists in a twofold manner: first, as coexistent with God from eternity, as resting in Him before all time; second, as outwardly existing, i.e. as manifested, first of all in order to the act of creation, and finally in His Incarnation in order to the redemption of the world. 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him. . . . And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth.' In these bold, concise, and unmistakable utterances, St. John, moved and enlightened by the Holy Ghost, at once completely solves the long-standing riddle of centuries, and communicates a new revelation. Joining on his representation to that of the Mosaic account of the creation as containing the first revelation of the activity of the Logos, he proceeds to erect upon this foundation his great doctrinal superstructure. The opening verses of the OT had already declared that in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth, and through His Word gave shape and order to formless chaos. St. John supplements this statement by further declaring that 'in the beginning' the Word already existed alongside of God and partook of the Divine nature. He thereby also confirms the language of Pr 8, which speaks of Wisdom as 'set up from everlasting,' and as occupying the very closest relation to God. True, he does not make use of the term Wisdom, but of the term Logos. The latter, however, is employed, not in its older meaning of Nous but in its then current sense of Word. The connexion with Pr 8 is obvious enough, and the Evangelist's representation makes it impossible to put any other interpretation upon the passage than that which it must bear when read in the light of his words.

The question is often asked, How far was the writer in his view of the Logos influenced by current philosophical speculations, and more especially by those of Philo? In seeking an answer we must keep in mind the fact that when the Gospel was written the name Logos was a familiar one, alike in Jewish and in non-Jewish circles. The air was full of such doctrines as Philo's, and that of the Logos in its essential features not only existed in Alexandria before his day, but must also have gained currency in Palestine, seeing there was constant communication between Egypt and that country. Consequently, it is not surprising that the author of the Gospel uses the name without explanation as one which his readers would be prepared to understand. Two extreme views have been propounded, and, as frequently happens, the truth would seem to lie somewhere between them. The first is, that the philosophy of the time had no influence whatever on the Prologue to this Gospel, and was not kept in view by the writer. In this case the name Logos is not regarded as derived from the Schools, but as having sprung up solely within the Church, in the sense of oratio=' word,' ' revelation.' But, if we thus exclude the meaning ratio and confine it to oratio, we cannot put a satisfactory construction on the words ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ λόγος. For though we may regard creation as a self-revelation of God, wrought through the Logos, who was as Logos at the beginning of the world, yet if, as we believe, ἦν denotes the pre-temporal existence of Christ, we cannot accept the narrowed meaning. It is only as λόγος ἐνδιάθετος that the term can denote His eternal existence before time ; and this we find to be an outstanding truth in the record of the Logos made flesh. The other and opposite view, that the writer merely expands and embodies the teaching of Philo, is likewise untenable. Even those who deny the Johannine authorship must reject it, for the two conceptions, if in some respects similar, are yet essentially at variance. While the idea of an Incarnation is utterly destructive of Philo's doctrine of the Logos, it is the central truth of the Christian faith that God's revelation is not completed until it is embodied in a human life. On the assumption that the Gospel is St. John's, this view is incredible. Can we suppose that the disciple whom Jesus loved, who drew from the Saviour the principles that gave character to his life, who pondered deeply and long what he had seen and heard, would have founded his conception of his Master on the crude notions of an expiring philosophy? The matter, then, would seem to stand thus : The author derived his view of Christ's Person from Christ's life and teaching, and his own reflexion upon them, guided by the illumination of the Holy Spirit. Like St. Paul, he might have expressed these views independently of any philosophical system. At the same time he recognized in the name and conception of the Logos a suitable vehicle for his own thought, and adopted it accordingly. In other words, he recognizes and declares that there is a great Truth after which men had been thus groping, that there is a Divinity working in the world, as the Greek had faintly perceived, and that there is need for a revealer of the invisible God, as the Jew had come to feel.

Very noticeable in connexion with St. John's solution of an enigma which had become more and more complicated as time went on, is the contrast between the firm tread of Scripture and the hesitating vagaries of the unaided human intellect. In the Prologue to this Gospel there is a note of certainty, of finality, of quiet confidence, and of powerful persuasiveness, which is foreign to Alexandrian theosophist and Jewish Targumist alike. The Logos became flesh : in this simple yet momentous declaration he conveyed to the world the secret of the inner life of the Godhead as he had learned it from the Holy Spirit working in the soul of one who had been so intimately associated with Jesus, and who, more than any other of the Apostles, was capable of being animated by the mind of the Master. That which he had seen and heard, and which had never faded from his adoring consciousness, he announced to men not only as an answer to their problems, but also as the redemption of their souls. The two loftiest ideas in OT revelation are those of Wisdom and the Messiah, and, although the Jews had no proper conception of this, and latterly even lost the consciousness of it, the two ideas were essentially one. It was his knowledge of this that enabled St. John to unlock the mystery which would yield to no other key. To as many as received Him on the footing of His being at once the Word and the Anointed of God, the Eternal Word gave power to become the sons of God. The jarring note in the Evangelist's account of this glorious gospel is the record that ' he came unto his own, and his own received him not.' It needed the lurid light of the cross to show the harmony and inseparableness of these two ideas, and to prove that Christ, as combining in His own Person everything ascribed to the Logos and the Messiah, is made unto us ' wisdom from God, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption ' (1 Co 1^{30}).

iii. ANGELOLOGY AND DEMONOLOGY. — A. ANGELOLOGY.—1. The OT doctrine of angels.—There was throughout the East a general belief in angels as inhabitants of the spirit-world. In the OT these are recognized as spirits intermediate between God and man, and acting as the messengers and servants of Providence. Their nature, while superior to that of man, is not purely spiritual ; their main function is that of executing the Divine behests. They are poetically conceived as forming the host of heaven (1 K 22^{19}), who praise God in the sanctuary above (Ps 148^2 150^1), act as the ministers of His will (Ps $103^{20f.}$), attend Him when He manifests Himself in His kingly glory (Dt 33^2 ? ; see Driver, ad loc.), and form His retinue when He appears for judgment (Jl 3^{11}, Zec 14^5). The mention of the captain of the Lord's host in Jos $5^{13ff.}$ is too slender a basis for the conclusion that the ancient Hebrew regarded the angels as an organized celestial hierarchy in which the cherubim and seraphim hold their respective ranks. Nowhere are the cherubim endowed with independent personality ; they are only ideal representations, varying according to the conception of the writers who make mention of them. In like manner the seraphim of Is 6 seem to be only symbolic appearances. There is, however, a very perceptible development of angelology in the OT itself. At first the LORD God speaks directly to man (Gn 3^9) ; then He appears to men through His messengers, who are called 'sons of God' (Job 1^6, Ps 29^1 89^6). We have further the conception of the Angel of the LORD, who is in some passages identified with J″ (Gn 18^{20}, cf. with 19^{13}), and in others hypostatically distinguished from Him (Gn 24^7, Zec 1^{12}). Whether this name is to be applied specifically to one angel who represents God's presence, or is to be extended to any angel with a special commission, remains therefore a moot point. The doctrine that Israel was led by the angel of J″ paved the way for the belief in angelic guardianship of individuals, which some would find in Ps 34^7 91^{11}, although it is doubtful whether these passages contain more than a poetical expression of trust in a beneficent Providence. On the other hand, angels were regarded as the instruments of judgment (2 S 24^{16}, 2 K 19^{35}, Ps 78^{49}), and even the forces of nature came to be personified as God's messengers (Ps 104^4).

Prior to the Exile, with rare exceptions such as Is 6^{2-6}, the prophets do not introduce angels, but already in the visions of Ezekiel and Zechariah they play a prominent part, and the mystic number of seven (Ezk 9^2, Zec $4^{2.10}$) possibly points to the hierarchical idea which certainly afterwards gained ground (To 12^{15}, Rev 8^2). Ezekiel calls them men; Zechariah calls them both men and messengers. By these prophets special prominence is also given to one angel who acts as Instructor or Interpreter. This is the fruitful germ from which has sprung the widespread invocation of angels and spirits in the worship of the Christian Church. Then, as in modern monastic piety, it appears to have arisen from a false conception of God as reigning in the remote heaven; angels were employed to bridge the gulf that separated Him from men. Zechariah is the first prophet to recognize different orders and ranks among the angels ($2^{3.4}$ $3^{1.4}$).

2. Post-exilic development of angelology on Persian lines.—In the post-exilic period, chiefly under the Parsi influences brought to bear upon the Jews of the Dispersion, the OT doctrine of angels underwent a curious and interesting development. Not that the Jews adopted wholesale the doctrine of Zoroaster either on this or on other points; but the inevitable social and religious influences amid which many of them lived in contentment and peace, could not but tell on their theology. All the more was this the case that Zoroastrianism was in the zenith of its prosperity as a religious system, and in many respects indeed, as we have seen, was allied to Judaism. In no direction did it influence Jewish thought more than in the department of angelology. Men's minds were strongly attracted to the superhuman, and angels were multiplied until God was conceived as governing the world by hosts of these 'intermediary beings who concerned themselves with the affairs of men with very various ends.' The belief in a regularly graded hierarchy of good and evil spirits, which characterized the religion of Zoroaster, began to be distinctly reflected, at least as to its main features, in the Jewish theology of the period. The position reached with regard to this whole doctrine in the later Judaism was apparently the result of the Persian conception of pure beings who surrounded Ormazd as his servants, acting upon the ancient Jewish belief that the angels were the messengers of Jehovah's will. Development of the doctrine on Iranian lines was facilitated by the general and undefined nature of the Heb. angelology. The latter offered no bar to the acceptance of an ideal structure based upon a common principle; and the religious character of the Mazdean doctrine of pure spirits gave it the appearance of being the complete form of their own more rudimentary belief. In the later Jewish literature, accordingly, the angels are viewed as a well-organized host, whose recognized chiefs (Dn 10^{13}) are admitted into God's immediate presence, and form His secret council (Enoch 14^{22}). They are seven in number (To 12^{15}). Three are named in Daniel and Tobit, viz. GABRIEL, i.e. 'man of God,' whose special function seems to have been to communicate Divine revelations (Dn 8^{16} 9^{21}, Lk 1^{19}); MICHAEL, i.e. 'who is like God?' the guardian of Israel (Dn $10^{13.21}$ 12^{1}, Bar 6^{7}, cf. 1 Th 4^{16}, Jude ^{9}, Rev 12^{7}); and RAPHAEL, i.e. 'God heals,' whose mission it was to cure disease (To 3^{17}), and to present the prayers of the saints before God's throne (To 12^{15}, cf. Zec 1^{12}). Three more are mentioned in 2 (4) Esdras: URIEL, i.e. 'God is light' (4^{1}); JEREMIEL, i.e. 'God hurls' (4^{36}); and PHALTIEL (the Syriac has Psaltiel, 5^{16}).[*] Who was the seventh? Is the silence of the pre-Christian Jewish literature on this point merely accidental, or was J″ Himself reckoned the first of the seven archangels, as Ormazd was the chief of the seven amshaspands?[†] On the latter supposition the analogy would be complete, but it would have been alien to all Jewish tradition to compare Ormazd or any of the archangels with J″. To them He was far above, and of another nature than, angels or archangels, who were only His servants. They borrowed the idea of the seven amshaspands, and made them the chiefs of the heavenly host; but they regarded them, their chief included, as beings entirely subordinate to J″.

The Persian influence is seen so far in the pronounced angelology of the Book of Daniel. What is new here is that angels, who are designated 'watchers' (עִירִין. In LXX עִיר is Grecized into εἴρ, but Aq. and Symm. render ἐγρήγορος), have recognized princes with particular names, whereas in ancient Israel none of the angels were known by proper names. The angel in Jg $13^{18f.}$ refuses to tell his name. That the names of the angels ascenderunt in manu Israelis ex Babylone[*] is expressly acknowledged by the Rabbins themselves. It is also taught in Daniel that the nations have their own special tutelary spirits, who fight actively in their behalf ($10^{13.20}$). This identification of particular angels with different nations carries us a step further than the intercession of the angels in Zechariah's first vision. There is also in Daniel a further development of the former prophet's vision of a hierarchy among the angels; they are classified in categories, of which each has particular functions.

But it is in the Apocryphal writings that we discern the full strength of the Persian influence. The great Books of Sirach and Wisdom have little or nothing to say about angels. Judith speaks of none, and 1 Mac. refers only once to the destroying angel (7^{41}). In Baruch also there is but a single reference to the subject (6^{7}). The other books, and mainly 2 (4) Esdras, Tobit, and 2 Mac., are our sources. The most important passage, and one which formed the groundwork, so to speak, of many subsequent delineations of man's relation to the spirit-world, is To 12^{12-15} (cf. Rev 8^{4}): 'When thou didst pray, and Sarah thy daughter-in-law, I did bring the memorial of your prayer before the Holy One: and when thou didst bury the dead, I was with thee likewise. . . . And now God did send me to heal thee and Sarah thy daughter-in-law. I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and go in before the glory of the Holy One.' This passage teaches still more clearly than the Books of Zechariah and Daniel that there is a distinction of rank among the angels. Raphael is one of seven who stand in the immediate presence of God; from Lk 1^{19} and Rev 8^{2} we learn that Gabriel was also a member of Tobit's heptarchy. This idea, which was probably taken from the customs of Oriental palaces, where dignitaries were wont to gather round the throne, and which at all events had been embodied in the religion of Zoroaster, attains great prominence in the Jewish Apocalyptic literature. In spite of the weighty authority of A. B. Davidson, who observes, 'The number seven already appears in Ezk 9^{2}, and there is no need to refer it to Persian influence' (art. ANGELS in vol. i.), it is difficult to resist the conviction that the seven amshaspands or princes of light suggested the seven Jewish archangels. So Winer, RWB, art. 'Engel'; Ewald, HI v. p. 185; Nicolas, Des Doctrines Religieuses des Juifs; Cheyne, OP p. 335. At the same time there is no reason to suppose that the entire scheme of the supersensible world elaborated in the Avesta became part of the creed of Judaism. While the Persian influence is traceable, and while there are general points of resemblance in the angelology of the two systems, there is nothing like absolute identity. It is further implied in the passage under review, that according to their position in this hierarchy particular functions are performed by particular angels. The great business of 'the seven' is to 'present the prayers of the saints.' It seems to follow from this that the prayers of the pious are directed to the angels for this purpose; compare, on the other hand, Rev 22[8f.]. Another belief, clearly reflected in Tobit, is that some angels are charged with the protection of individual men: 'A good angel shall go with him, and his journey shall be prospered, and he shall return safe and sound' (5[21]). 'Good' is here evidently not descriptive of the angel's character as opposed to evil angels, but to his office of guardianship, in keeping with the statement of v.[16] 'God . . . shall prosper your journey; and may his angel go with you.' The Israelites thought of the superhuman powers, not as good and evil but as benevolent or antagonistic. If the idea of angelic guardianship of individual men appears at all in the OT (Ps 34[7] 91[11]), it does so in a far less definite shape than here. In NT times, on the other hand, this belief seems to have been quite current (Ac 12[15]). An interesting example of its recurrence in modern literature is found in Lessing's Nathan der Weise, where Recha, Nathan's adopted daughter, is made to say—

The same idea was extended to nations and armies (Dn 12[1], 2 Mac 11[6] 15[23]). Indeed we find in 2 Mac. almost a repetition of the old Roman legend of Castor and Pollux mounted on white steeds and appearing at the head of the Jewish armies (3[25ff.]). A somewhat similar tale is told in 10[29f.], where five such 'men' appear, 'two of them leading on the Jews.' In 15[23] Judas Maccabæus is represented as praying for 'a good angel' to terrify the enemy, and in v.[27] the Jews are described as having been 'made exceeding glad by the manifestation of God.' This idea as applied to nations seems to underlie the Heb. text followed by the LXX translator of Dt 32[8] 'The Most High set the bounds of the people according to the number of the angels of God' (בְּנֵי אֵל) instead of 'sons of Israel' (בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל). Perhaps also Ben Sira may have had the angels in view when he wrote: 'For every nation he appointed a ruler' (Sir 17[17]).

3. Conception of elemental angels in post-canonical Jewish literature.—Allusion has already been made to the personification of the forces of nature in the OT. The same tendency showed itself later in the conception of the elemental angels. Sir 39[28ff.] speaks of 'fire and hail, and famine and death; teeth of wild beasts, and scorpions and adders' as 'spirits (πνεύματα) that are created for vengeance.' Although these are not angels, they are said to rejoice in executing God's commandment, and the language used by the writer certainly prepared the way for the introduction into Palestine of the Gr. idea of attributing to every separate thing its δαίμων or angel. In the Book of Enoch, the sea, the hoar frost, the snow, the mist, the dew, and the rain,—each has its special spirit (60[16ff.]). This idea is still further developed in the Book of Jubilees (B.C. 135–105); the different elements are represented as each containing a spirit, and this again its angel, so that it becomes possible to speak of the angels of the fire-spirit, the wind-spirit, etc. The fullest development, however, of the tendency in question is found in the Targums. Thus in that of Jonathan the pestilence of Hab 3[5] becomes the angel of death. That even abstract conceptions had their angels bound up with them appears, e.g., from the statement of the Testament of Benjamin that the souls of the virtuous are led by the angel of peace (ἄγγελος τῆς εἰρήνης).

To sum up. The Jewish people, under the influence of what they saw in the religion of Zoroaster, formulated their doctrine of angels with more precision than they had done previously. Especially was this the case with regard to these points: (1) the angels as a whole were conceived as forming a celestial hierarchy with seven princes; (2) those angels who acted as intermediaries between heaven and earth were designated by proper names; (3) the Jews began to follow the custom (which, however, was no less Greek than Persian) of peopling the whole world with angels, and of giving to every man his own protecting spirit or δαίμων; (4) they formed the conception of the elemental angels.

4. Doctrine of angels as held by the Essenes and by Philo.—That the Jewish angelology had not reached its full development even at the beginning of the Christian era is evident from the fact that a cardinal point in it, viz. the doctrine propounded in the Talmud and the Targums regarding the creation of angels on the second day of the creation of the world, is entirely absent from the NT as well as from the later pre-Christian Jewish writings. The same conclusion is pointed to by the vagueness in several respects (e.g. in the exact division of angelic tasks, and in the varying names given to the last three archangels) of the angelology of the two centuries before Christ, which seems to have been a product of popular imagination rather than the deliberate teaching of the Rabbis. The Palestinian and Babylonian Jew was, however, quite satisfied with an angelology which not only supplied some tangible link between him and the Deity, but also afforded the comfortable assurance that in heaven his destinies were watched over by the accredited commissioners of J″. It was otherwise with the Jews of Alexandria and the Essenes, who were concerned with the speculative rather than the practical, and with whom the doctrine of angels took the form of a theory of cosmic powers. By the latter sect the popular belief in angels was spiritualized into an esoteric system, in which the angels were only metaphorically the servants and messengers of God; in reality they were descending grades of being, differing in purity and in power in proportion to their distance from the First Cause, of which they were all emanations. It was the privilege of the initiated to be informed as to the distinctive names of this graduated series of spirits, and of the relations in which they stood to the whole and to one another. Any one admitted to their sect had to take an oath that he would 'equally preserve' their peculiar books and the names of the angels (Jos. BJ II. viii. 7). In all this we see the allegorizing and Gnostic tendency already at work.

Philo's doctrine of angels, although much akin to that of the Essenes, bore the peculiar stamp of its birthplace. It was a Platonized version of the ancient Hebrew beliefs. The latter formed, indeed, the common basis of both the Palestinian and the Alexandrian angelology; the differences in the developed products were due to the fact that in the one case Zoroastrian, and in the other Platonic, influences were at work. According to Philo, the angels are incorporeal beings who inhabit the air, and are in number equal to the stars. They are comprehended in two main divisions—the inferior angels, who dwell nearest to the earth and are capable of descending into human bodies; and the higher and purer intelligences (λόγοι = Ideas), whose habitat is the upper regions of the air. It is through the latter that God, who as the perfect Being cannot enter into relations with corruptible matter, communicates with the universe. These intermediaries, whose action is purely spiritual, Philo identifies not only with the Platonic Ideas and Stoic Forces, but with the Dæmons of the Greeks and the Angels of the Jews. Their function is to execute the commands of the Most High, and to protect and direct the souls of good men. Among the infinite variety of the powers two are supreme—goodness and might. It must be said, however, that Philo has no clear-cut conception of these mediating forces. At times he speaks as if they were mere abstractions, at other times as if they were persons. But this is the necessary result of the premises from which he starts. As the media by which He works in the world His Ideas must be inseparable from God; while at the same time, on the assumption of His aloofness from the world, they must rank as independent entities.

5. Denial of angels by the Sadducees.—In certain quarters, however, during the post-exilic period the doctrine of angels seems to have met with entire rejection. The position of the Samaritans is not quite clear, but at all events they had a doctrine of angels, and in this respect differed from the Sadducees, who maintained that 'there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit' (Ac 23^{8}). This is so far supported by Josephus, who says that according to the teaching of the Sadducees the soul dies with the body (Ant. XVIII. i. 4). How much does this denial of angels by the Sadducees imply? It is possible that they only rejected the oral Pharisaic tradition and the developed angelology of their day, while accepting the written Scriptures and a rationalistic interpretation of the old angelophanies. Yet they were evidently pure materialists, and repudiated the idea of a future life. It does seem strange that they should nevertheless have believed in God; but their God was, like the deities of Epicureanism, entirely separated from the world. In their view the present life was complete in itself, and man had no future judgment to face. As adherents of the Epicurean philosophy, they could not accept either the doctrine of a future life, or the Jewish angelology which postulated a spirit-world created by God, and judged by Him.

B. DEMONOLOGY.—1. The position as reflected in the earlier OT literature.—The development in demonology is still more marked than that of angelology. Among the ancient Hebrews the belief in evil spirits seems to have been of the most rudimentary description, hardly amounting to more than a vague popular superstition. The data furnished by the earlier OT literature is extremely meagre. Ruins and waste places were peopled with weird spectres (sĕ'îrîm), including a night-monster, Lilith, who was specially dangerous to infants (Is 13^{21} 34^{14}).* Mental disease was attributed to the malign influence of evil spirits, but in such cases the evil spirit is said to have proceeded from the LORD (1 S 16^{14}). As His Providence comprehended alike the evil and the good (1 S 2^{6}, Ps 78^{49}), there was really no place for demons viewed as the source of evil. The shēdîm of Dt 32^{17} and Ps 106^{37}, though illegitimate objects of worship, are not in OT the noxious spirits which they became in the later Judaism, and the story of the serpent in Gn 3^{1-7} is not elsewhere alluded to in any pre-exilic writing. If the belief in evil spirits can be said to have existed in Israel before the Exile, it certainly was not in the widespread form which it afterwards assumed. Although those interpreters who have detected a personal being in Azāzel (=(?) 'God strengthens,' Lv 16^{8}) are probably right, in view of the fact that Jehovah receives the one goat and Azāzel the other, it does not follow that the conception of the latter arose at an early date in Heb. history. It is probable that the Priestly Code is not of Mosaic origin, and that this allusion to the ritual of the scapegoat belongs to post-exilic times. There is no subsequent mention of Azāzel in OT, although he reappears in the Book of Enoch as a leader of the (fallen) angels. Cheyne ('Azâzel' in Encyc. Bibl.) thinks he was 'a personal angel substituted for the crowd of sĕ'îrîm (or earth-demons) to whom the people sacrificed; just as the scapegoat was the substitute for the sacrificial victims.' However this may be, it is clear that he was regarded as in some sense antagonistic to J″; and that the conception of him, if not identical with that of Satan, as Origen (c. Cels. vi. 305) and others have supposed, was at least a step in the direction of that of the devil.

2. The Satan of Job, Zechariah, the Chronicler, and the Similitudes of Enoch.—In the Prologue to Job we have the first trace of the Satan or Adversary, i.e. the angel whose function it is to act as Accuser and to execute God's purposes of judgment. As a member of God's council (1^{8}) he stands in contrast to those angels whose ministry is concerned with errands of mercy, but while an angel of evil he is not in his own nature an evil angel. Although showing a strong disinclination to believe in human virtue, he does not in Job, as in Jude, contend with God; he is content to act by His permission. But while he is not here represented as an evil spirit, he is yet on the way which led later to his being so conceived. He performs his task with a too evident relish, and instigates God against Job (2^{3}). It is still a question among critics whether the Book of Job is pre-exilic, but the other OT writings in which the word Satan is used to denote this minister of God undoubtedly belong to the Jewish period. In Zec $3^{1.2}$ he appears as the pitiless accuser whom J″ repels. The cruel and malicious way in which he exercises his office against the broken-down Church of the Restoration calls forth the rebuke of Divine grace. Here there is an approach to the conception of him as an evil spirit, without his being regarded, however, as an embodiment of all evil; he is still God's servant. In 1 Ch 21^{1} Satan is used without the article as the distinctive designation of the spirit who stands up against Israel as their enemy. It is at his instigation that David numbers the people, an act ascribed in earlier times to J″ (2 S 24^{1}). The possibility of such an interchange is owing to the fact that in either case the angel who tempts David is the minister of J″. Angels are but the ministers of His will. Even to the 'lying spirit' mentioned in 2 Ch 18^{21} we are not to ascribe an evil character. That passage does not prove that at this stage evil spirits were not only believed in, but viewed as having power to 'possess' individual men. The spirit who misled the infatuated Ahab is Jehovah's messenger, and goes forth from His immediate presence. In the Satan of Zechariah and the Chronicler, then, even more than in that of Job, there seems to be some approach to the conception of an evil spirit. At the same time he has not yet become an actual demon. The period was one of transition: foreign influences were at work among the Pal. and Bab. Jews, and primitive Semitic beliefs were undergoing a process of transformation. Thus in the earlier post-exilic age Satan was neither a Heb. angel pure and simple, nor a Jewish demon of the developed type familiar to us in NT. Later, in the Similitudes of the Book of

* Although these passages are probably exilic, and coloured by Babylonian influence, the mention of jackals and other animals in connexion with the sĕ'îrîm warrants the conclusion that demons were supposed to dwell in all those animals which haunt the solitary waste.

Enoch, written, according to Charles, B.C. 95–80, he appears as ruler of the angels whom he has made subject to him (54^{6}, cf. Mt $12^{24ff.}$). These, who are designated Satans, have access to heaven, but are subject to the Lord of spirits (40^{7}). Like those of Satan in NT, their functions are tempting ($69^{4.\,6}$, cf. Mt $4^{1ff.}$, Lk 22^{3}), accusing (40^{7}, cf. Rev 12^{10}), and punishing (53^{3} 56^{1}, cf. 1 Co 5^{5}). It was long before Satan came to be conceived in Palestine as Beelzebub, or prince of devils. There is, in fact, a strange reticence regarding the existence and nature of Satan in the literature of the period between the Testaments. He is not mentioned in the Apocrypha (Satan being most probably used in Sir 21^{27} merely in the general sense of adversary) or by Josephus. There is not, however, the same silence with regard to demons. Under the influence of Mazdeism a more concrete form was given to floating Semitic superstitions about evil spirits. Not that this influence went very deep, for Persian dualism could not seriously affect Hebrew monotheism.

It is a moot point whether the conception of Satan may not have been taken over from the Persians. This is denied by many scholars, e.g. Oehler, who maintains that 'the Satan of the OT is devoid of essential characteristics which must be present to justify a comparison with Ahriman' (OT Theol. ii. p. 291, Eng. tr.). So also Renan. Cheyne thinks it 'a matter for argument. But who can fail to see that the Satan of the Book of Revelation is the fellow of Ahriman?' (OP, p. 282). G. A. Smith, while admitting the difficulty of the question, ranges himself on the negative side (The Twelve Prophets, ii. p. 319). According to Wellhausen, however,—who thinks that 'the influence of Parsism upon Judaism was not so great as is usually assumed,'—'Satan has some relation to old Hebrew conceptions (1 K xxii.), but nevertheless is essentially the product of Zoroastrian dualism' (art. 'Israel' in Encyc. Brit.). Bruce suggests that the divergence of 1 Ch 21^{1} from 2 S 24^{1}, referred to above, may have been due to a feeling on the part of the Chronicler, begotten of Iranian influence, that temptation was no fit work of God (The Moral Order of the World, p. 63). The influence of the Persian dualism, which represents Ahriman as the antagonist of Ormazd, may also possibly be reflected in Zec 3. Here Satan appears as accuser of Joshua the high priest, standing, as was customary upon such occasions, at his right hand (Ps 109^{6}). The rebuke administered to him exactly coincides with that of Jude ^{9}, where Michael the archangel is said to have disputed with him about the burial of Moses. It is, however, doubtful whether in Zec. Satan is not used merely in the general sense of the Adversary; the occurrence of the article seems to preclude the view that we have here a regular proper name as in 1 Ch 21^{1}. In the art. 'ZOROASTRIANISM in vol. iv., J. H. Moulton, while characterizing as 'absurd' the idea that Satan was borrowed from Angra Mainyu, is ready to concede that 'the ranking of demons and the elevation of one spirit to their head may have been stimulated by Parsism.' This writer also allows that 'the abandonment of earlier ideas, like Azāzel and the serpent' 'in favour of the Satan,' is to be ascribed to Persian influence. See, further, art. SATAN in vol. iv.

3. The doctrine of evil spirits in the Apocrypha and in the writings of Josephus.—Although the Apocrypha say nothing of Satan (unless Wis 2^{24}, on which see below, refers to him), they clearly teach the doctrine of δαιμόνια or evil spirits. These are not angels, nor, apparently, fallen angels. They have power to plague and even slay men, but can be driven away by fumigation, and bound by the angels. Asmodæus is represented in To 6^{14} as being in love with Sarah, daughter of Raguel, and as having killed in succession seven unfortunate men to whom she had been married (3^{8}). The angel Raphael advises Tobias the son of Tobit to marry her, and provides him with a charm, in the shape of the heart and liver of a fish thrown upon the ashes of incense, to drive away the demon. The smell causes the evil spirit to flee into Egypt, where he is bound by Raphael (8^{1-3}). If all the other spirits were like this one, they must have had bodies, and must have been inferior in power to the angels. The writer of the Book of Tobit was evidently acquainted with Mesopotamia, and therefore with the Persian demonology, which is reflected in his work, although not to the extent of representing the demon as a rival power to that of God. He stops short of actual dualism. The author of 1 Mac., speaking of the Akra or citadel which was the headquarters of the Syrian garrison, describes it as 'an evil adversary (διάβολος) to Israel,' i.e. 'an adversary or devil in stone'; but this simply reflects the popular conception of the devil as hostile to God's true worshippers.

Josephus, though silent as to Satan, has a good deal to say about evil spirits, and we may fairly take his views as those current in his time. His theory is that demons are the spirits of wicked men departed, who enter into the living and kill them unless they can obtain deliverance (BJ VII. vi. 3). The art of exorcizing evil spirits is also known to him. By the use of certain incantations, and especially by the application to the nostrils of the demoniac of a fire-coloured root called barras, which grew near the fortress of Machærus, the demon can be expelled. Josephus speaks of this as the discovery of Solomon, and says he saw one Eleazar releasing demoniacs in this fashion (Ant. VIII. ii. 5). He gravely affirms that great care must be exercised in the handling of this root, otherwise fatal consequences will follow. On the soil being removed, it may, however, be safely taken by tying a dog to it; as soon as the dog moves, it dies, but the plant has been rendered innocuous (BJ VII. vi. 3).

4. Demonology of the Alexandrian Jews.—If the Pal. demonology of the two centuries preceding the fall of Jerusalem be characterized by an element of triviality, that of the Alexandrian Jews is marked by one of vague generality. In the LXX heathen gods are uniformly demons, and not merely nonentities as in the Heb. text. The same view is taken by the Alexandrian author of Bar 3^{8}–5^{9}, who in his hatred of idolatry charges the Israelites with having sacrificed to devils and not to God (4^{7}). In the Book of Wisdom the subject is dealt with on a higher plane of thought. 'God created man for incorruption, and made him an image of his own proper being; but by the envy of the devil death entered into the world, and they that are of his portion make trial thereof' ($2^{23f.}$). This is interesting as being the first clear allusion in Jewish literature to the narrative of the Fall as told in Genesis. It is also a philosophy of the history, for it 'substitutes a personal devil for the serpent,' and is, moreover, a tolerably precise statement of the doctrine of original sin. But it is only a passing allusion that the writer makes to the subject; he does not return to it, and his views do not reappear in other writings of the Alexandrian Jews. Philo, who makes only a single reference to evil spirits as exciting impure desires in man, adopts another explanation of the Fall (de Gig. 4). Yet the recurrence of this view in Rev 12^{7}, and its acceptance by Christian theologians, show that it must have had its advocates.

5. Pronounced development of demonology in the Jewish pseudepigrapha.—In the Jewish pseudepigrapha, highly composite works containing many Christian elements, and ranging over one or two centuries before and after the Christian era, much light is thrown upon the development of demonology. These writings embody a mass of heterogeneous material which had considerable influence in shaping NT doctrines, and in no direction is this influence more marked than in that of demonology. The only demon named in the Apocrypha is Asmodæus (To $3^{8.\,17}$), but in the pseudepigrapha we meet with many others. Beliar, probably the Belial of 2 Co 6^{15}, appears in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, in the Sibylline Oracles (2^{167}), and in the Ascension of Isaiah (4^{2}) as the Antichrist. The latter work further describes him as the ruler of the world (1^{8} 2^{4}), which will be the scene of his manifestation (4^{2}). In the Book of Enoch, which seems to embrace all the superstitions of the period, a list is given of the chief of the demons to the number of eighteen (6^{7}), and another of (evil) 'angels' to the number of twenty (so the Greek text of 69^{2}), followed by a further enumeration of their chiefs, with an account of the particular direction in which each showed himself active. In both instances the leader of the demons is Semjâzâ. No place is given in either of the lists (which belong to different sections of the work, and differ considerably from each other) to Asmodæus, or to Sammael, who figures in the Ascension of Isaiah as ruling in the firmament along with Beliar (4^{2} 7^{8}), and in the Targum of Jonathan as the angel of death (Gn 3^{6}). It was he who tempted Eve (Jalkut Shim. 'Beresh.' 25). As the special foe of Israel he was the counterpart of Michael (Shem rabba 18).

In Enoch 16^{1} the demons are spoken of as the disembodied spirits of the giants, who were the progeny of the fallen angels and the daughters of men, and who will carry on their work of moral ruin upon the earth unpunished till the final judgment (cf. Mt $12^{43ff.}$ and 8^{29} 'Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?'). This is clearly a legendary expansion of Gn $6^{2.4}$, which, however, says nothing about a fall of angels, and nothing condemnatory of the love shown by the sons of the Elohim for the daughters of men. The Heb. tradition, which was not without its analogies in pagan mythologies, arose naturally enough in an age in which no surprise was felt at the fact of familiar relations between God and men. It is not easy to trace the process by which the narrative of Genesis was gradually metamorphosed into the legend of the Book of Enoch; but by the time when the LXX translation was made there was apparently a disposition to look askance upon the union of the sons of God with the daughters of men. This seems the most natural explanation of the curious divergence by which in that translation the simple fact of the existence of giants gives way to the representation of the giants as the offspring of that union. This theory once accepted, it would then be an easy enough deduction from it that such a relationship was a blot upon angelic sanctity. M. Nicolas (Des Doctrines Religieuses des Juifs, p. 264 f.) thinks that the legend of the fall of angels and of their transformation into demons, as well as the Book of Enoch itself, originated among the Pharisaic and ascetic Jews who gathered round the temple of Leontopolis in Egypt during the high-priesthood of Onias IV. But this view, of course, involves the assumption that the Book of Enoch was originally written in Greek, whereas according to Ewald and more recent authorities (e.g. Charles, The Book of Enoch, p. 21 f.) it is a Pal. composition with a Heb. original.

C. THE RELATION OF THE RELIGIOUS CONSCIOUSNESS OF OUR LORD TO THE CURRENT BELIEFS ABOUT ANGELS AND DEMONS.—We can only briefly touch upon this question, as the discussion properly belongs to NT theology.

It is remarkable that Jesus added nothing to the doctrine of angels. He certainly used it as it existed for the advancement of His own purposes, but He nowhere demands faith in angels as necessary to discipleship. In this respect both Judaism and Christianity are distinguished from the religion of Islam. Can we conclude, then, that Jesus made use of angels merely in the way of symbolism? Or does not such a saying as this compel us to the opposite conclusion: 'Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven'? (Mt 18^{10}). Although it is used with a certain poetic freedom, an angelology is clearly implied in the NT.

The popular belief in Satan and demons is nowhere assailed by our Lord. It may be that this did not lie to His hand as the herald of the heavenly kingdom. But did He accept it? If He had meant to lay stress upon the reality of the idea, would He have used it so exclusively in figure or parable as He has done? Owing to the number of factors (anthropological, physiological, psychological, and theological) involved, the subject is admittedly full of difficulty, and it seems equally perilous either to try to explain it away or to dogmatize upon it. It comes out strongly in NT writings, yet not in such a way, perhaps, as to make it possible to formulate any very definite doctrine. Schenkel and theologians of his school maintain that the belief in Satan and demons in NT literature is only the reflex of the popular Jewish belief produced through foreign influences, but already more or less given up by the educated classes of the period, and that it is therefore no peculiar product of the Christian idea. The difficulty presses most in connexion with the frequent cases of casting out demons recorded in the Synoptic Gospels. How are they to be explained? The theologians referred to do so on the Accommodation Theory, which men like Pressensé again have always consistently rejected; others would explain them psychologically, and diagnose them as cases of delirium or insanity; Schleiermacher and Matthew Arnold speak of the power of a dominant will over a crushed spirit; stricter pietists have clung to the literal doctrine of external evil spirits; Keim has put forward the theory that Christ freed an enslaved self-consciousness from the morbid dispositions engendered by superstition; Bruce attributes the confession of the Messiah by the demoniacs to the prevalence of the Messianic hope, and its special sway over shattered minds. According to a recent writer, the demonic possession recorded in NT is genuine, and has as its distinctive features (1) insanity or mental disease of some sort, forming the natural element; (2) the confession of Jesus as Messiah, forming the supernatural element (Alexander, Demonic Possession in NT, pp. 121, 150). The presence of the latter element is the criterion of real demonic possession, which was a counter-movement on the part of the powers of evil to the Incarnation. In this way only three typical cases occur—those of the demoniacs of Capernaum (Mt $9^{32f.}$, Lk 11^{14}) and Gerasa (Mt $8^{28ff.}$, Mk $5^{1ff.}$) and the youth at the Transfiguration-hill, and the sufferers are regarded as having been the victims of epileptic insanity, acute mania, and epileptic idiocy respectively. Interesting and able as is this writer's treatment of the subject, he has not proved his case, and the last word upon the problem has not yet been spoken. There is perhaps no satisfactory middle ground between 'the view that what Christ accepted must be true, and that which sees in His attitude to demonic possession a particular example of Kenosis.' Three things seem clear—(1) Jesus recognizes a Satanic activity and a Satanic mastery over the possessed; (2) He usually reduces the legions of devils commonly believed in to a single Satanic being, though in one passage (Mt 12^{45} || Lk 11^{26}) He speaks about the unclean spirit taking with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself (the question arises here, If we accept the personality of the devil, must we also believe in his angels?); (3) He conceives the relation of Satan to man as a moral one, and so gives to the whole doctrine an ethical basis. From this standpoint there is a good deal to be said for the ancient view that there is a possession bound up with moral obliquity.

iv. ANTHROPOLOGY.—The development in regard to the doctrine of man is not so remarkable. In general we find just the OT anthropology in the Apocrypha, though it is in some respects stated with greater precision and clearness. On one or two important points, however, there is a distinct deviation from the OT position.

1. Psychological nature of man.—As to his nature and origin, man is a creature of God, consisting of soul and body. There seems to be no distinction made between πνεῦμα and ψυχή; at all events there is no trichotomy. The fullest conception of man's personality is found in the Book of Wisdom; but, although on some other points the phraseology of that book is distinctly of a Platonic cast, it nowhere adopts Plato's doctrine of a tripartite nature in man, 15^{11} being only an apparent exception. This is the more remarkable in that it was the accepted theory of the Alexandrian school, and became one of the tenets of Philo (de Somn. i. 22) and of Josephus (Ant. I. i. 12). But we have here only one instance out of several in which the writer shows his independence of the Hellenistic philosophy; he can apply it on occasion to the kernel of OT dogma with very fruitful results, but he is not its slave. His position as to the derivation of the human soul is that of creationism, not traducianism. The spiritual ego, which is distinct from the body, comes directly from God, and attaches itself to the body at birth. But at this point we meet with a real variation from OT doctrine. Our author teaches the pre-existence of the human soul. When good, it enters an undefiled body ($8^{19f.}$). Some dispute this interpretation of the passage, but the influence of Gr. philosophy is undoubtedly traceable here, as also in the further statement that the body is only an 'earthly frame' for the mind (νοῦς, 9^{15}). The soul is temporarily lent to the body, which must after a brief space restore it and then return to dust (15^{8}). Here the Jewish doctrine of the resurrection of the body is abandoned in favour of the Gr. conception of the immortality of the soul. The writer's ideas of pre-existence and dualism are borrowed from the Pythagorean and Platonic doctrines respectively. With regard to pre-existence, we may compare the disciples' question in Jn 9^{2} 'Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?' This remained for long the main prop of the pre-existence doctrine, and it shows how readily uneducated people must have picked up many philosophical doctrines which did not seem directly to clash with sacred religious customs. One of the alternatives here is, of course, that possibly the man had sinned before his birth. Viewed in the light of the subsequent remark to the man himself, 'Thou wast altogether born in sins,' this seems incapable of explanation except on the theory that there had become visible in this way the punishment of sin committed in a pre-existent state. The saying is probably to be traced to the influence of the Essenes, who in spite of their exclusiveness commanded the reverence of the populace as strict moralists, and as a secret order representing the occult and mysterious. At all events, it shows how deeply foreign views had imprinted themselves on the Jewish theology of the time, and that with regard to anthropology as well as other doctrines. In the attempt to solve the perennial riddle, What is man? the dualistic theory lies midway between the two extremes of materialism and pantheism. But, while dualism is right as to the combination in man's nature of the animal and the spiritual, it settles nothing as to the union of those two elements. On this point, indeed, the Gr. philosophers, and after them the Gnostics, indulge in the wildest speculations. Sense is made to take the place of sin, and the body is viewed as in itself evil, seeing it originates from a principle opposed to the Divine element in the human spirit. In contrast to this the Jewish anthropology as embodied in the OT taught the creation of man, of his body, and his soul, by an act of the Divine will (Gn 1^{27} [P] 2^{7} [J]). Pre-existence is nowhere taught in the OT, Ps 139^{15}, which is perhaps the nearest approach to it, being simply a poetic description of growth in the womb. That in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era the scriptural doctrine was seriously endangered from the side of speculative philosophy, is clear from the Book of Wisdom itself. According to Langen, the writer does no more than clothe genuine Jewish doctrine in a Gr. dress, thereby establishing it with a precision corresponding to the danger it had to meet; but, in view of his position with regard to pre-existence and dualism, the statement requires modification. In connexion with the latter point it should be noted that if in 9^{15}, influenced by the Platonic idea that the body is the soul's prison, the author means that the body led man into sin, he ascribes this in another passage to the envy of the devil (2^{24}). The most probable explanation of this divergence appears to be that he was trying to find a via media between philosophy and Scripture.

Although the work is considerably under the influence of Hellenism, the doctrine of creationism is traceable in 4 Mac. (13), where God is spoken of as giving their souls to men. The reverse is the case with Enoch, and yet trichotomy is taught in at least one passage (67^{8}). The expressions of Josephus on this subject are vague and even contradictory (Ant. I. i. 2, BJ VII. viii. 7). His description of the soul as a part of godhead (μοῖρα θεοῦ) is only his way of affirming its likeness to God, and is not to be interpreted pantheistically; it is evidently used to emphasize the contrast between the perishable material body and the immortal soul. He is at one with Platonic dualism in maintaining the unsuitability of the union of spirit and matter in one body, and, although he nowhere expressly adopts the view of the Essenes, it is doubtful whether he contemplates a bodily resurrection. The one point upon which he is clear is that there is a continued personal existence of the soul after death.

2. Original moral condition of man.—According to Gn $1^{26f.}$, man was made in the image of God. This is the positive foundation on which the later Jewish theology bases its view about the moral dignity of the human race. But, although the phrase is uniformly referred not to physical form but to mental and moral characteristics, it is not always understood in precisely the same sense. According to Sirach, man's likeness to God consists in his sovereignty over the rest of creation, and in his intellectual endowments, particularly in the power to discern good and evil ($17^{2.\,8}$). In Wisdom this resemblance is seen not only in man's dominion over the creatures and in his moral direction of the world ($9^{2f.}$), but also in the fact that he was created for immortality (2^{23}). By Philo the Divine image in man is conceived as mediated through the Logos. The reasonable soul is a transcript of the eternal Word (de Plant. Noe, 5), and it is in the rational element or νοῦς that we are to look for the Divine image (de Mund. Opif. 23), in virtue of which man is a product, not of earth but of heaven (de Plant. Noe, 4). Strangely enough, Josephus makes no allusion to the subject.

3. The immortality of the soul.—In Wisdom the idea of a future life is much more prominent than in the earlier OT canonical books. The old vague delineations of Sheol, and intermediate references to the realm of the shadow of death, no longer suffice for the cultured Alexandrian. Materialism is met by a clear and pointed statement of the view that the soul is immortal (2^{23} 3^{1}). The writer of 2 Mac. adopts the same standpoint (6^{26} $12^{43f.}$). And if in both books stress is mainly laid upon the fact of the future life of the righteous who were apparently destroyed by persecution, this does not warrant the inference that the writers deny the future existence of the wicked. 2 Mac 7^{14} (cf. Jn 5^{29}) lends no support to this view, and the reference to punishment after death implies the continued existence of the sinner ($12^{43f.}$).

Apparently, the future existence of the wicked was also accepted by orthodox Pal. Jews. The common phrase 'destruction of the ungodly' must be interpreted in the light of those passages in OT and Apocryphal books which have in view the eternal punishment of the wicked. By the 'removal' of the godless in Enoch 1^{1} is meant their being handed over to the place of punishment, and not their annihilation; cf. 22^{13}, which speaks of sinners whose 'souls will not be slain on the day of judgment.' 'There are degrees of suffering in Sheol. The worst penalty appears to be "the slaying of the soul," but even this did not imply annihilation' (Charles; see this writer's further notes on Enoch 99^{11} 108^{3}). Even in the Ascension of Isaiah, which says that the destruction by fire of the ungodly will cause them to be as if they had not been created (4^{18}), absolute annihilation is not intended.

In the doctrinal position of the Sadducees as summed up in Ac 23^{8} (cf. 4^{2}, Mt $22^{23ff.}$) the anthropological element is the most important. Their denial of angels was of little consequence compared with their denial of the resurrection. A love for Hellenistic worldliness had rendered attractive to them the idea that this life is complete in itself, that death is no mere shadow but a reality, and that a resurrection is not to be thought of. Along with the resurrection of the body, the Sadducees naturally denied the immortality of the soul. They were pure materialists, who made no earnest attempt to reach a philosophy of the nature and life of the human spirit, and took no account of the Scripture fact that the separation of soul and body is the punishment of sin. At the opposite pole from the Sadducean doctrine was the extreme spiritualism of the Essenes, who denied the possibility of a resurrection, but believed in the immortality of the soul. They accepted the Pythagorean doctrine that the human soul is derived from the purest ether, and that its connexion with the body is accidental and necessarily temporal. Its pre-existence they regarded as a necessary consequence of immortality and the dualistic opposition between spirit and matter. The practical effect of these views was seen in a rigid bodily asceticism and in an earnest pursuit of moral ideals. Immortality and the resurrection both formed part of the creed of the Pharisees. Josephus, indeed, says they taught the transmigration of the souls of the good, and the eternal punishment of the wicked. But, so far as the former idea is concerned, this deviation is really more one of form than of substance, the only difference being that in the one case it is asserted that the material frame does not remain the same, while in the other it is held that every soul has its own particular body. It is quite after the manner of Josephus to make a Jewish doctrine as little objectionable as possible to men of other races, and this may account for his curious confusion of the Jewish doctrine of the resurrection with the widely prevalent pagan doctrine of the transmigration of souls. The idea of the punishment of the wicked was certainly not excluded from the doctrine of transmigration, although the resurrection was frequently spoken of as confined to the good. It was conceived only as a resurrection to life, in which, of course, the lost had no part. What was really but a qualification of the resurrection was thus transferred to the resurrection itself, and Josephus was at once right and wrong in limiting the resurrection to the good, while representing the wicked as delivered up to punishment. But in general it is true of this writer that he has no decided anthropological views of his own, and that his pages reflect the most diverse opinions upon this subject current in the Palestinian Judaism of his time.

4. The first sin and its consequences.—In Sirach we have exactly the biblical account of the Fall: 'Of the woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die' (25^{24}); and this may be taken as representing the general opinion among the Jews of Palestine two centuries prior to the Christian era. As practical reformers, the prophets did not concern themselves with religious metaphysics; but during an epoch when the Law was the one subject of study it was inevitable that attention should be concentrated upon the problem which agitated the whole ancient world—that of the origin of evil. And, naturally, the narrative in Gn 3 formed the starting-point in this discussion. Only gradually was the doctrine of original sin clearly formulated. In Sir 8^{5} all are indeed said to be worthy of punishment; but if there be transgressors who are 'a deceivable seed,' those who love and fear the Lord are 'an honourable plant' (10^{19}). The writer of Wisdom says, 'By the envy of the devil death entered into the world, and they that are of his portion make trial thereof' (2^{24}). This speculative treatment of the narrative of the Fall in Genesis in no way alters its content. The language clearly implies the doctrine of original sin, which, however, is not conceived as inconsistent with a certain predisposition towards good (8^{19}). That this goodness, on the other hand, is in any case not absolute, is shown by the writer's statement that apart from Divine aid he could not possess wisdom (8^{21}).

In Enoch the eating of the tree of knowledge is treated as the source of a radical moral and spiritual transformation in man, which showed itself in his instant recognition of the impropriety of being naked. It carried death with it also, not as a punishment but as a natural consequence (69^{11}). Although Dillmann would read this into 108^{11}, it is doubtful whether the book knows anything of a natural bias of all men towards evil. The question of original sin is scarcely in the view of the writer, whose concern is rather to explain the great moral difference in men. This he attributes to an initial difference of natural disposition. Philo treats the narrative of the Fall allegorically. Man represents the spiritual, woman the physical, side of our being. By teaching man to exchange the celestial for the terrestrial life, woman was the cause of the first sin (de Mund. Opif. 53 ff.). Through his descent into a sensible body, the first man caused the most evil consequences to his whole posterity. Sense as such being evil, sin is inborn with human nature (de Vita Mosis, ii. 157). Josephus (Ant. I. i. 2–4) gives a sort of allegorizing version of the biblical account of the Fall. By eating the forbidden fruit our first parents attained the height of knowledge, but it proved their destruction. Their punishment is made to consist in labour and adversity, in the swift advance of old age and the near prospect of death. Of an original immortality nothing is said. In a somewhat embellished account of the Creation the Book of Jubilees takes cognizance of Adam's sin, and represents it as involving his expulsion from Paradise, with other attendant penalties. But it goes no further. It declares neither that death is the consequence of sin, nor that Adam's transgression resulted in the depravity of the race.

It would appear, then, that in Jewish post-exilic tradition no clear views had been formulated on the subject of anthropology. A certain degree of latitude prevailed alike as regards the philosophical conception of the constitution of man and the theological position as to the original condition of our race. In particular, no doctrine of original sin had, for the most part, been arrived at. With some exceptions, however,—notably that of Josephus,—the recognized necessity of death was connected with the fall of our first parents. Yet, curiously enough, this was usually considered a distinct gain, inasmuch as through the first sin man had audaciously possessed himself of knowledge divinely prohibited. In other words, he had sinned to his own advantage. So that in this particular, as Langen points out, 'pre-Christian tradition agrees rather with the Prometheus-myth than with the biblical account' (l.c. p. 365).

In 2 (4) Esdras we meet with the doctrine of original sin in a highly developed form. Already in the angel Uriel's promise to teach him 'wherefore the heart is wicked' (4^{4}), the writer assumes that the question will interest his readers, and in several passages he gives to it a distinct and definite answer. The sins of Israel are fruits of the first fall ($3^{21\text{ff.}}$). So also in 4^{30} it is said, 'A grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning, and how much wickedness hath it brought forth unto this time! and how much shall it yet bring forth until the time of threshing come!' As in our nature the evil far outweighs the good, so the perishing outnumber the saved (7^{44} 8^{3} 9^{15}). In view of the pessimistic tone of the writer, it would not be safe to infer that his outlook was that of the Judaism of the period, although in days of troublous events it was doubtless shared by many. The element of truth underlying his morbid presentation is that emphasized by our Lord, viz. that relatively few enter in at the strait gate. This is quite in keeping with the strict demands of OT morality, in which the writer finds a point of contact for his doctrine of original sin. He gives clear expression, however, to what was only obscurely wrapped up in Jewish tradition. But in his handling of this doctrine he does not confine himself to abstract theory; he approaches the problem also from the practical side. With the deep feeling of a soul crushed by the curse of sin he cries out, 'O thou Adam, what hast thou done? for though it was thou that sinned, the evil is not fallen on thee alone, but upon all of us that come of thee' (7^{48}). Although the writer's views are coloured by Christian influence, that influence is only a reflex one. He was himself no Christian, and no propagator of Christianity. His work is essentially Jewish, and its aim is to revive the Jewish hope. Nothing is further from his intention than the appropriation of foreign matter, yet it was inevitable that expressions forged in the heat of the conflict attending the early development of Christian doctrine should have appealed to his susceptible spirit. On its austerer side Christianity ministered to his gloomy spiritual tendency. In its milder aspects it seems to have awakened no answering echo within him. What, consciously or unconsciously, impressed him was its delineation of the race as sunk in universal sinfulness and exposed to the wrath and curse of God, of the human heart as naturally wicked, and of the comparatively small number of the saved. Yet he is so far from denying the possibility of salvation that he even specifies what is necessary in order to find it, viz. works and faith (9^{7} 13^{23}). As the thought already appears in Gn 15^{6}, there is no need to ascribe the expression to the influence of St. James.

5. Free will and foreordination.—The OT clearly affirms, on the one hand, the doctrine of Divine providence and foreordination, and, on the other, the freedom of the human will. All the later Jewish writings take the same position with regard to man's moral liberty. According to Wisdom, God is found of such as seek Him in singleness of heart ($1^{1\text{ff.}}$). Wisdom is attainable by him who loves her and will diligently pursue her ($6^{12.\ 14}$). 'For her true beginning is desire of discipline; and the care for discipline is love of her; and love of her is observance of her laws; and to give heed to her laws confirmeth incorruption; and incorruption bringeth near unto God; so then desire of wisdom promoteth to a kingdom' ($6^{17\text{ff.}}$). Thus along the entire line of the soul's moral development the way lies open to man. Owing to innate wickedness (5^{13}), he cannot tread this path without Divine help (8^{21}); but for this he can pray (7^{7}), and it will be given him if he shows himself worthy of it ($1^{2\text{ff.}}$), and does not court death by unrighteous words and deeds ($1^{12.\ 16}$). To the same effect is the teaching of Sirach. The Lord 'showed men good and evil' (17^{7}), and 'left him in the hand of his own counsel' (15^{14}). 'Before man is life and death; and whichsoever he liketh, it shall be given him' (15^{17}). It is noteworthy that, in thus affirming man's power to distinguish between good and evil, the writer stoutly assails the contrary opinion ($15^{11\text{ff.}}$). As he would never have controverted an unknown theory, the doctrine of predestination must have had its exponents in Jewish circles. Free will in man, it was held, could not consist with God's government of the world. Providence meant predestination, and man is but a passive agent in the hand of God. This is the point of view against which Ben Sira directs his polemic; and, although we cannot tell with what Pal. school he was specially identified, it is evident that during this period theological questions were keenly debated. In view of the full recognition of human freedom, and in opposition to Sadducean rationalism, special stress was laid in some quarters upon the heavenly ordering of earthly things. This thought gradually came to be expressed under the figure of a heavenly book or heavenly tables, in which was set down the whole course of events as these would unfold themselves in actual history. The idea of a book of life is not foreign to the OT (Ex 32^{32}, Ps 69^{28}), but it was more freely employed in the later literature; cf. e.g. Enoch 104^{1} 108^{2} 47^{3}. In the Book of Jubilees sins are said to be written in the eternal books which are before the Lord (39^{6}); while Abraham and Levi are written down as just in the tables of heaven (19^{9} 30^{20}). The same idea occurs in Dn 10^{21}. It corresponds to the Platonic world of Ideas or Divine world-plan, and seems to have been the Jewish expedient for retaining the old doctrine of Divine providence in the face of Hellenism. Philo finds the distinctive nature of man and the most direct consequence of his likeness to God in the faculty of self-determination. The moral liberty belonging to the rational element in man is the very condition of virtue. By a spontaneous act of will man can choose to practise good or evil, and so arrive at honour or condemnation. His destiny is thus in his own hands. According to Josephus, the chief difference between the three leading Jewish sects was connected with the question of human freedom; but, except as adherents of one or other of these, men seem to have troubled themselves little about the relation to each other of the two factors of human liberty and Divine prearrangement. The peculiar use of εἱμαρμένη for θεός affords an example of Josephus' liking for Hellenistic terms as a medium for the expression of Jewish ideas (Ant. XIII. v. 9, XVIII. i. 3; BJ II. iii. 1).

6. Ethics.—In the sphere of morals the vital question must ever be, What is sin, and what is virtue? According to OT ideas, sin consists in deviation from the law of God, and virtue in the observance of that law. But for the most part the OT is content with laying down general principles, leaving men to apply these to their own special circumstances in accordance with their individual judgment. In post-exilic Judaism we meet with two marked developments differing on opposite sides from the OT position. The one is that of Pharisaism, according to which the main element in morality is the literal observance of positive precepts; the other is that identified with the Alexandrian school, according to which the principal importance is attached, not to the outward act itself but to the sentiment inspiring it.

(1) Palestinian Jews based their ethical system on the Mosaic law, which is not a philosophy but a revelation. It does not deal with the general conditions of moral existence as such, but with the particular conditions that obtained in Israel. Naturally, therefore, the scribes were not philosophers; they were interpreters of the sacred Law. For Ezra and his coadjutors this formed the unique standard, not only of religion and morals but also of economics and politics. Every department of life was regulated by it. No distinction was made between the ceremonial and the moral; Sabbath observance and rules about food were enjoined by the same law that commanded the love of God and just dealing towards men. National law and not conscience was the recognized norm of morality, which thus became synonymous with jurisprudence. In point of fact, the practice of well-doing was often dictated by the love of good for its own sake (To $4^{7\text{ff.}}$, Sir 4^{28} etc.), but in theory morality was simply a matter of mechanical obedience to legalistic prescriptions. This conception of ethics led to the Law being developed in quite a wrong direction. Every biblical commandment was surrounded by a network of petty regulations. No allowance was made for changing circumstances; full obedience to the Law in all its particulars was inexorably demanded of every Jew. To the precepts of the Written Law were added those of the Halakha or Traditional Law, which was handed down as a sacred trust from generation to generation, and ultimately embodied in the Talmud. It took centuries for the Oral Law to reach its completed form, but its birth dates from the restoration of Israel under Ezra and Nehemiah. An attempt was thus made to bring every conceivable case within the scope of the Law, and with merciless logic to regulate the whole of human conduct by strict rule of thumb. Legal details were multiplied until religion became a trade, and life an intolerable burden. Men were reduced to moral automatons. The voice of conscience was stifled; the living power of the Divine word was neutralized and smothered beneath a mass of external rules. Hence our Lord's accusation against the Pharisees, that by their traditions they made void the Law. Not that in Palestinian ethics the inner motive was absolutely disregarded. The literature of the period recommends the practice of the Law out of respect to God who gave it (To 1^{12} $4^{5\text{ff.}}$ etc.); and, from the efforts made in the 2nd century A.D. to crush out the modified spiritualism represented by Sirach and the school of Gamaliel and Hillel, we may reasonably infer that the Pharisaic affirmation of the merit of works met with considerable opposition at an earlier date. Liberalism disappeared only when the observance of the Ceremonial Law became the one safeguard of Israel's nationality. Yet there is no doubt that externalism held the field, and that more and more, as the one thing needful.

A conspicuous example of legalistic Judaism is furnished in connexion with the observance of the Sabbath (see vol. iv. p. 320^{b}). No fewer than 39 species of servile work are forbidden on that day, and each of these includes numerous particulars. To observe scrupulously the prescribed rules about food is viewed as morally meritorious (Dn $2^{8\text{ff.}}$, Jth 8^{6} etc.). From the days of Noah downwards, the eating of blood seems to have been considered criminal. In Enoch 4^{5} the giants are depicted as dreadful cannibals because guilty of this enormity. The Book of Jubilees also attaches much importance to this prohibition. 'Eat no blood whatever . . . that thou mayest be preserved from all evil' ($21^{6.\ 18\text{ff.}}$). This appears to be a superstitious gloss upon the biblical statement, 'the blood is the life' (Lv 17^{14}). At all events, it shows us that an ethical significance was given to mere externalities having none. Almsgiving is represented as purging away all sin (To 12^{9} 14^{11}). This error as to the value of good works passed over into Christianity with Jewish Christians, and formed the subject of St. Paul's great controversy. In the special religious conditions of the Jews this mechanical and minute system of ethics was perhaps inevitable. It seems to be a law of religious history that all written tradition gives rise to an oral tradition, and that the latter always claims to dominate conscience; especially is this the case where, as in Mosaism, written tradition is at once a religion and a revelation (Nicolas, Des Doctrines Religieuses des Juifs, p. 381). Church history shows that even (official) Christianity has not always refrained from lording it over the conscience in matters of detail not included within the scope of the Divine commandments. Closely connected with the value attached to good works was the exclusiveness which distinguished the Pal. Jews of this period. It was no longer their birth only that marked them off from other nations; in virtue of their observance of the Law they occupied a position of superiority over 'sinners of the Gentiles' (Gal 2^{15}). The strength of this feeling is reflected in the jealousy afterwards shown by Jewish Christians towards their brethren of pagan extraction, and in the demand that all such should at least perform the obligations of proselytes. The misapprehension as to the nature of sin on the part of orthodox Judaism led naturally to a wrong view regarding absolution from sin. In this connexion there was apparently no thought of a moral renewal of the heart. To judge from the attitude of later Rabbinism, it was all a question of calculation. Sin could be atoned for by counterbalancing good works; and if a man's good deeds exceeded his evil deeds, then he was both morally good, and would stand in the judgment. But evidence is not wanting that in the Judaism of the period room was found for the conception that a soul may reach a point in sin which constitutes a state of moral banishment from God. According to Jubilees ($26^{3.\ 31}$), Esau committed 'a sin unto death' in renouncing the yoke of his brother, while 2 (4) Es 7^{49} speaks of 'works that bring death,' i.e. for which, on earth at least, there is no forgiveness.

With regard to retribution, the Pal. Apocrypha strongly maintain that a holy life will bring happiness, and that the wicked will meet with misfortune and punishment (Sir 35^{11} 28^{1}). The writers mostly confine their view to the present life. Tobit joins with Sirach in laying great stress on almsgiving as a means of securing the Divine favour, but only, it would seem, with reference to this life; though in one passage he speaks of death as more profitable for him than life, and desires to be released from distress that he may 'go to the everlasting place' (3^{6}). Future retribution, however, is also taught (Jth 16^{17}, 2 Mac 7^{14}, 2 (4) Es $7^{36.\ 79f.}$).

(2) The moral ideas of the Alexandrian Jews reflect a different and, in one respect at least, more scriptural atmosphere. Moral worth is determined, not by the measure of obedience to positive prescription but by the inner purpose of the heart. The spirit of the Law is not subordinated to the letter. Morality is a quality of soul (Wis 1^{4} 6^{10}), and has its roots in fellowship with God (15^{3}). Wisdom, which has its source in the four cardinal (Platonic) virtues—soberness, understanding, righteousness, and courage (8^{7})—corresponds somewhat strikingly to what St. Paul designates faith. 'To be acquainted with thee is perfect righteousness, and to know thy dominion is the root of immortality' (15^{3}). According to Philo, religious reverence is the source of virtue, and the perfect law is the disinterested love of the good for its own sake.

But, if the Alexandrian ethics coincides with OT teaching in the place which it assigns to the heart's intention, it deviates from the scriptural position in virtually setting aside the practice of the Mosaic law. In Wisdom sacrifice is mentioned only incidentally, while stress is laid upon the importance of prayer (16^{28}), and upon the word of God as the true nourishment of the soul (16^{26}). Philo expressly teaches that God takes no pleasure in sacrifices, but is pleased only with purity of heart (de Victim. Offer. 3). The virtuous soul is His temple, and its homage the true offering. So far he may be said to anticipate the spirit of Christianity. But in opposing the mechanical morality of the Pal. schools the Alexandrians fell into an unhealthy spiritualism. The writer of Wisdom shows a distinct leaning towards asceticism. In his view the body is the enemy of the soul, upon which it acts as a heavy drag (9^{15}), and celibacy is better than the anxious lot of him whose children are only too likely to be given to wickedness ($3^{12ff.}$ 4^{1}). Philo goes still further, and allegorically reduces all the positive precepts of the OT to the one idea of overcoming sense by the life of the spirit. It is the duty of the wise man to loosen the bonds that bind the spirit to the material frame in which it is imprisoned (de Migrat. Abr. 1). Although the application of this general principle frequently coincides with OT precepts, it amounts to a rejection of the positive teaching of revelation. That there is no fundamental agreement is shown by the difference between the Philonic and OT conceptions of sin. According to OT revelation, the sinner's restoration may be effected by his penitent return to God; in Philo's system there is no healing for the soul that has deliberately sinned. Neither does the Alexandrian theosophist acknowledge any degrees of heinousness in sin, seeing that he attaches no importance to the outward act, but takes account only of the freedom and decision with which the sin is committed. This writer's ascetic bias is so far corrected by his declaration that the care of the soul and devotion to God should not render us oblivious to our duties towards our fellow-men (de Decal. 22).

In contrast to the Palestinians, the Alexandrian Jews applied the idea of retribution to the future as well as to the present life. Wisdom clearly teaches the doctrine of future rewards and punishments ($3^{1ff.}$). The Day of Judgment is expressly mentioned ($3^{7.\ 18}$). The terrors of an evil conscience and the thought of future condemnation are jointly set forth in 17^{21}. In 19^{4} the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is represented as a necessary doom, quite after the analogy of the Greek Nemesis.

Another distinctive note of the Alexandrian ethics is its universalistic tendency. According to Wisdom the peculiar advantage of the Jew consists, not in his birth but in his possession of the knowledge of God. Pagans are sinners, not because they are not of Abraham's race but because they are without the knowledge of the true God ($13^{5ff.}$). It is from this standpoint that idolatry is regarded as the source of evil and the corruption of life (14^{12}). Philo departs even more emphatically than Wisdom from the Jewish particularism taught in Palestine. All men are brethren, similarly organized and endowed; before all is set the same task of emancipating the soul from the bondage of the body. Slavery is the greatest of all evils, and virtue consists in obeying the voice of conscience. It is the mission of the Israelites to be the priests and prophets of the whole human race, and herein lies their privilege. But in order to accomplish this momentous task they must have a true spiritual understanding of their Law, i.e. they must become philosophers. This extreme spiritualism was due partly to the influence of Greek philosophy, and partly to the distance of the Alexandrian Jews from Palestine. Equally shut off from contact with the schools of the home land, and from the observance of the Ceremonial Law, they soon idealized their religion.

7. Christian doctrine gave final shape and precision to the Jewish anthropology, and threw a flood of light upon the obscurities of a period unrivalled for religious wavering and confusion. To many things in the current theological teaching Christ gave His assent; with regard to others He set men upon the right track; others still He rejected or supplanted by positive doctrine of a contrary character. To a large extent this was done through the use of well-known ideas and expressions. The words of Jesus with reference to unpardonable sin (Mt $12^{31f.}$ ‖; cf. 1 Jn 5^{16}, He $6^{4ff.}$) probably reflect a phraseology familiar to the Judaism of the age. A propos of this example, Langen suggestively remarks that the key to many theological difficulties of NT passages lies in approaching them from the standpoint of their historical connexion (Judenthum, p. 381). Without essentially altering its content, Christian doctrine introduces light and definiteness into the well-nigh chaotic mass of religious thought and theory which represented the accumulation of centuries. As to the nature of man, it distinguishes between soul and spirit without embracing Plato's doctrine of trichotomy, and rejects the Pythagorean view of the connexion between soul and body. It teaches, further, that there is a personal future life for man, a resurrection to life, but also to judgment. In St. Paul's Epistles we have the facts of redemption joined on to the teaching of the opening chapters of Genesis, and raised to a definite system. Sin, death, and grace appear in their true significance and connexion. On the one hand, we have the loftiest ideal towards which to strive in our moral and spiritual growth and development, and on the other the Almighty will working from eternity towards the fulfilment of His purposes (Ro 8). While not showing how the two doctrines can be held in combination without neutralizing each other, it teaches both free will and an overruling Providence. Finally, Christian ethics neither ignores the motive inspiring conduct, nor minimizes the importance of the external act. It teaches that, while the moral quality of an action is determined by the inner motive, its outward manifestation is also worthy of praise or blame (Mk 14^{6}).

v. THE MESSIANIC HOPE.—1. Meaning of the expression.—The word Messiah (Heb. מָשִׁיחַ, Gr. Χριστός) means 'anointed,' and is used most frequently in OT of the theocratic king of Israel (1 S 12^{3} etc.), but with a special significance when applied to David and his descendants (Ps 18^{50} $89^{19\text{ff.}}$). In Dn 9^{25} the reference is apparently to Cyrus (cf. Is 45^{1}). The title does not occur either in the Apocrypha or in the Apocalyptic literature written during the last century and a half B.C. In the latter especially there are undoubtedly Messianic passages, but the style of composition lent itself most naturally to the use of the symbolical. The earliest extant instance of its distinctive use as a technical form is found in the anti-Sadducean Psalms of Solomon (17^{36} $18^{6.\,8}$), composed c. 140 B.C. It may be noted here also that the expression 'Messianic hope' is not free from a certain ambiguity, seeing that under this title are frequently comprehended two things which should be carefully distinguished, viz. the expectation of the Messianic era, and the expectation of the Messianic king. In tracing the development of the Messianic idea in Israel it is necessary to keep in view the fact that many Prophetic and Apocalyptic writers who look forward confidently to a glorious future for the nation entertain no expectation of a personal Messiah. The Jews cherished a strong belief in the restoration of their national prestige as Jehovah's chosen people. After purifying the nation by discipline, He would bestow upon them all that heart could wish. This faith, already preached by the prophets of the 8th cent. B.C., they firmly held apart from and prior to the notion of a unique personal deliverer in the form of the Messiah. In certain sections of Judaism also, and at certain periods, when the latter expectation grew dim, the wider hope was never relinquished.

2. The OT position.—The prophets Amos, Hosea, and Joel give clear expression to Messianic hopes for Israel and Judah, but say nothing of a personal Messiah. What they predict is the revived glory of the Davidic house (Am $9^{11\text{f.}}$) and the return of the children of Israel (Hos 3^{5}). Nor does Zephaniah, in depicting the happy future that shall follow the Divine judgment on Israel and the nations ($3^{9\text{-}20}$), introduce at all the figure of Messiah. Jeremiah announces the coming of a king of David's line, but seems to think of a succession of them (17^{25} 22^{4} $33^{15.\,17}$); and Obadiah (v.^{2}) speaks of a plurality of saviours on Mount Zion. The same thought appears to be implied in Ezk 43^{7} $45^{8\text{f.}}$, and elsewhere this prophet idealizes the reign of David, referring to him as the 'shepherd' of Israel and 'their prince for ever.' In Isaiah, Micah, and Zechariah we meet with a great advance in the development of Messianic expectation. These prophets do not confine the blessing to their own nation, and clearly bring forward the person of a particular descendant of David (Is $7^{13\text{-}16}$ $9^{6\text{f.}}$, Mic $5^{2\text{ff.}}$, Zec 9^{9} 14^{9}). The terms in which this king is described perfectly fit the character of the Messiah as that came to be recognized in Jewish theology.

3. The Messianic idea in the Apocrypha.—While confidently predicting better times for Israel, the Apocrypha afford but few materials for the construction of the doctrine of the Messiah. Baruch, Tobit, and Sirach may be noticed first as falling within the period between the cessation of prophecy and the commencement of the Maccabee revival. Baruch comforts Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the assurance of the destruction of their enemies, and of the return of their prosperity as a united people 'gathered together by the word of the Holy One' ($4^{21\text{ff.}}$). There is no Mediator known to Baruch as accomplishing all this. Many of the Fathers pointed to another passage ($3^{35\text{ff.}}$) as a prophecy of the Incarnation; but the words 'afterward did she (AV 'he') appear upon earth, and was conversant with men' are more properly regarded as a personification of Wisdom. Tobit's point of view is somewhat different. He predicts the same happiness for Israel, and a return to Jerusalem, there to re-establish with great pomp the worship of the Lord God. But he speaks of no vengeance to be wreaked on their enemies, over whom they are rather to obtain a glorious triumph in the shape of their conversion to Judaism ($13^{5.\,11.\,16\text{ff.}}$). Ben Sira knows no more of a personal Messiah than either Baruch or Tobit. The idea of a glorious future is present to his mind, although he expresses himself on the subject with great sobriety. He recalls the promises made by God to Abraham and to David (44^{21} 45^{25} 47^{11}), and looks for the return of the scattered Jews, for the punishment of their oppressors ($36^{10\text{ff.}}$), and for the breaking of 'the sceptres of the unrighteous' (35^{18}). In spite of a dim Messianic expectation in 44–50 that is in no special way connected with an individual Messiah, his real interest is in the perpetuity of the Israelitish people. 'The days of Israel,' he says, 'are innumerable' (37^{25}), and 'their glory shall not be blotted out' (44^{13}). The only other passage we need refer to is one which is generally thought to be of later origin on account of the great contrast it bears to the prevailing doctrine of the book, viz. $48^{10\text{f.}}$. This passage, which recalls the closing lines of the prophecy of Malachi, speaks of Elijah returning at the inauguration of the Messianic kingdom, and that in such a way as to seem to imply that the author had hopes of living to see it all. But the Gr. text is obscure, and it is certainly not safe to conclude that he speaks of a future life.

'From the little and in part doubtful evidence that remains to us, it would seem that in the period between the Captivity and the rise of the Maccabees the Messianic hope resolved itself into vague anticipations of a glorious and happy future, in which the presence of God would be more manifest, but of which a Messiah would form no essential feature' (Drummond, Jewish Messiah, p. 199). This is exactly the position of those modern Jews who say the Messiah is not a person, but an epoch.

In 1 Mac. three passages have been singled out for discussion in this connexion:—(1) 'David for being merciful inherited the throne of a kingdom for ever and ever' (2^{57}). These words are put into the lips of Mattathias, and it is possible that the writer, without ascribing this expectation to the priest of Modin, contemplated the restoration of the Davidic kingdom through the appearance of the Messiah. (2) 'They pulled down the (desecrated) altar, and laid up the stones in the mountain of the house in a convenient place, until there should come a prophet to give an answer concerning them' (4^{46}). There is here certainly no specific reference to the Messiah. (3) 'The Jews and priests were well pleased that Simon should be their leader and high priest for ever, until there should arise a faithful prophet' (14^{41}). Although the absence of the article makes it difficult to identify the 'prophet' in question with the Messiah, 'the allusion may still fairly be regarded as Messianic in the general sense that the expected "faithful prophet" first appeared in Christ' (Camb. Bible, ad loc.). In 2 Mac. there is only one passage of Messianic import—'In God have we hope, that he will quickly have mercy upon us, and gather us together out of all the earth into the holy place' (2^{18}). The use of 'quickly' seems to imply the expectation of the near approach of the Messianic kingdom. There is nothing in Judith beyond the mention of 'the Day of Judgment,' when the Lord Almighty will take vengeance on the enemies of Israel (16^{17}).

In the Alexandrian Wisdom of Solomon likewise we meet with little that can claim to be directly Messianic. We have the same belief expressed as to the punishment of the enemies of God's people, and the elevation of the latter to a position of supremacy, but all in very general terms (3^7 5). There is just one passage—2^{12-20}—which has been often reckoned to be Messianic. It describes the suffering of the righteous at the hands of the ungodly, here and there in such language as makes it very natural to interpret it of the Messiah. Most probably, however, it is Israel as a nation that is spoken of here; and many of the expressions are to be applied rather to the present than to the future. In 16^{17} and other passages Israel is called ὁ δίκαιος. Besides, some of the things said scarcely admit of Messianic application, e.g. 'Let us lie in wait for the righteous man,' 'He is grievous unto us even to behold,' 'We were accounted of him as base metal.' These expressions all point to national enmities. Moreover, the next chapter proceeds to speak of the righteous in the aggregate. It is inconceivable that, had the hope of a Messiah been clear to his own mind, this writer would not have brought it forward in an unmistakable way in his references to the glorious kingdom awaiting the godly (5^{16}). At the same time it may be conceded to Ewald that 'this work should, . . . in consideration of its central idea and ultimate purpose, be reckoned among the Messianic productions' (Hist. v. p. 484).

With the exception of the material supplied by 2 (4) Esdras, which is dealt with below, this sums up what the Apocrypha contain with regard to the doctrine of the Messiah; and certainly it is impossible to claim anything in the way of development here. Indeed, 'in the post-Exilian time the limitation of Messianic apprehension to OT forms becomes again much greater than with Jeremiah and Deutero-Isaiah' (Riehm, Messianic Prophecy, p. 231).

4. Transformation of Messianic hopes into Apocalyptic ideas.—In the post-exilic period the ancient Messianic promises gradually assumed a new aspect. The Apocalyptic presentation of the Messiah-hope appears for the first time in the Book of Daniel, which seems to have formed the model of most of the subsequent literature bearing this name. The work dates from the Maccabæan struggle against the tyrannical attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes (the 'little horn' of ch. 7) to suppress Judaism by force. Its aim is to revive the courage of the Jewish people. This it seeks to do by pointing them to the splendid example of religious constancy set by the heroes of a former age (1–6), and to the glorious destiny awaiting them in the future (7–12). It deals with the restoration of Israel, and the victorious establishment of the worship of J" under a Davidic prince, but with a wealth of detail that is new, and with a reference of the facts to the history of the four great nations which in succession ruled the world. The kingdom of God is represented as the fifth and last monarchy ($2^{44\text{f.}}$), the final consummation of the Divine purposes to which the whole series of revolutions, political and religious, consecutively lead up. It will be preceded by the Abomination of Desolation (9^{27} 12^{11}), the culminating point in the career of the transgressors (8^{23}). This will continue for a fixed period, and then the last and vilest of the heathen powers will be crushed by the special interposition of the Most High, who will transfer the dominion to His saints (7^{18}). The glorious deliverance will be signalized by a partial resurrection of the dead, of whom some shall rise to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt (12^2). So shall be inaugurated the Messiah's kingdom, which shall extend to all nations and never be destroyed (7^{14}). Some think there is here no trace of the Messiah, and that the person in human form who appears in the vision of Dn 7 is merely the personification of Israel, as the four animals are the personification of the four empires; but the majority of scholars ascribe to him a supernatural character (cf. article SON OF MAN in vol. iv. p. 583 f.). In any case, the Messianic idea appears here in a more precise form than in Sirach. Instead of vague predictions of a prosperous future, there is a definite date assigned to the downfall of Israel's enemies, and to the assumption by the chosen people of universal dominion. Those who have fallen victims to persecution will not be without their reward; they will be raised up to share in the glories of the Messianic era.

Subsequent Apocalyptic writers follow the Book of Daniel in connecting the advent of the Messiah with the general development of human history, although they differ from it and from one another in their mode of mapping it out. Sometimes it is divided simply into the period preceding and that following the Messiah's coming; sometimes into three periods of 1000 years. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Levi 17 f.) speak of seven weeks, Enoch of ten weeks, and the Sibylline Or. (2^{15}) of ten generations. Other books, however, represent the time of the Messiah's advent as known only to God (2 Es $6^{7\text{ff.}}$). Already in Daniel the enemies of God's chosen people are supported by the rebel angels ($10^{18\text{f.}}$ 12^1), and in the later literature their last and greatest enemy is represented, not only as a pagan king but as the prince of demons, leading all the hosts of evil against the Messiah. Some other notable developments occur, such as the preparation of the way of the Lord by the reappearance not only of Elijah as in Malachi, but also of Moses, Isaiah, and Jeremiah; the dating in mystical numbers of the main events that usher in the Messianic era; a resurrection of the just (qualifying Dn 12^2; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3, BJ VIII. i. 4); the giving of a new law for the whole world (Sib. Or. $3^{755\text{ff.}}$); and the millennium, or reign of the Messiah on earth for 1000 years. These elements sufficiently distinguish the apocalypses from the ancient Heb. prophecies. To speak more generally, the former are differentiated from the latter by their almost purely transcendental character, and by the wider sweep of their horizon. If the essential features of the picture are the same as in the prophetic writings, the main interest is shifted from the present to the future, and the canvas is enlarged. There is greater precision, more fulness of detail, and bolder colouring. This gradual transformation of Messianic hopes into apocalyptic beliefs was the necessary consequence of the political situation in Israel. As each new crisis overtook them, a way had to be found of reconciling the prophetic promises with present misfortunes.

But there is an element in Jewish Apocalyptic literature which forbids us to regard it as a mere extension of OT Messianic teaching. Foreign influence is clearly traceable in such ideas as those of a partial resurrection, a millennial reign, etc. And in this instance the external impulse was not Greek, but Persian. Between Hellenism and Jewish Apocalyptic there is no affinity: the one conceived the golden age as past, the other as future. In the atmosphere of Alexandrian Judaism the Messianic hope lost its vitality, and resolved itself into little else than a philosophy of human betterment from the point of view of religion and morals. On the other hand, apocalyptic beliefs are closely associated with Babylonia under the Persian rule. The scene of the Book of Daniel, in which they were first propounded, is laid in Babylon, and the Pal. Apocrypha show that it was among the Jews who either as returned exiles or as citizens had intimate relations with Babylon that these views found acceptance. Moreover, the sacred writings of the Persians (Vendîdâd, etc.) speak of the coming of a deliverer in the last days, of the overthrow of the enemies of Ormazd, and the consequent establishment of an era of happiness analogous to that contemplated in the Messianic expectation of the Jews. The resemblance extends even to such details as the idea of a fifth monarchy, the resurrection of the dead, the millennial reign of the saviour, etc. Not that these elements were simply adopted by the Jews as an addition to their own Messianic hopes by way of supplementing and completing them. In no case does the resemblance amount to identity, and on certain points, as, e.g., that of the final restoration of the wicked, the Persian doctrine was distinctly rejected by the Jews. This again influenced their views of the resurrection, which they conceived as partial and not universal. The Persian elements traceable in the Jewish beliefs of the period merely show that, in the fresh interpretation of ancient documents induced by their changing circumstances, the Jews were influenced by the recollection of something analogous in Mazdeism.

We have a typical specimen of Jewish Apocalyptic in the Book of Enoch. Difficult critical questions arise with reference to this strange and interesting book,—questions of date, authorship, and constituent elements,—but it is unnecessary for our purpose to discuss them. (See the general and special Introductions in Charles' ed.). Two well-marked sections of the book treat of the Messianic expectation, viz. the Similitudes (37–71) and the Dream Visions (83–90). The date assigned by Charles to the latter section is B.C. 166–161, or a little later than Daniel. The work of a Hasidæan in full sympathy with the Maccabæan insurrection, it contains two visions, of which the first deals with the judgment of the Deluge, and the second gives a bird's-eye view of the entire course of human history from the Creation down to the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. In the first vision no attempt is made to explain the origin of human sin. According to the representation of the writer, the judgment that first fell upon the world was caused by the sin of the rebel angels, and not by that of man. In the second vision, which employs a symbolism akin to that of the Book of Daniel, special stress is laid upon the distressful condition of Israel after the Exile. This is ascribed to the faithlessness of the seventy shepherds, who wickedly destroyed those whom God entrusted to their care ($89^{19ff.}$). But in the midst of this oppression, from the party of the Hasidæans and in the person of Judas Maccabæus (the 'great horn' of 90^{9}), there will arise a deliverer whose sword shall destroy their enemies. God Himself shall appear, and the earth shall swallow them up (90^{6-19}). Then will ensue the judgment of the fallen watchers, the shepherds, and the apostate Jews, who will be cast into a fiery abyss ($90^{24ff.}$). This will be followed by the setting up of the new Jerusalem, the conversion of the remanent Gentiles, and their submission to Israel ($90^{28ff.}$), the resurrection of those who have succumbed to persecution, and the gathering of the dispersed of Israel (90^{33}). Finally, the Messiah ('a white bullock') will appear (90^{37}); all the saints will be changed into his likeness, and God will rejoice over them (90^{38}). We have here 'the Messiah coming forth from the bosom of the community. He is a man only, but yet a glorified man, and superior to the community from which he springs. So far as he is a man only, he may be regarded as the prophetic Messiah as opposed to the Apocalyptic Messiah of the Similitudes, and yet he is not truly the prophetic Messiah; for he has absolutely no function to perform, and he does not appear till the world's history is finally closed. Accordingly, his presence here must be accounted for purely through literary reminiscence, and the hope of the Messiah must be regarded as practically dead at this period. The writer felt no need of such a personality so long as the nation had such a chief as Judas Maccabæus' (Charles, Introd. p. 30 f.).

5. The Messianic idea in later Palestinian books.—The Book of Jubilees (written, according to Charles, B.C. 135–105). This work is distinguished by the spirituality of its description of the Messianic kingdom, although the person of the Messiah, whom the writer expects to arise from Judah, is alluded to only once (31^{18}). It is neither strictly apocalyptic in form, nor chiefly concerned with the subject of the Messianic hope. Only two or three passages are of importance for our purpose. Ch. 1 speaks of the day when the sanctuary of God will be established in the midst of Israel for ever and ever. Corrected by reproof, the people will abandon their idolatry. After having been dispersed among the heathen, the penitent Israelites will be gathered into one, and God will come and dwell among them. On the setting up of the Messianic kingdom, 'the heavens and the earth' . . . 'and all the luminaries shall be renewed' (1^{29}). This idea of the gradual transformation of nature as well as man appears to have been taken from Mazdeism (Söderblom, La Vie Future d'après le Mazdéisme, p. 254). In ch. 23 the death of Abraham at the age of 175 years gives occasion for some reference to the duration of human life, and this again leads the writer to portray in glowing colours the future vicissitudes of Israel. By reason of sin the infant of three weeks will look like a centenarian. But they will begin to renounce the sins of their fathers, and then their days will gradually lengthen to a thousand years, and the servants of the Lord 'will again pursue their enemies.' In another passage universal empire is promised to kings of Jacob's line (31^{18}). The statement that life will be short until the day of the Great Judgment (23^{11}) seems to indicate that the writer conceives the Judgment as intervening at the point when after protracted trial a new generation penitently kisses the rod. This marks the rise of the Messianic era. 'Jubilees will pass away,' however, before a perfectly pure Israel shall dwell in quiet throughout the land.*

We must next take account of the Similitudes of Enoch (chs. 37–71), which Charles refers to B.C. 95–80. This work exhibits the genuine religious spirit of Judaism. The Messianic doctrine in particular finds here unique expression. Dealing with the old problem, How can the temporary triumph of wickedness consist with the justice of God? the writer finds the answer in a comprehensive review of the world's history from the first beginnings of evil down to the final extrication wrought by the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. His method is strictly apocalyptic. Men were led astray by the watchers, who became subject to Satan (54^{6}). After this sinners deny the Lord of spirits (38^{2}), and the mighty oppress God's elect children ($62^{9ff.}$). But the Son of Man along with the Head of Days will appear for judgment. Punishment will be meted out to the fallen angels (54^{6}), the kings and the mighty (38^{5}), and the godless (38^{3} etc.), and 'unrighteousness will disappear as a shadow' from the earth (49^{2}). Heaven and earth will be transformed ($45^{4f.}$), and the elect will live in the light of eternal life (58^{3}). The Elect One will dwell among them, and 'with that Son of Man will they eat and lie down and rise up for ever and ever' (62^{14}). Most frequently the Messiah is designated 'the Elect One' (40^{5} 45^{3} etc.), but also 'the Righteous One' (37^{3}), 'the Anointed' (48^{10} 52^{4}), and 'the Son of Man' (46$^{2ff.}$ 48^{2} etc.). His pre-existence seems to be affirmed in 48$^{2-6}$. This is a solitary instance of religious speculation on the part of this Apocalyptic writer; and certainly it is rare to find in a Pal. work of pre-Christian date such a union of the Messianic idea with the Logos doctrine of Alexandrian and the Wisdom doctrine of Pal. Judaism. It probably appealed to him, however, as 'the fittest means of preserving intact the religious content of the Messianic idea' (Langen, Judenthum, p. 414). In the Similitudes the Messiah appears as (1) Prophet and teacher. Wisdom is poured out like water before him (49^{1}); its secrets stream forth from his mouth (51^{3}). He is the last and highest embodiment of the spirit of prophecy (49^{3}), and the revealer of all that is hidden (46^{3}). (2) Vindicator and ruler of the righteous. He has been revealed to the elect (62^{7}), and will be a staff to the righteous (48^{4}). He preserves their lot, and is the avenger of their life (48^{7}). They shall have the earth for their dwelling-place (51^{5}); He will abide over them (62^{14}); and their faces will be lighted up with joy (51^{5}). (3) Judge. The writer's spiritual conception of the Messianic idea comes out specially in connexion with the judicial function assigned to him. The Lord of spirits has chosen the Messiah as judge (49^{4}). For this work he is fitted by reason of his perfect righteousness (46^{3}). No matter by what death they have perished, all the righteous will be raised by him to life again (51^{1} 61^{5}), and no evil shall stand in his presence (49^{2}). He possesses the spirit of might (49^{3}), and rules over all (62^{6}). All judgment is committed unto him, and he will sit on the throne of his glory (45^{3} 69^{17}). The consequences of judgment are presented in 45$^{2ff.}$. In the transformed heaven and earth no place will be left for sinners. Azāzel and all his associates he will judge (55^{4}). On all men and angels, good as well as bad, he will pronounce sentence (61^{8}), and in his presence falsehood will be impossible (49^{4} 6^{23}). While the writer thus boldly represents the Messiah as the supernatural Son of Man, clothed with the attributes of Deity and separating the righteous from the wicked, it is noteworthy that, like other pre-Christian Jewish authors, he knows nothing of a Second Advent. The Messiah is spoken of simply as the deliverer of the righteous, the light of the Gentiles (48^{4}), and the judge of the world, and his whole activity is connected with a single appearance. This may help to explain the fact that to the later Judaism, and even to the first Christian disciples, a suffering Messiah seemed a contradiction in terms. Rather, it was thought, must the Messiah on his coming 'abide for ever' (Jn 12$^{32ff.}$), in keeping with the view already presented in Enoch of his single and continual presence upon earth.

* While Charles admits that this is a correct statement of the case 'if v.^{11} is correctly handed down and to be taken literally,' he argues that the view that the Final Judgment precedes the Messianic kingdom is precluded by the writer's conception of this kingdom as 'a gradual and progressive transformation. Cf. the same writer's note on 23^{30}.

That the Messianic expectation grew stronger as the end of the Jewish State drew near is evidenced by the Psalms of Solomon, a collection of 18 psalms breathing the spirit of OT poetry, and dating from the early years of the Roman supremacy in Palestine (B.C. 70–40). Of these poems, which are of Pharisaic authorship, only two (17 and 18) give expression to such hopes. The writer strikingly combines the thought of God Himself being the King of Israel (17^{1}) with that of an endless Davidic monarchy (17^{5}). After recalling the beginnings of royalty in Israel, and bewailing the havoc wrought by the stranger (?=Pompey), he pleads with God for their restoration under 'a son of David' (17^{23}). He then goes on to describe the person of the future Messianic king, on which he lays greater stress than his predecessors (Daniel, Sirach, etc.). This ruler will gather again the holy people, over whom he will reign in righteousness (17^{28}). The heathen (17$^{25.\,27.\,31}$) and the 'proud sinners,' i.e. the Hasmonæans (vv.$^{26f.\,41}$), will be driven from the inheritance usurped by them. The subject nations will come to a purified Jerusalem to bring her wearied children as gifts, and to see the glory of the Lord (17$^{32ff.}$). Himself without sin (17^{41}), there is no unrighteousness in his days, for all are saints, and their king is the Lord's Anointed (17^{36}). Ordinary methods of warfare he will not resort to (17^{37}), but will smite the earth with the word of his mouth (17^{39}). The period of his dominion is limited: 'he shall not faint all his days.' Such is the beauty of the king of Israel, and happy are they who are born in his days (17^{47} 18^{7}). This bright expectation of a Messiah in face of the triumph of the Roman arms shows that the downfall of the national dynasty was marked by a distinct revival of Messianic hopes. The writer contrasts the evils of the present with the glorious future awaiting Israel when they shall have returned to God. The Messianic idea is treated, however, more with reference to its bearing on the earthly prospects of the Israelitish people than is the case in Enoch, and it is very doubtful whether the supernatural at all enters into the poet's conception of his hero. While there is no secularization of the Messianic idea, the future king is represented as David's successor upon the earthly throne (11. 18$^{6-10}$).

At the commencement of the Christian era the Messianic idea in its spiritual significance had faded largely from the popular mind. It was in truth the secularization of this idea that led to the crucifixion of Jesus. A Messiah of another sort was wanted. This feeling found its strongest manifestation in the fanaticism of the Zealots, who, on the principle that God had already (under the Maccabees) delivered Israel from the yoke of a great heathen empire, continually fomented rebellion against the power of Rome. At the opposite pole from this was the exclusively spiritual conception of Messianic prophecy which had become the specialty of apocalyptic authors. Both of these elements originally entered into the Messianic idea, but gradually they came to be sharply distinguished.

In the Assumption of Moses, written according to Charles A.D. 7–30, but doubtless embodying views current before its composition, the Jewish lawgiver recounts to Joshua the future history of the nation down to Messianic times. The work is apocalyptic, and gives expression to the Messianic idea on its purely religious side. There is no mention of any victory over the heathen. The writer abandons the hope of an earthly Messiah,* and some would even detect hostility to this hope in the statement that 'the Eternal God alone . . . will appear to punish the Gentiles' (10^{7}). In the beautiful passage forming ch. 10 there is nothing beyond an ardent expectation that J″ will manifest Himself for the punishment of their enemies and the salvation of the chosen people. The theocratic kingdom, which will be preceded by a day of repentance (1^{18}), will extend to 'the whole creation' (10^{1}). The dominion of the devil shall have an end, and Israel's enemies shall be punished by the hands of the angel (Michael), 10$^{2.\,8}$. God will also exalt Israel to heaven (10^{9}), whence they shall joyfully behold their enemies in Ge(henna).†

The trend of Jewish Messianic expectation just before and after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans is exhibited in the Apocalypses of Baruch and 2 (4) Esdras. These two writings have so many affinities that some have regarded them as from the same hand; but, according to the most recent scholarship as represented by Kabisch and Charles, they are composite works derived from several authors. Baruch reflects the Judaism of the latter half of the 1st cent. A.D. The Messianic portions, which present an optimistic view of the earthly prospects of Israel, seem to have been written prior to A.D. 70. They are three in number—(1) 27-30^1. The coming tribulation, which will fall into twelve periods, will extend to the whole earth, and the enemies of Israel will be destroyed. After that the Messiah will appear, and the surviving 'remnant' will feed not only on the flesh of animals and the fruits of the earth, but on manna from the skies. It will be a time of plenty, of marvels, and of joy. At the end of his reign the Messiah 'will return in glory' to heaven. (2) 36-40. Four successive world-empires antagonistic to Zion will rise and perish. When the last and most terrible of these (Rome) is ripe for destruction, then will be revealed 'the principate of my Messiah, which is like the fountains and the vine, and when it is revealed it will root out the multitude of his host.' The last surviving leader (?=Pompey) will be put to death by 'my Messiah,' whose reign will endure for ever, until the world of corruption is at an end. Here the Messiah plays a more active part than in the former section, the protection of Israel and the overthrow of their enemies being represented as his sole work. (3) 53-74. In this section, which magnifies the Law while expressing the popular Messianic expectation, the writer divides the history of the world into twelve periods of evil (black waters) and good (bright waters) alternately, followed by a period of woes (the last and blackest waters). To these succeeds the Messiah's kingdom (the bright lightning). He will judge the nations, sparing those who have not trodden down the seed of Jacob, but slaying the enemies of Israel. He will then continue to sit on the throne of his kingdom, and all tribulation will vanish before the universal joy.

* Hilgenfeld's identification of 'Taxo' (9^{1}) with the Messiah is purely arbitrary. Cf. vol. iii. p. 449^{b}.

† According to the conjecture of Charles, who for ἐν γῇ (=in terram) reads in Gehenna, and thus certainly gets a better sense.

The representation of 2 (4) Esdras (written, according to Schürer, in the reign of Domitian, A.D. 81-96), while of the same spiritual type, is marked by some striking peculiarities of its own. Among the Jews hitherto the thought of a glorified Messiah had been universally prevalent, but pseudo-Ezra speaks of him as dying after an activity of 400 years, and says nothing of his resurrection. After the death of Christ, the world, he says, shall relapse into primeval silence for seven days, 'so that no man shall remain.' Then the new world shall be ushered in, the earth shall restore its dead, and the Most High shall be revealed upon the seat of judgment ($7^{28\mathrm{ff.}}$). In contrast to the view presented in the Assumption of Moses, this writer not only sharply distinguishes the Messiah from J" Himself, but also gives a figurative delineation of his person. He is described as a lion rising up out of the wood and rebuking the eagle (i.e. imperial Rome) for her unrighteousness. While he has been kept by the Most High unto the end in order to condemn the Romans, the rest of the Jewish people shall live happily under his sway until the Day of Judgment ($12^{31\mathrm{ff.}}$). Again he is pictured as a man coming up from the midst of the sea, and flying with the clouds of heaven (13^3). Planting himself upon a great mountain (the emblem of Zion), he encounters a mighty host who have gathered themselves against him from the four winds of heaven, and destroys them by the flaming breath of his lips. Coming down from the mountain, he then calls to him another and 'peaceable' multitude (the ten tribes). These figures, it is explained, are used of 'this my son' (13^{37}); and, although it is not easy to deduce from them a very concrete doctrine of the Messiah's person, one or two points are sufficiently clear. The writer dissociates himself from the view current in the Judaism of his time: according to him, the Messiah is in no sense an earthly king. At the same time it is plain, from the representation he gives of him as dying, that he does not conceive him as possessing essential Deity. Neither is he depicted as an ordinary man: he comes up out of the sea, 'as it were the likeness of a man,' and flies with the clouds of heaven. As fire melts wax, so his voice burns those that hear it ($13^{3\mathrm{f.}}$). It would therefore seem that in this apocalypse the Messiah is conceived as a created being of a quite peculiar kind, who appears as a man among men for the destruction of Jehovah's enemies and the restoration of His people, although not as an earthly potentate. The Most High has reserved him for long (13^{26}), until the moment appointed for his coming. 'No man upon earth can see my son, or those that be with him, but in the time of his day' (13^{52}). Then he shall be revealed (7^{28}), and his appearance will herald that revolution which shall destroy the power of Rome and bring together the scattered tribes of Israel.

It is clear from the Shemoneh 'Esreh—the chief prayer which it was the duty of every Israelite to repeat thrice daily, and which, although it attained its final form only after A.D. 70, must be considered much more ancient as to its groundwork—that the hopes expressed in these apocalypses were cherished by the nation as a whole. Prayer is offered for the gathering of the dispersed, the rebuilding of Jerusalem, the revival of the Davidic kingdom, and the restoration of the sacrificial service.

6. The Messianic expectation in Hellenistic Judaism.—If in Palestine the hope associated with the advent of the ideal Davidic king had not altogether waned in presence of the political and religious liberty enjoyed under the Hasmonæan dynasty, the people were at least content to wait for the rise of a new prophet (1 Mac 14^{41}). But in Egypt, where they were still under Gentile dominion, the Jews seem to have cherished more warmly the hope of a Messianic deliverance. Thus about B.C. 140 the oldest Jewish portions of the Sibylline Oracles predict the approach from the East of a God-sent king, who will take vengeance on his adversaries, and make war to cease throughout the earth. Heathen opposition to the temple will collapse under the stroke of the Immortal, whose children will live in peace and quietness under the protection of His hand. At sight of this the Gentiles shall accept God's law, and bring gifts to the temple. So shall be inaugurated the reign of peace. God will set up an eternal kingdom over all mankind, with Jerusalem as its central seat, and under the just sway and judicial control of the prophets ($3^{652\text{-}794}$). Although the Messiah is not named, and although the main stress of the prophecy is laid on the triumph of the Law, the introduction of the figure of the Messianic king into the writer's delineation of the future is nevertheless very significant in view of the abstract spiritualism affected by Alexandrian Judaism generally, and already traceable in the LXX. No less remarkable is it that even a speculative moralist like Philo, in his delineation of the happiness in store for the righteous, should avail himself of the image of the Messianic king. According to this writer, all adherents of the Law will be liberated 'at a given sign on one day.' Led by a Divine appearance, visible only to the delivered, they will rebuild the ruined cities, and the desert will be fertilized (de Exsecr. 8-9). On their deliverance the dispersed Israelites will stream together to a certain place: the indefiniteness here is probably due to a spiritualizing in Philo's mind of the Zion of the prophets. The coming era will be signalized by the tameness of wild beasts (de Præmiis et Pœnis, 15 ff.); by the saints' bloodless victory in battle ['Then, says the prophecy (Nu 24^{7}, LXX), a man who goes to battle and makes war shall go forth and subdue great and populous nations, God Himself sending help to His saints' (ib. 16)]; by the blessing of physical health and strength (17–18); and by that of wealth and prosperity (20). Athough there is here no express mention of a personal Messiah, the latter is nevertheless clearly indicated in the warrior who subdues great nations. The use of such language, alien as it is to Philo's general point of view, is a proof of the prevalence of the Messianic idea in his time. It is more after his manner to lay stress upon the liberating power of virtue, and this he contrives to do, without, however, altogether excluding the activity of the Logos as a fundamental factor in the future salvation.

The Hellenistic sympathies of Josephus are apparent in his treatment of the Messianic idea. He studiously ignores it. Only in two passages of his writings does it find the faintest expression. In recording Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream he declines to explain the meaning of the stone which was cut out of the mountain and destroyed the image (Dn 2^{45}), on the ground that as a historian he is not concerned with the future (Ant. X. x. 4). Again, in remarking upon the fulfilment of several of Balaam's predictions, he takes no account of the Messianic prophecy in Nu $24^{12ff.}$, but merely adds: 'One may easily guess that the rest will have their completion in due time' (Ant. IV. vi. 5). No further evidence is required to show that in his presentation of Jewish history the Messianic prophecies of the OT are deliberately ignored. When he says of Jesus, 'This is the Christ' (Ant. XVIII. iii. 3), all he means to convey is that He was popularly regarded as the Jewish Messiah. Certainly, the words do not contain the confession of his own faith. That he had personally abandoned (if indeed he ever understood) the Messianic hope is clear from his declaration to his fellow-countrymen at the siege of Jerusalem that Rome was invincible, and that God had now given the dominion to Italy (BJ V. ix. 3), as well as from his impudent transference of it to the rule of Vespasian (BJ VI. v. 4).

After the Exile the doctrine of the Messianic expectation appears to have assumed two very different forms—one in Palestine, and the other in Egypt. The increased clearness of the prophetic doctrine had been accompanied in Palestine by an increased departure from the true understanding of the scriptural position. In the prevailing popular conception the religious character of the Messiah was overlooked. Men either thought of him as a temporal prince, or lost sight of the personal element altogether in their anticipation of a temporal kingdom. 'The theocratic views of the people made it impossible for them to separate the thought of the Messiah from that of a victorious earthly king, and caused them to cling to the political idea till it was finally extinguished in the ashes of the Holy City.'[*] In Egypt the doctrine had a different history. If the notion of a Messianic ruler did not cease to be popularly contemplated, no place at all was given to a visible Messiah in the Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy. Where Philo does introduce the figure of the Messianic king, this is done purely as a concession to the popular sentiment, and not because it falls in with his ethical view. The conception of the Alexandrian philosophers was wholly ideal, and exclusive of personal Messianic activity. The Law and wisdom were all the Messiah they wished. No other view would square with their philosophical system, which did not favour the concrete and visible side of things. This was the opposite extreme of the development in Palestine, and it is not improbable that what yet remained of true Messianic hope in the latter country was due to the tenacity with which their brethren in Egypt clung to the mystical conception of the Messianic deliverance.

7. Peculiarities of the later Messianic hope.—From the situation as broadly reflected in Palestine and in Egypt it is clear that the hope of a bright future, which formed an integral part of the religious consciousness of Israel, assumed various aspects in different minds and at different periods of the national development. Particularly noteworthy are some well-marked points of contrast between the older and the later Messianic hope. These have been well stated by Schürer (HJP II. ii. p. 129 ff.), whom we here follow. (1) Upon the whole, the former contemplated nothing more than the advent of better times, when a purified nation under a wise and just Davidic king should occupy a place of power and influence, and enjoy all the blessings of peace and prosperity. (2) While the former was almost entirely national, the latter growingly assumed an individual character. Every pious Jew would share in the glory of the future kingdom, and for this end the righteous dead would be raised to life again. (3) The former did not go beyond the circle of earthly circumstances, whereas the latter conceives the future salvation as transcending the sphere of the present. (4) In later times, and in the hands of the scribes, the Messianic hope assumed a more scholastic form than in the earlier prophetic days. 'The poetic image was stiffened into dogma' in a way not possible so long as the Messianic expectation was a living reality. While this characterization is broadly true, it is to be remembered that 'even in later times the old hope of a glorious future for the nation maintained the supremacy. This forms, even in the later view of the future, the determining ground-plan of the picture. And just as upon this foundation the characteristic peculiarities of the later view have stronger or weaker influence, and produce this or that alteration, is the old image now more now less, now in one way now in another, specially modified and supplemented' (HJP II. ii. p. 135).

8. Question as to the retrogression of the Messianic idea during the post-Prophetic period.—Was there a break in the development of this doctrine? Did the distinctively Messianic hope disappear with the cessation of prophecy, to be revived only with the advent of Christianity? It would be wrong to suppose that it ever became absolutely extinct. In order to this the Prophetic books of the OT must have perished, and the synagogues must have been closed. Neither of these things had happened. Even in the darkest days there yet remained some earnest souls who clung to the old faith and tried to revive it. It is, however, undeniable that the expectation of a personal Messiah went greatly down after the Prophets were silent. The hope of a bright future for Israel never wavered, yet there was a very strong disposition no longer to associate it with the raising of an ideal Davidic king to the throne. For many, the Prophetic picture of such a king had lost its first attractiveness. They had waited for him long enough, and he had not appeared. Thus among the great mass of the Jewish people there was no living faith in a personal Messiah at the time when the Apocrypha were composed. What was the reason of this retrogression? So far as we can judge, it was due to two considerations—(1) The hope of the Jews was a distant hope. It was in books—that was all. They took for granted that there would be no great realization of it in their time, and looked upon the living realities of Divine grace as confined to the past and the future. Such want of heart manifested in regard to this great central doctrine was necessarily a crushing blow to the national development. (2) Their hope was a political hope. The transient glory of the Maccabæan period gave a measure of religious life, but any further deliverance that was longed for was rather along the same lines. 'The speedy triumph of the Maccabees satisfied for a time the aspirations of the people; and a longer period of suffering and disappointment was needed to develop the hope of a Messiah into a passion among the masses of the nation, and into a doctrine in the schools of the learned' (Drummond, Jewish Messiah, p. 269). The hopes centred on the Hasmonæan princes were gradually seen to be delusive, and in the struggle for supremacy between a secularized hierarchy and the Pharisees or party of the Law the people took the side of the latter. Turning from all human kingship, they looked for deliverance to the king whom J″ Himself would raise up from David's line. That in the time of Christ this hope was generally prevalent is manifest from the Gospels. It had been abundantly proved that the kingdom of God could not perfect itself under the restrictions of an earthly State. But that stone which the builders rejected was soon to become the head of the corner in the prophetic building; and in the person and work of Jesus as Messiah the true spiritual idea of the Divine kingdom was to arise and prevail.

vi. ESCHATOLOGY.—In the OT, eschatological doctrine appears in a very undeveloped form, and, though it cannot be said to occupy a large place in the Apocrypha either, there is yet enough in these post-canonical books to show that in the period after the Exile there was a much clearer apprehension of a future life than there had been in the earlier stages of the nation's history. It is, however, in the Apocalyptic literature of the two centuries preceding the Christian era that the most marked development in eschatology is met with. In these works the inherent importance of the subject, connected as it was with the Messianic hope, combined with the Jewish fondness for elaborate and fantastic presentation of truth to give it a foremost place.

1. The OT position.—By many scholars (Stade, Schwally, Charles) the eschatological ideas of the early Hebrews are traced to the ancestor worship of Semitic heathenism. However this may be, it is certain that in the Mosaic legislation the outlook is confined to the present sphere of existence: virtue is rewarded, and vice punished, during this life. Both in pre-Mosaic and in Mosaic times, however, the view that death does not end the conscious life of all had taken possession of the popular mind. It comes out in connexion with the translations of Enoch (Gn $5^{22\text{ff.}}$) and Elijah (2 K 2^{11}), although immortality is here conceived as a possibility only for soul and body together, previous to death, and not after it. The thought of Jehovah's power restoring the dead through human instrumentality (1 K 17^{22}, 2 K 4^{35}), which is of later occurrence, also implies the thought of a future life. According to the Heb. conception, death does not mean absolute extinction. Although the dead person does not in any real sense live, he still subsists. He descends into Sheol, a dreary region of darkness (Job 10^{21}), a land of silence and forgetfulness (Ps 94^{17} 115^{17}), the house appointed for all living (Job 30^{23}). In this shadowy existence, the dreamy counterpart of his past life, he has no fellowship with the living, whether men or God (Ps 6^{5}, Is 38^{18}). He has nothing to fear, and nothing to hope for. Into this conception of Sheol no moral element enters; there is no distinction made between good and bad. Personal identity, however, is not lost, and the kingdom of the dead reflects the family and other distinctions of the upper world. Thus men are gathered into tribes (Gn $25^{8\text{f.}}$ etc.), and kings sit upon thrones (Is $14^{9\text{f.}}$).

Although they did not actually formulate either the doctrine of immortality or that of the resurrection, the Prophets by their ethical tendency prepared the way for a more spiritual development. Their insistence upon the fact that Israel's relation to J″ is morally conditioned, was fitted to awaken the consciousness of a new life through fellowship with God. The conception of a life of blessedness beyond the grave was the necessary corollary of the law of individual retribution as proclaimed by Jeremiah ($31^{29\text{f.}}$) and developed by Ezekiel (18^{4}). That this law as thus stated caused much perplexity to the afflicted righteous is evident from Job and Ecclesiastes as well as from several of the Psalms. And, although the doctrine of a blessed future life in which the wrongs of the present will be righted is nowhere definitely taught in these books, they contain passages in which it certainly seems to be implied (Job $14^{13\text{ff.}}$ $19^{28\text{f.}}$, Ps 49. 73). If in Job the immortality of the individual is no more than a deep aspiration, in Ps 49 and 73 it becomes a settled spiritual conviction. Early in the 3rd cent., and even perhaps late in the 4th, it was merged in the larger doctrine of the resurrection, which embraced not only the idea of an individual immortality, but also that of the Messianic kingdom. Thus for a time the former idea completely fell into the background, since to the Jew the future blessedness of his nation was more than the well-being of the individual.

This eschatology of the nation is reflected in the Prophetical books of the OT, especially in the conception of the day of J″, when judgment will be meted out to Israel's enemies, and unmingled happiness to the chosen people, the judgment on the former being the inaugural prelude to the national blessedness of the latter. We have here the oldest expression of a conception which subsequently assumed various forms. In the 7th cent., when the Jews chafed under the cruelty of their Assyrian oppressors, Nahum and Habakkuk reasserted it with only slight modification. According to Amos, however (and also Hosea, who, while not using the expression 'day of Jehovah,' predicts the judgment which it denotes, $13^{12\text{ff.}}$), it is upon Israel itself that the judgment will most severely fall (3^{27}), for in His 'day' J″ will manifest Himself, not in order to the triumph of Israel, but for the vindication of His own righteousness. In Isaiah and Micah the judgment is represented as falling chiefly upon Judah and Jerusalem (Is $1^{24\text{ff.}}$ 29^{6}, Mic 3^{12}), while in Zephaniah it is set forth for the first time as embracing the whole world (1^{18}), and leaving only a righteous remnant in Israel ($3^{12\text{f.}}$). In Jeremiah the day of J″ is mainly, although not exclusively, directed against Judah ($37^{6\text{ff.}}$); but at the same time there is held out the hope that the national life will be regenerated and restored ($23^{7\text{f.}}$ $24^{5\text{f.}}$), and that the Gentiles shall be converted, and only the impenitent destroyed ($12^{16\text{f.}}$).

The epoch of the Exile witnessed a revival of individualism in religion. According to Ezekiel and his followers, judgment means the destruction of the Gentiles and the purification of Israel man by man in order to the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, which will be introduced by the day of J″. In the post-exilic age the idea of judgment recedes before that of a universal Messianic kingdom. Through Israel as the Servant of J″ all nations shall embrace the true religion ($42^{3f.}$ 49^{6} 52^{13}–53^{12}), and yield themselves to Him of their own accord (Is $2^{2ff.}$ = Mic $4^{1ff.}$). In Is $19^{16\text{-}25}$ Egypt and Assyria are placed alongside of Israel as sharing in her spiritual blessedness, while in Mal 1^{11} we have the language of unqualified universalism, and the acceptance by J″ as a pure offering even of the unconscious sacrifices of the heathen. In contrast to this standpoint, however, the particularism of Ezekiel continued to have its advocates, and the Messianic kingdom was viewed as the close preserve of a reunited Israel (Hos 3^{5}, Mic 5^{3}, Is $9^{1ff.}$), the Gentiles being either excluded or represented as in subjection to Israel. In Hag. ($2^{20ff.}$) and Zec. ($1^{18ff.}$) the day of J″ is depicted as involving the destruction of the heathen powers, and the establishment of the Messianic kingdom as consequent on the rebuilding of the temple. Joel's point of view is already apocalyptic; the nations generally will be destroyed, and Israel justified; there is no moral sifting of Israel as in older prophets. In the apocalypse of Daniel it is taught that when evil has reached its height the end of the world will ensue.

It needed a combination of both the individual and the national aspects of the thought of a blessed future for the righteous to form the fuller doctrine of the resurrection as apparently conceived by the end of the 4th or beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. If we accept Cheyne's view as to the date (c. 334 B.C.) of the remarkable passage Is 26^{19}, and Charles' interpretation of its meaning, it was then held that immortality would indeed be secured to the righteous individual, but would consist in his resurrection to share in the blessedness of the Messianic kingdom.

2. Post-canonical development.—But, although the doctrines of immortality and the resurrection were thus steadily establishing themselves in Jewish thought, it was only very gradually that they won their way to general recognition among the people. In several of the OT Apocrypha there is no mention of them. Sirach limits to this life both the punishment of wickedness and the reward of righteousness. Even after the doctrine of the resurrection was being regularly taught in the schools of the Pharisees, many of the Jews evidently had no clear ideas upon the subject (Mk 9^{10}). At the same time, in the post-canonical literature there is undeniably a further development of the eschatological conceptions of the later prophets. The new views regarding the future destiny of man assumed two distinct forms—one in Palestine, the other in Egypt. To the Pal. Jew the future life was made real only through a bodily resurrection; to the Alexandrian, it was the necessary consequence of the immortality of the soul.

The 2nd cent. B.C. witnessed a great advance in eschatology. Instead of the old indefiniteness of the day of J″, we have the formulation of distinct ideas. The Book of Enoch especially describes the last things and the other world in minute detail.

(1) Future judgment.—A prominent feature in the eschatological development of the period is the strongly expressed certainty with regard to future retribution, in contrast to the admitted uncertainty that men will in this life be rewarded according to their works. In the view of the apocalyptic writers of this century the establishment on earth of the Messianic kingdom will be preceded by judgment and just recompense for all men living, and for some or all of the Israelitish dead, as well as for the fallen angels. To a certain extent punishment has already been administered through the first world-judgment on the angels who formed unions with the daughters of men, on their children, and on all men living at the time of the Deluge (Enoch $10^{1\text{-}12}$). These angels are bound fast in gloomy caverns under the hills ($10^{4f.\ 12}$), while the souls of men are relegated to Sheol (22), until the final judgment that shall usher in the reign of the Messiah. Then will judgment be pronounced upon the impure angels, the demons who have hitherto escaped punishment (16^{1}), and, with the exception of one special class of sinners (22^{13}), upon all Israel. The fact of an individual judgment after death is thus already taught in the oldest section of the Book of Enoch. It is also found in Jubilees (4^{23} $5^{9ff.}$ etc.) in special connexion with the idea of 'heavenly tables,' on which 'judgment is written down for every creature and for every kind.' We have it embodied likewise in the Apocalypse of Baruch ($4^{4ff.}$), according to which those who have rejected God's law will first behold the righteous invested with the splendour of angels, and 'afterwards depart to be tormented.' There is here no limitation of the idea to faithless Israelites. In the contemporary Book of Daniel (B.C. 168), which presents a contrast to the Book of Enoch in respect that it has in view the future of the nation rather than that of the individual, judgment is executed by the saints (7^{22}) as a prelude to the final judgment at the hands of the Almighty ($9^{12ff.}$). Although nothing is said as to the judgment of angels, that of the angel princes of Persia ($10^{13.\ 20}$) and Greece (10^{20}) is implied. In Enoch 83–90 (written B.C. 166–161), the last judgment is likewise placed at the inauguration of the Messianic kingdom. Special reference is made to the judgment wrought by the 'great sword' of Judas Maccabæus (90^{19}), whose victorious campaigns against the Syrians were being carried on when this part of Enoch was written. In this section of the book the thought of a general individual judgment is set forth in great judicial detail. A throne is erected for the Lord of the sheep; the sealed books are opened; the seven archangels are commanded to bring before Him the evil angels (the fallen Watchers), who are cast into an abyss of fire; the seventy faithless 'shepherds' of Israel and the 'blinded sheep' (i.e. apostate Jews) share the same fate. After this the Messianic kingdom is set up on earth; a new Jerusalem takes the place of the old, and the righteous who have suffered oppression are brought into it ($90^{20ff.}$).

During the last century B.C. there occurred a radical change in Jewish eschatology. What lay at the root of this was the conviction that an eternal Messianic kingdom cannot be suitably manifested on the present earth. Such a view had obviously an important bearing upon the whole field of eschatological thought. It led the writers of this century to take new ground with respect to the kingdom, and the place of the Final Judgment relatively to it. Some cut the knot by denying the eternity of the earthly Messianic kingdom (Enoch 91–104); others by postulating the idea of a new heaven and a new earth (Enoch 37–70). The latter section of the Book of Enoch is the only work of this century which still places the Final Judgment at the inauguration of the Messianic kingdom. All others dating from this period (Enoch 91–104, Ps.-Sol., etc.), appear to relegate it to its close. As to the scope of the Judgment, the view of the former period remains unaltered; it extends to all men and angels, righteous and wicked. Enoch 91–104 follows Daniel in speaking of a preliminary judgment wrought through the instrumentality of the saints. In Ps-Sol 17. 18 the Messiah himself is judge, although the act of judgment here is probably confined to the destruction of the hostile powers.

The Pal. Judaism of the 1st cent. A.D. continued virtually to reflect the eschatological position arrived at in the preceding century. In the Assumption of Moses, as well as in the Apocalypse of Baruch and 2 (4) Esdras (certain sections excepted), there is conserved the idea of a preliminary judgment. The Final Judgment on men and angels is placed at the close of the Messianic kingdom, or, failing the expectation of such a kingdom, at the close of the age (Apoc. of Baruch), or on the completion of the number of the righteous (2 (4) Esdras).

So far as the doctrine of a Future Judgment is concerned, it would therefore appear from the above that the Apocryphal period witnessed very decided developments. Although the OT idea of judgment through the overthrow of existing hostile powers was to some extent retained (Enoch $90^{18f.}$, Assumption of Moses 3, Apoc. of Baruch 72^{6}, 2 Es 13^{14}), this gradually gave way to that of a forensic act. The Judgment was placed for the most part at the end of the Messiah's reign instead of at its commencement. It tended to assume a growingly personal and individual character. The scope of the Judgment was also extended so as to include all, men and angels alike. Obviously, we have here a distinct approximation to the doctrine of the Judgment as given by Christ Himself. 'He employs many of the terms which were current, while He relieves the popular beliefs of all that was gross, fantastic, or trivial. He brings to the OT conception the extension and the certainty which it needed. The spiritual principles of His teaching, and the things which it adds to the Heb. faith on the subject, make the old doctrine a new one.' * That He is Himself the Judge, that every man will be judged by Him 'according to his works,' and that His judgment is final,—these are the transforming elements by which all the deficiencies of the pre-Christian conception are removed, and the doctrine of a Future Judgment is raised to a clear and definite position in the doctrinal structure of revealed religion.

(2) Realms of the departed.—(a) Sheol.—In Dn 12^{2}, according to the most probable reading, this is designated 'the ground (land) of dust,' and seems to be used in its OT sense as denoting a region devoid of moral distinctions. It is represented as the final abode of all mankind save the best and the worst in Israel, of whom the former shall rise to 'æonian life,' and the latter be cast into Gehenna. For these two classes Sheol is only a temporary and intermediate abode. The writer appears to have in his mind the faithful and the apostates in the struggle with Antiochus Epiphanes.

From the detailed description in Enoch 22 it is manifest that during the 2nd cent. B.C. the conception of Sheol underwent a radical change. From being a place free from moral distinctions it has become a place of retribution, where men are dealt with according to their deserts. Here all souls assemble (22^{3}), and await the Judgment in their respective habitations. Of these there are four—two for the spirits of the righteous, (1) for those who have died an unmerited death, (2) for the rest of the righteous; and two for the spirits of the wicked, (1) for those who have already been punished in this life for their wickedness, (2) for those who escaped punishment in the upper world. From three of these divisions there is a resurrection to final judgment; but from the fourth, the abode of sinners to whom death came as the punishment of their crimes, there is no resurrection. In their case Sheol is equivalent to hell. Ethically, this represents a great advance upon the old Heb. conception, although it is of too cast-iron a description to be truly ethical. The soul can neither become better nor worse, and 'Sheol thus conceived is only a place of petrified moralities and suspended graces' (Charles, Eschatology, 187).

Soon, however, this fault was to be remedied, for in 2 Mac $12^{42ff.}$ moral transformation in Sheol is considered possible. Judas is said to have offered sacrifice for the fallen warriors, 'for if he were not expecting that they that had fallen would rise again, it were superfluous and idle to pray for the dead.' During the last century B.C. Sheol is regarded (1) as the intermediate abode of the dead, whence all Israelites (2 Mac 6^{23}), and possibly all without distinction (Enoch 51^{1}), rise to judgment; (2) as the final abode of the wicked, i.e. as hell (Enoch 56^{8}, Ps-Sol 14^{6} etc.), where souls are slain (Enoch 99^{11}). In Enoch 91–104 Sheol is almost synonymous with Gehenna, and in Ps.-Sol. entirely so. The Similitudes conceive Sheol as the preliminary abode of those dying previous to the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. Subsequent to this, however, it becomes the final abode of the wicked (63^{10}). This view of Sheol was almost a necessary consequence of the belief that only the righteous would be raised from the dead.

In the 1st cent. A.D. Sheol is represented as the intermediate abode of all the dead prior to the last judgment (Apoc. Bar 23^{5} 48^{16}, 2 (4) Es 4^{41}). According to Josephus, the Pharisees taught that the righteous are rewarded and the wicked punished under the earth (ὑπὸ χθονός, Ant. XVIII. i. 3), or in Hades (καθ' ᾅδου, BJ II. viii. 14), i.e. in Sheol. The righteous rise again, and possess other bodies; but for the wicked there is no resurrection. Between the righteous and the wicked in Sheol there was, according to the prevailing conception of the period, a great gulf fixed. The former inhabited 'the treasuries' (Apoc. Bar 21^{3} etc., 2 (4) Es 7^{95}) of restful bliss; the latter dwelt in a place of torment (Apoc. Bar 30^{5}).

It appears, then, that during the Apocryphal period the conception of Sheol was by no means a fixed quantity. Rather was it in a somewhat fluid condition, and underwent considerable variation. It had, however, 'come to be regarded as a definite stadium between death and judgment, with preliminary penalties, and, in some forms of thought, with moral processes. The idea of an intermediate state took a larger and larger place in Judaism, and in this matter Christian theology to a great extent served itself heir to Jewish theology. But all this is in the strongest possible contrast to Christ's own teaching. His words fix our thoughts on the present life and the final issues. . . . They give little or no place to the thought of an intermediate state.' *

(b) Paradise.—According to Schrader,† the word 'paradise' is of Perso-Indogermanic origin (pairidaēza, from pairi, 'around,' and daēza, 'a rampart'), and signifies an enclosure or 'park.' From this it came to denote a pleasure-garden generally, as in Neh 2^{8}, Ec 2^{5}, and was ultimately adopted as the distinctive designation of the seat of the blessed, whether conceived as earthly or heavenly. According to the conception that prevailed in the 2nd cent. B.C., Paradise was reserved for those who had been directly translated in the flesh. In other words, its gates had been opened only for Enoch and Elijah. From the way in which it conceives Sheol as 'the place of condemnation' (7^{22} 22^{22}), the Book of Jubilees, however, seems to imply that Paradise is the intermediate abode of the righteous dead until the Final Judgment. But this work also shares the point of view of the later 2 (4) Esdras, according to which

† COT ii. p. 71.

Paradise is conceived as the final abode of the righteous (7$^{36.\ 123}$ 8^{52}). Already in the 1st cent. B.C. it is viewed as 'the garden of the righteous' (Enoch 60^{23}), and the dwelling-place of 'the elect' (Enoch 60^{8} 61^{12}). In the Similitudes, however, it is not the eternal abode of the holy, who pass from it to the Messianic kingdom.

It would appear, therefore, that no very definite position had been reached either with regard to the geographical situation of Paradise or with regard to its inhabitants. This is clear from the varying representations of the Book of Enoch under both of these heads. 'In 32$^{2f.}$ it lies in the East: in 70$^{2ff.}$ between the West and North: in 77^{3} in the North. . . . It is apparently empty in Enoch's time in 32$^{3ff.}$, and the righteous dead are in the West, 22: it is the abode of the righteous and the elect in Enoch's and Noah's times in 61^{12} 60$^{8.\ 23}$: the abode of the earliest fathers in Enoch's time, 89^{52}.' *

In spite of the uncertainty thus attaching to the term 'Paradise' in Jewish thought, the later Rabbis constructed an elaborate topography of it, with 'Abraham's bosom' as the place of highest honour. The general popular conception in the time of Christ is perhaps fairly well reflected in that of the Essenes, who, according to Jos. (BJ II. viii. 11), regarded Paradise as a region situated beyond the ocean, where there was no uncongenial rain or cold or heat, and where righteous souls were perpetually refreshed by gentle zephyrs blowing from the sea. The word is very sparingly used in NT. In the recorded sayings of our Lord it occurs but once (Lk 23^{43}), and not in such a way as to throw much light upon His own conception of the term. He employs it in a very general sense, and possibly as the word which would convey most meaning and comfort to the listener.

(c) Heaven.—It is not until the last century B.C. that we find heaven represented in Apocalyptic writings as the abode of the righteous subsequent to 'the day of the great judgment.' This view is first met with in Enoch 91–104, where the righteous are described as the objects of angelic intercession (104^{1}). To them will the portals of heaven be opened (104^{2}); their joy will be like that of the angels of heaven (104^{4}); and they will yet become companions of the heavenly host (104^{6}). According to the later Apoc. of Baruch, they will be made like unto the angels (51^{10}), while in the Similitudes of Enoch it is claimed that they will themselves become angels in heaven. The Book of Jubilees (23^{31}) and the Assumption of Moses (10^{9}) also regard heaven as the eternal home of the righteous.

(d) Gehenna.—From denoting the scene of idolatrous sacrifices 'Gehenna' (from the Hebrew גֵּי הִנֹּם = 'valley of Hinnom,' Gr. Γέεννα) came to signify the place where apostate Jews are punished in the sight of the righteous (cf. Is 50^{11}). In Dn 12^{2} it becomes the final abode of all such apostates. But in the last century B.C. this idea took on quite a new complexion. Gehenna is now no longer exclusively reserved for apostate Jews, and is the place of punishment for the nations generally (Jth 16^{17}). More particularly is it intended for kings and the mighty (Enoch 48$^{8f.}$ 53^{5} 54^{2}). Again, whereas according to the older view the torments of the wicked were to afford a constant spectacle to the righteous (Enoch 27$^{2f.}$ 90$^{26f.}$), in the Similitudes this spectacle, although still to be witnessed (62^{12}), is only of temporary duration. This fresh development is necessitated by the writer's view with respect to the transformation of heaven and earth at the advent of the Messiah. In the new heavens and the new earth there was no place for Gehenna, which accordingly disappears from the sight of the righteous from henceforth (62^{13}). Still another modification of the older view of Gehenna occurs in Enoch 91–104, where the wicked are cast into the furnace of fire as incorporeal spirits (98^{3}). Hitherto the punishment of Gehenna had been thought of as both bodily and spiritual, but here the former element is eliminated. In this book no distinction is made between Sheol and Gehenna (99^{11} etc.). 2 (4) Esdras contains the following statements: 'The Most High shall be revealed upon the seat of judgment' (7^{33}), and 'the pit of torment shall appear, and over against it shall be the place of rest: and the furnace of hell (Gehenna) shall be showed, and over against it the paradise of delight' (7^{36}). The nations that are raised from the dead will then be called upon to behold the contrast between the delight and rest on one side, and fire and torments on the other (7$^{37f.}$). It was only in the later Rabbinism that the word was used to denote a temporary purgatory as well as the abode of the wicked after death. As employed by Christ in the Synoptic Gospels, 'Gehenna' retains its older meaning as 'the final retributive scene or condition, not any intermediate place, whether of penalty or of purification, between death and the resurrection.' * On the momentous and difficult question as to the eternity of the penal condition in Gehenna, the student is referred to the discussion in bk. iii. ch. vi. of the work just quoted.

(3) The Resurrection.—The first occurrence in the OT of the idea of a resurrection is in Hos 6^{2}, where the hope expressed is clearly not individual but national. It appears again in a national sense in Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones (37$^{1\text{-}14}$). Chronologically, the next reference to this idea is found in the post-exilic prophecy of Is 24–27. Here there is a distinct advance upon former conceptions. Although the thought of a resurrection is still, as in Hosea and Ezekiel, limited to Israel (26^{14}), its application to individuals (26^{19}), even if the prophets' words do breathe a pious hope rather than contain a clear-cut doctrine, is new. One other OT passage is of importance in this connexion, viz. Dn 12^{2} 'And many of them that sleep in the dusty ground (lit. the ground of dust ?=Sheol) shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to reproaches and everlasting abhorrence.' There is here taught for the first time a resurrection of the wicked, as also the doctrine of a diversity of lot reserved for the righteous and the wicked in the future. In both cases the writer thinks of Israelites only, and does not even include all of these. Only those are in his view who have distinguished themselves either by their promotion of, or antagonism to, the Divine kingdom.

In the subsequent development of the doctrine the extent of the resurrection was variously conceived. In Dn 12$^{2f.}$ the writer thinks of a partial resurrection of both righteous and wicked; Enoch 1–36 speaks of a resurrection of all the righteous and some of the wicked; the Similitudes represent at one time that all will be raised up, good and bad alike (51$^{1f.}$), and at another contemplate the resurrection of the righteous only (61^{5}); while Enoch 91–104, and the later Jewish literature generally, limit the idea of the resurrection to the righteous (Enoch 91^{10} 92^{3}, 2 Mac 9$^{14.\ 36}$, Ps-Sol 3^{16} 13^{9} etc.). It is in all these cases the resurrection of Israel that is spoken of; there is as yet no thought of a general resurrection.

Different views were held also as to the nature of the resurrection itself. From 2 Maccabees (which as a professed epitome of the work of Jason of Cyrene must be taken to reflect the eschatological views of the century preceding that in which it appeared) it is evident that in the 2nd cent. B.C. the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was very distinctly held. In the account of the cruel death of the seven brothers and their mother, the resurrection is represented at once as a resurrection to eternal life ($7^{9.36}$) in fellowship with the risen righteous (7^{29}), and as a resurrection of the body (7^{11}). By thus uniting the doctrine of a resurrection with that of immortality, 2 Mac. takes up a more advanced position than any other Apocryphal work.

* Charles' ed., note on 60^{8}.

* Salmond, op. cit. p. 360.

During the last century B.C. the mode of conceiving the resurrection underwent a change in keeping with the altered view as to the scene of the Messianic kingdom. So long as the latter was regarded as an eternal kingdom on this earth, the idea of a bodily resurrection seemed quite in place. But, after it became usual to think of that kingdom as having its only fitting manifestation in a new heaven and a new earth, the resurrection was conceived either as purely spiritual (Enoch 91–104, Ps.-Sol.), or as one in which the risen righteous shall be invested with garments of glory and of life (Enoch $62^{15f.}$). The Similitudes, however, reflect the older view of a bodily resurrection.

Although at the beginning of the Christian era the limitation of the resurrection to the righteous was the accepted view of Judaism, there were still different ideas held with reference to the resurrection itself. According to Jos. (BJ II. viii. 14), the Pharisees taught that 'the souls of good men only are removed into other bodies,' i.e. bodies of another nature than the present, while the Essenes believed in the soul's immortality, but not in a bodily resurrection. In the Jewish-Alexandrian writings the resurrection is regarded as wholly spiritual, and as taking place immediately after death.'[*] Matter being essentially evil, there can be no resurrection of the body. As the true self, the soul only is immortal, and can be redeemed only through Wisdom (Wis 8^{13}). The knowledge of God's dominion is the root of immortality (15^{3}). The author starts from the position that 'righteousness is immortal' (1^{15}) as God is immortal. Then follows the statement that 'God created man for incorruption' (2^{23}); in consequence of his Divine origin he bears the stamp of immortality. Death would have been unknown but for the envy of the devil (2^{24}). Eternal life in fellowship with God is therefore the portion of the righteous. To them death is but an apparent calamity ($3^{3f.}$). The ungodly, on the other hand, are doomed to death (2^{24}), and are punished for their crimes both here and hereafter ($3^{17f.}$). In this book only the larger thought of immortality is emphasized; it leaves it to be implied that there must be a previous (spiritual) resurrection to life. The righteous dead, moreover, are not merely as in OT said to dwell in Sheol, but in immediate nearness to God (6^{19}).

The same view is set forth still more explicitly in the writings of Philo. According to this author, the body is only the temporary and polluted prison-house of the rational soul, which, as an emanation of Deity, is immaterial and imperishable. This is essentially the Platonic doctrine; although Philo, for whom Genesis is only an allegorical history of the soul's development, found it already taught in the statements that God made man in His own image ($1^{26f.}$) and breathed into him His spirit (2^{7}). Philo's view as to the essentially evil nature of matter precludes the possibility of a bodily resurrection. He quotes approvingly the word-play of Heraclitus, who calls the body (σῶμα) the tomb (σῆμα) of the soul (Leg. Alleg. i. 33).

The doctrine of an incorporeal immortality is also taught in 4 Maccabees in connexion with the famous story of the martyrdom of the seven brothers and their mother. It describes the brothers as 'running in the way of immortality' (14^{5}); the mother as 'again giving birth to the entire number of her sons for immortality' (16^{13}); and both them and her as 'assembled together to the company of their fathers, having received again from God pure and immortal souls' (18^{23}).

Another point, in regard to which no agreement had been arrived at when Christ came, was the time of the resurrection. According to Enoch 51^{1}, it was to take place immediately before the Messianic era; according to the Apoc. of Baruch and 2 (4) Esdras, it was to synchronize with its close.

The only Jewish works of the 1st cent. A.D. which teach the doctrine of a general resurrection of the entire human race are the Apoc. of Baruch (30^{2-5}) and 2 (4) Esdras (7^{32-37}). Even on this view, something was done to conserve the idea that the resurrection is a privilege pertaining to the righteous. In connexion with the appearance of the Messiah, reference is made to 'those that be with him' (2 Es 13^{52}) in such terms as to suggest a retinue of saints whose special prerogative it is to 'rise first' (cf. 1 Th 4^{16}) and accompany Him when He assumes His earthly dominion. The nature of the resurrection body appears to have been the subject of frequent discussion. In Apoc. Bar 49^{2}–51 it is taught that the bodies of the dead will be raised in precisely the same form as that in which they were committed to the ground, so that they may be recognized. After their identity has been established, they will undergo a transformation in order to endless spiritual existence in glory or in torment. This supplies a link with St. Paul's teaching on the resurrection in 1 Co $15^{35ff.}$.

That the belief in a personal resurrection was not, however, universal during the Apocryphal period is shown by the fact that certain books belonging to it retain the old view of Sheol (Sir $17^{27f.}$ 41^{4}, Bar 2^{17}). Indeed, from the evidence adduced it will be seen that during this period 'the belief had a varied and interesting history. It underwent certain enlargements, and became more established. But it developed at the same time some doubtful elements, and remained subject to some uncertainty.'[*] If immortality cannot be said to have been a dogma of the later Judaism, certainly the idea, along with that of the resurrection which stands or falls with it, was one generally current among the Jews. Yet we know that it met with a vigorous opposition from the Sadducees, who made use of the Greek materialism to combat a doctrine that occupied so rudimentary a place in the OT. This party, however, could not succeed in Israel; and the hopes which had long animated those known by that name gradually tended to fix themselves in a clear and definite doctrine, which found its completion in the teaching of Him who declared God to be the God not of the dead but of the living, and Himself to be the resurrection and the life. In these words Christ indicates that man's relationship to God is such as to secure not only his continued existence, but his existence in his whole being, bodily and spiritual. His language, even as reported in the Fourth Gospel, points, moreover, not to a bare immortality in the Hellenic sense, but to a bodily resurrection (Jn $5^{25f.}$). It is further set forth in His teaching that the resurrection will be universal. The expression 'the resurrection of the just' (Lk 14^{14}), so far from limiting the scope of the resurrection, actually suggests the very different lot of the wicked when they shall be raised up. There is a 'resurrection unto life' and a 'resurrection unto condemnation.' Beyond what may be gathered from the comparison between the condition of the risen and that of 'the angels in heaven' (Mt 22^{30}, Mk 12^{25}, Lk 20^{36}), Christ's doctrine furnishes no information with reference to the nature of the resurrection body.

3. Question as to the influence of Zoroastrianism upon Jewish eschatology.—The development in eschatology during the Apocryphal period was undoubtedly of the most pronounced character. How are we to explain it? How is it that with the Messianic hope sunk so low there should have been not only an advance in eschatology, but an arrival at such fixed forms as we meet with in the Jewish literature of the age? A living faith in a personal Messiah was not always essential to Messianic expectation and the belief in a Future Judgment; and what we find in Amos and other OT prophets we may be prepared to see repeated. But the position of the apocryphal and pseudepigraphic books is here so much clearer and fuller than anything in the OT that we are constrained to ask, How was it reached? It can hardly have been the result of metaphysical speculation. Was it, then, simply a legitimate development upon doctrines potentially existing in the OT? Those who take this view point to the fact that the restoration of the chosen nation is set forth under the figure of a rising again to authority and influence (Ezk 37). The later Jews, it is said, put their own construction upon such passages, and thence formulated to some extent a doctrine as to the way in which the righteous would come to the enjoyment of the Messianic kingdom. When it should be inaugurated, they would be raised up and have part in it.

Many scholars, however, explain the eschatological development of the period on the theory of the contact of Judaism with foreign systems of thought, and in particular maintain that the doctrine of the resurrection was arrived at through the medium of Zoroastrianism, or at all events assumed the form it did under the stimulus of Persian influence. It can no longer be reasonably doubted that the resurrection formed part of the creed of the ancient Persians; and at any rate we have the express testimony of Theopompus (preserved in Plutarch, etc.) that this doctrine was held by the Zoroastrians at the time of Alexander the Great, i.e. previous to its appearance in Daniel, and at least as early as Is 26^{19}. This theory is therefore historically possible. But can it be substantiated? Apart from the general presumption that the Jews would be disposed to regard favourably the religion of Cyrus, their deliverer, stress is laid upon the fact that the doctrine of an individual resurrection appears in the OT only in writings dating from, or subsequent to, the Pers. period, and is (?) first put forward in a book, the writer of which had special connexion with Babylonia. These considerations, however, do not prove that the Jewish doctrine of the resurrection was derived from the religion of Zoroaster. As Nicolas has said, 'Ideas do not pass ready-made and complete from one nation to another like the fruits of industry which are transported in caravans.' And, in fact, the Jewish and Persian beliefs with regard to the resurrection of the body are not identical. Zoroastrianism knew nothing of a partial resurrection, whether of the righteous and wicked as in Daniel, or of the righteous only as in 2 Mac. etc., and, unlike Judaism, looked for the final restoration of the wicked after the resurrection. The idea of simple borrowing is further precluded by the gradual formation of the Jewish doctrine, the development of which, in its principal stages, is distinctly traceable. This doctrine was of no sudden growth in Israel. It had long been nascent, when the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes gave it life and vigour as the grand sustaining hope of those who did battle for God's law. This was a great turning-point in Judaism, and gave to it, as regards religious beliefs, modes of thought, and ethical practice, a character which has been stamped on all its subsequent history. Scribes and people were united by a common patriotism. The religious conscience was awakened; men looked eagerly for the promised Deliverer, and in the assurance of His coming found a new life. Those who shed their blood to prepare the advent of His kingdom would be raised up to share in its bliss. The resurrection of the dead was thus the necessary complement of the Messianic hope, and in its earlier form was set forth as the first act of the victorious Messiah, and as the privilege of Jews only. This is the genuinely Jewish form of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, and had a distinct place in an order of ideas called forth by the crisis which overtook the Jewish nation in the second quarter of the 2nd cent. B.C. It did not owe its existence to foreign influence, but was the result of internal development.

But there may be stimulus without transference, and this appears to be what really happened in the case before us. The foreign influence was not such as to supply or even fundamentally to affect the doctrine itself; at most it helped to determine the form of its development. Naturally, therefore, it does not seem to count for much in any single passage in which it can be traced; yet the cumulative effect of its presence in frequent instances is not to be denied. For an interesting enumeration of passages from the OT and post-canonical literature giving evidence of Parsi influence on Jewish eschatology, see par. 7 of the article ZOROASTRIANISM in vol. iv. Among other (and more doubtful) examples the following perhaps may be safely allowed. Is 24$^{21f.}$ speaks of an intermediate place of punishment for evil powers, where they are imprisoned prior to their final judgment. Even Charles, who thinks that the influence of Zoroastrianism on Jewish eschatology was but slight, admits that the ideas here expressed 'appear as a foreign element in the OT, and may be derived from the Mazdean religion.'* Cf. in this connexion Jude^{6}, Enoch 18$^{14.16}$ 21^{6}. The new heaven and new earth of Is 65^{17} 66^{22}, to be ushered in after the Last Judgment and overthrow of evil, corresponds to the Pers. doctrine of 'renewal' after the world's purification by 'the ordeal of molten metal.' The latter may also have suggested the figure used in Mal 3^{2} 4^{1}. In Ps 17^{15} 49^{14} there is probably a reflexion of the Pers. conception of the dawn as a daily emblem of the resurrection. In the later Apocalyptic literature also traces of Parsism occur. In Enoch (45$^{4f.}$) reference is made to the transformed heaven and earth; and its location of the mountain of God's throne in the south (18^{6}), taken along with the placing of a hell in the north (Secrets of Enoch, 10), recalls another characteristic of Parsi literature. Through the medium of earlier Jewish apocalyptic, many Persian ideas found their way also into the Apocalypse, e.g. the binding of the old serpent, Satan's futile attack upon heaven, the millennium, etc. In the peculiar and epoch-making circumstances of their nation the Jews assimilated certain foreign elements, and grafted them upon the data supplied by their own sacred books—so modifying them, however, as to make them fit into and complete their own doctrinal system, with a view to the fuller expression of their own spiritual needs.

A. IN JEWISH APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.—Jewish theology in the period between the OT and Christ made some progress towards a Trinitarian view of God. It was marked (1) by a monistic and transcendent conception of God, which put Him far away from man, and avoided all anthropomorphisms about Him (cf. Weber, Altsynag. Theologie, 144 f.). On the other hand, the Law was largely put in place of the immanent J″, and God made a student of the Law; that is, a Judaizing of J″ took place, which ended in the dualism of a transcendent God and a Rabbi schoolmaster God. (2) This remoteness of God led men to seek after mediators between the far-off One, whose very name was a mystery (Enoch $69^{14f.}$; Weber, 144), and the earth. Angels and other beings were made prominent; but especially the Messiah was felt after. In Palestine the mediating 'Word' of the prophets, the מֵימְרָא, was taught (cf. Weber, p. 174); while in Alexandria Philo elaborated his doctrine of the Divine λόγος, whom he identified with 'the Angel' and all Divine manifestations in OT (cf. Siegfried, Philo, p. 219 f.; Drummond, Philo, ii. 239 f.). This 'Word' was regarded sometimes as Divine thought or revelation or action. Again, it was presented as a Divine hypostasis, personal if not a person (4 Ezr 6^{43}, Apoc. Bar 56^{4}, Wis 8^{1}). Biesenthal goes so far as to hold (Trostschreiben d. Ap. Paul an d. Hebr. 69) that 'the Generatio æterna filii vel Messiæ was in no wise a later doctrine of Christianity, but belonged to the very oldest teachings of the synagogue.'

The transcendent view of God arose in the schools of the scribes in opposition to surrounding polytheism; and, while it called for a Mediator, it also tended to make him transcendent as was God. This may be the reason for the practical disappearance of the thought of king Messiah in the period just before Christ, and the appearance, through study of the OT, of a heavenly Mediator (cf. Baldensperger, Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 1892, p. 69). This Mediator, the 'Word,' was Divine, in heaven (Dn $7^{9.13}$, Enoch 46. 48. 6^{2}), pre-existent, a supernatural 'Son' of God (En 105^{2}), who would come in due season to reign on earth (En 45^{4}, Ps-Sol $17^{23f.}$). He sits upon the same throne with J″, shares His knowledge (En 46) and glory (En 62, 4 Ezr 2^{43}), and will be final judge (En 47^{3}). All that is involved in the 'Word' Enoch ascribes to 'the Messiah' (52^{4}); though Philo does not identify the λόγος with the Messiah. As soon as Jewish theologians systematically studied the OT, they found a God-like Being set forth somewhat after the manner of NT writers and early Christians. He was the 'Wisdom' of Pr 8 (cf. Midrash in loco), 'the Angel' (Targ. Ex 23^{16}); He spoke to Moses at the bush; He was the Heavenly Man of Dn 7^{13} (cf. 4 Ezr 13^{3}), and the Eternal One of Mic 5^{1}. All other middle beings are set aside by this supreme Mediator, who is the 'firstborn' of God (Targ. Ps 2^{7}; Baldensperger, p. 88), and 'Christ the Lord' (Ps-Sol $17^{28.35.36}$; cf. La 4^{20}, Lk 2^{11}). The writings which describe His coming are called 'apocalypses,' for He would unveil the very face of God (4 Ezr 6^{72} 7^{28}, Assump. Mos 10^{7}). With him 'Deus palam veniet' (l.c.). Here Judaism reaches a half-metaphysical, an Arian conception of the Son of God, beyond which it could not go. Only the incarnation in Jesus Christ could lead men further.

(3) With the Messiah would come also the Holy Spirit, which had left prophetic men since Malachi (Weber, p. 78). But how it was related to God and His Christ was not evident. It is identified with Divine wisdom (Wis 7^{9} 9^{17}), with the Angel (Ps-Sol 10), and with the Memra (Wis $7^{22f.}$). The Spirit is felt to be distinct from J″; the Targums (on Mic 2^{7}, Zec 4^{6} etc.; cf. Schlottmann, p. 82) often distinguish the Spirit from God, and that with the same formula מִלִּפְנֵי י׳=מִן קֳדָם (e.g. Gn 1^{2}, Jg 3^{10}, 1 S 10^{6} 16^{13}) where no such distinction is in the Heb. text. Philo gave to the λόγος the designations ὁ δεύτερος θεός and ὁ πρεσβύτατος υἱός, also 'an image of God' (de Somn. ii. 6); and the Spirit he calls an 'impress' of this λόγος image of God. This Spirit of the λόγος of God is the principle of all life. Both 'Word' and Spirit inhere in God: the Spirit is personal (Weber, p. 185), Divine, God's voice in man, the Eternal Wisdom. Again, we hear it called a creature, and made on the first day. Further than this Judaism could not go. We have here, perhaps for the first time, the absolute designation 'the Holy Spirit' (Ps-Sol 17^{14}, 4 Ezr 14^{23}, Wis 9^{17}); and He comes with 'Christ the Lord' (Ps-Sol 18^{8}), who appears 'in wisdom of the Spirit and righteousness and power' (cf. Lk 24^{49}, Ac 1^{5}).

(4) This Jewish teaching was comprehensive but confused. It had elements of the Trinity in it, but did not know what to do with them. It believed in God transcendent and 'God with us,' but could not correlate them. Its Christology found three things in OT—(1) the Son of God, heavenly, Divine, eternal, and the Son of Man, also in heaven (Dn 7^{13}, Enoch 62^{9}); (2) the human Messiah, who would be a glorious king of all the earth; and (3) the suffering Servant of J″. How to combine these was beyond the power of Judaism (cf. Enoch 5. 10. 25. 90. 98). The heavenly and the earthly elements would not meet. Two Messiahs were sometimes taught; and most Jews looked for a Messianic kingdom such as actually appeared in Mohammedanism. The Holy Spirit was also beyond Rabbinical grasp. Perhaps the 'still in the land,' from whom NT Christians chiefly came, 'full of the Holy Ghost,' knew more than did the theologians. Philo speaks of 'the Divine Spirit' (de Gig. 5); others preached a created spirit, a ministering spirit, like the angels (Weber, 184). The Spirit was needful for holy living; but it was now withdrawn and hidden, to come again with the Messiah. The Bath Ḳôl took the place of the Spirit, the scribe took the place of the prophet. The fulness of OT teachings lies here, but confused, waiting for the NT doctrine of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

B. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—i. Advent and Incarnation.—(1) With the close of the OT the spirit of Prophecy left Israel. Judaism, in spite of particular workings of the Spirit, did not have the Holy Ghost (Jn 7^{39}). It was said to have left the nation with Malachi, and was little looked for by Rabbis and scribes (cf. Gunkel, Wirkungen d. heil. Geistes, 55). But as the Advent of Christ drew nigh, His great forerunner, the Spirit of God, suddenly reappeared, and a group of saints in Israel, filled with the Holy Ghost, prepared His way. The last OT prophet foretold the first NT prophet; and both, led by the Spirit, proclaimed Messiah the Lord (Mal 4^5 $3^{1f.}$, Mk 1^7). Jesus and the Evangelists regard gospel history as beginning especially with John the Baptist (Lk 16^{16}) and his inspired testimony to the Son of God. He announced the coming of Jesus as the coming of J″ (Is 40^3, Mk 1^3, Lk 1^{76}). He showed the return of the prophetic Spirit as the Spirit of Christ (Mk 1^8, Lk 1^{67}), which alone knew the deep things of the Law and the Prophets, and led to Christ as the fulfilment of both. Now for the first time we hear a prophet clearly preaching salvation as repentance towards God the Father (Mt 3^2), faith in a coming King, the Son of God (Mk 1^1, Jn 1^{29}), who takes away the sin of the world, and a baptism of the Holy Ghost, given by the Son of God (Mt 3^{11}, Mk 1^8, Lk 3^{16}, Jn 1^{33}).

(2) The work of Jesus was inseparable from His Person. What He did rested on what He was, for His preaching included Himself. None born of woman was greater than John the Baptist; but he was less than the least in Christ's kingdom, and beyond measure less than the King Himself (Mt 3^{11}, Mk 1^7, Jn 1^{34}). John was filled with the Holy Spirit from the womb (Lk 1^{15}), through the Holy Spirit Christ became man. To the one He imparted character, to the other He gave being. The Gospel to the Hebrews (ed. Hilgenfeld, 17^1) calls the Holy Ghost the spiritual Mother of Jesus, as Mary was His bodily mother. Angels now appear again as messengers of God, and their chief mission (Lk $1^{15.\,35}$) is to proclaim the entrance of the Spirit into humanity, and to set forth the mystery of the Incarnation by the Holy Ghost. To the inquiry of Mary how she could become mother of the Son of the Highest (Lk 1^{34}), Gabriel replied that it would take place through the co-operation of the Holy Ghost and the power of the Most High (v.^{35}) upon her. The Most High means here God the Father (Lk $6^{35.\,36}$): both Father and Spirit caused the Incarnation (cf. Is 48^{16}). The Father, by His power, appeared as an overshadowing cloud above the Virgin, as later over Jesus when He called Him 'my beloved Son' (Mt 17^5). The Spirit is said to 'come upon' (ἐπελεύσεται) Mary, as the power of the Father 'shadowed upon' her (ἐπισκιάσει); so that the conception is more specifically described as of the Holy Ghost (Mt $1^{18.\,20}$): yet Jesus is called the Son of the Father. It is evident that the Holy Spirit is here more than a Divine influence; otherwise, the addition 'the power of the Highest' would be meaningless. It seems also clear that, while the Spirit acts as a Person, the parentage is ascribed to the Father. The God with whom Mary found favour appears in personal distinctions of Father and Spirit in the conception of Jesus, as was perhaps foreshadowed in the creation of Adam (Gn 2^7). The result of this supernatural conception was twofold: first, Jesus was holy, corresponding with His relation to the Spirit; and, second, He was the Son of God (Lk $1^{3.\,5}$), corresponding with His relation to the Father. He was as sinless as the Holy Ghost. His sinlessness and His supernatural birth are put together. The RV of Lk 1^{35} shows that the one was rooted in the other; because of this Divine origin 'wherefore, also, that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.' It was to bring out the truth that 'it was not the Sonship but His holiness from His very birth, which was secured by the miraculous conception,' that the Revisers were so careful to correct the translation here (Dr. D. Brown in Presb. and Ref. Rev. 1896, p. 232; cf. Hofmann, NT Theol. 25). His sinlessness was not incidental, but was of His very being. The non potuit peccare lay in His nature; otherwise, through childhood and youth He could not have developed without some falls into sin. He was one with the Holy Ghost. He is also so one with the Father that His name is 'God with us' (Mt 1^{23}); and His kingdom, like that of J″, is everlasting (Lk 1^{33}). The angel of the Lord calls Him Christ the Lord (Lk 2^{11}); for the identification of the Messiah with Jehovah, long foretold, was now a historic reality.

(3) The birth of Jesus was of God and of the Spirit of God; in like manner He was baptized for service in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The Baptist says that Jehovah sent him to watch for the coming of the Son of God; and the sign of His coming, as all Israel knew (Is 11^2), would be the descent and abiding upon Him of the Holy Ghost. His great mission, in contrast to that of John, would be to baptize men with the Holy Ghost. In the Gospel to the Hebrews ($3^{14\text{-}17}$) the Holy Spirit says, 'Fili mi, in omnibus prophetis expectabam te, ut venires et requiescerem in te. Tu es enim requies mea, tu es filius meus primogenitus, qui regnas in sempiternum.' The most Jewish Christians had definite views of the Divine Christ and the personal Spirit. We are not sure (Jn $1^{15\text{-}18}$) where the testimony of John passes over into that of the Evangelist; in any case, the witness is remarkable. He knows that the Son came from heaven (Jn 3^{31}), was preexistent, and because of His heavenly origin was above all human forerunners ($1^{27.\,30}$). What Christ taught He learned by seeing and hearing it from God (3^{32}). He bore the sins of the world (Jn $1^{29.\,36}$), because He was the Lamb of God and a heavenly offering (v.^{30}). He was the final Judge of the sinners of the world (Mt 3^{12}), because He was Jehovah and His way was the way of J″ (Jn 1^{23}). Such was the Son of God whom John recognized at baptism, through the statement of the Father that the Spirit would rest as a dove upon the Son. John adds, 'I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God' (Jn 1^{34}). The Synoptists add that the Father spake from heaven when the Spirit descended, saying, 'Thou art my beloved Son' (Mt 3^{17}, Mk 1^{11} 3^{22}). The objective dove symbol was an indication that the Spirit was distinct from the Father who spake, and from the Son who heard the Father's voice and beheld the dove descend (Mk 1^{10}).

(4) The double witness of Father and Spirit to the Son was regarded as His commission to enter upon His ministry of redemption. And, what is of special importance, Jesus now received authority to baptize men with the Holy Ghost. The Baptist and all four Evangelists regard this as the great truth set forth in Christ's baptism (Mt 3^{11}, Mk 1^8, Lk 3^{16}, Jn $1^{23.\,26}$); and the risen Lord confirms their view (Jn 3^5, Ac 1^5). His work was as far above John's as the Spirit of God is above water. The OT taught that the Holy Spirit would come with the Messiah (cf. Jl 2^{28}, Is $11^{2\text{-}4}$); the Baptist takes a long step beyond this in proclaiming that the Holy Spirit comes directly from the Messiah as Son of God. The truth here developed is that the Holy Ghost stands in the same relation to the Son that He does to the Father (cf. Is 44[3]). He is the Spirit of God; He is also the Spirit of Christ. At the birth of Jesus the Son appeared as conceived by the Spirit; now the Spirit appears as proceeding from the Son. In the one case Jesus received of the Spirit; in the other the Spirit received of Christ. The Spirit in relation to Jesus Christ cannot be cause in the same sense in which He is effect. We touch here the mystery of the God-man, in which apparently contradictory statements respecting Him find their simplest solution by reference to His human and Divine natures (cf. Novatian, de Trin. xi.; Augustine, de Trin. i. 8). As man the Messiah needed the Spirit as means of perfect human development; as God He imparted the Spirit to believers for regeneration and full redemption.

(5) The Temptation of Jesus was closely connected with His baptism as introduction to service. The conflict with Satan had to do with the true relation of the Son to the Father; and it was the Spirit that drove Him to this conflict (Mk 1[12]). 'If thou be the Son of God' was the repeated taunt. The second Adam stood where the first Adam fell. The threefold temptation was the same—lust of the flesh, lust of the eye, and pride of life; bread good for food, to know as much as God, to have the kingdoms of the world, so pleasant to the eyes, at once in Messianic possession. It was a battle of the evil spirit and the Holy Spirit with ministering angels (Mt 4[11]). It was a struggle of the Son of God and the god of this world, in which the aim of the tempter was to tear Christ out of His oneness with the Father. The same truth appears in the Transfiguration (Mt 17[2-8]). In face of Satan (16[23]), doubting disciples, and the cross (17[9]), the Son stood to reveal what is called the Trinity. The bright cloud of the presence of Jehovah (1 K 8[10. 11]) is here: the Father addressed Jesus as 'my beloved Son,' telling the Church to 'hear him' as the great Prophet (Dt 18[15. 18]); and He was transfigured by the Holy Ghost (μετεμορφώθη; cf. ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ, Ph 2[6], 1 Ti 3[16]) in anticipation of His return to the glory of the Father. Christ was now ready for His public ministry. Born of the Spirit, baptized of the Spirit, victorious over the devil by the Spirit, He returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee (Lk 4[14]). His first public utterance in Nazareth was, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me'; and 'the eyes of all . . . were fastened upon him; for he said, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears' (Lk 4[18]). He knew that both Himself and His gospel came from God the Father and the Spirit of God.

(6) The NT doctrine of the Trinity, presented as it is chiefly from the point of view of the Son, contains the following elements:—

First, There is one God, Jehovah, the Father everlasting.

Second, Ever with Him was His Divine Spirit.

Third, With Him also, from before the foundation of the world, was His only-begotten Son, enjoying perfect knowledge of the Father, and sharing His glory.

Fourth, In the fulness of time the Son came into this world (a) by incarnation (Jn 1[1. 14]) through the co-operation of the Father and Spirit (Mt 1[18. 20], Lk 1[35]), and (b) by humiliation, ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν (Ph 2[7]).

Fifth, This coming was for the salvation of men; it was preceded by the love of the Father and followed by the work of the Spirit.

Sixth, In His incarnate mission to save men, the Son was endued with the Holy Ghost without measure.

Seventh, Following the work of humiliation, which ended in death and burial, came the resurrection and exaltation of the Son through the co-operation of the Spirit (1 P 3[18]) and His ascension to the Father where He was before.

Eighth, This ascension was a triumph over Satan and his kingdom, a reward for the Son, in which He received all Divine gifts for men, these gifts being summed up in the Holy Ghost, whose coming to earth was inseparable from the Son's glorification in heaven. The two foci of NT Christianity are: (a) God sending the Son from heaven to earth to redeem men, and (b) the risen and glorified Christ sending the Holy Spirit to make men partakers of that redemption.

Ninth, The Church is under the constant providence and mediatorship of the exalted Son and the immanent Spirit: this is sometimes presented as what Christ has done for us, and, again, as what He does in us, by the Spirit.

Tenth, When the end comes, the Son will return and judge mankind; He will then terminate all that is temporal in His kingdom; and Father, Son, and Holy Spirit will continue for ever in those Divine relations which took on the colour of time and space in the history of redemption. Of these inner relations of the Trinity neither Jesus nor the Apostles speak. The Scriptures reveal only the side of the Divine being which has to do with God's relation to the world and man; yet the doctrine of the Godhead in these respects is so set forth as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, that, if such representations rest upon reality, we seem constrained to believe that there are personal distinctions within the Divine Essence.

When we pass to Christ's entrance upon His ministry, we touch the whole sequence of thought here outlined as involved in the Trinity. In the Synoptic accounts Jesus presents the gospel as the kingdom of God the Father, to enter which men must not only accept the words of Christ, but have faith in Him as Saviour; in the Fourth Gospel Jesus offers salvation as eternal life. This life is in the Son, and is imparted by the Spirit.

ii. Teaching of Jesus.—(1) In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus appears (a) as proclaimer and bringer of God's kingdom. He came from the Father (Mt 20[28]; cf. Jn 16[1]), had all the Father had (11[27] 28[18]), and entered this world able to seek and to save the lost (Mt 15[24] 18[11], Lk 19[10]). In this implied pre-existence Jesus claimed more than ethical oneness with God. Ethical pre-existence is no true pre-existence. It was Jewish theologians whom He challenged to tell whose son the Messiah is (Mt 22[45]); and when they answered 'the son of David,' He replied that David, speaking by the Holy Ghost—whom Jesus presupposed as well known from the OT—called his son his Lord. Isaiah knew (11[1]) that the Messianic 'rod' and 'branch' sprang from the stem of Jesse, and pointed to a Lord and kingdom above that of David; so Jesus teaches that His sonship was not simply from David, but from a source which made Him David's Lord. He was David's Lord in heaven before He appeared as Jesus on earth (cf. Mt 10[40], Mk 9[37], Lk 9[48]). Such seems to be the argument. This heavenly origin made Him well-pleasing in the sight of God (Mt 3[17] 12[18] 17[5]), set Him above the angels in heaven, put Him next the Father (Mk 13[32]), and gave Him authority from the Father to forgive sins (Mk 2[10]). As Son of God He cast out devils and empowered others to cast them out (3[15]). Jehovah said, 'Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else' (Is 45[22]); Jesus does not hesitate to put Himself in place of J″ in the same invitation: 'Come unto me all ye that labour' (Mt 11[28]). Salvation depends upon Him (11[27]), and He is always present to save (Mt 18^{20}). Because He was ever with God (Mt 24^{3}; cf. Dn 7^{13}), He can judge men from the beginning of time to the end. As Son of Man He will welcome the saints to glory (Mt 25^{34}, Lk 23^{69}) and sentence the wicked to outer darkness. Jesus knows God as well as God knows Him (Mt 11^{27}). Only the omniscient Father can know the being of the Divine Son (16^{17}, Lk 10^{22}). The sole confession of faith which He approved was that of His own Divinity (Mt 16^{17}); and upon that He built His Church (v.^{18}, cf. Jn 17^{8}). He did not declare sins forgiven: He imparted forgiveness (Mk 2^{5}). The consciousness of Jesus speaks as of one who was with God before all time, through all time, and who continues in eternity with God. His words were thus understood by the Jews (Mk 2^{7}, Jn 5^{18}) and by the Apostles (Mt 10^{40}, Jn 4^{34} 5^{33} 6^{38-40}, 1 Co 15^{47}, 1 Th 1^{10} 4^{16}). The words imply such a relation as theologians call the Trinity.

(b) The fellowship of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit appears still more personal and essential in the actual work of man's redemption. The religious value of Father, Son, and Spirit appears to be the same. The Spirit is not prominent in the teachings of Jesus, first, because its work, internal, subjective, tender, must be felt rather than described; and, second, because the outpouring of the Holy Spirit was not to come till after His ascension. Yet the Spirit is there (Mt 10^{20}), for faith in God involves also faith in Christ and the Holy Spirit; since each has part in man's salvation. This truth appears whether considered from God downwards, from man upwards, or from Christ the centre outwards. This last is specially important in NT teachings, for Jesus ever looks back to the Father and forward to the Spirit. He is the only, the living bond between them. No man can come to the Father but by Him (Mt 11^{28}, Jn 6^{44}); no man can come to Him unless the Father draw him (Mt 11^{25}, Lk 10^{21}); neither can any man come to Father and Son unless born of the Holy Ghost (Mk 13^{11}, Mt 5^{45}, Lk 11^{13}). Salvation, Jesus teaches, depends upon right relations to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Unless men enter the kingdom of the Father through faith in God they will be lost (Mk 1^{15} 11^{22}). Unless they believe in the Son as Saviour they will be left under sin (Mt 11^{28} $24^{30.44}$ 25^{34}). And unless they accept the Holy Spirit they will incur eternal death (Mk 3^{29}). The kingdom of heaven comes from the Father (Mt 6^{10}), is brought by the Son (Mk 1^{15} 12^{34}), and put in the hearts of men by the Holy Spirit. When Jesus showed the Holy Ghost casting out devils He said, 'Then is the kingdom of God come unto you' (Mt 12^{28}). Both Father and Son hear the prayer prompted by the Spirit (Mt 6^{6}, Jn 14^{14}); and all the blessings of the kingdom of God flow from the Father in heaven through Christ, who bids us ask what we will; and the Holy Spirit, who brings all the gifts of the heavenly Father to His children on earth (Mt 7^{11}, Lk 11^{13}), will impart it unto us. Jesus taught that the full establishment of the kingdom would be the work of the Holy Ghost (Lk 24^{49}, Ac 1^{8}).

(c) The Trinity underlies the kingdom of God; it is also the revelation of God which overthrows the rival kingdom of the devil (Mt 12^{26}). God the Father is at the head of the one, the devil the father is at the head of the other (Mt 13^{38}, Jn 8^{44}). Jesus came to destroy the works of the devil (Gn 3^{15}, Mk 1^{24}, 1 Jn 3^{8}), and the Holy Spirit was the power of God in His hands to cast out Satan. The world of demons was much more prominent in NT thought than we sometimes suppose (cf. Weinel, Wirkungen des Geistes, pp. 1–26). Jesus summed up the Lord's Prayer in 'Thy kingdom come' and 'Deliver us from the evil one.' His commission to the Twelve consisted essentially in 'Preach the gospel' and 'Cast out the devil' (Mk $1^{22.23.39}$ 3^{11} $16^{15.17}$, Lk 4^{32-34} $9^{1.2}$); His own work might be similarly summed up. The destroyer and the Saviour were thought of together: Nullus diabolus, nullus Redemptor, seems to be the NT nexus of thought. It was a conscious conflict of personalities. The demons assailed Christ, or appealed to Him as the Son of God, doubtless understanding more by that title than did the Jews (Mk 3^{11}); and He replied that He carried on a war of destruction by means of the Holy Spirit (Lk 9^{43} 11^{20}, Mt 12^{28}), who was given by the Father (Lk $11^{13.14}$). The evil spirit was cast out by the Holy Spirit; and the Holy Spirit came from the Father through the Son (Mt 12^{28}). That Son and Spirit are both Divine and personal, Jesus shows in the terrible passage Mt 12^{22-32}; cf. Mk 3^{22-30}, Lk 12^{10}. Men saw the Son through the Spirit casting out devils, and were so blind as to call it the work of Beelzebub. Looking at the sun they called it midnight. Such confounding of spiritual values meant moral chaos. All other impulsive blasphemies against Father or Son would be forgiven; but to see the personal Holy Ghost at work and call Him the personal devil meant death to spiritual distinctions. It was blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (perhaps, as the derivation of the word, βλάπτειν τὴν φήμην, suggests, attack on personal character), and involved 'guilt of eternal sin' (Mk 3^{29}). It was also, so one are Son and Spirit, in some sense an unforgivable sin against the Son (cf. Lk 12^{10} 'a word against the Son'), 'because they said he hath an unclean spirit.' So pointed is the personal antagonism that Jesus seems also to teach: Nullus diabolus, nullus Spiritus Sanctus. The blasphemy which Jesus declared fatal was against the Holy Spirit; the blasphemy which the Apostles first feared was against the Son of God (Ac 13^{45}, Ja 2^{7}, 1 Ti 1^{13}). The two sins which have no forgiveness are lying to or about the Holy Ghost, and putting the Son of God to the shame of open denial (Mk 3^{29} 8^{38}, Lk 9^{26}; cf. Ac 5^{3}, He 6^{6}). The destiny of man's soul depends upon his attitude towards the Son of God and the Holy Spirit; we can hardly think of higher claims for the Divinity and Personality of both.

(2) The record of Christ's teaching in the Fourth Gospel presupposes the Synoptics, and in Apostolic perspective, under illumination of the promised Spirit, unfolds their final meaning. Were this Gospel not from John, it still would show how the most spiritual Christians in Apostolic days recalled the words of Jesus respecting the Son and Spirit, and how their experience witnessed to them. In the Apocalypse, Jesus appears, after the manner of the Synoptists, as Son of Man exalted as Son of God; in the Fourth Gospel, Christ is revealed as the Divine Son incarnate, not humbled, but with His eternal glory veiled by temporary abode among men, only to burst forth again in full splendour at His ascension. Jesus here presents Himself as central in salvation; He is the eternal life ($6^{33.35}$), of which men must partake or perish. From this central position Jesus ever looks up to the Father and forward to the Spirit. He speaks much more here of the Holy Spirit than He does in the Synoptics. He enlarges and unfolds here what He indicated there. He identifies Himself more closely with the Gospel. The kingdom appears here as eternal life, and that life is in Christ (1^{4} 3^{36} 5^{40} 6^{33}). He is not a guide to the way, or a preacher of truth: He is the way, the truth, and the life (14^{6}). When John's disciples wondered at His knowledge of men, He told them that He was Jacob's ladder, reaching all the way to God ($1^{50.51}$). To see Him was to see the Father (14^{9}). His solemn words, Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν . . . ἐγώ εἰμι (8^{58}), seem to reflect the 'I AM' of Ex 3^{14}. In His typical interview with Nicode-mus, the Jewish theologian, He presented salvation as flowing from Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Baur says Jn 3^{16} sums up all Christian truths, and from it the Trinity appears as 'the most definite expression of the peculiar relation between God and man which has been realized through the revelation of Christianity' (Lehre von d. Dreieinigkeit, i. 80 f.). Nicodemus addressed Jesus as 'teacher' (3^{2}); but Jesus replied that He was 'eternal life' (vv.$^{15.\,16}$), and pointed out as the three steps in man's redemption, (1) regeneration by the Holy Ghost (vv.$^{5.\,6}$); (2) faith in the Son of God, who came from heaven to save men by His death (vv.$^{13-15}$); and (3) the love of God the Father, who gave His only-begotten Son to redeem the world (v.$^{16\text{f.}}$). The elaborate teachings of Jn 14–17 are but an unfolding of what is here taught as the way of salvation. Moving from heaven to earth, as the thought of Jesus does in the Fourth Gospel, we find His theology consists of (1) God the Father in glory and the glorification of the Father in the redemptive work of the Son; (2) the salvation of men through the incarnation, death, and exaltation of the Son; and (3) the establishment of a kingdom (so in the Synoptics) of eternal life (so in Fourth Gospel) through the Church, in which by the special revelation of the Holy Spirit men will be born again and equipped with spiritual gifts for service, and all to the glory of the Father and the Son (Jn $5^{17.\,21.\,24.\,43}$). Even when speaking to a Samaritan woman and early in His ministry, Jesus related acceptable worship to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. He taught that God is His Father (4^{21-26}), and, through Him, Father of believers only (1^{12} 8^{44}); and that the Father is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth, that is, in the Spirit of truth (4^{24}, cf. 14^{17}). To the Jewish theologian as an inquirer, to the Samaritan woman as indifferent, and to the eager disciples ($14^{6.\,13.\,16\text{f.}}$) the Lord's theology is the same—to the Father, through the Son, by the Holy Spirit. In the farewell discourses (14–17) the Father, Son, and Spirit are so repeatedly spoken of as if persons, as acting together and apart, as going forth one from another, and returning one to another, that the question of difficulty is not: How can one God subsist as Father, Son, and Spirit, but rather: How can the Father, Son, and Spirit, here respectively set forth by Jesus, constitute one God?

In these discourses Jesus sheds some light upon the inner Trinitarian relations of the Godhead. He shows first that the work of redemption involves His triumphant return to the glory which He had with the Father before the world was (6^{62} $13^{31.\,32}$ 17^{5}). It was Divine, eternal glory to which the Son returned: such glory only a Divine Being could lay aside and take again. It remained ever with Him as Son of God, but was veiled in the incarnation (1^{14} 2^{11} 11^{40}). Jesus says the Son is so one with the Father that He has glory of His own, has eternal life in Himself (5^{26} 11^{25}); in fact, that all that the Father has the Son has (5^{21} 16^{15} $17^{2.\,5}$). Men may believe in Him as in the Father (14^{1}), seek life from Him as from the Father (6^{47}), pray to Him as to the Father (14^{4}), and are as safe in His hands as in the Father's hands ($10^{28.\,29}$). And for this equality with God He gives a remarkable reason: 'My Father is greater than I.' He describes His relation to the Father in the paradoxical words: 'I and my Father are one' (14^{28} 10^{30}), and again, 'My Father is greater than I' (14^{28} 10^{29}). Jesus never calls Himself God; but ever claims to be Son of God, and does this through a perfect human consciousness (14^{16} 17^{3} 20^{17}). He knows that both as Son of Man and Son of God He came from heaven (13^{6} 8^{38}); and He calls Himself the Son of Man who is in heaven (3^{13}). He claims to be 'the Son' in an absolute sense, as God is to Him 'the Father' in an absolute sense (6^{40} 3^{35} $5^{20.\,19.\,21.\,22.\,23.\,26}$ $8^{35.\,36}$ 14^{13}). It is from this relation of God incarnate that He says, 'My Father is greater than I.' For Moses or Paul or Luther to say, 'God is greater than I am,' would be absurd. Equally absurd would it be for Christ unless He were conscious of superhuman being, as the Jews saw at once (5^{23}). In the two places where He thus speaks (10^{29} 14^{28}) He addressed His disciples. He might thus speak from the point of view of His humiliation by the incarnation or in reference to the precedence ever given the Father before the Son and Spirit; but, plainly, His purpose here is to cheer believers. He does not say, 'I am less than the Father'; His mind dwells upon the absolute oneness with the Father, so that all the greatness and fulness of the Father are for His people. Hence He says to His disciples (10^{29}), 'My Father is greater than all' opponents, and (v.^{30}) 'I and my Father are one.' Again (14^{28}) He says, 'If ye loved me ye would rejoice, because I go unto the Father; for my Father is greater than I.' The greatness of the Father is not apart from the Son, but belongs to the Son, and through the Son becomes His people's. The Father was not greater than the Son by way of contrast or separation, but in the way of likeness and perfect oneness. No mere ethical union of Jesus with God fully explains this 'one.' Only one Divine Being seems able to include such relations and make the infinite fulness of the Father the possession of the Son. Only God could receive all of God. Of such Divine being Christ seems plainly conscious (3^{13} 6^{46} $8^{28.\,38}$ 10^{36}). When charged with making Himself God (10^{33}) He answered that He was Son of God, and gave, as proof, that He was sinless (cf. Lk 1^{33}, Jn 10^{36}), sanctified and sent of God—a thing no mere man could claim. The salvation of all the redeemed hangs upon Jesus Christ; only a oneness of being with God can bear such a load of weal and woe. It is into this transcendent and real relation of Father and Son that Jesus roots the gospel of redemption. It begins and ends in heaven. Because the Son came from God and went to God (13^{13}) He could wash the disciples' feet, and as Divine Providence be ever with His people. From this transcendence He speaks as Jehovah to His people (Ac $9^{5.\,10\text{f.}}$), and from it He sends forth the Holy Spirit. The Spirit is spoken of as in heaven with the Father and Son, and coming to earth at the intercession of the Son.

If there is anything cardinal in NT teachings ($14^{16-19.\,26}$ 15^{26} 16^{7} 17^{1} 20^{22}, Lk 24^{49}, Ac $1^{5.\,8}$ $2^{4.\,17.\,33}$, Ro 1^{4} $8^{1.\,9}$, Gal $3^{1.\,2}$), it is that the gift of the Holy Ghost comes through the glorification of the Son. This is the theme of Jn 14–17, especially of 16^{5-15}. Here Jesus sends another Paraclete to continue His personal work (14^{16}). Jesus never spoke of the Spirit as created; there is a power from on high (Lk 24^{49}), but its source is the personal Spirit (Ac 1^{8}). Nor does He ever speak of the gift or outpouring of the Spirit, as John himself does (1 Jn 4^{13}). Jesus speaks of the Holy Spirit as a Personal Being, coming from the Father, sent by the Son, to testify before men to Father and Son ($15^{26.\,27}$). Hence the disciples would not be 'orphans' when Jesus left them (14^{18}). When He said, 'I will come unto you' (14^{18}), He meant by the Spirit: the one is as personal as the other. The incarnate Son was more of manifestation of God then than the Father; so Jesus says that the Spirit can do greater things for men than the Son, because the Son returned to the glory of the Father and the Son (14^{16} 15^{26} $16^{7\text{f.}}$). Each takes precedence in His peculiar work. The Father can no more complete the work of redemption without the Son than the Son could begin it without the Father. They are so one that Jesus could say that the Father sanctified Him (10^{36}) or that He sanctified Himself (17^{19}). The Father sends the Son; and the Son comes Himself. Jesus excludes in all His teachings separate action of Father and Son ($14^{9.\,10f.}$ $17^{10.\,21}$). And the mission of the Spirit is to witness to Father and Son. This indicates the equal Divinity of all. Unless the Son were God, He could not send the Spirit of God; and the Holy Ghost would not testify to and glorify a man. Jesus teaches that Father, Son, and Spirit are all equally present in the souls of believers ($7^{38.\,39}$); yet none loses His personality or is confounded with another. The witness of the Spirit, Jesus says, is twofold—first to the Church, and second to the world. To Christians He would so recall the teachings of Jesus and add to them that believers would know the Son as never before. Jesus taught 'these things' (14^{25}); the Spirit would teach 'all things' (v.^{26}), that is, the things of the Father and Son (16^{13}), as the Spirit ever hears (16^{13}, note the present sense in ἀκούσῃ) them in Divine omniscience. To the world also, through the Church, the Spirit would testify for Christ ($16^{8\text{-}15}$). As in the Synoptics, so in the Fourth Gospel, Jesus reveals the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as building up God's kingdom and destroying that of the devil. The Spirit was to convince the world that it had not glorified the Son. To hate the Son was to hate the Father (15^{23}), and to hate the Son called forth the protest of the Spirit ($15^{23.\,26}$). Only the Spirit, coming from the glorified Christ, could overcome this hatred (16^{7}). And this co-operation of Son and Spirit rested on essential relations to one another and to the world (11^{50} 16^{7}). Almost dramatically it is said of the personal Spirit that ἐκεῖνος ἐλθών (15^{26}) would convict the world of a threefold sin. The triple attack of Satan upon the Son (Lk $4^{3f.}$) is met by a triple defence of the Spirit. The first world sin was disbelief in Christ; the second was sin against the righteousness of Christ (cf. 'eternal sin,' Mk 3^{29}). Conviction of this sin the Spirit wrought through the triumphant resurrection of Jesus (cf. 1 P 3^{18} 4^{6}, 1 Ti 3^{16}, He 9^{14}), and His return to the Father, with whom only the righteous can dwell. The third sin, like the third temptation (Mt 4^{9}), was putting Satan in the place of the Son of God. The Spirit would show that the death of Jesus meant the destruction of the devil: 'the prince of this world is judged' (Jn 16^{11}). As intimated in the Synoptics, Jesus here teaches that God is to destroy the kingdom of evil by His Son and Spirit. The prince of this world is judged and doomed. The Son testifies (14^{17}) that the world is lost because it cannot know and receive the Spirit; the Spirit testifies that the world is lost because it does not accept and honour the Son. The only hope of man, Jesus teaches, lies in coming to God through the Son and the Holy Spirit. The Divinity of both and their place in the Trinity appear to be inextricably involved in Christ's own gospel. In most solemn manner He asks the once blind man (9^{35}), 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God?' He accepts his confession of faith in Him as such, 'Lord, I believe.' He also accepts, as He had done before (Mt 14^{33} 16^{16}), worship as Son of God. Here His testimony to His own Divinity and equality with God culminates. But with it He ever associates the Holy Ghost as coming from God ($14^{13\text{-}17}$) and continuing the work of the Son in leading men to God ($3^{5\text{-}8}$ 14^{16}).

(3) The Synoptic Gospels present, by way of just historic accommodation, the teaching of Jesus to the Jews, though showing incidentally, especially after the resurrection, the higher self-consciousness of Christ as found in the Fourth Gospel (cf. especially Mt 11^{27} and Lk 10^{22}). This last, given intentionally for disciples (Jn $21^{23\text{-}25}$), for the Church, and for man as man, unfolds the deeper character and words of Christ. There are two symbolical acts, which show how the doctrine of the Trinity appears with equal naturalness in all the Gospels. Jesus breathed upon His disciples and imparted the Holy Ghost (Jn 20^{22}). He also bade them baptize their converts in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (Mt $28^{18.\,19}$). Here in brief symbol and formula He sets forth the Trinity conception of Jn 14–17. He breathed upon the disciples from His own glorified body and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost.' He speaks as Lord, 'Take'; it is a word of command with which He sends forth the Spirit. He begins to do what He said He would do (16^{7}). Speaking as God (cf. Gn 2^{7}, Ezk 37^{5}), He exercised the authority to impart the Spirit of God. Through His word of command and His vital breath the Holy Ghost proceeded from God the Father to the hearts of men. The Apostles received the baptism of the Holy Spirit for service, as had Jesus Himself for His great Apostleship (Mk $1^{8.\,10}$, Jn 1^{32}, He 3^{1}). The authority to bind and loose given by Jesus (Mt 18^{18}) is now ascribed to the Holy Ghost (Jn 20^{23}). Both Son and Spirit forgive sins through the Apostles. The gift of the Spirit (Jn 20^{22}) corresponds with the baptismal command (Mt 28^{19}). Both set forth the Apostolic commission; and both do so in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. In the Fourth Gospel, Jesus sends forth the Twelve in His own name, with the authority of the Father and inspired by Him with the Spirit (20^{21}). In Mt 28^{20} He claims all power in heaven and on earth, and bids them disciple and baptize men in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Jesus began His own work with baptism, which He said was from God (Mt 21^{25}), and referred to communion with Himself as baptism (Mk 10^{38}); hence His command to baptize is not strange. He would send His disciples to the Gentile world with the same ordinance with which John came to Israel. It is the Trinitarian formula that challenges criticism (cf. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. 349, 374). True, there is no text evidence against it (Resch, Paralleltexte, 3 Ev. ii. 393 f.); and it occurs in the most Jewish Gospel, where such teachings are improbable unless from Jesus. Later references to baptism in the name of Jesus (Ac 2^{38} 19^{5}, 1 Co 1^{13}) seem either to describe the acceptance of Christianity, without reference to the mode of baptism, or to prove that the Trinitarian form was not the only one in use. Where the form of baptism is expressly referred to, it is always in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (Didache, vii. 3; Justin M., Ap. i. 61; cf. Resch, l.c.). If the teachings in Jn $20^{21\text{-}23}$ are from Jesus, Mt 28^{19} is quite natural. If the Apostles were sent by the Father and the Son, and inspired by the Spirit to declare converts' sins remitted, what more natural than to add 'baptize them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost'? We can hardly think of Paul, some 25 years after Christ's ascension, writing 'the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all,' or John reporting Jesus ($16^{7\text{-}15}$) as building His gospel upon Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, unless the Lord had taught essentially what is in Mt 28^{19}. The teachings of Jesus seem fairly to include the following: (1) He approved of the baptism of John, and His disciples continued it (Jn 3^{22} 4^{1}); (2) after the death of John, He let this preparatory baptism drop (a) because the kingdom foretold had actually come, (b) because Messianic baptism led to false views of the kingdom and provoked opposition, (c) because Jesus gradually turned to the special instruction of the Twelve; (3) His teaching on baptism identified it with the Holy Ghost, as all the evangelists tell us (Mt 3^{11}, Mk 1^{8}, Lk 3^{16}, Jn 1^{33}, Ac 1^{5}), hence, as soon as the Holy Spirit was given at Pentecost, the Apostles felt that the time had come for the renewal of external baptism also; (4) baptism 'in the name of Jesus' would then mean, as Jesus taught, baptism of the Holy Ghost and into the service of Christ, in contrast with Johannine baptism; (5) Luke shows that Jesus had the same view of baptism and the Trinity as appears in Mt 28^{19}. He taught (a) the coming of the Holy Ghost, (b) this coming was a baptism of the Holy Ghost, and (c) the Father and Son participated in this baptism of the Holy Ghost (24^{49}, Ac 1^{5}). Here are the same elements of doctrine as are contained in Mt 28^{19}. If we suppose with Haupt (Apostolat im NT, 38 f.), that this is not a formula of baptism, but a summary by the Evangelist of Christ's teachings on baptism and what it meant, we reach the same result: the only confession of faith and baptism that Jesus taught meant sharing the redemption of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The Apostolic form 'in the name of Jesus' would then mean just what is taught in Mt 28^{19}. It was baptism in the Spirit unto Christ: hence, when St. Paul found disciples (Ac 19^{3}) who had not received the Holy Ghost, he asked unto what they had been baptized: baptism had special reference to the Holy Ghost. It also referred to all the redemptive work of the Son (Gal $3^{26\text{f.}}$, Ro 6^{3}), as well as to the full activity of the Spirit (1 Co 12^{13}, Tit $3^{5.\,6}$).

St. Paul also puts baptism and the Holy Spirit together (1 Co $10^{2.\,3}$) in a way to make it seem certain that he traced both to Christ (11^{23}, cf. Mt 20^{22}). St. Peter, too, describing conversion (Ac 2^{38}), united baptism in the name of Jesus, and reception of the Holy Ghost, just as we should expect on our view. Baptism 'into the name' meant baptism unto God (Jer 14^{9}), who is revealed, not through but in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Jehovah was the name of God for the OT covenant; the new name of God for the new covenant in Christ is Father, Son, and Spirit. Their equal Divinity, personality, and participation in man's redemption so form the doctrine of God and His work in the teachings of Jesus, that Mt 28^{19} may well be regarded as a culmination and synopsis of the gospel of the risen Lord. This baptismal formula was the centre of a solemn act of worship in which Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were equally adored. It was a solemn profession of faith in which each was regarded as indispensable ground of man's salvation. It was a solemn confession of covenant relation in which each was equally looked to as source of consecration and blessing. Jesus speaks of these distinctions as of spiritual realities. It seems impossible to paraphrase His words into, 'Baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Messiah, and of God as Spirit,' as some modern critics say Jesus meant (cf. Kaftan, Wesen der Chr. Rel. ii. 345 f.; see H. M. Scott, Nicene Theol. 255 f.). 'The Trinity of revelation, according to Jesus' own teachings, leads up to a Trinity of Being' (Schlottman, Compendium d. Bib. Theol. 134). The historicity of Mt 28^{19} is not weakened by later opposition to Gentiles entering the Church (Ac 11^{10} 15^{16}, Gal 2^{16}); for that controversy turned not on the fact but on the mode of their admission: must they enter the Church through the synagogue or not? (cf. Schmid, Theol. of NT, 163). On the other hand, this Trinitarian confession has an argumentative relation to all nations; the spread of the gospel would be a proof of the truth of the doctrine. Upon such teaching Christ promised His blessing; with it He would be in His Church unto the end of the world (v.^{20}, cf. Mt 24^{14} 30^{31}). Out of this confession of faith in baptism, taught by Jesus, has grown the first and only creed of all the ages: 'I believe in God the Father . . . and in Jesus Christ our Lord . . . and in the Holy Ghost.' 'The baptismal symbol in its whole contents goes back beyond all question to the Apostolic age' (Caspari, Quellen z. Gesch. d. Tauf-symb. i. 5); and no other than a Trinitarian formula has ever appeared in the history of the Church (cf. Resch, 424 f.); 'Trinitarian baptism was universal in the earliest churches and among the earliest heretics.' No Judaizer or Gnostic administered Christian baptism without the τρισμακαρία ἐπονομασία, the 'trina invocatio, nomen trinæ beatitudinis,' that sprang from Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (Clem. Hom. ix. 23).

iii. Apostolic Teaching.—(1) The outpouring of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostolic Church brought first the personality of the Spirit into greater prominence, and, secondly, shed new light from the Spirit upon the Son. (a) This new light showed (α) the great importance of the Person as well as the words of the incarnate Christ—He was much more than a prophetic Messiah; (β) the unique value of His atoning death; and (γ) the vital relation for believers between this shameful death and His glorious resurrection and ascension to the right hand of the Father, where He represents and rules His people. The first martyr, full of the Holy Ghost, saw the heavens opened and Jesus standing on the right hand of God (Ac $7^{55.\,56}$; cf. 1 P $1^{19\text{-}21}$ $3^{18\text{f.}}$, Ph $2^{6\text{f.}}$, He 1^{3}). He who ascended to Divine glory, it was felt, must ever have dwelt in Divine glory; and His incarnation, instead of being His life, was but an incident in His eternal existence. These Jewish Christians all start from Ps $110^{1\text{f.}}$, and declare by the Holy Ghost that the Psalmist knew by the Holy Ghost that Christ was Lord of David and Lord of all (Ac $2^{34.\,36}$ 10^{36} 11^{23}, Ja 2^{1}, Jude ^{4}; the Didache calls him 'the God of David,' 10^{6}). 'Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ' and 'our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' meant the same thing (2 P $1^{1.\,11}$ 2^{20}). Jesus was equal with Jehovah (cf. Weiss, NT Theol.^{6} 132); His throne was God's throne (He $1^{5.\,8}$ 3^{13}); because He was God (He 1^{8}). Language failed these Jewish Christians to say more of the glory of the Son of God. The whole OT, as revelation of the Holy Spirit, testified to the Divine Christ (He 3^{7} $1^{5.\,8\text{f.}}$ $2^{2\text{f.}}$ 5^{6} 10^{5}). The ruling idea in Hebrews is that the old covenant of Jehovah with Israel was supplanted by the new, in which Jesus takes the place of Jehovah, Christians take the place of Jews (cf. Ep. of Barnabas 4), and the Holy Spirit, which led Israel towards Canaan, leads Christians through the Son to the rest in heaven (1^{2} $2^{3.\,4\text{f.}}$ $4^{1\text{f.}}$). This eternal Son is as the Jehovah of the OT (He $1^{3.\,13}$ 8^{1} 12^{2}), and is described there as such (Ps 110, He 1^{13}, Ps $102^{26\text{-}28}$, He 1^{10}). He became incarnate to save men; and, in co-operation with the Holy Ghost the eternal Spirit (9^{14}), the eternal Son (1^{8}) became author of eternal salvation (5^{9}), and eternal redemption (9^{12}) unto an eternal inheritance (9^{15}). The relations of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are eternal. An attempt is made to set forth the connexion of the Son with the Father by comparing it with a brightness streaming from the Divine glory. Christ is one with God as a ray of light is one with the sun: out of such relation He takes form as a Personal Being distinct from the Father, yet so one with Him that to see the Son was to see the very glory which constitutes the Father (He 1^{3}), the very 'character of His being' (cf. Weiss, 493). 'He was everything lofty that could be imagined. Everything that can be said of Him was already said in the first two generations after His appearance' (Harnack, Dogmengesch. i. 66).

(b) Equally marked is the Apostolic conception of the Holy Ghost and His relation to Father and Son. In the Gospels Jesus speaks 25 times of the Spirit, and the Evangelists make a like number of references; but in the Acts and Epistles over 160 statements are made about the Holy Ghost (Scofield, The Holy Spirit in NT Scripture, 11). In the Gospels the Spirit 'was not yet' (Jn 7^{39}), that is, not in the fulness and abiding power of post-Ascension days. But, after Christ's return to the Father, Apostolic men were 'full of the Holy Ghost' (Ac 4^{8}). At Pentecost the Spirit came as Jesus predicted (Jn 3^{8} 16^{5-15}), to inspire and equip the Church. He came also in judgment, as Jesus had said (Mk 3^{28}, Lk 12^{10}). The first mention of the 'Church' (Ac 5^{3}) shows Ananias and Sapphira dead upon its threshold for lying to the Holy Ghost. To lie to the Spirit was to lie to God (v.^{4}); for it is the Spirit of both God (1 P 4^{14}) and His Christ (1 P 1^{11}). Regeneration is the work of the Spirit, who uses the word (1 P 1^{23}, Jude $^{19.\ 20}$); it is also the work of God (1 P 5^{10}). The writer of Hebrews speaks little of the Spirit in believers; but when he comes to set forth the eternal high priesthood of the Son (6^{20}), which was 'after the power of an endless life' (7^{16}), he emphasizes the doctrine that Christ's eternal intercession takes place through the eternal Spirit (9^{14}). If Spirit means here (cf. Delitzsch, ad loc.) 'the Divine inward being of the God-man,' we meet once more the view that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are eternally one with God who is a Spirit.

(c) St. Peter as leader of the Jewish Christians preaches the gospel as from Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. He sums it up doctrinally (1 P 1^{2}) as (α) election by God the Father, (β) through the Holy Spirit, (γ) unto salvation by Jesus Christ. This is the order from the side of God: from the side of man he describes it to inquirers and twice over to a court of Jewish theologians (Ac 2^{38} 4^{12} 5^{32}) as (α) repentance towards God, (β) faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and (γ) receiving the Holy Ghost. He says the conversion of Cornelius was acceptance of the Holy Ghost as a gift of God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ (Ac 11^{16}, cf. 1 P $1^{17f.}$). He describes Christians as those who have 'faith in the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ' (2 P 1^{1-11}), where Jesus is both God and Saviour. He adds that both the preacher and the Word must be witnessed to by the Holy Spirit, to have any effect (1 P 1^{11} 4^{11}). This Trinitarian gospel of St. Peter is that of St. Stephen (Ac $7^{48f.}$), St. James (1^{5} 2^{1} 4^{5}), and St. Jude (vv.$^{19-21}$). The beginning of the Christian life takes place through presentation of the Son in the Word; for such applying the things of Christ by the Spirit (1 P 2^{3}) regenerates the heart. All Christian growth depends upon being in Christ (3^{16} 4^{1} 5^{14}). The three Apostolic conditions of entering the kingdom of God were repentance (Ac 5^{31} 11^{18}, Ro 2^{4}, 2 Co $7^{9.\ 10}$; cf. Mt 9^{13}, Lk 24^{47}), faith (Ac 3^{16} 14^{27} 20^{21}, Ro 9^{10}, 1 Co 13^{13}), and holiness (Ac 26^{20}, He 6^{1}, Ja 2^{17}, Ro 16^{3}); and these rested upon Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Faith in Christ works by love (Gal 5^{6}) towards the Father, the Son, and the brethren, and purifies the heart by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (Ac 15^{9}). These constant allusions to the Trinity, with no further explanations, show that this doctrine was taken for granted among the Apostolic Churches. From the adoration of Jesus Christ, the centre of the Trinity, as God by Jewish Christians, light must have fallen in all directions upon the conception of God as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

(2) St. Paul sets out from fundamental belief in one God (Gal 3^{20}, 1 Co 8^{6}, 1 Ti 2^{5}), but at once proceeds to teach that in the gospel God is the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. (a) Upon this essential relation of Father and Son he built all his hopes (Ro $1^{3.\ 8}$, 1 Co 1^{2-4}, 2 Co 4^{6}). In the eternal Son believers were chosen before the foundation of the world (Eph 1^{4}). He is called κύριος and even θεός, side by side with the Father (Ro 9^{5}, cf. 7^{25}, Tit 2^{13}). He shares Divine attributes, and, together with the Father, is worshipped and glorified (1 Co 1^{2}, Ro 13^{10}, Eph 5^{19}, 1 Ti 1^{12}). Yet He is never identified with the Father, but is carefully distinguished from Him (1 Co 8^{6}, Ro 1^{4} 8^{32}). He is the image of the invisible God (Col 1^{15}), and shares the invisible glory of God; He is also 'a man' Christ Jesus (1 Ti 2^{5}). As sharing the glory of the Father, He is called the 'firstborn' of all creation (Col 1^{15}). As Jesus spoke of the Father as greater than He, when claiming all the Father has as His, so St. Paul describes the glorified Christ as Head of Creation, in reference both to God and the universe. In Him all things subsist, because He is the Son and receives all from the Father (2 Co 4^{6}). He is described as 'existing before the world in the eternal Godhead, yet He did not cling with avidity to the prerogatives of His Divine majesty, did not arbitrarily display His equality with God; but . . . took upon Him the form of a servant' (Lightfoot's paraphrase of Ph $2^{6f.}$). St. Paul does not use metaphysical terms, but teaches here that the μορφὴ θεοῦ involved participation in the οὐσία θεοῦ. Similarly, Bengel remarks (in Nösgen, Gesch. NT Off. i. 19) that the term θεότης as distinguished from θειότης expresses 'non modo divinas virtutes sed ipsam divinam naturam.' St. Paul regards the Incarnation as serving the double purpose of showing God's love as Father (Gal 4^{4}, Ro 8^{3}; cf. Jn 3^{16}), and of revealing the inner relations of Christ's premundane and Divine being (2 Co 8^{9}, Ph $2^{6f.}$). A God of love seemed to involve personal subjects and objects of love within the Godhead, from which God who loved the world sent forth the Son of His love to save men. The Father gave the Son (Ro 8^{32}), the Son gave Himself (Gal 1^{4}), surrendered His glory and died on the cross; the Holy Spirit witnesseth to the Son and wins sinners to accept Him (Ro $1^{1.\ 4.\ 5}$). That is St. Paul's gospel (Ro $1^{16.\ 17}$), which has proved itself the power of God unto salvation. He often sums up his gospel, and it is always Trinitarian (Ro 5^{1-5} $8^{2f.}$ $15^{16.\ 17}$, 1 Co 2^{1-4} $12^{3f.}$, 2 Co 3^{3}, Gal 4^{4-6}, Eph $1^{3-6.\ 13}$ 2^{18} 4^{4-6}, Col $1^{3.\ 4.\ 8}$; cf. He $1^{1.\ 9}$ $2^{3.\ 4}$ $10^{26.\ 29.\ 31}$ $11^{22.\ 24.\ 29}$). Over every sermon he can pronounce the benediction of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (2 Co 13^{14}).

(b) St. Paul, like all the Apostles, supports his theology by the Old Testament. His central theme, the Divine Christ, he sets at once in inseparable relations to Jehovah. The Jewish teachings of his day confounded אלהים and יהוה (so Jehovah is rendered θεός in LXX of Nu 22^{13} 28^{8}, while אל and אלהים appear as κύριος in Nu 28^{8}, Gn $21^{2.\ 6}$); but St. Paul, with a few possible exceptions (1 Co 3^{5}, Ro $14^{4f.}$), agrees with St. James (1^{1} $2^{1.\ 5}$) and St. Peter (Ac 2^{36}) in distinguishing them as two Divine Persons. The Father is θεός, though the name is also given to the Son (Ro 9^{5}), and the Son is κύριος. This personal distinction of Father and Son is traced by St. Paul to the OT distinctions of אלהים and יהוה, and to the different relations of God to man expressed by those names (cf. Seeberg, Die Anbetung d. 'Herrn' bei Paulus, p. 8 f.). The distinction of God in Himself and the revealing Jehovah in the OT, St. Paul sees fully unfolded in the personal distinction of Father and Son. Christ did not become Lord; His κυριότης was but a form of His activity as a personal Divine Being. He was God before He was manifested as Lord; and He will be God after He ceases to rule as Lord (1 Co 15^{25}; cf. August. l.c. i. 8). He is Lord, not in relation to God but in relation to man (Ro $5^{1.\ 11.\ 21}$ 6^{11} 14^{8}, 1 Co $1^{2.\ 10}$). St. Paul, too, goes back to Ps 110, which he quotes oftener than any other OT passage (Ro 8^{34}, Eph 1^{20}, Col 3^{1}, 1 Co 15^{23}). He found there the Lord Christ reigning with the Lord God until all enemies to God's kingdom were subdued, and sharing the Divine majesty and power inseparable from God. This prophecy was fulfilled in the incarnate Lord conquering death and Satan, and through the Resurrection sitting down at the right hand of God, with all enemies at His footstool (Ro 8^{34}, Eph 1^{20}). The glorified Christ is the Lord of glory (Ph 2^{9}, Ja 2^{1}). Not till after the Resurrection was Jesus Lord, though He was ever Divine (1 Co 2^{8}; cf. Mt $22^{41f.}$). Christ saves us as triumphant Lord (Eph 4^{3}, 1 Co 7^{32}). He is also the Providence of the Church (Gal 2^{2}, 1 Co 4^{19} 16^{7}). When all believers are saved His lordship ceases; He gives the kingdom which He undertook to the Father and resumes the eternal relations of the Son (1 Co 15^{25}). From the Resurrection to the Last Judgment is the rule of Christ. He rules with the Father (1 Co 15^{10}, Ro 8^{30}), as He saves with the Father (Col 1^{3}, Ro 8^{8}). God's work for man, St. Paul teaches, is never apart from Christ's work. They are as rays of heat and light in the same sunbeam. Hence St. Paul was called to be an Apostle by both Father and Son (Gal 1^{1}), who formed one Divine power (as omission of διά before θεοῦ and singular predicates show; cf. 1 Ti 1^{1}, 1 Th 3^{11}, 2 Th 2^{17}, 1 Co $15^{8.\,10}$; Seeberg); and he sees the final judgment as by both God and Christ (2 Th $1^{6f.}$, 1 Co 4^{5}). All between these in St. Paul's survey of life is done equally by the Father and Son. 'The active rule of the exalted Lord is, according to Paul, such that in every act of it contemporaneously an act of God the Father is completed' (Seeberg, p. 35). The grace of the Son is as much a Divine element in salvation as is the love of the Father (Tit $3^{6.\,7}$); hence, with the possible exception of Ro 8^{34}, St. Paul never speaks of intercession of the Son with the Father, so one are they considered in working. His God, in opposition to polytheism, is 'one God the Father, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things' (1 Co 8^{6}). He says (v.^{4}), 'there is none other God but one,' and that one God is the Father and Son. These were equally God for St. Paul from Ps 110 to his own last experience. The subordination of the Son was but a stepping-stone to lift the saints to the glory of the Father, which was shared by the Son. The words 'Christ is God's' (1 Co 3^{23}) support the assurance 'ye are Christ's,' as the statement 'the head of Christ is God' upholds the teaching that 'the head of every man is Christ' (1 Co 11^{3}). St. Paul follows Jesus' teachings that the Father was greater than the Son, not by way of contrast, but in a unity, which communicates all the greatness of the Father through the service of the Son (cf. Col 1^{19} 2^{9} 3^{11}).

(c) St. Paul's theology is Christo-centric. He proceeds from Christ outwards to Father and Spirit, yet everywhere recognizing the Divine relation of the Spirit to the Father and Son. The living bond between the Son, exalted as Lord, and man is the Holy Ghost. St. Paul echoes Jesus' doctrine (Jn 16^{14}) that the Spirit teaches Christ and is an earnest of all good things to come (2 Co 1^{22} 5^{5}, Eph 1^{19}). So one in working are they that he calls Christ a life-giving Spirit (1 Co 15^{45}), and says, 'the Lord is the Spirit' (2 Co 3^{17}). They are one as in the Godhead, yet distinct, both in their subjective and objective relations to man; for he adds: 'where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty,' and elsewhere (Gal 5^{1}) says, 'stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free.' St. Paul's theology grew out of his experience. He knew the personal Divine work of Son and Spirit in his own soul (Ph 3^{3}, Ro 8^{9} 9^{1}). He had extraordinary gifts of the Spirit (1 Co 14^{18}). He knew that all religious life comes from the Spirit (Ro 15^{19}, Gal $3^{2.\,3}$). He knew, also, that Christ in him was his life, his hope of glory (Col 1^{27}). But he sharply distinguished the revelation of the Lord in him (Ac 22^{7}), and the sending of the Son that we may become sons of God, from the sending of the Spirit to awaken us to the life of sons (Gal 4^{4-6}). He did not regard the Spirit as merely the spiritual disposition produced in us by Christ. Christian life is equally related to both Son and Spirit; they are equally Divine, but not identical. The Spirit proceeds from the Son as the Spirit of Christ (Ro 8^{9}, Gal 4^{6}, 1 Co 2^{16}, Eph 4^{8}), as well as from the Father; and in his experience St. Paul found the Son to be the fundamental type of the form of life into which believers are brought by the Spirit (so Nösgen, ii. 262). The Spirit is the impelling power, the Son is the abiding life element, in the Christian (Ro 8^{14}, Gal 1^{18}). The same fruits spring from both (Gal $5^{5.\,16.\,22.\,24}$, Eph 5^{9}, Ph 1^{11}). Both make us free from the Law (Gal $5^{1.\,18}$). We are to have the mind of both (1 Co 7^{40}, Ro 8^{27}); both intercede with the Father for us (Ro $8^{34.\,27}$), and with us for the Father (Ro 8^{9}, 2 Co 13^{5}). We cannot trace the limits of the working of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; but St. Paul plainly teaches that there are such limits. The Spirit begins the life of the soul in man, but all NT writers ascribe the resurrection life of the body to the risen Christ (2 Co 4^{10}). The Spirit makes man a new personality, the Son makes man a member of His body, the Church (Nösgen, l.c.) The Son may become angry and condemn in wrath (1 Co 15^{22}), the Spirit is only grieved (Eph 4^{30}). The constant use of the names shows a corresponding distinction of functions within the Godhead.

(d) St. Paul's worship also is of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The Spirit is for him personal, searching the deep things of God, with a will of His own for man's good, and showing Divine treasures to man (1 Co 2^{11}; cf. Lk 24^{49}, Jn 15^{26}). The Spirit does the work of the Father and Son (Ph 4^{13}, Gal 3^{5} 4^{6}). Father, Son, and Spirit must have been for St. Paul Divine realities. He could not pray to mere names or personifications. He never suggests that one is more or less Divine or personal than the other. That most solemn claim of Jehovah—'I have sworn by myself . . . that unto me every knee shall bow' (Is 45^{23})—St. Paul applies to Christ as God (Ro 14^{11}, Ph 2^{10}). For a Jew with the First Commandment as the creed of his life, prayer to Jesus Christ meant full equality with God; for neither OT (Is 42^{8} $48^{11f.}$, Jer $10^{11f.}$, Ps 18^{22}) nor NT (Ro $1^{24f.}$, 1 Th 1^{9}) allows worship of anything but God. The blasphemy of Antichrist was claiming Divine honours (2 Th 2^{4}). St. Paul warned against worshipping φύσει μὴ οὖσι θεοῖς (Gal 4^{8}), hence he must have worshipped Christ as φύσει ὄντι θεῷ. A Christian was a man calling on the name of the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation (Ac $9^{14.\,21}$); and St. Paul, like St. Stephen (Ac 7^{59}) and all saints (Rev 22^{20}), prayed to Christ Himself (Ac 22^{16}) and taught others to do so (1 Co 2^{1}). To call on Christ was the same thing as prayer to God (Ps 88^{10}, Is 45^{23}). St. Paul's test of a Christian was 'calling on' the Son (2 Ti 2^{22}). False teachers knew this test, and did not dare to omit it (2 Ti 2^{22}), because praying to Jesus was the recognized way of salvation (Ro $10^{12.\,13}$). A Christian meant a worshipper of Christ (1 Co 1^{2}). St. Paul prays to the Son to send the Spirit (Eph 3^{14}). The Spirit prays in him to the Father, echoing the familiar 'Abba' of the Lord's Prayer (Ro 8^{15}, Gal 4^{6}). He unites Father, Son, and Holy Ghost in doxologies of adoration and praise (2 Co 13^{14}). He prays for the same things—men's salvation—to Father and Son, and in the same Spirit to both. He thanks the Father through the Son (Ro 1^{8} 7^{25}). He does not pray to them alternately, or in succession, but at the same time (2 Th 1^{2}, Gal 1^{3}, 1 Co 1^{3}). He cannot separate them in his worship. In certain thanksgivings St. Paul prays to God as the Father of Jesus Christ (Ro 15^{6}, 2 Co 1^{3}, Eph 1^{3}), showing that he knew the Lord was within the Godhead as Son. He thanks the Father through the Son, because Christ's work was the ground of all thanksgiving to God. The Son is the completer of the Father's work for man. The love of God and the grace of Christ and the fellowship of the Spirit of love meet, therefore, in the spirit of gratitude. St. Paul's three cardinal virtues are, faith in Jesus Christ, love to God the Father, and hope in the spirit of promise (Eph 1^{13}, Gal 3^{14}, 1 Co 13^{13}). They are all fruits of the Spirit (Gal $5^{22.\,23}$), and come from the Father through the Son. St. Paul certainly taught all the data of a doctrine of the Trinity, however theologians may differ as to its formulation. He could not have learned his fixed, confident doctrine of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit from Jewish theology; neither did pagan thought suggest such teachings: he evidently received it as part of the gospel given him by Christ (cf. Gal 1^{3-8}).

(3) St. John's teachings take their perspective (a) from his doctrine of the λόγος, which he sees prefigured in the OT. This is central in his Gospel, as it is in the doctrine of the Trinity. The Divine λόγος became incarnate in Jesus. This may be why Christ's conception of the Holy Ghost is not referred to, and why the Spirit is spoken of as a gift, and not made so clearly personal as in the words of Jesus Himself (1 Jn 3^{24} 4^{13}). The Fourth Gospel presents Christianity as a double revelation of God through the Spirit and through the Son; the Evangelist bears witness chiefly to the Son, and lets the Son testify to the Spirit. Because St. John beholds the eternal Son prominent in the OT (Gn 1^{1}, Ps $33^{4.\,6}$, Is 40^{8} 55^{11}, Jn $1^{1.\,14}$), he does not describe the Incarnation as a humiliation, as St. Paul does (Ph 2^{6}), or rise to it through the thought of His ascension to glory involving pre-existent glory, as in He 1^{3} 2^{9} 10^{12}. He sees the Divine Son, the Creator of the universe (1^{3}), carry the glory of God veiled with Him into the world (1^{10-14}), and, when His work of redemption was complete, move calmly again into the glory which He had with the Father before the world was. His emphatic statements that the λόγος was in the beginning with God, and that the beginning of the being of all things was through Him, set forth the eternal Being of the Son. And because of His Divine Sonship He was a Divine revelation: 'No man hath seen God at any time, God only-begotten (μονογενὴς θεός, as in ℵ B C L), who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.' What can transcend 'God only-begotten'? St. John exhausts all Jewish descriptions of Divine manifestations to set forth the glory of the Son. He embodied them all. He was one with the יקר, the evident 'glory' of God (1^{14} 2^{11} 12^{41}, Targ. to Is 6; cf. Schlottmann, 130, Mt 16^{27}, Mk 8^{38}). His coming is the coming of the Divine glory, which Ezekiel said (43^{1-7} in Targ.) should dwell for ever with God's people. Jesus had identified Himself with the Shekinah (Mt 18^{20}; cf. Pirke Aboth, iii. 3): He even said that His presence was greater than the Shekinah in the temple (Mt 12^{6}): St. John proceeds to identify the Son with the Memra or 'Word' (1^{14}). In one statement he combines the Memra (λόγος), the Yeḳar (δόξα), and the Shekinah (in σκήνοω), and applies all to the incarnation of the Son of God ($1^{14.\,18}$). Jesus Christ reveals the personal glory of God, not temporarily, but incarnate, tabernacling among His people as Jehovah tented among Israel (Ex 25^{8} 29^{45}, He 1^{3}). Philo called the λόγος figuratively δεύτερος θεός; St. John calls Him simply θεός; for He is on one side the λόγος of God, and, on the other, God. Philo's λόγος is πρωτόγονος υἱός, or, as an angel, ἀρχάγγελος (cf. Riehm, Heb. 146 f.): but St. John puts the Son-Logos far above all angels; He is one with God, truly personal and incarnate as the Messiah, all of which is foreign to Philo's allegorical exegesis. St. John's theology shows no connexion with that of Philo. Like St. Paul, he comes to Jesus from the OT, and finds that it is the revealed God, the Jehovah, the Lord of David, the 'Memra' that took flesh in Jesus (1^{2} 14^{9}). The relation of the Son to the Father is expressed by St. John as in He 1^{3}, by the terms 'light,' as 'God is light' (1 Jn 1^{7}), 'life,' as 'God is life' (1^{2})—only the Son is called 'the life' or 'eternal life' (1 Jn 5^{20}), because the Son is the manifestation of Divine life and its source for man—and especially by the word μονογενής ($1^{14.\,18}$ $3^{16.\,18}$, 1 Jn 4^{9}; cf. 1^{1}). Christ was the only-begotten Son of God, as the widow's son was her only child (Lk 7^{12}), as the ruler's daughter was his only daughter (Lk 8^{42}), and as the possessed boy was his father's only son (Lk 9^{38}). He was the 'only-begotten' in such a sense that He might be called the only-begotten Son or the only-begotten God. He was the Son absolutely, and in a sense shared by no other being. He was so one with God that St. John says He was God ($1^{1.\,14}$); or, as put elsewhere (1 Jn $5^{5.\,20}$), He was the 'true God' revealing the true God. He was also 'with God' ($1^{1.\,2}$), i.e. not God without a property peculiar to Him as Son of God. From this Divine Sonship flows St. John's Gospel. In it he finds the source of all blessing and eternal life (20^{31}, 1 Jn $5^{12.\,13}$). From it come (1) the power to become sons of God (1^{12}), (2) sonship through faith in the Son (9^{35}), (3) sonship through the will of the Father (1^{13}), (4) participation in the truth, grace, glory, and indwelling of the Father (1^{14}, 1 Jn 4^{15}); (5) an experience of the fulness of the Godhead in the Son ($1^{16.\,17}$), through union with whom (6) believers share the victory of the Son of God over the devil (1 Jn 3^{8}), and (7) have the witness of sonship in themselves (1 Jn 5^{10}). No Divine Son of God, no other sons of God. If God be not the Divine Father of the Divine Son, He is the religious Father of no man: that is the theology of St. John's Gospel.

In the Apocalypse, which has a strong Jewish colouring, we find the same high conception of the Father and the Son. As conqueror over Satan and Saviour of the saints, Jesus sits in Divine glory, adored and praised as omniscient (2^{33}), omnipresent, and eternal (1^{18} 2^{8} 3^{21} $5^{8.\,14}$ 7^{12} 11^{15} 20^{6} $22^{1.\,3}$). He is the Son of Man, in heaven with the Ancient of days (Dn 7^{13}, Rev 14^{14}), while judge of all men on earth (2^{27} 12^{5} 19^{15}). His face shines as the face of God (1^{16}); and before Him the prophet falls down as before Jehovah (1^{17}). He is King of kings and Lord of lords (17^{14} 19^{16}), nay, He is Lord God Almighty (15^{3}). Weiss concludes (p. 560): 'It is certain that the Messiah appears here as an original Divine Being,' side by side with the Father.

(b) Of the Holy Spirit and His relation to the Father and Son, St. John says little; but his constant presentation of Christianity as life, birth from God and a birth to holiness, presuppose the Comforter. He makes the full teachings of Jesus on the Holy Spirit (14–17, cf. 7^{39}) his own; and says the Apostolic experience and testimony through the Holy Ghost, after the glorification of Christ, were as rivers to drops, compared with what they were before (7^{39}). The water of life is from the Spirit as from the Son (7^{37}). Jesus taught the Spirit as Paraclete on earth representing the Father and Son (cf. παράκλησις of Holy Ghost, Ac 9^{31}); St. John adds the doctrine that the Son is a corresponding Paraclete in heaven with the Father, representing men (1 Jn 2^{1}). The 'new birth' is mentioned five times in the NT. It is a παλινγενεσία of the whole creation through Christ (Mt 19^{28}), and of a single soul in conversion through the Spirit (Tit 3^{5}); St.

James (1^{18}) sees Christians 'come into the world' (ἀποκυεῖσθαι) begotten of the Father; and St. Peter twice speaks of God begetting us again (1 P $1^{3.\ 23}$). St. John has the further conception that the birth from God takes place through the Holy Ghost (1^{13}, 1 Jn 2^{29} 3^{9} 4^{7} $5^{1.\ 4}$), for there is no doubt that by born of God he means by the Holy Spirit (3^{6}). In two passages he shows that the indwelling of the Father and the Son depends upon the Spirit (1 Jn 4^{13} 3^{24}). He presents religion also as a command of the Father to believe on the Son (1 Jn $3^{23.\ 24}$), and then says that this obedience of faith is possible only through the indwelling of the Father and Son by the Spirit. The only way to keep out evil spirits is to be possessed of the Holy Spirit; and we know, he says, which is the Holy Spirit, by its testifying to the incarnation of the Son of God (1 Jn $4^{2.\ 3}$ $5^{5.\ 6}$) and to nothing else (16^{13}). In the passage on the Three Witnesses (1 Jn $5^{6.\ 8}$) the Holy Spirit testifies to the Son as Divine Redeemer, (a) because from Him flows the double stream of life-giving, cleansing water (Jn 7^{38} 19^{34}) and atoning blood; (b) because the witnessing Spirit is 'the truth'; and (c) because the Father testifies also to the Son (1 Jn 5^{9}).

(c) St. John touches here a thought which runs through the whole NT. God, who is transcendent, incarnate, and immanent as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, establishes His kingdom in opposition to the god of this world, who is the devil and Satan (Rev 12^{9} 20^{2}). The kingdoms of light and darkness run in growing opposition through the Fourth Gospel (6^{70} 7^{20} $8^{44.\ 48}$ 10^{20} 13^{2}). St. John knows of demoniacs (cf. 'signs,' etc., 4^{48} 20^{30}), but the only man he describes as possessed of the devil ($13^{2.\ 27}$) is Judas, the son of perdition, who betrayed the Son of God. To deny the incarnate Son is to join the ranks of Antichrist, to deny the Father also (1 Jn 2^{22}), and to show that the new birth from God has not taken place (1 Jn 3^{9}). That is, the only way to oppose the devil is to be born of God by the Spirit (1 Jn 5^{18}). Christians are sons of God through the Son of God (1 Jn $3^{1\mathrm{f.}}$), who came to destroy the works of the devil (v.^{8}); and they prove both their sonship and their opposition to the devil by obeying the Spirit in them, testifying to the incarnate Son. Thus both the begotten beginning and the triumphant end of the Christian life are inseparable from Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (1 Jn $5^{1.\ 5.\ 6}$). Amid the OT imagery of the Apocalypse we move upon the same high plane. It opens with a benediction ($1^{4.\ 5}$), like that of St. Paul (1 Co 13^{13}), in which salvation is set forth as coming from God, the seven spirits before His throne,—evidently the sevenfold, perfect revelation of the Spirit promised the Son (Is 11^{2}),—and from Jesus Christ. Salvation is ever ascribed to God and the Lamb (7^{10} 4^{11}), and is mediated by the Spirit to the Churches ($2^{7.\ 11.\ 17.\ 29}$ $3^{6.\ 13.\ 22}$ 14^{13} 22^{17}). The rapt Christian 'in the Spirit' hears the voice of Jesus saying, 'Hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches.' As in the Gospel, so here, the Spirit appears both as between Jesus and the Father (1^{4}), and as possessed by Christ (3^{1}). The Son and the Spirit are so identified that what one says is from the other ($2^{7.\ 8.\ 12.\ 17}$ $3^{5.\ 6}$). The glorified Christ and the prophetic Spirit are here actually at work as foreshadowed in the OT view of the Word and the Spirit of God. The Paracletes in heaven and on earth are also here. The glorified Christ says, 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord,' and the responsive Spirit replies, 'Yea, that they may rest from their labours' (14^{13}). The Spirit and the Bride say, 'Come'; that is, 'Come to Jesus' ($22^{17.\ 20}$); and Jesus is the only way to the Father.

iv. Teachings in the Life of the Apostolic Church.—The Trinity was not a theory from without, but part of the gospel, life, work, and worship of the Apostolic Church. It lived in devotion long before it appeared in theology. The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were as much part of Church life as body, soul, and spirit were elements of every believer's life. They are not introduced or explained, but everywhere taken for granted and present. No man can share NT worship without using Trinitarian forms. This natural and incidental yet constant reference to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in Apostolic Churches presupposes just such a development as our study has indicated. The later and clearer statements are always in full agreement with what had been already taught. What the first disciples received from Jesus went far beyond what is recorded in the Gospels; it went far beyond all that He said or did; for after His ascension they became conscious that Jesus was not only a teacher, but Saviour and Lord, and imparter of the Holy Ghost. The teachings and work of Christ in Apostolic experience expanded much more rapidly than they could have done in any process of merely natural development. The order, too, of growth is just what we should expect: new teachings of Jesus about God as Father, then the teachings of Apostles about the Son, and, last of all, the full reference to the Holy Spirit. This order repeats itself in the history of doctrine which took form in the Nicene Creed. Through the words of Jesus, the Synoptic Gospels, St. Paul, Hebrews, St. John, and the Acts, there runs a harmonious and growing representation of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Jesus sets Himself as Son above all the servants of God (Mt 21^{33}, Mk 12^{1-9}, Lk $3^{22\mathrm{f.}}$); He $1^{1.\ 2}$ gives the same doctrine in theological form, declaring the Son above all created beings 'God for ever and ever.' St. Paul presents an intermediate view, in which God and His Christ are central (1 Co 1^{3}, 2 Co $1^{2.\ 3}$, Gal 1^{3}, Eph 1^{2}); but puts it at once in vital union with the Trinitarian conception of God as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (2 Co 13^{14}, Eph 3^{14-16}). The Acts shows historically that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were inseparable from the life and thought of believers; while the Fourth Gospel presents the same teaching as the culmination of NT theology (16^{7-10}). (For further indications of doctrinal growth, cf. the articles GOD IN NT and HOLY SPIRIT in vol. ii.). These early disciples knew that there is an infinite eternal God (2 Co $4^{17.\ 18}$, 1 Ti 1^{7}); they knew also that He is personal, and personal only as Father, Son, and Spirit. How the Infinite can be personal is ever a mystery; to Apostolic men the threefold personality of the infinite God was no greater mystery than any personality of the Infinite. They also knew that there is a God of Absolute Right, the Supreme Lawgiver, the Holy Father in heaven (Jn 17^{11}, Ro $7^{7.\ 12}$, Rev 4^{8}); on the other hand, they knew that God had broken through His own law, and, by His revelation in the Son and Spirit, opened heaven and poured supernatural grace and blessing upon men (Ro 3^{26} 4^{5}, 1 P 1^{3-5}). Their practical experience found that this personality of the Father, and the mediating personalities of the Son and the Spirit, were indispensable to fellowship with God through grace and faith, and in the struggles against sin. Illustrations of this practical Trinity may be seen (1) in the equipment of the Apostles, (2) the establishment of the Church, (3) the work of Missions, (4) the test of sound Doctrine, and (5) the nature of Christian Worship.

(1) The risen Lord gave His commands no more directly to the Apostles, but through the Holy Ghost (Ac 1^{2}). As inseparable as the Father and the Son appear before the Crucifixion, just as inseparable appear the Son and the Spirit after the Resurrection. To the Son as mediator of the Father, and to the Spirit as mediator of Father and Son, the Apostles turn as to the source of all power and authority.

St. Peter says he opened the Church to the Gentiles because the Lord Jesus Christ from heaven told him to do so (Ac 11^{8}), and because the Holy Spirit told him to do so (Ac 10^{19} 11^{12}). St. John says the Spirit of truth in the Apostles made them men of God (1 Jn 4$^{2.\ 6}$), and witnessed through them that the Father sent the Son to give life to believers (vv.$^{13.\ 14}$). The Spirit in the Apostles made them preach the incarnate Son, and denounce all contrary preaching as of the devil (1 Jn 3$^{8-10}$). The Lord Jesus sent Ananias to St. Paul that he might be filled with the Holy Ghost (Ac 9^{17}); then St. Paul preached Christ, that He is the Son of God (v.^{20}). St. Paul supported his claim to be an Apostle by appealing to the call of God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ (Ro 1^{1}, Gal 1$^{1.\ 15.\ 16}$, 1 Co 1^{1}), who filled him with the Holy Ghost at his conversion for apostleship (Ac 9^{17} 1^{2}). He traces the grace of apostleship and of all work in the Church to the Holy Spirit (1 Co 12^{13}) and the Son (v.^{27}, 1 Ti 1^{12}, 1 Co 7$^{2-5}$, 2 Ti 2$^{2.\ 11}$); and he spoke from experience. These Apostles tested all Christ's Trinitarian promises. In His name, as the name of God, they cast out devils (Mk 16^{17}, Ac 16^{18}), healed the sick (ib. Ac 3^{6} 9^{34}), and raised the dead (Ac 9^{40} 20^{10}). The Holy Ghost in their work honoured the Son as He honoured the Father (Jn 5^{23} Ac 3^{6} 16^{18}, Ja 2^{19}). St. Peter found that the Spirit inspired him to speak as Jesus promised (Mt 10$^{19.\ 20}$, Lk 12^{12}), and, thus inspired, he preached repentance towards the Father and faith in the Son as the way of life (Ac 4$^{8.\ 10.\ 31.\ 33}$). He saw also in the OT covenant of God with parents and their children a point of connexion for the doctrine of approach to the Father through the Son (Ac 2$^{38.\ 39}$ 3$^{13.\ 17}$). Sins were remitted or retained by the Apostles on the authority of the Son and as inspired by the Spirit (Mt 18^{18}, Jn 20$^{22.\ 23}$, Ac 8$^{20f.}$). They imparted the Holy Spirit for service (Ac 8^{17}), and, full of the Holy Ghost, acted in the name of Christ as ministers of discipline (Ac 15^{29}), in conscious opposition to the kingdom of Satan (1 Co 5$^{4.\ 5}$ 6^{11}). They could pronounce Anathema in view of the coming Lord. Christ in the midst, and the Spirit in the midst with the Apostles as ministers, formed the Supreme Court of the Church. St. Paul sums up his apostleship (Ac 20–24) in (a) the constant witness of the Holy Spirit, guiding him through bonds and persecutions of Satan and bad men; (b) a ministry received from the Lord Jesus Christ; and (c) a gospel of the grace of God revealed in His Son. That was his practical work, and not a theological elaboration (Ro 15$^{16.\ 19}$). The Apostles claimed and exercised doctrinal authority over the Church (1 Jn 4$^{6f.}$, 1 Co 4^{21} 5^{4} 9$^{1f.}$ 11^{23}), resting their claims on the command of the Son through the Spirit (Ac 1^{2}). They alone perfectly knew the meaning of Jesus (1 Co 2^{16}), as Jesus alone perfectly knew the meaning of the OT. They also had the Spirit of prophecy, so that they could declare the future glories of Christ's kingdom, and the overthrow of the kingdom of the devil (1 Co 5^{5} 16^{22}, 1 Ti 1^{20}, 1 Jn 2^{22} 4^{3}, Rev 2^{9} 3^{9}).

(2) The Apostolic Church was built upon faith in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Pentecost was in an important sense the birthday of the Church; and St. Peter explained it by saying that the Son at the right hand of the Father, having received the promise of the Spirit, 'shed forth this which ye now see and hear.' The Holy Ghost sent by the glorified Son made the Church. If anything is certain, it is that the Apostolic Church saw its foundation laid in the ascension of Christ and the descent of the Spirit. This Spirit of Christ was the regenerating, sanctifying, working power in the Church. If any man had not the Spirit of Christ, he was none of His (Ro 8^{9}). Surrounded by pagans whose gods were devils (1 Co 10^{20}), and by Jews who were led by Satan to crucify the Lord (Jn 6^{70} 8^{44} 13^{2}), Christians were kept by the power of the Holy Ghost (Ro 5^{5}). They met heresy in the same power (1 Jn 4$^{2f.}$), and were given by the Spirit a twofold defence: (1) the Old Testament, inspired at first by the Spirit, and now made practical by the Spirit; and (2) growing faith in the Son of God. The Spirit revealed Him in the hearts of believers as the personal, glorified, triumphant Lord (1 Co 2^{14}). The OT and Christ were shown to be essentially the same Word of God, once spoken by the prophets, now incarnate and glorified in Christ. But, as in the OT, so in the NT, the Spirit is never confounded with the Word or with Christ. Whether speaking through Apostles or Prophets, the Spirit ever declares Jesus Christ to be the true cornerstone of the Church (Eph 2^{20}, 1 P 2^{6}). Through the Spirit believers already share the glory of Christ, and through Him receive all the gifts of the Spirit (1 P 3^{7}, Eph 1^{3} 6^{14}, 2 Co 1^{22}, Ro 8^{16}).

(3) From the Trinity also started the Mission of the Church (Mt 28$^{19f.}$). The Holy Spirit appeared at once as the great propagating power. He repeated the 'Come' and 'Go' of Jesus (Mt 11^{28} 28^{19}, Ac 1^{8}) and continued His work. Jesus declared that the work of foreign missions was the aim of His death (Jn 12$^{20.\ 23-36}$). It was furthered by the Father (v.$^{28f.}$), and carried out by the Spirit, who inspired the first missionaries, Peter (Ac 4^{8}), Stephen (6^{5}), Barnabas (11^{24}), Philip (8^{29}), and Paul (13^{4}), to preach the gospel and cast out devils (Jn 12^{31}; cf. Ac 8^{7}). 'Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them,' said the Spirit (Ac 13^{2}); 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature,' said Jesus. 'Baptize them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,'—that is the Trinitarian foundation of missions. St. Paul is intelligible only as a man who regarded himself as an organ of the Holy Ghost, fighting the powers of darkness (Ro 8^{38}, Eph 6^{12}) to save men by the Son of God (1 Co 2^{4} 1$^{4-7}$). He had more gifts of the Spirit than other Apostles, and was the greatest missionary of Christ (1 Co 14^{18}). The Holy Spirit directed him to his field of labour (Ac 16^{7}), and the Son told him what to expect in those fields (9^{15}). The same is true of St. Peter (Ac 1$^{15f.}$ 2$^{4.\ 17-38}$) and the rest.

(4) The NT Church also regarded the Trinity as the doctrinal assurance that any man was preaching the gospel. Unless he preached the Son of God in personal witness of the Spirit, he was not true to Christ. St. Paul urged Timothy (2 Ti 1$^{13.\ 14}$) to hold fast the Apostles' form of sound words, which consisted in faith and love towards Christ, who is God our Saviour (1 Ti 2^{3}), and was committed unto Him by the Holy Ghost. False teachers left the Church because they denied the Father and the Son, and had no unction of the Holy Ghost (1 Jn 2$^{19.\ 20.\ 22}$). Only those preaching the Divine Son had the witness of the Spirit: to such there came the demonstration of the Spirit and of power (1 Co 2^{4}, 1 Th 1^{5}, Ro 9^{1}). Supernatural signs of the Holy Ghost encouraged such missionaries to preach, and roused the careless to hear of the Son of God as Saviour (He 2^{3}, 1 P 1^{12}, Eph 1$^{13f.}$). As Christ knew what was in man, in like manner did the Spirit in Apostolic preachers so reveal the hearts of heathen in Christian meetings that they fell down crying, 'God is in you of a truth' (1 Co 14^{25}). The two heresies against which the Apostles warned were an incipient Gnosticism, which rejected Christ as Lord and Head (Col 2$^{6.\ 8.\ 19}$, 1 Ti 1$^{2.\ 3}$), and an allied Antinomianism, which set at naught the Holy Ghost (Eph 5$^{6.\ 9.\ 18}$, Rev 2$^{13.\ 17.\ 20f.}$, 1 Co 3^{17}). The Holy Ghost warned (1 Ti 4^{1}) against 'doctrines of devils' which opposed the Son, and 'seducing spirits' which fought against the Spirit of God. By the laying on of hands the Holy Spirit was given to NT workers that they might preach the Son of God as Saviour (1 Ti 4$^{14.16.6}$). Only such preaching of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost would actually reform and save men (Eph 1^{17} 2$^{4-6.18}$ 3$^{1.2.5.14-16}$ 4$^{3-6.13.14}$ 5$^{1.2.9.18-20}$). St. Paul's test description of the gospel against Judaizers is, 'God sent forth His Son . . . to redeem them . . . under the law,' and make them 'sons'; also, 'God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son' into men's hearts, 'crying, Abba, Father' (Gal 4$^{4-6}$). All men sent of God would preach this sending of Son and Spirit as the true gospel of Christ (1 Co 12$^{3f.}$), and not 'another Jesus,' and 'another Spirit,' constituting 'another gospel' (2 Co 11^{4}).

(5) The NT Church meant two or three gathered together with the Son in their midst (Mt 18$^{17.20}$). The meetings for worship were of two kinds—first, that of the Lord's Supper, in which Christ was central; and, second, the public service of οἰκοδομή, in which the Holy Ghost was central; but each carried with it the Trinity. The general worship was charismatic. Its aim and purpose was edification of the saints through the χαρίσματα granted the various participants by the Holy Ghost (1 Co 14^{26}). The worshipping people were the body of Christ (1 Co 10^{16} 12^{27}, Eph 4^{12}), in which each member edified the others as an organ of the Holy Spirit (Jn 6^{45} 7^{38}, 1 Co 3^{16}). Each brother who took part was moved by the Spirit of the glorified Head of the Church, the Lord Christ (Eph 1^{22} 4^{15}, Col 1^{18}). St. Paul traces all the elements of worship—tongues, prophecy, teaching, interpretation, prayer, singing—to the Holy Ghost (1 Co 14$^{1f.}$; cf. Jude ^{20}); but not apart from the Father and the Son; for in this worship were diversities of gifts by the same Spirit, differences of administration by the same Lord Jesus, and diversities of operations by the same God and Father (1 Co 12$^{4-6}$). The order of St. Paul's thoughts in worship appears as he prays for the Ephesians (3$^{14-17}$) to the Father that He would strengthen them by the Spirit, so that Christ might dwell in them. He asks the Romans (15^{30}) to pray in like manner on his behalf. The doxology to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, spoken of God rather than to God, with which St. Paul opens and closes Epistles (Ro 1^{7} 16^{27}, 1 Co 1^{3} 16^{23}, 2 Co 1^{2} 13^{14}), doubtless appeared also at the opening and close of Christian worship (2 Co 1$^{2.3.9}$ 13^{14}). The synagogue worship began with 'Blessed be Jehovah' (cf. Schürer, GJV^{3} ii. 377); the Christian service began with such an invocation as 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . the God of all comfort' (2 Co 1^{3}). The Jewish worship closed with the threefold benediction: 'The Lord bless thee . . . the Lord keep thee . . . the Lord give thee peace'; the Christian service ended also, probably, with a threefold benediction of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (cf. Ro 15$^{12.13.16}$, 2 Co 13^{14}, Rev 1$^{4-6}$ 11^{13} 14^{7} 16^{9} 19^{7}). St. Paul uses the word κύριος nearly 150 times, and always of the Son of God, uniting the Lord Jesus and the Lord God in his worship (cf. Seeberg, p. 3). Both Jewish and Gentile Christians, filled with the Holy Ghost, worshipped equally the Father and the Son—a thing impossible to men whose Bible was the Old Testament, unless they accepted what we understand religiously by the Trinity (Eph 5^{19}, Ph 1^{19}).

A similar recognition of the Trinity underlies the worship of the Lord's Supper. Only those baptized in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were to partake of this Holy Supper (1 Co 10$^{1-4}$ 14$^{16-19}$, Gal 3$^{27f.}$, Ac 2^{38} 8^{12} 19^{3}; Didache, x.). It called to mind the Father, in whose kingdom the new wine would be drunk (Mt 26^{29}, Lk 22^{16}). It was celebrated in remembrance of the Son, who sealed the new covenant with His blood (Mt 26^{28}, Mk 14^{24}, Lk 22^{19}); while the solemn reference to Christ's return to the Father and the coming thereby of His kingdom implies the work of the Holy Ghost (Lk 22^{18}). The wonderful discourses (Jn 14–17) on the mission of the Comforter were spoken in connexion with the Supper. The washing of the disciples' feet while at the table (Jn 13$^{5.13}$) symbolized the work of the Spirit. The worship of all who were here fed by the Son was charismatic (Ac 20^{7}), and conducted by men full of the Holy Ghost. Jesus said, 'this do in remembrance of me'; St. Paul said, 'till he come' (1 Co 11^{26}); the Spirit-filled disciple at the feast prayed especially to the Lord Jesus, saying, 'Come, Lord.' This appears as part of the ritual (Didache, x.), and St. Paul's use of it in the original 'Maran Atha' (1 Co 16^{22}) shows that it was already liturgical in NT days (cf. Rev 22^{20}). The object of adoration here, as in all worship, was the Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to promise (Mt 28^{20}), was invisibly present, feeding the Church, and guiding all her activities (Ac 1^{24} 2^{47} 4^{31}). The hymns of the Church must have started from this Christian Passover (Mt 26^{30}, Mk 14^{26}); they are all 'spiritual songs' (Eph 5^{19}), arising in men filled with the Holy Ghost (5^{18}, cf. Col 3^{16}), and without exception glorifying the Son of God (Eph 5^{20}, Col 3^{17}, 1 Ti 3^{16}, Rev 19$^{1-3.6f.}$ 11$^{17f.}$ 4^{11} 5$^{9-13}$). For St. Paul the Lord's Supper consisted in (1) a celebration of the Lord's death, and (2) communion with the glorified Christ (1 Co 11$^{24f.}$ 10$^{16f.}$). This κοινωνία of the body and blood of Christ, which united all to worship the Son, was the creative work of the Spirit, which made a group of individuals a Church of God. After Pentecost, believers continued in this κοινωνία (Ac 2^{42}), which was a gift of the Spirit (v.^{38}). The Holy Ghost led believers at the Communion Supper to break bread in memory of the Son and offer prayer to Him as Lord of all. From NT days onwards, the Spirit led Christians at the Lord's Supper to pray to Christ as both Creator and Redeemer (1 Co 10$^{21.26}$, Didache, ix.); and in both offices He was inseparable from the Father. The communion of the Lord's Supper was 'unto the κοινωνία of His Son Jesus Christ,' to which we are called by the Father (1 Co 1^{9}); and in it as the family gathering of the Holy Brotherhood 'the communion of the Holy Ghost' was indispensable (2 Co 13^{14}). The community of goods (Ac 2$^{42f.}$), which was an enlargement of the Lord's Table to provide for the poor of the Church, arose through men 'all filled with the Holy Ghost' (Ac 4$^{31.32}$), speaking the word of God and witnessing to the glorified Christ (v.^{33}). And the sin of Ananias and Sapphira against this communion —St. Paul calls the contribution for the saints a κοινωνία (Ro 15^{26})—was lying to the Holy Ghost (Ac 5$^{3.9}$). The men chosen to serve these tables of the Lord and His poor were 'full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom' (6^{3}); and when the first of them, Stephen, began to preach, his gospel was the Most High God and the Glorified Christ, whom he adored as Lord. In urging the Jews to be saved, he declared that opposition to God and His Christ was resisting the Holy Ghost (7$^{48.59.51}$). The NT connects also the sacrament of Baptism and that of the Supper. The one was God's Israel marching in covenant with the Lord through the sea; the other was the spiritual meat and drink given to feed them by the way (1 Co 10$^{1-4}$ 12^{13}). And, what is very important, both sacraments profess faith in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. St. Paul sees in Baptism a profession of fellowship with the Son (Ro 6^{3}, 1 Co 1^{13}), into whom believers are baptized by the Spirit (1 Co 12^{13}), showing that he agrees with Mt 28^{19}; and in the Supper, which commemorates the Son, he says we 'drink of the Spirit' (1 Co 12^{13}; cf. Nösgen, ii. 333). The sent Son and the sent Spirit appear in both sacraments as the only way to communion with God. The Lord's Supper embodies the thought of covenant with the Father through confession of the Son. Jesus called it a new covenant in His blood (Mk 14^{24}). To eat and drink of this Supper was a test of loyalty to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (1 Co $10^{20.\ 16}$ $11^{22.\ 20.\ 29}$ 12^{13}; cf. Mk 14^{18}, Lk 13^{26} 24^{30}, Jn 13^{18}). At the foot of the cross the sacrificial meal of loyalty to Christ was eaten. It was a place of spiritual life or death; hence St. Paul, following Jesus (1 Co 11^{23}, Jn 8^{44}), sees the alternative here to be the kingdom of God or the kingdom of Satan; table of the Lord Jesus or table of the devil; Spirit of God or spirit of evil,—that is the crucial confession-test at the Holy Supper (1 Co $10^{16\text{-}21}$ 12^{3}). The charismatic communicant, speaking excitedly with tongues, might seem unworthy to sit down at the Lord's Table; St. Paul's supreme and only criterion is, 'No man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost' (12^{3}). The test of every Christian in all worship, including the most sacred service of the Lord's Supper, was belief in the Holy Ghost, who testified to the Divine Son, who came forth from the Father. The real presence of the Son of God, set forth in the bodily symbol of the broken bread, experienced in the communing Church, which is the body of Christ, ever one with her Divine Head, and witnessed to by the Holy Ghost, without whose presence there can be no Christian worship, is a doctrine of the NT to which the Church in all ages has borne testimony. In the believer's experience, as in the Bible history of redemption, this doctrine grows upon him. Not till the OT revelation ended was it evident that God was Father; only the Son could perfectly reveal the Father. Not till Jesus had finished His work and returned to the Father was it fully evident that He was the Divine Christ; only the Holy Ghost could perfectly reveal the Son of God. And not till the Church has ended her work on earth and become glorified with her Lord, and the historically revealed economic Spirit has completed her sanctification, will the Divinity and Personality of the Holy Ghost be perfectly manifest. Only in the heavenly life, where the Spirit may cease to be subjective and inseparable from our spirit in religious consciousness, will His distinctive character appear as manifest as that of the Father and the Son.

LITERATURE.—There is no recent literature on this subject. See art. GOD IN NT in vol. i. Besides the works quoted in the text and the sections in *Bibl. SUMMARY.
Literature.

This article is intended not simply to state what the teaching of the Bible on the subject of Revelation is, but also to show what is the nature of the revelation preserved in the Bible, and what are the wider relations to human thought and life held by it. It will deal accordingly with the philosophy, the history, the doctrine, and the evidence of Revelation. Topics already discussed in previous volumes will again be referred to, but the new point of view from which they will be regarded should prevent repetition, and, wherever possible, reference to previous articles will take the place of detailed treatment. The subject will be handled with this intention and under these limitations.

i. THE PHILOSOPHY OF REVELATION.—1. The present position regarding the Bible.—It is generally admitted that a great change in theological thought has taken place during the last century, especially in regard to the Bible. We cannot now think of it as our fathers did. We cannot believe that its science must determine our view of nature; that its historic records can never be convicted of mistake; that its every part alike gives us the whole counsel of God; that the imperfect morality which is found in some whom it commends as holy, or commissions as teachers, must be explained by the discovery of mystic meanings; that every word it utters regarding man's duty, devotion, and destiny must be accepted as authoritative. This change of attitude regarding the Scriptures is due to several causes. Firstly must be mentioned the ethical spirit of the age. In the records of the Bible, deeds are reported and approved in the name of God as done by men recognized as servants of God which our conscience must condemn. There are views of God's relation to men presented which contradict man's consciousness of freedom, on which his moral duty and worth alike depend. Can God approve injustice and cruelty? Can man be the creature of a Divine omnipotence? Such questions are being asked, and cannot be answered without considerable modification of the traditional views of the Scriptures. Secondly, science has been making many discoveries, if also manufacturing a few theories. Everywhere it finds unbroken order, unchanging law, continuous development. In claiming that miracle and inspiration are possible the Bible seems to come into conflict with science, and harmony can be restored only by a reconsideration of current conceptions regarding the Bible. Thirdly, the philosophical conception of evolution, which has so transformed every mode of man's mental activity, has been brought to bear on the Scriptures with results in many ways opposed to the thoughts which have hitherto ruled in the Christian Church. Lastly, the literary and historical criticism of the writings themselves has led to conclusions about date, authorship, mode of composition, literary character, and historical value, which are very far removed from the opinions on these matters which have been handed down in the Church. On these grounds, the common views about the Bible hitherto held are being very widely and boldly challenged.

But, on the other hand, we seem to be furnished now with a more secure foundation on which we may build our apology for the worth of the Scriptures. For, firstly, within the last century philosophy in the person of the idealist thinkers of Germany has become more favourable to religion, recognizing its use and worth in making man rational, and accepting the conception of God as the necessary, ultimate principle of thought. In more recent sociological theory the value of religion in moralizing man has been recognized. Without expecting very much help from philosophy and science in vindicating the claims of the Bible, we must yet acknowledge that the much more respectful attitude towards religion which now generally prevails among thinkers does offer the promise of more careful and sympathetic consideration of any defence of the Scripture which may be advanced. And, secondly, what calls itself the science of Comparative Religion has shown that man is everywhere religious, even as he is rational and moral, although the forms in which these higher activities are expressed are often imperfect and inadequate. Although the discoveries made in this inquiry regarding man's religion have sometimes been used to discredit the unique value of the Bible, yet in an impartial comparison with other religions Christianity need not fear that it will lose its pre-eminence, nor will the Holy Writings of our faith fail to assert their superiority. Keeping these general considerations in view, we may now apply ourselves more closely to the subject of Revelation with special reference to the Scriptures. In dealing with this, it will not be enough to inquire what claim the Bible makes for itself, and what worth the Christian consciousness assigns to it; it will be necessary to verify this claim, and vindicate this worth in relation to man's thought and life. It is the purpose of this preliminary philosophical discussion, therefore, to show that man's nature implies religion, and religion revelation, and revelation inspiration; but that while all these belong to man as man, yet the perfect religion, the ultimate revelation, and the authoritative inspiration are found in only one Person, who is, however, so related to a historical development going before and to a historical development following after Him, that He cannot be viewed apart from their record, or they be seen apart from Him.

2. Man and Religion.—It must be here assumed that the attempt to explain man empirically—that is, as a product of nature—has failed, and that he must be interpreted ideally, as a person in and yet above the process of nature. If Materialism, or Naturalism, or Agnosticism be true, then human religion is a delusion, and Divine revelation an impossibility. But none of these theories can offer a guarantee for the truth of science, or a reason for the claims of conscience; and each of them fails to explain all that man feels to have the highest worth for him. Idealism alone can so interpret man as not to lower the value of his spiritual interests and pursuits. What, then, is the idealist interpretation of man? As rational, he seeks truth, the harmony of thought and being; as moral, he seeks what from different points of view may be described as holiness or freedom, or the harmony of law and will; as emotional, he seeks what from different points of view may be described as blessedness or love, the harmony of his whole self with his whole environment. Now, although these ideals are not always consciously present to his mind, even although they may disguise themselves in the forms of lower desires and expectations, yet they are ever determining his actions both as motive for and as end of his development. These ideals as realized in one Being afford man his conception of God. Of course it is not affirmed that man's religious consciousness reaches this conception by any such analysis or argument; all that is here indicated is that man's ideal nature adequately interpreted implies the conception of God, and that his belief in his ideal involves his faith in a reality corresponding thereto, for such a reality alone can afford him the assurance that his ideal can be realized. Unless the intelligence and the intelligible world have their ground in one reason, the harmony of thought and being can never be reached; unless the activity of man can be derived from the same character as is expressed in moral standards, the harmony of will and law seems unattainable; unless the same purpose is expressed in the desires of men and the process of the world, there will be no escape from the struggle of the self and the environment. Man has ever sought to form relations with, by rendering services to, or seeking benefits from the Being on whom he is proved by his very nature dependent, and with whom, as rational, moral, emotional, he claims affinity. The communion of God and man finds expression in Religion, which from a speculative standpoint may be defined as necessary, and from a historical as universal. It is true that attempts have been made to prove that there are peoples without religion; but in the instances produced it has subsequently been found that closer investigation modified first impressions; and, even should there be any doubt left in a few cases, it can be confidently asserted that peoples without religion have not yet reached the full development of their humanity. Without attempting now to disprove the contentions of the thinkers who do not interpret man's morality and religion as true, but account for them as fictitious, we may assert that the origin of religion cannot be inconsistent with its functions. If man's ideal implies religion, its origin lies not in what is lowest but in what is highest in him. Imperfect as were the forms in which the instincts, impulses, and intuitions of religion at first were manifested, yet we have warrant in the history of religions for concluding that man's consciousness of God developed along with his consciousness of self and the world. The communion he sought with God had necessarily the inadequacy of his purposes for himself, or the uses he made of the world. If religion be thus implied in man as mind and heart and will, the inquiry as to the organ of religion in him is evidently due to a misconception of its nature. Religion is not one of a number of spiritual functions; it is the relation between man's whole personality and the Being who is its ground, law, type, ideal, in whom all his varied functions have their source and reason. Hence religion has his whole nature as its organ, and finds expression in all his spiritual functions. Religion is not primarily or exclusively intellectual (Hegel), or moral (Kant), or emotional (Schleiermacher), but embraces mind and will and heart alike. Just as man responds to his natural environment in knowledge, feeling, deed, so does he respond to his spiritual environment in reason, conscience, reverence. His consciousness of God is at least as varied as his consciousness of the world, or of his own self. But in the history of religions the proportion and harmony of these three elements has not been maintained. Religion as truth and as righteousness has often been subordinated to religion as the satisfaction of emotions. This is sought in worship, from which all intellectual and all moral elements cannot be altogether excluded. In Greece, for instance, we find the popular idolatry completely divorced from the ethical inquiry of a Socrates and the speculative effort of a Plato. The intellectual and moral content of religion has again and again been allowed to fall behind the stage reached by science and morality, while the ritual elements were made unduly prominent. Yet it is quite evident that the consciousness of God ought to have a content adequate to the demands of reason and the dictates of conscience. The religious development of mankind has not been normal; it has been disturbed and perverted by sin. Renewal as well as progress is needed. Hence God's activity in religion must be redemptive as well as perfecting.

3. Religion and Revelation.—It follows from the very nature of religion that God is active as well as man. If man raises himself above his natural to his spiritual environment, from self and world to God, God responds to that approach; nay, it is to the attraction of this spiritual environment that man yields. Unless religion is a delusion, man is not holding intercourse merely with a transfigured self or an idealized world. Religion is not an imagination, which robs the world of its finitude, or lifts the self above its limitations. It is because neither the world nor the self is adequate to his ideal conceptions, or can satisfy his ideal necessities as a spiritual being, that man in religion elevates himself to a region not of his own abstractions, but where Divine reality meets him, and enters into reciprocal relations with him. The truth, pureness, and power of religion depend on the completeness of this elevation. When the consciousness of self or the world dominates, we have conceptions of God false and unworthy. Paganism never so delivered itself from the consciousness of the world as to rise to a true and pure conception of God. Its deities remain natural beings, and therefore not ideally rational or moral. When it did rise above the consciousness of the world, and even strove to rise above the consciousness of self, it reached a pantheism in which God was merely τὸ ἕν or τὸ ὄν. Neither by observation of the world nor by contemplation of the self can the consciousness of God be reached, for neither is adequate to give content to the conception. The world may suggest a final purpose and an ultimate cause, the relation of the self to the world a common ground for both, the self reason and righteousness transcending man's, so much truth there is in speculative theism. But, nevertheless, no effort of man, unaided of God, has reached His reality. Not through nature nor in self does man know God, but only as God makes Himself known. Just as for his natural existence man and nature must be in reciprocal relations, so for his spiritual experience must man and God be alike active. To deny God's action on man in his religion is to destroy its truth, worth, and claim. His religious knowledge is not self-projection, his religious life is not self-subjection, his religious feeling is not self-satisfaction. So to treat religion is not to interpret it as true, but to account for it as fictitious, however necessary and universal the fiction may be allowed to be. Or to explain religion as the action of nature on man is equally to contradict its essential character. It is further to deny that God can have reciprocal relations with the spirit who has affinity with Himself. It is to affirm that God who is absolutely, and man who is relatively, above nature can have no personal relations except through nature; that God, who is communicative, cannot communicate unless under such conditions as make the communication inadequate for His bounty and man's need; that God is unable to constitute such direct relations with man as a complete human development demands. This is to subject both God and man to nature. If man in religion is conscious of elevating himself above nature that he may more completely ally himself with God, shall we say that God is unable so to detach Himself from nature that He may respond to man's effort? May we not believe rather that God stands in such personal relations to man that He can out of His own fulness meet the need of Himself which He has implanted; that the spirit that seeks for knowledge of Him, because it has been made for it, will gain it, and not be mocked by a transfigured self or an idealized world? Yet mystic thinkers have been mistaken when they thought that God could be known only in abstraction from the consciousness of self and the world. It is not by losing the finite consciousness that the Infinite reality is known. Nay, it is in such an elevation and purification of the consciousness of self and the world as carry us beyond their finitude and reveal to us their absolute source and purpose. This is a real distinction, the verbal expression of which is not easy. We do not know God apart from the world and self, and yet we know Him as different, though not separated, from both. We do not leave the world and the self behind when we rise to God, but we see the self and the world in God. Although God is manifested, yet He is not exhausted in world and self. God has a revelation of Himself in nature and history on the one hand, and man's own spiritual being on the other; but that revelation cannot be identified with human discovery in the realm of nature, human reflexion on the course of history, human insight into character. All these human activities imply Divine action, as in God we live, and move, and have our being; yet, to be in the full sense a revelation to man, nature and history, reason and conscience must become the organs of a Divine activity, not of creation, or preservation, or government only, but distinctly of self-communication. Nature as a succession of phenomena, history as a series of events, and personality as an organism of varied functions, are not revelations, but become so when man knows that in them God is speaking to him, and making Himself known.

This revelation, it is to be understood, is permanent and universal. It is not to be supposed that the spiritual activity of man, which seeks God in nature, history, self, summons into activity the spiritual self-revealing function of God; but all these media of Revelation are to be conceived as permanently and universally so related to God that they constitute His manifestations, and man is so made that he interprets them as such when in religion he seeks God. But man's receptivity does not always and everywhere respond to this activity of God. While he is made for intercourse with God, he does not maintain it unbroken; nay, he may even suffer it altogether to cease. God is still active, but man is not responsive. The consciousness of self and of the world are raised into a false independence of the consciousness of God; and, it may be, ultimately exclude it, or so pervert it as to make it but the expression of spiritual deformity. Man's responsiveness to this permanent and universal Divine activity must not only be stimulated and sustained, but the consciousness of self and the world must be put in their true and right relation to the consciousness of God. But since, as the history of heathenism has shown, this consciousness of God has not been mediated, but perverted by the consciousness of self and the world, God must in thought be first detached from self and the world, that the right and true relation may at last be apprehended and appreciated. In other words, God's transcendence must be asserted, in order that His immanence may be understood. The spiritual vision, so to behold God as above and beyond nature and history, is lacking to man, as neither his inner nor outer experience can stimulate or sustain it, and therefore God, who is Himself the light, must bestow on men the sight to behold Him. These objective and subjective requirements have been met in that special revelation of God, the literature of which lies before us in the Holy Scriptures.

4. Revelation and Inspiration.—In passing from general to special revelation, we must take note of a certain ambiguity which attaches to the common use of the term 'revelation.' The sense in which the term has been used in the previous discussion is this. Nature, history, conscience, reason, are so constituted that they show what God is; but man has not received this knowledge in its purity and completeness, for he does not know God as He makes Himself known. His receptivity to the Divine revelation must be restored, so that his consciousness of God, obscured and perverted, may be purified and perfected. God must, on the one hand, so act on him as to make him capable of this purified and perfected consciousness; and, on the other hand, that there may be continuity in his spiritual development, this consciousness of God must be mediated by a progressive purifying and perfecting of his consciousness of self and the world. This action of God on the nature of man we call 'inspiration'; its result, the perfected and purified consciousness of self and the world and God, is 'revelation.' The latter term is sometimes loosely used for the subjective process as well as the objective product, but it is desirable that the method and the purpose of God's action be thus distinguished, and the term Inspiration be reserved for the one and the term Revelation for the other. While the essential content of this revelation is the character and purpose of God, the contingent form is the consciousness of the self and the world of the inspired agent. It is quite possible to imagine that this Divine action might have been universal; and yet, if we consider what is God's method in the progress of the race, we shall recognize that this restriction of inspiration to individuals is not contrary to but in accord with it. Although the form of St. Paul's argument raises great difficulties for our thought, yet the fact must be admitted that there is a Divine election of individuals and nations. God deals with mankind as one body, of which the several members have not one function, but are mutually dependent. Science, art, philosophy, culture of many kinds, is the Greek's contribution to the treasures of mankind. From the Roman the nations have learned law, order, government. The speciality of the Hebrew was religion. Each function was assigned to each people, not for self-enrichment only but also for mankind's greater good. As limitation of effort and concentration of energy are the necessary conditions of the greatest efficiency and fullest service, it would seem that in no one people could all the functions of a complete humanity be developed: to each must be assigned the development of one function, the results of this development in each being in course of time made the property of all. If we compare the historic peoples with the savage races, we may ask, Why has God made them so to differ? Surely the answer is, that to the historical peoples may be given the generous task of imparting the treasures of thought and life, which they have won by ages of toil and struggle, to the savage races, who may have been incapable of gaining them for themselves. The Parable of the Labourers has an application to the history of the world. The labourers hired at the eleventh hour also received a penny. It is to be remembered that God's election is to service through sacrifice, as the world's saviours are also its sufferers. As the Hebrew people was chosen to be the school of the knowledge of God for the world, the lessons were taught in national pain, loss, ruin. This revelation was not only limited in space, but also conditioned by time. A perfect revelation would be wasted on an imperfect nation. Religion, or man's receptivity for God's communication, can make progress only as conscience and reason, morals and institutions are developed. That a revelation may be effective for the ends for which it is intended, it must be adapted to the stage of growth of the persons to whom it is given. Accordingly, the idea of evolution, the application of which has been so fruitful in other branches of knowledge, not only may but must be utilized in the interpretation of this revelation. Viewed from this standpoint, it shows a steady if slow progress, not without relapses followed by recoveries, yet with the dominant tendency to truer thought, purer worship, and better life, until in Jesus Christ the promise of the Hebrew religion found its fulfilment, and from Him went forth the power which has made, and is still making, the Christian religion the final and perfect satisfaction of man's need of God. The theoretic proof of the superiority of the Christian to all other religions is being confirmed by the practical proof that, wherever it is known and understood, the imperfections of the religion hitherto cherished are recognized, and its higher claim and greater worth are acknowledged. In its idea of God as Father it offers the truest object for faith; in its law of love it affords both the highest principle and the strongest motive for morality; in its promise of eternal life it inspires the brightest hope; and in the salvation from sin it offers it delivers mankind from its greatest danger and meets its deepest need.

Before passing to consider more closely the history of this revelation, two remarks, for which the preceding discussion affords the warrant, may be added. Firstly, there is no religion without revelation. In so far as men have sincerely sought God, however inadequate their conceptions or imperfect their methods, He has been really found of them. The truth and worth of any religion depends on the measure of man's responsiveness to God's revelation. Secondly, we cannot altogether deny the inspiration of the great religious personalities who have in any degree reformed or revived religion, such as Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, and Mohammed. In so far as they saw any clearer light than their contemporaries, God gave them sight; but, as any revelation which came through them has done immeasurably less for man's progress than the revelation in Christ, they cannot be regarded as His rivals, but at best as tutors to lead to Him.

ii. THE HISTORY OF REVELATION.—1. Characteristics of OT revelation.—In dealing with this history it will not be necessary to enter into any minute details, as these have already been presented in such articles as ISRAEL in vol. ii. and OLD TESTAMENT in vol. iii., but the characteristic features and decisive factors may be briefly shown. The revelation was to and by individuals, lawgivers, judges, priests, and prophets—men who were chosen, called, and fitted by God to be the teachers and leaders of their fellow-countrymen, rebuking their sins, withstanding their unbelief, correcting their mistakes as to God's relation to men, communicating His will and His purpose, and announcing His judgments and His promises. Otherwise it could not have been; for just as peoples are chosen for special functions, so in these peoples persons are chosen, by whose enlightenment and stimulus they are fitted for the discharge of their respective functions. To the minds and hearts and wills of a few men God commits His message and mission to the many. But these few are not isolated from or independent of the society for which their work is done. Not only do the words and works of the individual not suffice for the full expression of the content of Divine revelation, but he in isolation would be incapable of being the organ of Divine communication. As the individual lives not to himself but for society, God's will for him cannot be expressed apart from His purpose for society. God's moral commands, involving as these do the relations of men to one another, can find adequate expression only in the customs, laws, and manners of a society. So communion with God for its variety and vigour needs community with men. If an individual message is not to be wasted, it must be delivered to a society with a measure of responsiveness. But this involves that each teacher or leader does not stand quite alone, but that he has entered into other men's labours, and that he is sowing seed of which others will reap the fruit. Each is continuing a work already begun, and is transferring to others a task waiting to be completed. There must be this inheritance from the past, and this bequest to the future at each stage; for the whole counsel and purpose of God cannot be communicated at once. As God's communication must at each stage be conditioned by man's receptivity, and the development of that receptivity was very gradual, the revelation was progressive. Men were led from lower to higher thoughts of God, from poorer to richer life in God, from narrower to wider hope from God. We must, to complete our conception of the process of revelation, not only consider God's action through the inspiration of men, but must also take into due account God's guidance of the whole course of the history of the people for whom this revelation was intended, and His control of all the events which affected its fortunes and development; for what God had done or was doing in judgment or mercy to punish or to save, was the content of the message and mission of the leaders or teachers. It was not through nature that God discovered Himself; it was not by brooding over their own inner life that God's spokesmen found the word of the Lord. They read the signs of the times in the rise and fall of empires; in famine, pestilence, and invasion; in the wrongs and miseries of the poor, and the tyranny and luxury of the rich; in moral and social conditions as well as in political circumstances: and the signs of the times were to them a Divine language. Accordingly, the history must be included in the revelation, in the measure in which God was seen to be acting, or was heard to be speaking by the inspired persons in all events and experiences. The external history afforded the occasion for the internal revelation, but did not limit its range, as inspired men learned and taught more about God than was immediately suggested by facts. It would be to ignore the most prominent feature of this history not to lay special stress on the redemptive character of it. God again and yet again showed Himself to be a Saviour in delivering His people from the evils which they had brought upon themselves by their transgression. The Exodus from Egypt and the Return from Babylon, to mention only the most momentous instances, were both decisive factors in the process of God's revelation.

2. Limitation of God's action.—It is by so viewing the history of Revelation in a nation that we escape some difficulties to which we expose ourselves, if we consider only the inspiration of individuals. It has often been asked, why should we restrict inspiration to Hebrew lawgiver, or judge, priest, or prophet, and refuse it to Greek sage or Roman statesman? Without entangling ourselves in any abstract psychological discussion about the subjective process of inspiration, we can answer the question by pointing out first of all, that, whatever true or holy utterance regarding God or the spiritual order may have fallen from the lips of Greek sage or Roman statesman, it was not addressed to a society, conscious of itself as discharging a Divine function in the world, as constituted by a Divine covenant and regulated by a Divine law; did not connect itself immediately with prior Divine utterances, which were alike the condition of its intelligibility and the basis of its authority; did not mark a stage in the progressive development of the knowledge of God, and of a moral and religious life corresponding thereto. We may most gladly admit that every good and perfect gift is from above, from the Father of lights, and that all truth concerning God is of God; yet we must maintain that such isolated, and for the most part impotent, utterances cannot have for us the same significance as utterances which find their due place and play their needful part in the expression of an ever more adequate and influential knowledge of God in a progressive national history. The distinctively religious character of this history is usually recognized, but is variously explained. The Hebrew people has been credited with a genius for religion, an innate tendency towards monotheism, a passion for righteousness. It has accordingly been maintained that we do not need to recognize in this progress any but the ordinary historical factors. Just as the Greeks had the genius of arts and letters, and the Romans the genius of law, so the Hebrews had the genius of religion. But the very phrase in which the function of this people in the world-economy is expressed, forces us to recognize what is claimed for itself by the literature which this genius has produced. If the argument developed in the previous section is valid, religion implies a reciprocal relation of God and man. The consciousness of the world and the self cannot constitute, although they may mediate, the consciousness of God. Nay, those tend to pervert or even exclude this, unless restrained and corrected by an intensified religious life, which is an increased responsiveness to the presence and action of God. Hence a genius for religion implies an activity of God which a genius for art and letters, or for law, does not. The character and the result of religious genius implies a revelation of God by Himself as no other genius does. But besides this consideration, two other evidences of the Divine action in Hebrew history may be indicated. On the one hand, we do not find any of the peoples who had the closest racial affinity to the Hebrews display any innate tendency towards monotheism, or any passion for righteousness; and, on the other, the history of the nation itself shows with what difficulty and delay it learned the lessons of faith and duty, which God was giving to it both by His dealings with it in events, and by His teaching of it by His messengers.

3. Fulfilment of the OT revelation in Jesus Christ.—This revelation has its issue and consummation in Jesus Christ. As religion seeks to bring man into such reciprocal relations with God that there may be a community of thought, feeling, and life, in His God-manhood religion had its ideal realized. As the purpose of revelation is to communicate to man such a knowledge of God as shall be adequate to answer the questions of his mind regarding God, to satisfy the longings of his heart for God, to determine his actions by the will of God, in the consciousness of Jesus, who knew the Father as He was known of the Father, in the testimony of Jesus, who being in the bosom of the Father has declared Him, revelation reached its goal. But we must add, inasmuch as man's relation to God in religion had been disturbed, and his capacity to respond to God's revelation had been destroyed by sin, in Him also was accomplished that redemption from the guilt, power, lust, and curse of sin, and that restoration to the knowledge, love, and life of God, which made it possible for man to receive Christ's revelation of God and to enter on the realization of His ideal of religion. In completing, Christ transcended the Hebrew religion and revelation. He came in the fulness of the time, but He was sent into the world by the Father. Accordingly, we have to recognize in Him two aspects—a historical and a metaphysical, a natural and a supernatural. It is not within the scope of this article to discuss the evidence for His Divinity (see article JESUS CHRIST in vol. ii.). Let it suffice to assert that it seems to the writer impossible otherwise to account, without violation of all historical probability, for the records of His teaching, work, character, and influence which have come down to us; for the growth, the spread, and the worth of the society He founded; for the moral and spiritual forces which proceed from Him to transform the life of individuals, nations, races; and that it appears to him both true and right to regard the universe as the gradual fulfilment of a purpose of self-revelation in a series of existences of ever higher worth, greater truth, and nobler grace, which is not closed by man, capable under limitations of understanding and welcoming this revelation, but finds its most fitting and worthy close in the union of the Creator and the creature, the Word who became flesh. But be it noted that the truth, worth, and claim of the Christian religion and revelation depend on the reality of the Divine incarnation. There may be a better religion and a truer revelation, although our intelligence cannot conceive their character and content, if Christ be only one of the prophets. Only if He is the Son, can we be quite sure that we have found at last, and can never again lose, the infinite and eternal Father.

There cannot be an adequate discussion here of the doctrine of the Person of Christ. But to determine accurately the range and limits of the revelation in Him, the limitations necessarily involved in a Divine incarnation (see article INCARNATION in vol. ii.) must be recognized. We must inquire how far the mode, the form, and even the content, of His teaching was dependent on His relation to His age and His people. Without entering into the very complex problems which His knowledge raises, it seems necessary for the purpose of this article to state two general principles. Firstly, He knew all that it was necessary for Him to know, that, as Son, He might reveal the Father, and that, as Saviour, He might redeem mankind from sin and death, and restore it to truth, love, holiness, God. His was unerring moral insight and spiritual discernment. Secondly, as regards the facts about nature and history, which men can discover for themselves by the exercise of their faculties of perception and reasoning, He probably knew what and as His age and people knew. All questions about God's character and purpose, and man's duty and destiny, He can answer with infallible authority. But questions about the authorship of a writing, or the date of an event, or the cause of a disease, it was not His mission to answer; and, therefore, regarding all such matters we are warranted in believing that He emptied Himself of all Divine omniscience. Although we cannot account for Him by birth, training, surroundings, yet He must be interpreted through the thought and life of His age and race. As born of Mary and of the seed of David, as brought up in the home, and doubtless taught in the school at Nazareth, as seeking His knowledge of God in the beliefs, fulfilling the will of God in the laws, and observing the worship of God in the rites of Judaism, as linking His precepts with the commands, His words with the teaching, and His claims with the authority of the Hebrew Scriptures, He stands in close and constant relation to the Divine revelation to the Hebrew people. He so attached Himself to it, that we may trace along three lines its progress towards Him.

4. Christ's connexion with the OT.—The truth entrusted to the Hebrew people was the conception of the character and purpose of God (see article GOD in vol. ii.). As the Divine discipline of Israel advanced, this conception became richer, wider, purer. At first thought of as might, then as wisdom and righteousness, He is at last conceived as longsuffering, mercy, pity, even love. At first viewed as so bound up with the fortunes of His people that their disasters are His dishonour, He is at last seen to fulfil His larger ends in their loss and ruin. At first regarded as pleased with offerings and won by worship, He is at last recognized as served by pure hearts, clean hands, and true lips. To this spiritual and ethical prophetism, and not to the legal and ceremonial Judaism of His own time, did Jesus ally Himself, and gave to this teaching a wider range and a deeper reach. The conception of God has a very intimate connexion with the organization of life. In the Hebrew people the idea of God was in a pre-eminent degree the regulative principle of life, the national law, and the social morality. All the teaching of the prophets and all the efforts of the reformers were directed to bring the life of the people into accord with its faith. It was this morality which Jesus accepted, unfolding its full meaning, and applying its principles to the inward motives as well as the outward actions, making wider the circle of those to whom the duties were due, correcting imperfections which had been allowed for the hardness of men's hearts, but, above all, supplying stronger and sweeter motives in the recognition of man's filial relationship to God, by the inspiration of His own moral enthusiasm and example, and by the constraining love of gratitude to Him for His sacrifice and salvation. As God came to be more clearly known, and the claims of righteousness to be more fully recognized, a need was more and more felt. The loftier the view of God and His will became, the greater did men's shortcomings appear to be. Of this sense of need was born the hope (see article MESSIAH in vol. iii.) of God's help; and just as God was known to be merciful as well as just, did this hope gain assurance; and just as men learned their helplessness and the failure of all their efforts at reform, did the hope gain urgency; and just as they learned in national disaster God's method of dealing with sin, did the hope gain distinctness. The true Messianic hope was born of a moral need, and grew for a religious end. The false Messianic hope was the offspring of an unethical patriotism and an unspiritual bigotry. Christ fulfilled the true Messianic hope, and was rejected by the Jewish people because He would not accept the false; yet even this true Messianic hope He transcended. Whatever was merely national, legal, ceremonial, had no fulfilment; only what was universal, ethical, spiritual, was realized in Him. He did not leave what He took from the Old Testament as He found it, but transformed it, and it is only as fulfilled by Christ that the older revelation has authority for the Christian Church.

5. Relation of Christ to the NT.—Between the two Testaments there is not only an interval of time, there is also a change of religious thought and life. A trinitarian conception of God takes the place of a unitarian; instead of a national there is an individual and thus universal relation of man to God: a ceremonial is superseded by a spiritual worship of God; an outward is changed to an inward morality; the hope of a deliverance promised yields to the assurance of a salvation possessed. Of course these contrasts are subject to some qualification, as there are parts of the OT which anticipate some of the higher elements of the NT, and there are features in the Apostolic Church as presented in the NT which are survivals of the lower elements of the OT. But that a new creation had been accomplished, no one comparing the two literatures can doubt. How can the NT be accounted for? Not by a mythical process (Strauss), nor by polemical tendencies (Baur), but by the historical person and work, life and death of Jesus Christ. The writers of the Gospels and Epistles give us what is an adequate explanation of their character and contents. In Jesus they had learned to recognize and confess not only the Messiah, but the Son of the living God, in more than the Messianic sense, even the Lord from heaven, and the Word who became flesh. As Healer and Teacher He stood alone above other men. He could not be ensnared by sin, or holden of death. As Crucified, He was to them the power and the wisdom of God unto salvation. In Him, as Risen and Ascended, God was reconciling the world unto Himself. This conception of Him which they give us as not only His own claim for Himself, but as the witness of their own experience of what He had been to them in the flesh or was still in the Spirit, is in perfect harmony with the words which they report as falling from His lips, and the deeds which they record as done by His hands. The Evangelical history and the Apostolic interpretation are in perfect unison. Whatever common sources the Evangelists used, each writes from his own standpoint, and their representations agree. It is unintelligible and incredible that this portrait of sinless perfection and gracious beauty can be a work of the imagination, and not a copy of reality. Four imperfect men could not have succeeded in producing this harmonious picture. Surely the impression and influence of the Original so inspired the writers that they were able to preserve for all time and all lands the grace and glory of the life of which only for a short time a few men were the witnesses.

But the NT offers not only this record, but also an interpretation; and there is at present a tendency to distinguish these two very sharply from one another. Some scholars and thinkers strive to free Christianity as Jesus taught it from the Hellenistic metaphysics of St. John and the Rabbinic exegesis of St. Paul. We must, therefore, inquire whether the Apostolic interpretation does not belong to the revelation in Christ, whether in disowning St. John's philosophy and St. Paul's theology we are not refusing Christ's own testimony to Himself by His Spirit in St. John and St. Paul. It seems necessary to insist that not only Christ's consciousness of Himself, but also the Christian consciousness of Him, belongs to His revelation. If the Person and work of Christ are the objective cause in the revelation, the spiritual contemplation of St. John and the moral conflict of St. Paul are the subjective effect; and the one should not be separated from the other. To know Christ fully, we must not only know what He said and did Himself, but also what He made of the men who fully surrendered themselves to His grace and truth. To grasp His truth in its entirety, we must know it not only as expressed in Him, but also as it finds expression in men of varied capacity and different character. He must present Himself not only as the perfect ideal, but also as the sufficient power for realizing that ideal in imperfect men. When we see Him taking men so different from Himself in nature, habit, character, and making them like Himself, the crooked straight and the rough plain, then only do we learn the fulness of power and the surety of promise which dwell in Him. Because in St. John's conception of the Person of Christ we can discern his mental habits, and in St. Paul's doctrine of Christ's work we can discover his character and experiences, it by no means follows that either of them is false. Nay, rather it follows that Christ evoked what was truest in St. John and best in St. Paul, and that the mind of the one and the soul of the other enable us better to understand Christ, who made them both what they were. He was the centre of numberless relations, the source of countless developments, the cause of manifold influences. Through many varied personalities He needed to exhibit the content of His Person. With regard to St. Paul especially there is an inclination among those whose spiritual experience has not afforded them the ability to understand his, to maintain that his views about sin and grace are morbid, exaggerated, unnatural, too much coloured by the Judaism which he claimed to have laid aside, too much involved in the legalism which he professed to be contending against. The lack of such an experience as St. Paul's gives no man the right or reason to deny its worth, which has been proved to many in the history of the Christian Church because they have shared it. To the present writer, at least, it seems beyond all doubt that without St. Paul's interpretation of the relation of Christ to sin, law, death, grace, and life, the revelation of God in Christ would not have been complete. Is not St. Paul's view of the Cross one of those truths which Christ could not fully disclose to His disciples, because they could not bear it, but into which the Spirit of truth led them? Is it altogether vain to suggest that St. Paul never knew Christ according to the flesh that he might gain his knowledge of Christ in the Spirit through inward struggle and anguish, and might thus in his writings give expression to an experience through which many after him would be called to pass? St. Paul's interpretation of Christ's work has not lacked the confirmation of some of the most notable Christian experiences. The criticism which imagines that when it has traced the exegetical methods of St. Paul to the Rabbinic schools, or the philosophical terminology of St. John to Alexandrian speculation, it has adequately accounted for what is distinctive in them, deludes itself. Behind their words there is their personal experience. These but afford the form, that gives the content. Had St. John not seen all in Christ and Christ in all, the doctrine of the Logos had never been. Had St. Paul not passed from sorrow and struggle to peace and power in Christ, he would never have construed the work of Christ as he does. The personalities have to be accounted for, and not merely their forms of speech traced. We may freely and frankly recognize much that was temporary and local in the modes of expressing the truth, and yet be warranted in asserting that the truth expressed is permanent and universal.

6. Limits of the NT revelation.—It may be objected, that if the Christian consciousness of Christ has authority even as the testimony of Christ to Himself, why should we limit this authority to the consciousness of St. Peter, St. John, St. Paul, and the other persons whose writings have found a place in the NT? Why should such works as the Imitation of Christ or the Pilgrim's Progress not be as authoritative as the Gospel of St. John or the Epistles of St. Paul? From the standpoint of this article the traditional answer, that the latter works are inspired and the former not, cannot be given, because the general principle assumed in this discussion is, that the inspiration of any writing in the distinctive sense in which we apply the term to the Holy Scriptures can be inferred only from its position and function in the history of revelation. The answer from this standpoint cannot be given in so few words, but it will be indicated as briefly as possible. Firstly, the men whose writings form the NT stood in an immediate historical relation to Christ, such as no men since have done. They were either eye-witnesses, or had received from eye-witnesses what they had declared. St. John had enjoyed intimate fellowship with Christ. St. Paul, though one 'born out of due time,' lived in such constant and intense realization of the Risen One that he could declare, 'to me to live is Christ.' St. James, although he was not the companion of Jesus during His earthly ministry, yet had known Him according to the flesh, and shared in that vivid and potent consciousness of the exalted Lord which was bestowed on the Church at Jerusalem after Pentecost. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, whoever he was, had connexion with the Church at a time when the Lord's presence, though withdrawn from sight, yet wrought signs and wonders among believers. As the history of the Canon (see articles CANON in vol. i., and OT CANON, NT CANON in vol. iii.) shows, the Christian consciousness hesitated about the admission of some writings, because they had not such warrant, or at least it was doubtful if they had. The value of the writings varies with the closeness of the contact of the writers with Jesus Christ. Secondly, a comparison of the writings which have been admitted with those which, though seeking admission, have been rejected, justifies the conclusion that the Christian consciousness, not as expressed in decrees of councils or the authority of bishops, but in a growing unanimity of use and esteem in the Churches, was guided by the Spirit of God in what it accepted as kindred with, and what it rejected as alien to, the deposit of truth and grace committed to it by Christ. That judgment has been confirmed by growing Christian experience. While some, because they lack the sympathetic insight, may reject this book or that, yet individual peculiarities are corrected by the general Christian consciousness. The critical questions which some of the books raise, such as 2 Peter and Jude, are as open as ever to discussion, and may result in the conclusion that these writings should have been excluded, and not included; but that does not affect the conviction that there is a limit to the books which the Christian consciousness will recognize as authoritative, because recording the revelation of God in Christ. Thirdly, this conviction is not without grounds in reason. It is altogether reasonable to conclude that those who were brought into contact with Christ Himself or with the Christian Church, in which He manifested His presence and power in an intensified spiritual life and in varied spiritual gifts, should be qualified by His Spirit authoritatively to interpret His mind and will. It is equally rational to conclude that this unique relation was destined to be, not permanent but temporary, continued only until the whole content of the unique personality of Christ, so far as was necessary for the practical ends of revelation, should find a place in the minds and win a hold on the wills of men. The introduction of so unique a Personality into the course of historical development must necessarily have established unique relations between Himself and those immediately connected with Him, and commissioned to proclaim and diffuse the truth historically exhibited in His Person. The varied relations in which men might stand to Him were then displayed; the limits to and the lines of the normal development of the Christian life were then indicated. Just as the seed, when it falls into fit soil, begins to grow, and has in it already, though undeveloped, the promise and the pattern of the full-grown plant, so the seed of the Divine life, finding its fit soil in the souls of disciples and apostles, displayed what is the type to which Christian life must conform. Not that the content was then fully developed, but that the form of that content and the laws of its development were then given. Fourthly, a note of revelation is originality. Religious life, however varied and intense, which is dependent on a past development and is not originative of a future development, cannot be accepted as a revelation. Hence, while Christianity is progressive, it is also permanent. It develops, but does not augment, 'the truth as it is in Jesus.' To suggest that religious works of later times may be equally inspired with the writings of the NT, is to ignore this characteristic of the revelation in the Son of God—a revelation which, as it has been shown, must include not only His own words and works, but also the interpretation of His person, which is given in the relations which He formed with, and the transformation which He wrought in, those who came into direct historic contact with Him in that manifestation of His presence and power which immediately accompanied His incarnation. We do not need to deny the high spiritual value of subsequent Christian literature, or doubt that it is the Spirit of God which is still guiding His people into truth. Nay, we should believe that God reveals Himself in the experience of every man whom in Christ He saves and blesses, and that his life in the Spirit is an inspired life; yet the revelation and the inspiration alike are mediated by faith in God's grace in Christ, and are therefore dependent on the original revelation and inspiration. We do not need to affirm that all the writings of the NT are equally inspired, and that no other books are inspired; but nevertheless we may acquiesce in the judgment of the Christian Church, that the Christian Revelation is presented adequately and effectively in the NT Scriptures.

7. Relation of Criticism to the history of Revelation.—In this sketch of the Christian revelation and its herald, the Hebrew, critical problems have not been discussed, not because the writer has ignored or been indifferent to their existence in forming his conclusions, but because the scope of the article seemed to him to exclude their treatment, and because in many other articles they have been fully dealt with. But a reference to the bearing of these questions on the conception of revelation cannot be altogether avoided. Whether myths, legends, and traditions were employed by the writers of the Hebrew records or not, whether the patriarchs were historical persons or personifications of tribal characteristics and relations, how much or how little was involved in the relation between Jehovah and Israel mediated by Moses, how far the prophets were innovators teaching new truths or conservators recalling old beliefs, what were the stages of the development of the Law before it assumed its final form in the Pentateuch, — these all are questions on which scholarship must be left to pronounce judgment. Questions of literary ethics, such as the use of older sources without acknowledgment, the composition of speeches for historical persons, the ascription of later developments of the ritual system or the moral code to Moses, the treatment of history from the religious standpoint of a later age, must be dealt with, not by applying modern standards but by recognizing the customs of each writer's age. That the critical reconstruction of the OT exhibits far more clearly than did the traditional views of date and authorship the progress of revelation, must be frankly admitted. That this progress is to be regarded as a merely natural evolution is a conclusion which no results of a legitimate and sober literary and historical criticism warrant, which involves philosophical and theological presuppositions, the acceptance of which must lead to the denial of the reality of a Divine revelation altogether, and which is contradicted, as will be shown in the next section of this article, by the testimony which the OT Scriptures bear to themselves. So long as criticism recognizes the presence and operation of God in the history of the Hebrew people, it may change our opinion of the mode, but it does not affect our conviction of the fact of a Divine revelation. The essential content of that revelation, the idea of God, the law of life, and the hope of salvation, as just described, will not be contradicted by any of these results. The idea of evolution seemed to many Christian thinkers a denial of the fact of creation; but now Christian theism has recovered from its panic, and confidently affirms that evolution is a creative mode and not a creating cause. So will it be with the results of criticism: it will be seen that it affects only the conception of the mode of revelation, and not the certainty of the fact. When we turn to the NT, it must be frankly conceded that Christian faith must be much more concerned about the results of criticism. If the portrait of Jesus is not substantially historical; if the witness of the Apostles to His resurrection, and the reception of the Spirit by them, is not to be believed; if St. Paul's interpretation of the Cross is nothing else or more than an individual, and in no way a typical experience; if St. John's doctrine of the Logos is a theological speculation, for which the historical Person of Jesus affords no justification,—then assuredly the character and content of Christian faith would be thoroughly changed, as the revelation of God in Christ would be essentially altered. Some indications have already been given how this criticism is to be met; but the fuller answer must be reserved until the last section of this article on the Evidences of Revelation has been reached.

8. Assumptions regarding the Supernatural.—Criticism may have much to tell us about the local and temporary forms of the revelation, about the personal characteristics and historical circumstances of the writers, about the literary methods of the writings,—in short, about the earthen vessel which holds the heavenly treasure; but the serious, even decisive, issue for faith lies not in any of these questions, however interesting, but in the affirmation or denial of the fact that God has spoken to mankind in the revelation, of which the Bible is the literature. In asserting this fact, care must be taken not to assume an untenable position. Even the most cautious criticism has made impossible the assumption of ultra-supernaturalism, which asserts the absolute infallibility and authority of all the writings in the Bible, which maintains that all human conditions are transcended by Divine revelation, so that its agents must have been raised quite above their individuality, environment, and stage of development into such a relation to God that the Divine content and the human form can be identified; that they may be regarded as altogether undetermined by their own capacity, character, or circumstances, and that accordingly the literature need not be interpreted by the history, as it may have no relation to the needs of the time when it was written, but may anticipate the needs of another age. The vehement defence which is sometimes met with of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, of the unity of Isaiah, of the accuracy of all the historical narratives, of the literal fulfilment of prophecy and apocalyptic, involves this assumption. This may for a long time yet remain the popular attitude, and here and there will be found a theologian in panic, who will seek to save the ark of God by appealing against the findings of scholarship to the prejudices and the passions of the multitude in the Churches; but in an article such as this it is not necessary to waste any effort in refuting it. What, on the contrary, is much more relevant to the present purpose, is to examine closely the opposite assumption of anti-supernaturalism, with which it would be unjustifiable to charge the Higher Criticism as a whole, but which does evidently account for some of the views advanced by some of its representatives.

Without at present entering on any detailed discussion of the subject of miracles (see article MIRACLE in vol. iii.) and inspiration, the denial of the supernatural operation of God in revelation must be dealt with. The denial may be due to either a supposed scientific interest or an assumed philosophical necessity; the uniformity of nature or the continuity of thought may be alleged as objections to the supernatural. So long as life, mind, and will cannot be explained by the simple application of the principle of causality, that is, so long as more complex forms of existence call for more adequate categories of thought, the uniformity of nature cannot be asserted so as to exclude the possibility of the supernatural, which is the highest conceivable category. The idea of evolution, with its recognition of a progress in which each successive stage transcends each preceding, is not a hindrance but a help to the belief in the supernatural; as it presents nature to us, not as a rigidly fixed system but as an ever-developing organism, full of surprises in its fresh manifestations, with a possible future inexplicable by its actual past. That personality in this progress appears as the highest stage, forbids the limitation of our conception of the whole process by the application of any of the lower categories, which are inadequate for the interpretation of this highest stage. And personality, which in its religious function reaches out beyond the natural to the supernatural, and recognizes not only its dependence on the order of nature beneath it, but also its affinity with the Maker of nature above it, itself holds the promise of unexhausted possibilities of existence. The categories of science do not explain all forms of being, and therefore cannot determine what may or may not be beyond the range of their application.

Without venturing on the unwarranted course of denying the possibility of the supernatural in the name of science, some writers try to get rid of it by denying the sufficiency of the evidence. But, in the estimate of the value of evidence, mental prejudice, if unconsciously, often affects the decision. Often when the trustworthiness of the witnesses is denied, they have been prejudged false witnesses on the assumption that miracles do not happen. How is it that many are prepared to accept as trustworthy the report of the sayings of Christ in the Gospels, and yet refuse to receive their record of His works? Is there not as much and as good evidence for the fact of the Resurrection as for any of the ordinary events of ancient history about which no doubt is felt? In this so-called scientific examination of the witnesses a philosophical presupposition is involved. Nature is conceived as a self-enclosed and self-sufficient system; but so to think of it is to allow the consciousness of the world to exclude the consciousness of God. When the attention is fixed on the world solely, then order, system, law become the guiding categories of thought. But when attention is turned to God also, then it is recognized that reason, character, will ought to be the predominant conceptions. In accordance with these the consciousness of the world must be transformed. The consciousness of the world suggests necessity, the consciousness of God freedom in the relation of God to the world; the former makes nature appear as a complete unity, the latter leads us to think of it as part of a larger whole; the former constrains us to look at nature as a sphere in which unvarying physical law maintains itself, the latter warrants us in regarding it as a scene in which a moral and spiritual purpose is being realized, to the accomplishment of which the physical order must be regarded as subordinate. The question of the probability of the supernatural is really identical with the question, whether the religious consciousness of God shall transform the scientific consciousness of the world, or the latter be allowed to determine the former. If we follow our religious consciousness, we shall be able to deal without prejudice with all the evidence for the supernatural submitted to us; if the scientific consciousness is allowed to rule over us, however much we protest our impartiality, the improbability of the supernatural will be an influential factor in our treatment of the evidence. The consciousness of God will also afford us the regulative principle in dealing with the narratives. We shall recognize that there is an assertion of the supernatural, due to ignorance of the laws which regulate unusual natural phenomena; that expectation of the supernatural has sometimes led to an assumption of it; that only such evidence to the supernatural can be accepted as valid as justifies it in relation to our consciousness of God, that is, in the supernatural there must be manifested Divine reason, righteousness, or grace. It is only if we view the world teleologically as the expression of Divine purpose that we can admit the supernatural, when it can be shown to be necessary to, and explicable by, the fulfilment of this end. In other words, we must be able to show an intelligible and credible reason why the supernatural order has been manifested in the natural.

A few words will suffice to meet the objection that the supernatural breaks the continuity of thought. If the world is viewed as the manifestation of the Idea or Reason, it is argued by some that no new factor can be admitted, but that each stage of the development must be explicable by that which precedes. But it may with reason be asked whether the limitation of the evolution of the Idea to the natural order is justified; whether we should not rather conceive that the rational system of the universe has the supernatural as the complement of the natural; whether man's thought has warrant to set limits to possible reality. This objection seems to be due to an exaggeration of the achievement and authority of man's self-consciousness. Let us recognize that there may be factors in the historic progress of revelation, inexplicable by our consciousness of ourselves or of the world, but of which the consciousness of God may afford the explanation. The world is something more than the evolution of categories, and its rationality vaster than any logical system. Reason is often set in opposition to revelation, but reason can give no adequate or satisfying interpretation of the world or of self without the regulative conception of God; and reason cannot develop for itself the full content of this conception without religion, or conscious relation to God, which, as has already been shown, presupposes revelation, or God's conscious relation to man. Man's reason is his capacity so to order and relate all his knowledge that the universe will appear to him an intelligible unity; but this unity cannot be constituted without the idea of God; and if man is to affirm a reality corresponding to this idea so that he may be able to base this mental structure on the solid foundation of real existence, it is only by religion, responsive to revelation, that he can bridge the gulf between thought and being. Hence reason must recognize as regulative of the consciousness of self and of the world the consciousness of God, and is therefore dependent on revelation; and that not an abstract revelation discoverable in individual minds, but, as man's reason has developed in human history, the concrete revelation in Christ in which man's conception of God has found its most adequate and satisfying content. If we confine our regard to the intelligence within or the intelligible without, the supernatural may seem unintelligible; but if we develop our sense of God, especially of our need of God to save and bless us, we shall gain the moral insight and spiritual discernment to apprehend and appreciate the supernatural.

9. History and Literature of Revelation.—Hitherto revelation has been discussed as a history and not a literature, as a life and not a book. This seems to the writer the proper standpoint. The inspiration of the writings contained in the Bible has in the traditional view too long been allowed to hold the foremost place; and the Higher Criticism has undoubtedly rendered us a service in compelling us to relate the literature to the history. To say that the Bible is the record of the revelation is inadequate, unless we give an extended sense to the word 'record.' While the narrative parts of the OT and NT do record the history of the Divine guidance and rule of the Hebrew people and the Christian Church, which is an essential element in revelation, yet in the Prophetic and Apostolic writings we have more distinctly and directly the literature of revelation, the expression of the inspired consciousness of the bearers of God's message to men. In the Psalms and the Wisdom literature we find the utterance of the devotional mood and the practical or speculative wisdom which a more or less close contact with Divine revelation produced. As in Christ the Spirit dwelt without measure, all His words and works are revelation; and the witnesses of them for us, in so far as they were influenced and impressed by this revelation, were inspired. The inspiration of all the writings is not of the same intensity, but varies with the stage of God's revelation reached, and with the degree in which the writer submitted himself to the presence and power of God's Spirit in it. The primary matter is God's action in events and persons to make Himself known, not in abstract truths about His nature but in concrete deeds in fulfilment of His purpose; altogether secondary is the literature resulting from that action. Although we must approach this revelation through its literature, the value of which is that it perpetuates and universalizes the revelation made temporally and locally, yet we must never allow ourselves to forget that the revelation was before the literature; and that even for us the literature is not an end in itself, but only a means to bring us here and now into vital contact and personal communion with the God who thus revealed Himself that He may continue to reveal Himself to us in a deeper knowledge, and warmer love, and better use of the Bible.

iii. THE DOCTRINE OF REVELATION.—1. The OT doctrine of Revelation.—Whatever stages Hebrew faith may have passed through before it reached absolute monotheism, yet in its doctrine of Revelation it is assumed that there is only one God, and that idols are nothing (Ps 18^{31}, 1 S 2^{2}, 2 S 7^{22}, Jg 6^{31}, Ex 19^{5}). Not only the history of the chosen people is ordered by Him (Ps 78. 105–107), but His judgments are also seen in the destinies of other nations (Am 1. 2. 9^{7}). He makes Himself known to persons who do not belong to the elect nation, as Melchiẓedeḳ, Laban, Hagar, Pharaoh, Abimelech, Balaam, Cyrus, Job. His worship goes back to the beginnings of human history (Gn 4^{26}), and even the heathen may offer Him an acceptable worship (Mal 1^{11}). Nature reveals His glory (Job 38–41, Ps 8. 19. 29. 93, Is 40^{12-26}). Man's conscience, reason, spirit, as coming from Him, reveal Him (Gn 1^{26}, Nu 16^{22}, Dt 30^{14}, Lk 3^{12}, Job 32^{8}, Ps 8^{5} 36^{9}, Pr 2^{8} 9^{10} 20^{27}, Ec 2^{26}). But limiting our attention to the revelation to the chosen people, which, however, is conceived as having a relation to all mankind (Gn 12^{3}, Is 49^{6}), God's intercourse with the patriarchs is often represented in language which is startling in its frank and free anthropomorphism. He appears to and talks with them. The references in Genesis to theophanies are so numerous that they need not be specially mentioned. (If with the aid of a concordance the word 'appeared' is tracked through the book, the relevant passages will be easily found). Sometimes the Lord appears or speaks in dreams, as to Jacob, Joseph, Pharaoh, Samuel, and Solomon. Sometimes He makes Himself known in a vision, as to Moses, Isaiah, and Ezekiel. A sign of His presence in the camp of Israel was the pillar of fire and cloud; afterwards His presence was found in the ark of the covenant (1 S 4–5). A sound in the tops of the mulberry trees was to David the proof of God's action (2 S 5^{24}). To Elijah, God came not in the whirlwind, earthquake, or fire, but in the 'still, small voice' (1 K 19^{11-13}). Through the priesthood, inquiry was made of Jehovah for guidance in perplexity by Urim and Thummim (see article in vol. iv.), or otherwise (Jg $20^{27.\ 28}$, 1 S $14^{36.\ 37}$ 22^{10}), and through it He communicated His blessing and instruction (Nu 6^{22-27}, Dt 33^{10}). The seer also is consulted (1 S 9). God's leading is sought and found by various signs (Gn $24^{13.\ 14}$, 1 S 10^{3}, Jg $7^{13.\ 14}$).

When the conception of God's transcendence tended more and more to supersede that of His immanence, greater prominence was given to supernatural organs of revelation, as His Spirit, Word, Wisdom, and Angel. (Consult the articles on all these subjects). The Angel is sometimes identified with, sometimes distinguished from, Jehovah, but may on the whole be regarded as a manifestation rather than as a messenger. The name of God (see articles on NAME in vol. iii. and GOD in vol. ii.) is the epitome of the revelation of God. It is sometimes so personified as to be virtually equivalent to God Himself, and to be the subject or object of actions (Ps 20^{1} 5^{11} 7^{17}, Is 29^{23} 52^{6} 18^{7} 30^{27}, Dt 28^{58} 12^{11}, 1 Ch 29^{16}, Ex 9^{16} 20^{24}, Ezk 20^{9}, 2 S 7^{13}, 1 K 8^{17-20}). In Ex 23^{21} the name of God is represented as dwelling in the Angel. A new name marks a fresh stage of revelation (Ex $3^{13.\ 15}$ 6^{3}). But, while God reveals Himself, it is recognized on the one hand that He cannot be fully known by man (Job 26^{14} 28^{12} 36^{26} 37^{15} 42^{3}, Pr 25^{2} 30^{3}, Is 45^{15}), and on the other that there is peril for the man who sees Him or His angel, or even looks on or touches the outward sign of His presence (Gn 32^{30}, Ex 3^{6} 19^{12} 20^{19} 24^{11} 28^{35} 30^{21}, Lv 16^{2}, Jg 6^{22}, 1 S 6^{19}, 2 S 6^{7}). Piety and morality, however, are the conditions of gaining such a knowledge of Him as avails for the needs of the soul, and of enjoying close communion with Him (Job 28^{28}, Ps 17^{15} 25^{12} 27^{8} 42^{2}, Dt 29^{29}).

The most prominent and authoritative organs of revelation are the prophets (see article PROPHECY AND PROPHETS in vol. iv.). All new beginnings in the life of the nation are made by the authority of prophets. Both Abraham and Moses are regarded as prophets (Gn 20^{7}, Dt 18^{18}). Quite in the spirit of the OT, St. Peter describes David as a prophet (Ac 2^{30}). Samuel sanctions the introduction of the monarchy, and even Saul after his anointing is mightily seized by the prophetic spirit (1 S 8–10). Nathan first approves David's intention to build the temple, but afterwards conveys God's prohibition (2 S 7). The division of the two kingdoms is first announced by Ahijah, who also intimates the fall of Jeroboam's house (1 K 11^{29} 14^{7}). Rehoboam's attempt to subdue the rebellion by force is forbidden by Shemaiah (1 K 12^{22}). Elijah not only announces to Ahab God's judgment on his family, but also anoints Hazael to be king over Syria, and Jehu over Israel (1 K 21^{22} 19^{16}). The part played in the national history by the later prophets, especially Isaiah and Jeremiah, is so familiar that it needs no detailed discussion here. The prophetic consciousness is of special significance for the doctrine of Inspiration; but it would be beyond the scope of this article to discuss this subject fully, nor is it at all necessary, for in the article on PROPHECY AND PROPHETS in vol. iv. it has already been dealt with by a master-hand. Suffice it here to call attention to the important and decisive fact, that while, unless in a few exceptional cases, the prophet continues in the normal exercise of all his faculties, yet he does with confidence distinguish between his own subjective meditations and the objective message of God. It is from this fact we must start in dealing with the question whether the OT does contain a revelation from God, or only the reflexions of men. That in this revelation God may have employed abnormal inward states, as dreams or visions (see articles DREAMS in vol. i. and TRANCE and VISION in vol. iv.), or extraordinary outward signs, is by no means incredible, as these may have been a necessary adaptation to the condition of those whom He used as the organs of His communication. The language about God's coming to and talking with the patriarchs we cannot accept literally, but must recognize the necessarily imaginative character of these narratives, although they probably have some historic basis in tradition, as the revelation of Jehovah through Moses seems to presuppose some antecedent revelation to the fathers of the people. Such conceptions as the Spirit, the Word, the Wisdom, or the Angel of God must be regarded as efforts of the human mind to explain God's presence and communion with men in revelation, while maintaining the idea of His transcendence and absoluteness; but in them we may recognize anticipations, however imperfect and inadequate, of the Christian revelation of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

2. The doctrine of the NT regarding the revelation in the OT.—The recognition of the OT in the NT may be traced along three lines—historical, theological, literary. The Hebrew is recognized as an elect and privileged nation, as the bearer of God's special revelation (Ro $3^{1.\ 2}$ $9^{4.\ 5}$ 11^{16}). Although the Jews by their unbelief have forfeited their claim, yet God has not forsaken His people, and their partial and temporary rejection is the divinely appointed means of a universal and final salvation (Ro 9–11). The promise had been given to this people in Abraham that it should be a blessing to other nations (Gal 3^{8}); God had delivered it from Egyptian bondage, and entered into covenant with it, so that it was pledged to obedience to His law. While St. Paul insists that the promise came before the Law (Ro 4^{1-16}), the old covenant is regarded as distinctively a covenant of law, and, as such, is contrasted with the new covenant which has been established by Christ (2 Co 3; cf. also He 8, and see article COVENANT in vol. i.).

Admitting the Divine origin and consequent spiritual character of the Law, its insufficiency to secure righteousness is acknowledged by St. Paul (Ro 7^{7-25}). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews equally acknowledges the inefficiency of the ritual sacrifices to cleanse the conscience and to restore communion with God (He 7). Thus the NT recognizes the imperfection and limitation of the former revelation; and Jesus, in contrasting what was of old (Mt $5^{21.\,27.\,33.\,38.\,43}$), because of the hardness of men's hearts, with His own teaching, seals with His own authority this Apostolic doctrine. The greatest persons of the old revelation are transcended by the supreme Person of the new, and fall far short of the privileges of the humblest and simplest believers. Abraham rejoiced to see the day of Christ (Jn 8^{56}). Moses and Elijah met Him in the Mount (Mt 17^{3}). While law came by Moses, grace and truth came by Jesus Christ (Jn 1^{17}). Greater is He than Solomon (Mt 12^{42}). Greatest of prophets, the Baptist is inferior to the least in the kingdom (Mt 11^{11}). The saints of old longed in vain to see what the disciples see (Mt 13^{16}). Nevertheless, what is best and truest in the old is carried on and completed in the new revelation. Jesus came not to destroy but to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5^{17}). He fulfils the Law by disclosing its essential principles, and by giving to these wider and more inward applications, by securing by His sacrifice the salvation from sin's guilt and power, which by obedience to the Law could not be attained, and by imparting a spiritual energy the Law could not offer. He fulfilled Prophecy generally by carrying on to its last and highest stage the Prophetic ideal of morality and religion, but especially by realizing in His own person the aspirations and expectations of saints and seers regarding the Day of the Lord, the Messiah in the narrower sense of the term, the Servant of the Lord, and the Priest after the order of Melchizedek (see articles on MESSIAH in vol. iii. and PROPHECY in vol. iv.).

The extent to which the writers of the NT regard this fulfilment as being carried will be shown in considering next the use of the OT in the NT, which yields us the following conclusions regarding their views:—(1) The OT Scriptures are cited as an organic unity, ἡ γραφή, αἱ γραφαί, τὰ γράμματα. (2) They are cited as authoritative, as appears from the formulæ of citation, γέγραπται, καθὼς εἶπεν ὁ θεός, from the purpose of the quotations to establish a proof, and from the frequency of the references in exact or approximate quotations or historical allusions. (3) Christ expressly assigns authority to the OT in the words 'the Scripture cannot be broken' (Jn 10^{35}); 'How then doth David in the Spirit call him Lord'? (Mt 22^{43}). (4) The inspiration (see article INSPIRE, INSPIRATION in vol. ii.) of the Scriptures is expressly asserted in two passages (2 Ti $3^{16.\,17}$, 2 P 1^{21}) which, however, are not definite enough to yield a doctrine. (5) The quotations are often inexact, and are drawn from the LXX as well as the Hebrew (see article QUOTATIONS in vol. iv.). To suggest a provisional conclusion at this stage of the discussion, it is evident that, while the writers of the NT treat the whole of the OT as authoritative because inspired, yet the inaccuracy of many of the quotations as well as the use of the LXX show that, even if they would have formally accepted a theory of verbal inspiration, yet they were not limited and controlled by it practically; but this general impression must seek confirmation in a more detailed discussion.

(a) Not only does Jesus Himself quote from the OT frequently, but in His own language the modes of speech of the OT are recalled. It ministered counsel and comfort to His own personal experience (Mt $4^{4.\,7.\,10}$, Lk 4^{18}, Mt 27^{46}, Lk 23^{46}). It was appealed to in His teaching (Mt $5^{21.\,27.\,31}$ 15^{4} 19^{19} $22^{32.\,37}$). It was His weapon in controversy (Mt 9^{13} 15^{8} $21^{13.\,33.\,38.\,43}$ 22^{44}). OT history served to illustrate His work, as the serpent in the Wilderness, the preaching of Jonah, and the doom of the cities of the Plain. His use of the OT leads us to recognize it as a Divine revelation akin in spirit and purpose to His own. A few quotations there are which raise points of difficulty, as His use of the words of God to Moses in proof of the Resurrection (Mk 12^{26}), His appeal to the taunt to the unjust judges as a justification of His claim to be the Son of God (Jn 10^{34}), His assumption of the Davidic authorship of the 110th Psalm (Mk 12^{36}), His allusion to Jonah's story as an illustration of His own resurrection (Mt 12^{40}). There is good reason for regarding this last allusion as a gloss which has crept into the text; and the other quotations, it may be pointed out, are used in controversy as ad hominem arguments, on which it would be perilous to base any conclusions about Jesus' exegetical methods; yet in each case we can discern the connecting link of thought between the quotation and its use, which justifies it as neither arbitrary nor artificial. The allusion to Jonah and the reference of the 110th Psalm to David have been used to drag the authority of Christ into modern controversies of literary and historical criticism. Without comment on the reverence or the prudence of this procedure, this argument can be met from the critical standpoint without recourse to the objectionable explanation that He accommodated Himself to His hearers. For, firstly, no wise teacher raises avoidable disputes on questions which lie beyond the range of His purpose of teaching, but uses the popular language in all matters indifferent. It shows a strange lack of moral insight and spiritual discernment to assume that it was so important that the Jews should have correct views about historical and literary questions, that Jesus was bound to spend time and take pains to put them right on these before He could impart to them the gospel of His grace. He came to preach the gospel, and nothing else; and, even if He had held other views than His contemporaries, there was no need of His discussing them with His ignorant and prejudiced hearers. This whole argument is due to a confusion of the accidentals and the essentials of Divine revelation. Secondly, the present writer is prepared to go further, not for the sake of getting altogether rid of this argument, but in the interests of a true Christology. One cannot read the Gospels with an open mind without coming to the conclusion that no claim for the omniscience of Jesus is made, nay, even, facts are recorded which disprove such a claim; that His consciousness of the Father whom He came to reveal did not include a knowledge of all the facts of nature and history which can be ascertained by the exercise of ordinary human powers of observation and inference; that His perfect wisdom and absolute truth, His moral insight and spiritual discernment, had no relation whatever to the treatment of literary and historical problems; that, as not embraced in His message and mission, His views on all such questions were the opinions of His age, which He had learned in the same way as all His contemporaries. If the purpose of revelation is practical—the salvation of men by the self-sacrifice of God—then the more complete the reality of the Incarnation, the subjection of the Son to the limitations of humanity, the more thorough is the fulfilment of this purpose. It is as much in the interests of Christian faith as for the sake of intellectual liberty that the limitation of the knowledge of Jesus must be confidently affirmed. But, to return from this necessary digression to the main course of the discussion, the investigation of Jesus' use of the OT shows that He recognized the kinship of His own religious life to that of the saints of old; that in His teaching He assumed as the condition of the understanding of His words the knowledge of the Law and the Prophets; that in the moral standards He imposed the principles of the Jewish theocracy were applied and developed, and that His own historic mission was conceived in relation to a continuous and progressive historical activity of God in and by the chosen people; but, on the other hand, the manner of His use of the OT does not discharge us from the duty, far less forbid the attempt, to free by sound exegetical and critical methods the universal and permanent content of truth in the OT revelation from its local and temporary forms of expression.

(b) The distinctive use of the OT in the Gospels and the Acts is this, that the whole life of Christ is viewed as the fulfilment of prophecy. We observe differences of emphasis, according to the speaker or writer, the hearer or reader. Without entering into details, it may be said that when the writer or speaker is himself imbued with the spirit of Judaism, or addresses himself to Jews, then the argument from prophecy is more prominent than when Gentiles are being spoken or written to by one of broader sympathies. Generally, the OT is appealed to as authoritative by or for those whose religious life had already been developed by it. How large a place this conception fills in the minds of the historical writers of the NT will be best shown by a brief summary of the facts of Jesus' life, in which they find predictions realized. He is born of a virgin in Bethlehem, and as an infant returns from Egypt to Nazareth. His public ministry is heralded by John the Baptist. He begins His work in Galilee by claiming the endowment of the Spirit, and in Judæa by showing His zeal for God's house. His ministry in Northern Galilee brings light to dark places. In His acts of healing He takes upon Himself the burden of men's infirmities. As befits the Servant of God, He is humble, silent, patient. He is compelled by the stupidity of the people to speak in parables. He enters Jerusalem in lowliness, seated on an ass. He is greeted as coming in the name of the Lord. His message is not believed; He is rejected by the leaders of the people; He is betrayed for money; He is forsaken by His followers; He is reckoned among transgressors, and hated without cause. His garments are divided; His bones are not broken, although His side is pierced; He is not suffered to be holden of death; He is exalted to God's right hand. By His gift the Spirit is poured forth upon all flesh. Although in Him all the nations of the earth are blessed, yet against Him the heathen rage, and the rulers are gathered together. In His exaltation as Son of the Highest all who scorn Him are put to shame. He proves Himself a light to the Gentiles, and in Him alone can the ruin of Jerusalem be repaired.

There can be no doubt whatever that the OT revelation reaches its highest point in the hopes which Christ fulfils, for there is a vital, organic connexion between it and Him. The Messianic hope did in many of its most striking features anticipate the characteristics of His life and work. On the other hand, these writers treat the whole OT as prophetical, even when it is purely historical or didactical, and thus use some passages for quite another purpose than their original intention. Yet even in these cases the interpretation cannot be pronounced altogether arbitrary and artificial. For if Christ may be regarded as the end and reason for all God's historical activity in the Hebrew people, then its whole development may be conceived as a movement towards Him in whom the promises which had never found fulfilment, the hopes which had again and again been blighted with disappointment, the aspirations which neither moral performances nor ritual observances could satisfy, all found their consummation,—then the spiritual experiences of God's saints of old may be viewed as an anticipation of the life hid with Christ in God, and the sufferings for righteousness' sake of God's witnesses to an unbelieving people as a participation in the Cross of the Just and Holy One. These writers, therefore, were entitled to assume the unity of the life of God's Anointed with the history of His chosen people, the prophetical character of its great personalities and the typical significance of its main institutions, although it must be acknowledged that they laid stress on minor details which may be adequately accounted for as coincidences, and need not be regarded, as they regarded them, as immediate prophecies. It has sometimes been assumed that these coincidences are not to be explained by similar conditions and experiences, due to the unity of the principle underlying the whole development of religion and revelation, which not only ends but is summed up in Christ, but must be accepted as Divine harmonies. To the mind of the present writer at least such a view gives an artificiality to, and hides the reality of, the connexion of Christ and the OT. There are cases, however (Mt $27^{9.10}$, Ac 2^{30}), where this connexion is imposed rather than discovered. Again, to note briefly the conclusion to which this part of the investigation leads, we are constrained to recognize the continuity of the revelation of the OT and the NT; and, on the other hand, that the writers of the NT tend to regard the parallelism as more exact than it actually is, owing to their peculiar method of exegesis in treating passages apart from, even in spite of, their historical setting. It need not surprise us to find that the men who were fitted by the Spirit to be both receptive and communicative of the truth as it is in Jesus were lacking in scientific method and historical insight. Their inspiration did not raise them above their times in these respects, and consequently we must, on the one hand, form such a conception of revelation as admits such limitations, and, on the other, maintain that the OT must be interpreted by the grammatical and historical methods of a scientific criticism, unhindered and undisturbed by appeals to the usages of NT writers.

(c) In St. Paul's Epistles the doctrinal aspects of the OT are more prominent. The frequency of his quotations depends on the subject he is dealing with, and the destination of the letter. Generally speaking, he appeals to the OT most frequently when he is asserting the independence of Christianity against Judaistic objections, and not when he is developing its unique contents. His so-called Rabbinisms (1 Co 10^{1-4}, 2 Co 3^{13}, Gal 3^{16} 4^{21-31}) need not excite any surprise and cause any difficulty: that they are so few in number is a testimony to his mental vigour and spiritual discernment. Sometimes he does give to a quotation an application which the context does not justify (Ro $9^{25.26}$ $11^{9.10}$ 12^{19}, 1 Co 9^{9} 14^{21} 15^{27}, Gal 3^{13}). Even in his normal use the OT language sometimes, on the one hand, obscures the Christian conception, and, on the other hand, his Christian conception transforms the meaning of the OT words. Sometimes his use gives a harder, at other times a more gracious, tone to the passages quoted than they have in their own context. The language of the OT is not adequate for his gospel, the essential inspiration of which we may assert and maintain without committing ourselves to an acceptance of his exegetical methods. The occasion and the purpose of the Epistle to the Hebrews explain the characteristically Jewish use of the OT. Sentences are taken without any regard to context; stress is laid on single words; allegorical explanations are given of historical references. This reading of the New Faith into the Old does violence to the historical significance of the one and the Divine originality of the other. The Apocalypse is steeped in the OT imagery, and applies the Messianic prophecies to the Second Advent. Without any closer examination of the other NT writings, enough evidence has already been produced to justify the conclusion that in every part the NT treats the OT as a Divine revelation, but that the exegetical methods of the NT writers are such as to forbid our basing on their use of the OT any dogmatic theory of verbal inspiration.

3. The NT doctrine of Revelation.—Although the NT recognizes the Divine revelation in the OT, it does not limit God's manifestation of Himself to the Hebrew history and literature. The Prologue to St. John's Gospel takes up the OT conception of the Divine Word, Wisdom, or Spirit in its doctrine of the Logos, and teaches a permanent and universal revelation in nature and in man as well as in the history culminating in Christ. As significant is St. Paul's teaching regarding the witness of nature to God, in his speech at Lystra (Ac 14^{15-17}); regarding man's affinity to God, in his speech at Athens (Ac 17^{22-31}); regarding the wilful ignorance of God, to which he traces the religious degradation and the moral depravity of the Gentiles, and the testimony borne to God by conscience, in his Epistle to the Romans (1^{18-32} 2^{14-16}); and regarding the Divine purpose in the pre-Christian stage in human history, in that to the Galatians (4^{1-9}). A study of the science of Comparative Religion does not contradict, but confirms, this doctrine of a permanent and universal revelation in which OT and NT agree. In many religions we find the higher elements suppressed by the lower, and in only a few the higher elements asserting themselves over the lower. Even in the corrupt and superstitious paganism with which Christianity in its earliest days came in contact, there was in its philosophical schools an approach to an ethical monotheism which, imperfect as it was, proved to some men a tutor to lead them to Christ.

As regards the NT doctrine of the OT revelation, enough has been said in the preceding paragraph; we must now consider what it teaches about the origin and the method of the Christian revelation. Jesus Christ is pre-eminently the revealer of the Father; this function He claims for Himself (Mt 11^{27}, Jn 17^{26}), and it is accorded to Him by St. Paul, St. John, the writer to the Hebrews (Jn 1^{18}, Col 1^{15}, He 1^{1-3}). Yet it is only by the Spirit of God that men are enabled to recognize in Him the Son of God (Mt 16^{17}, Gal 1^{15}). To know God in Christ is to receive a revelation which transforms all things, so that self and world alike appear as a new creation (2 Co 5^{17}). An interesting evidence of St. Paul's consciousness that the Christian revelation was both in continuity with and in contrast to the older revelation, is his use of the word 'mystery.' The Divine purpose which has hitherto been concealed is now revealed (Ro 11^{25} 16^{25}, 1 Co 2^{7}, Eph 1^{9} $3^{3.4}$ 5^{32} 6^{19}, Col 1^{26} 2^{2} 4^{3}). A completion of the old revelation (Mt 5^{17}, Gal 3^{24} 4^{4}, Jn 5^{38}), the new revelation can claim permanent validity, as it will not be superseded by any other (Mt 24^{35}). On the other hand, the comprehension of the perfect revelation by man is imperfect relatively to the full and clear vision of Christ, which is the Christian's hope for the hereafter (1 Co 13^{12}, 1 Jn 3^{2}): Christ's consciousness of perfect knowledge of, love for, and obedience to the Father is explained only by the confession of His essential unity with the Father. The promise of Jesus to His disciples, that the Spirit should be given to them, was fulfilled at Pentecost; and in the outpouring of the Spirit on that day St. Peter was bold enough to see the fulfilment of Joel's prophecy of a universal prophetic inspiration (Ac $2^{17.18}$). Both in the Acts and in St. Paul's Epistles it is assumed that all believers are inspired; in the exercise of their charisms, spiritual gifts, the presence and power of the Spirit in them is revealed. But for the instruction and government of the Church (see art. CHURCH in vol. i.) it was believed that Apostles and Prophets possessed an authoritative inspiration. The Apostles had seen the Lord, and were witnesses to the Resurrection (Lk 24^{48}, Ac $1^{8.22}$ 2^{32}, 1 Co 9^{1}). They showed the signs of an Apostle (1 Co 9^{2}, 2 Co 12^{12}), and they had received a call from God (1 Co 12^{28}, Eph 4^{11}). They were endowed as well as the Prophets with that higher energy of the Spirit which qualified them for special revelations (see articles APOSTLE in vol. i. and PROPHET IN NT in vol. iv.). Most instructive in this respect are the writings of St. Paul, as to defend the truth of his gospel it was needful for him to establish his claims as an Apostle. He asserts his independence of human instruction and his reception of his gospel by Divine revelation (Gal 1^{11-24}). In his own instructions to the Churches which he had founded he distinguishes between the commandments of the Lord and his own judgment (1 Co $7^{25.40}$), but expresses the confidence that even in the exercise of this he has the Spirit of God. He testifies that, in a state of ecstasy, he was transported to the third heaven and heard unspeakable words, unlawful to utter (2 Co $12^{2.3}$). Not only did Jesus appear to him on the way to Damascus (Ac 9^{17}, 1 Co 15^{8}), but on other occasions also did He come and speak to him in trance or vision (Ac 18^{9} 22^{17} 26^{16}). At Troas he was guided to cross to Macedonia by a vision in the night (Ac 16^{9}). The angel of God conveyed an assurance of safety to him (Ac 27^{23}). St. Peter, too, was taught his duty towards the Gentiles in a vision during a trance (Ac 10^{10}). An angel appeared to Mary in a vision (Lk 1^{26-38}), and to Joseph in a dream (Mt 1^{20-23}). The visions in the Book of Revelation may be, as is common in Apocalyptic literature, a literary device, but there may have been some basis for them in unusual psychic conditions. Of such mental states as trance, vision, dream as organs of revelation, we must beware of judging by our modern standards. For us such means of Divine communication may seem less credible than inward intuition, but even to a St. Paul these methods of revelation seemed significant and valuable. (The articles on DREAM in vol. i. and TRANCE and VISION in vol. iv. may with advantage be consulted). In closing this section of the article a few general considerations may be offered. The Prophet, or Apostle, or even Christ Himself, is confident that God is revealing His mind and will to him, but distinguishes God's words from his own. With the Prophet, it would seem, the inspiration was not constant; his whole personality did not become the permanent organ of the Spirit. In the Apostle the spiritual possession is more constant and complete. He may still distinguish his own opinions from his Lord's commands, but his inspiration is derived from an intimate personal union and communion with the living Christ Himself. As the natural life has been more completely transformed by the supernatural, their contrast is less evident than in the prophetic consciousness. In Christ the union of God and man is so complete, that, so to speak, the absolute quantity of the inspiration guarantees the perfect quality of the revelation. There is, therefore, no uniformity in the intensity of the inspiration or the sufficiency of the revelation in the Holy Scriptures; but we must distinguish degrees of the one as we recognize varieties of the other. In the OT the prophetic consciousness exhibits revelation at its highest; the spirit of devotion as expressed in the Psalms may be reckoned nearest to this; then we may perhaps place the meditations in the Wisdom literature on the problems of life and duty; and, lastly, come the historical records, inspired in so far as they regard the history as the development of God's purpose and the fulfilment of His promises. The Apostolic interpretation varies in the fulness of the understanding of the mind of Christ, dependent on the closeness of the fellowship with the life of Christ, in whom revelation and inspiration alike culminate. The OT increases as a revelation as it approaches Him, and the NT varies as a revelation as it receives more or less of His Spirit.

iv. THE EVIDENCE OF REVELATION.—1. Evidence of the Bearers of Revelation.—The first line of evidence is to be found in what has just been mentioned at the close of the previous section—the consciousness of the bearers of the revelation. They bear witness that they are not speaking of themselves, but that God is communicating to them what they are declaring to others. The truth of the reality of the revelation, and the sincerity of its organs,—these two are not the same, for a man professing to communicate a revelation might be a deceiver or self-deceived,—cannot be proved by any outward attestation, but only by the moral and spiritual quality of the revelation, and by the personal character it forms in the bearer. The fulfilment of prophecy is not, unless in exceptional circumstances, a test that can be immediately applied, and the performance of miracles does not afford a decisive criterion, as the natural may be made to appear as supernatural. But these two evidences are quite out of court for us. For, where the character of the bearer and the content of the revelation do not inspire confidence, denial that any real prediction has been made, or any actual miracle has taken place, cannot be disproved. If at one time prophecy and miracle were relied on as attesting a revelation, such an argument is worthless at the present day. For, on the one hand, the more critical attitude towards the records of revelation which is becoming more general forbids that unquestioning belief that predictions were made and that miracles did happen which was once common; and it is being more clearly recognized, on the other hand, that a Divine revelation must be able to commend itself morally and spiritually to the conscience and reason of mankind, and that a revelation which could not so commend itself could never be accepted on any external evidence without such an abdication of reason and conscience as would involve a far more serious injury and wrong to the moral and spiritual nature of man than could be compensated for by any such revelation.

2. Evidence of the Literature of Revelation.—But, when we get to this position that the evidence of revelation is in the quality of its contents and the character of its bearers, we, to whom this revelation has not come at first hand, but has been transmitted by a literature, have to ask this further question: Is the literature trustworthy in its testimony to the consciousness and character of these bearers and to the contents of this revelation? This is the point at which the history of the formation of the Canon of the OT and NT forces itself on our attention. This story has already been told in previous articles, and need not be told again; but one fact deserves special notice, that it was not by formal decree of any ecclesiastical authority that certain writings were selected as sacred, recognized as inspired, and accepted as authoritative for faith and life; but this was brought about by their use in worship and for edification. We need not claim an infallible judgment for either the Jewish or the Christian Church, but what must be insisted on is that it was the religious consciousness which was the court of appeal with regard to the writings to be treated as the literature of revelation. The importance of such a literature cannot be overestimated. Only if God had revealed Himself uniformly to all mankind, would there be no need for such a literature. Reason has already been shown why along with a general revelation we may believe in a special. To perpetuate and to diffuse this special revelation, limited both spatially and temporally, the written record was necessary. Jesus Christ would be incomprehensible without the record of the revelation which led up to Him, and His grace and truth would be inaccessible to the mind and heart of mankind without the report of the revelation realized in and proceeding from Him. Yet a difference between the importance of the two Testaments must, in view of the modern critical position, be clearly recognized and frankly explained. What were the stages and phases, the features and factors, of revelation in the OT is an interesting and important question for our understanding of the OT; but it does not in the slightest degree affect the historical reality of Jesus Christ. Not the view of the OT which most unquestioningly accepts as historical all its narratives and all the traditional opinions about authorship and date of the writings makes Christ most credible, but that which makes to us most intelligible the progress of revelation towards Him, and the fulfilment of its promise in Him. Accordingly, we can, without troubling or bewildering our faith with a task for which it is not competent, leave to a reverent scholarship, which makes neither ultra-supernatural nor anti-supernatural assumptions, all historical and literary questions regarding the OT. The NT, however, holds a much more immediate and vital relation to the revelation in Christ, and from Him through His witnesses. If the substantial historicity of the Gospels and the Acts cannot be maintained, if the image of the Person of Christ presented there is mainly a work of fiction and not a copy of fact, if Jesus did not really so impress and influence men as He is represented to have done, if the Apostles who have undertaken to interpret to us their experience of His grace ascribed to His Spirit what was due to their heredity, individuality, or environment, then the Christian revelation must lose so much of its contents as to affect its character. If, for instance, a filial consciousness towards God and a fraternal consciousness towards mankind was all that Jesus revealed, if He put Himself in no way into relation to the sin of mankind to save men from its guilt and curse, then undoubtedly Christianity becomes a religion of illumination, and not of redemption. But if the historical character of the NT as the record and report of the life and work of Christ, and the interpretation of the experience wrought by His spirit, is more necessary to Christian faith, it can be maintained as that of many parts of the OT cannot. We have more nearly contemporary evidence of the existence and the acceptance as authoritative of the NT writings than for any of the OT. The contents of many portions of the NT are self-evidencing to reason and conscience as revelation, as many portions of the OT cannot be said to be. The character of Christ, the existence of the Church, the experience of St. Paul,—all these are proofs of the reality of the Christian revelation as presented in the NT such as can meet doubt and help faith. That the NT can be accepted as a true record and a faithful interpretation of the revelation in Christ, is a conclusion which the best scholarship allows and Christian faith claims.

3. Evidence of Experience.—No conclusion of scholarship on so difficult and delicate a problem as the date, authorship, historical accuracy, and theological authority of these writings can compel faith. Scholarship, as honest and as competent as that which is found in the Christian Churches, has not felt this compulsion, and has been able to maintain an opposite conclusion. For this conclusion depends not only on the outward data, but on the inward attitude with which the data are approached. If, through the Person and Teaching and Work of Christ, God does not here and now draw near to a man, make Himself known to him, meet his greatest need, and bring him his highest good, neither the OT nor the NT can be proved to him the record and the interpretation of a Divine revelation. He might assent intellectually to the whole process of argument, but a mere assent to the claims of the Holy Scriptures has no religious value or significance. The evidence of revelation is a present experience, the impression the Holy Scriptures make, and the influence they wield, in reproducing in men the same relation to God as was perfectly realized by Christ, and is being progressively realized in men by the presence and power of the Holy Spirit. The intellectual process cannot be ignored, and the spiritual experience alone recognized. If it were proved to a man's reason that the NT is not a true book, he might find an æsthetic gratification, but he could not get a spiritual satisfaction in the life and work of Christ. It will enlarge and strengthen a man's faith, if he not only yields himself to the impression Christ makes on him, and the influence He gains over him, when the NT is read and studied on the assumption that it is true, but if he also sees what evidence there is to justify that assumption. The evidence may at first not go beyond the more probable, or the less improbable, but that is itself enough to justify a man, under the pressure of his practical necessities, in putting Christ to the proof, with all honesty and sincerity, whether He is indeed able to save to the uttermost all who come unto God through Him. The results in personal experience and character will in most cases raise the probability to a certainty, and the man will be able to say that he knows whom he has believed, and is persuaded that He is able to be to all who trust Him all that the NT represents Him as being.

4. Reception of the Divine Revelation.—It is with this proving of Christ's grace that the present evidence of Divine Revelation must begin. But the acceptance of Christ as from God will so change the mental attitude, the moral disposition, the spiritual capacity, that a personal apprehension, appreciation, and appropriation of the entire revelation of God in the Holy Scriptures will become increasingly possible. There may remain incidents incredible and doctrines unintelligible, and no Christian man is required to do violence either to conscience or to reason by forcing himself to believe anything which does not evidence itself to him as from God. On the one hand, a large liberty of reserve should be claimed, and, on the other, a wide tolerance of difference should be shown. But no man who has found God in Christ can treat with indifference any element in the Christian revelation. He must feel that his insensibility to impression from or influence by any part of the Holy Scriptures is his own spiritual loss, the narrowing and the impoverishing of his experience; and he should so strive to widen his intelligence and deepen his sympathy by fuller submission to the Spirit of truth and love in Christ, that he will be able at last to secure and rejoice in the whole counsel of God, all the truth as it is in Jesus. Only by this receptive and responsive attitude can a man become the possessor of the Divine revelation as his personal treasure. As in olden times God revealed Himself in outward signs and sounds, so in the Holy Scriptures, read with intelligence, reverence, aspiration, does He still reveal Himself. Not a distant but a present, not an indifferent but an interested, not an indolent but an active Father meets us in Christ by the Spirit, and deals with us here and now. The significance and value of the old revelation is that it is the medium of an ever new revelation. God Himself proves that He spake and wrought of old by speaking and working in us now His own good will and pleasure, even our salvation. Every Christian man should be an inspired man, because the Spirit is in Christ given to all men according to their faith; and, in this experience of the Spirit, God is really revealing Himself. But inasmuch as this revelation comes from this inspiration, and this inspiration is conditioned by faith in Christ's grace, and that faith is not found apart from a knowledge of the Gospel as contained in the Holy Scriptures, this continuous revelation and universal inspiration in Christ is not a rival to or substitute for the revelation and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, as the former is dependent on and controlled by the latter. We know that God reveals Himself in us only as we know the revelation of the Father in the Son; but to the testimony of the writers of the Scriptures to their own authority and the witness of the Church to the worth of these Scriptures for its faith and life there must be added, to produce that perfect confidence in God's revelation which it demands and deserves, the experience in the individual soul of God's presence and power in His Son and by His Spirit.

Summary.—Let us sum up in a few words the arguments of this article. Man is by necessity of his nature religious. Religion implies revelation; man's approach to God is in response to God's approach to man. As religion is, so is revelation universal; but its quality varies with human capacity and development. It is in accord with God's method that He should through one nation bless all mankind. In the history of the Hebrew people there can be traced a progressive revelation, the record of which is in the OT. This culminates in Christ, in whom the ideal of religion is realized, and the perfect revelation is given. To secure full historic reality to this revelation, the image of His person and the influence of His work must be perpetuated and diffused, as is done by means of the NT. The Holy Scriptures as the literature of revelation offer us a doctrine of its range, method, and purpose. The bearers of the revelation bear a witness to their own qualifications and authority, which is confirmed both by their characters and the contents of their message. This evidence is further strengthened by the recognition of the worth of the OT in the Jewish Church and of the NT in the Christian Church. But the full evidence of revelation is not possessed until its purpose has been fulfilled and its effect realized in the experience of the Christian, saved from sin and death and doom by the love of the Father in the grace of the Son through the fellowship of the Holy Spirit.

LITERATURE.—The special articles referred to may be consulted for the Literature relating to their respective subjects. For the more general literature, the note at the end of the article BIBLE in vol. i. may be referred to. To the books there mentioned may be added Caird's, Pfleiderer's, and Sabatier's Philosophy of Religion; Fairbairn's The Philosophy of the Christian Religion; and Illingworth's Reason and Revelation. Bruce's Apologetics deals with many of the topics touched on, and his Chief End of Revelation is still worth consulting. Herrmann's Communion of the Christian with God offers an original and suggestive treatment of the subject of Revelation.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

THEOCRACY.—The terms 'theocracy' and 'theocratie' have been used somewhat freely in connexion with the history of Israel, but it is not altogether easy to determine with precision what ideas should be attached to them. It may seem that, if these words are to denote an actual constitution of human society, they must imply the absorption of the State in the Church, or at least the supremacy of the Church over the State. When applied, as they are, to the form and aims of the mediæval Papacy, they have this meaning; and so taken they would be true only of the period, or periods, of Jewish history when the people were under a hierarchy, with the high priest at its head. Wellhausen and other critics of his school do, in fact, restrict the notion of the Theocracy thus, and consequently hold, in accordance with their view of the documents, that it was realized only after the Exile. The question of the best use of the term must not, however, be identified with that of the date of the Priestly Code. Readers of the Bible, generally, taking the Pentateuch as it stands, and believing the constitution therein described to have been given and actually established by Moses, have regarded those early days as ideal ones for the Theocracy. But it may be doubted whether they have derived the impression that its essence lay in priestly rule, or whether this is in reality suggested in the Bible; while a more elastic conception must certainly be formed if justice is to be done to the teaching of the OT as a whole.

i. The use of the term by Josephus.—The term 'theocracy' was coined by Josephus on the model of others expressive of various kinds of political constitution, in order to explain to Gentile readers the distinctive characteristics of the national life of Israel. He uses it but once, and then with an apology. In c. Ap. ii. 16, after referring to differences between States in respect to the seat of power—a single sovereign, a few, the multitude—he proceeds: ὁ δ' ἡμέτερος νομοθέτης εἰς μὲν τούτων οὐδοτιοῦν ἀπεῖδεν, ὡς δ' ἄν τις εἴποι βιασάμενος τὸν λόγον, θεοκρατίαν ἀπέδειξε τὸ πολίτευμα, θεῷ τὴν ἀρχὴν καὶ τὸ κράτος ἀναθείς. 'Our lawgiver had an eye to none of these; but, as one might say, using a strained expression, he set forth the national polity as a theocracy, referring the rule and might to God.' As Josephus introduced the term, it may be worth while to consider a little more fully what he intended to convey by it; and this may help us to clear our own minds. There is the more reason for doing so, because statements in regard to his meaning, which the present writer believes to be in different ways misleading, have been made by such writers as Stanley, Jewish Church, Lecture 18 init., and Wellhausen, Proleg. to Hist. of Israel, Eng. tr. p. 411, 3rd German ed. i. p. 436.

In the sequel to the words just quoted, Josephus says, by way of explanation or expansion of them, that Moses led the Israelites to recognize God as the source both of the good things bestowed on all mankind, and of deliverances granted to themselves in their distresses in answer to their prayers; that to the whole people he imparted a knowledge of God such as at most a philosopher here and there among other nations had attained to; and that he gave them Divine laws and customs to mould and train their national character.—A broader or more unexceptionable statement as to the special relation of the true God to Israel as their ruler, and of their relation to Him as His subjects, it would be difficult to imagine.

In other places, however, Josephus describes the Mosaic constitution as an 'aristocracy,' connecting this with the view that it is also a theocracy, which he indicates without using the term. Thus in his version of Moses' address to the people at the close of his life,—in which he gives more prominence, so far as provision for government was concerned, to the judges who were to be appointed in all their gates, of whom Moses had spoken (Dt 16^{18} $1^{15f.}$; cf. Ant. IV. viii. 14), than to the priests,—he makes Moses say, 'An aristocracy is best, and the life in harmony therewith; let not desire for another polity take hold of you, but cherish this one, and having the laws as your masters, do all things according to them; for it suffices to have God for your ruler' (Ant. IV. viii. 17). Later on he explains Samuel's grief at the people's demand for a king by his hatred of kings and conviction that an aristocracy is Divine, and that it makes those happy who have it for their form of polity (Ant. VI. iii. 3). Once more, of the Return from Exile he writes that those who then settled in Jerusalem adopted 'an aristocratic constitution with an oligarchy, for,' he adds, 'the chief priests were at the head of affairs till the descendants of the Hasmonæan became kings' (Ant. XI. iv. 8). See, further, art. RELIGION OF ISRAEL, II. iii. 1.

It is to be observed that Josephus lays no stress on the 'holiness,' either official or personal, of the ruling class, as he would have done if he had held the view attributed to him by Wellhausen; and in the last passage cited he even distinguishes the 'oligarchy' of priests from that 'aristocracy' which he regards as so desirable. It appears that for him the theocratic character of the system lay, not in its formal institutions but in the fact that they were of a kind to throw much on the people themselves. There was no excessively eminent human personage to intercept the regards that should be turned on God alone. Men were to submit to the laws because they had received them from God, and to depend on His guidance and protection—which included, no doubt, the raising up of leaders for times of special need.

ii. We pass to the actual history of the belief in Jehovah's kingship over Israel. (a) The connexion of the belief with Semitic religious ideas.—This was one of those conceptions derived from the general stock of Semitic religious ideas, which in Israel came to be immeasurably refined and exalted. In the OT itself we have evidence that in other instances also the tribal or national god was regarded as the king of the tribe or nation. In early times it was the specific duty of the chieftain or king to lead in war, so that the notion of chieftainship or kingship is itself involved in the belief implied in the language of Jephthah (Jg 11^{24}) that the god fought for his people, and won and held the territories in which they dwelt (cf. 1 S 26^{19}, Ru $1^{14f.}$, and the phrase in Is 10^{10} 'the kingdoms of the idols'). For evidence from other sources, see W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 66 f.

(b) The view attributed to Gideon and to Samuel that the establishment of an earthly kingship implied disloyalty to Jehovah.—In two passages in OT the proposal to establish an earthly monarchy is treated as an infringement of Jehovah's rights, Jg 8^{23} and 1 S 8 with 12^{12}. It will be necessary that we should discuss briefly the historical value of these notices. And, first, a few words as to the documents.

There is a large amount of agreement among critics to the effect that in the Book of Judges the work may be traced of a compiler of the age of Deuteronomy, i.e. the latter period of the Jewish kingdom, who has provided a framework into which he has fitted narratives, and perhaps a collection of narratives, of an earlier age. Some touches, also, are assigned to a post-exilic editor. The question whether Gideon's refusal of the kingship is a trait introduced by one of the later hands will have to be considered in connexion with the similar view of human monarchy appearing in 1 Samuel. In the portion of that book which relates to the choice of Saul, two accounts are combined which give distinct, and in some respects differing, views of the transaction. That one in which the desire for a king is represented as an act of disloyalty to Jehovah is generally regarded as the later of the two. Wellhausen refers it, chiefly because of its attitude on this point, to the exilic or post-exilic time, when the monarchy had been overthrown and the government was in the hands of the chief priests (Prolegomena, Eng. tr. pp. 249, 253–6, and 3rd German ed. i. pp. 260, 265–8). The statement in regard to Gideon in Jg 8^{23} he necessarily supposes to have been introduced at the same period (ib. Eng. tr. p. 239, and 3rd Germ. ed. p. 249). Other competent critics, however, point out marked affinities between the document embodied in 1 Samuel, which is now in question, and E of the Pentateuch (Budde, ZATW p. 230 f.; Driver, LOT^{6} p. 177 f.); and in the connexion of this document with the Northern Kingdom is to be found, according to Budde, the true explanation of its low estimate of the monarchy (ib. pp. 235, 236). He accounts for the words of Gideon in like manner ('Richter' in Kurzer Handcom. in loc., and Einleit. lix f.). If we must choose between these views, the latter is certainly the more reasonable. It is a pure figment of the imagination, and opposed to all the evidence which we possess, to suppose that, under the constitution established after the Exile, men learned to depreciate the monarchy. On the contrary, we know that the hope of its restoration was still cherished; and, although there was a period in which this hope died down, there is no sign that any other ideal was formed of a nature to exclude it. Indeed, if such had been the case, its revival, without leaving any trace of a struggle between it and other aspirations, would have been well-nigh impossible. There were, on the other hand, no sacred associations with any one of the successive dynasties in the Northern Kingdom, and prophets had been brought into far more frequent and sterner conflict with individual kings. It would be more conceivable that here religious men should have become convinced of an inherent incompatibility between human and Divine sovereignty. But evidence is wanting that such was the case. [In Hos 13^{10} no opposition to kingship on principle is implied. With regard to Hos 10^9, see G. A. Smith in Expositor's Bible, p. 288, n. 1.]

The admission that the narrative of Gideon's judgeship may not have been committed to writing till long after the events, and that the document used in 1 Samuel with which we are concerned may probably have been composed in the latter part of the 9th or even in the 8th cent. B.C. (on date of E, see Driver, LOT^{6} p. 123), does not make it unsuitable for us to ask whether the view respecting the institution of monarchy which is found in them may not be due to a sound tradition. That view does not seem to be out of harmony with the character of the early age to which the narratives refer, and with natural tendencies of the human mind. And its appearance merely in two isolated instances, which cannot be shown to have anything in common with the experience and feeling of better known periods of Israelite history, is sufficient to suggest that it is a survival. We do not indeed know of the existence outside of Israel of the same view. But it would surely be quite in accordance with the relations supposed to exist between the god and his worshippers (see W. R. Smith, RS, Lect. 2) that a tribe or group of tribes which adhered to its primitive organization, or want of organization, should insist that its god was its king, contrasting itself in this respect with neighbouring nations that had adopted monarchy; or even that the notion of the permanent chiefship or kingship of the god should have been evolved before that of permanent human kingship. And, when a movement arose to substitute a monarchy for the older and looser constitution of society, it would be natural that in some quarters it should meet with opposition from a spirit of conservatism, which would call religious beliefs to its aid. We shall, moreover, be justified in regarding the fact that we have an example of this in Israel, though not elsewhere, as due to a peculiar intensity of religious feeling and faithfulness to the God whom they acknowledged, by which not the whole people but individuals amongst them were already distinguished.

(c) The Theocracy subsequent to the establishment of the Monarchy.—But while there is reason to think that belief in Jehovah's kingship over Israel existed before the regular establishment of an earthly monarchy, and that it afforded a ground with some for objecting to this institution, the sense of the Divine sovereignty over Israel was not in the event impaired by this change of national polity. It is a mistake to speak of the transition to this new period as 'the close of the Theocracy' (so Stanley does, Jewish Church, Lect. 18 init.). The same work in which the document that describes resistance to the introduction of monarchy is embedded, has in its second book set forth Jehovah's covenant with David and his descendants in terms which virtually make the reigning prince of this house the earthly vicegerent and representative of the heavenly King, under whose control he still remains (2 S 7^{1-17}). Some other passages, which show how the relation of the king to God was regarded, are 2 K 11^{17} $23^{3.4}$, Ps 89^{27}, Neh 13^{26}, and even as to the Northern Kingdom 1 K 14^{14}. In Dt 17^{14-20} we have 'the law of the kingdom' set forth in subjection to the principle of the Theocracy (cf. Driver, LOT^{6} p. 92). The remarkable expression in 2 Ch 13^8 should also be particularly noticed:—'the kingdom of Jehovah in the hand of the sons of David'; the lateness of the work in which it occurs makes it the more important. The use of the title King for God belongs especially to the Prophets and Psalms. Some instances in which God is called King of Israel, or in which His being so is most directly implied, are of the times of the Monarchy or the first part of the Exile, and occur in writers to whom, beyond question, the Divine sanctions of the earthly kingdom were no unfamiliar thought (Zeph 3^{15}, Ps 48^2 89^{18} [AV and RVm], Is 33^{22}, Jer 8^{19}). Passages of a later date are Is 43^{15} 44^6. It is to be added that, where God is spoken of simply as King, or as King over all the earth, the special relation of Israel to God may be, and in some cases certainly is, present to the writer's mind, the thought being that Jehovah, who has made Zion His favoured seat, from His capital exercises a world-wide dominion (Zec $14^{9.16.17}$, Jer 10^{10} 48^{15} 51^{57}, Ps 95^3 98^6 145^1). Where individuals with special devotion address God as their King, it is impossible to say always whether they held that the privilege and the power to do so were consequences of their membership in the chosen people; but sometimes they seem to have recognized this (Ps 5^2 44^4 68^{24} 74^{12}).

In conclusion, we may say that if we are to be guided by OT thought and language, as assuredly we ought to be, in determining the meaning to be given to the term theocracy, it must be employed to designate, not any one of the forms of government under which the Israelites lived, but a great conviction. It will describe the faith that God exercised a special and effective rule over Israel by blessings, punishments, deliverances, by prophets, whom He sent to instruct them, and the visitations of His providence, throughout all the stages of their chequered history. And in that Kingdom of Heaven, of which our Lord spake so much, the Theocracy found its enlargement and fulfilment.

Introduction.—Under the designation 'according to the Hebrews' several Church Fathers, from the 2nd to the 5th cent., speak of a Gospel which existed in their day, though to Greek-speaking Christians known but vaguely, if at all. Many of the statements made with regard to it are of ambiguous meaning, as if the writers themselves were but imperfectly acquainted with the subject; and hence it is little wonder if the most divergent theories have been held about it. Was the Gospel according to the Hebrews a particular book, or was it a type of tradition which was embodied in several different books? Did it exist in Greek as well as in a Semitic tongue? and was the Hebrew a translation from Greek, or the original? Was it a source of the canonical Gospels or derived from them, or quite independent of, and parallel to, them? In the absence of any certain answer to these questions, some of which may never be finally disposed of, the Gospel according to the Hebrews has been made to fill a place in connexion with each successive theory of the origin of the Gospels; some, as Lessing, and more recently Hilgenfeld, regarding it as the primary root of the whole of the Gospel literature; the Tübingen school seeing in it the earliest written expression of the Jewish-Christian position; while others hold that it was never important, and that, while it may have contained some true reminiscences, its tradition on the whole was secondary and derived. Recent discussions, however, by Hilgenfeld,[*] Zahn,[†] Handmann,[‡] Harnack,[§] and Nicholson,[‖] have rendered the subject less shadowy. While there is still much difference of opinion on special points, the Gospel according to the Hebrews is coming into view as it actually existed in the early centuries.

i. PATRISTIC AND OTHER EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—1. More facts are to be learned on the subject from Jerome than from any other Father; and it is best to begin with what he tells us, referring afterwards to the statements before him and after him. What is here said about Jerome is based on the admirable discussion by Zahn, in which the passages are collected.

Jerome went twice to the East. He lived 374–379 a hermit life at Chalcis in Northern Syria, and in 385 he was at Antioch on his way to Palestine, to spend the rest of his life in the monastery he founded at Bethlehem. He was much in contact with Syrian Christians, who helped him to learn Hebrew, and told him many interesting things. In particular, he gathered from them much information as to the Gospel they used. This he describes by various phrases which at first sight seem somewhat inconsistent with each other. At one time he calls it 'the Hebrew Gospel'; at others, and most frequently, 'the Gospel according to the Hebrews' (juxta or secundum Hebræos). These words may be a description, not a title, and do not of themselves require us to think of a written work; they might refer to the Evangelical tradition current in the East, which might exist in more than one form. Jerome frequently says that the Nazarenes use this Gospel, or are in the habit of reading it. If the 'Nazarenes' of Jerome were a particular sect, their Gospel would be a particular book. But the name is more probably, in most of the passages where he uses it, a general one for the Jewish Christians of the East; so that the Gospel they used might have various forms. In one passage (ad Mt 12^{13}; No. 8[¶]) Jerome says the Nazarenes and the Ebionites used this Gospel. Here he must be held to be speaking very loosely. There were Ebionites who were, to the eye of the Churchman, heretics, and they had a Gospel of heretical tendency of which fragments are preserved, though not by Jerome. But the term 'Ebionite' was also used as a general designation of the Christians of Palestine who kept up a Jewish form of belief in Christ. It is not therefore to be inferred from this expression of Jerome that he identified the heretical Gospel of the Ebionites with that according to the Hebrews, which he does not elsewhere regard as heretical. More probably he is guilty of a confusion, and adds the Ebionites to the Nazarenes, though the two were identical: if this is so, his expression need not point to more than one book. But all doubts as to what he means by his 'Gospel according to the Hebrews' are set at rest by his other statements. In his de Viris Illustribus (ii. 3) of the year 392 he speaks of a book which existed at that day in the library at Cæsarea, which the martyr Pamphilus took such pains to form; and he says that the Nazarenes at Berœa (Aleppo) showed him the same work, and allowed him to copy it (No. 2). Here we come to another puzzle. In this passage he calls the book, of which he knew two copies, ipsum Hebraicum, 'the original Hebrew.' Now, he is speaking in this passage of the Gospel according to Matthew, so that he appears to think, like Cureton in later days, that what he had copied out was the original Hebrew of Matthew, of which the canonical First Gospel in Greek was a translation. In his commentary on Mt 12^{13} (the passage cited above) he says that the Gospel used by the Nazarenes and Ebionites was called by many 'the original of Matthew' (Matthæi authenticum). And in his work against the Pelagians he speaks of 'the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is written in the Chaldæan and Syrian tongue [i.e. Aramaic, cf. Zahn, p. 659. It is Chaldaic as appearing in the OT, Syriac as a living language], but in Hebrew letters, which the Nazarenes use to this day; according to the Apostles, or, as many are of opinion, according to Matthew, which has a place in the library at Cæsarea (No. 3).' And this book, he tells us, he had translated into Greek and Latin. To these translations of his own he frequently refers. There can be no doubt that he made them; there is evidence, indeed, that they occasioned some little scandal in the Church, and were regarded as an indiscretion on his part, as if he had sought to add a fifth Gospel to the sacred four acknowledged by the Church.

There are many difficulties and confusions in Jerome's statements on this subject, but the following facts clearly appear from them:—1. The Christians of Syria used in the 4th cent. a Gospel in Aramaic, written in the square Hebrew character, and not identical with any of those in the Canon. 2. There was great uncertainty as to the origin of this work. Many held it to be the original work of the Apostle Matthew. Some identified it with the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, the surviving fragments of which, not preserved by Jerome but by others, show it to have been a different work (see Harnack, Chronologie, ii. 627). Those who knew little about it could say that it was used by the heretical Ebionites as well as by the ordinary Oriental Christians. 3. It was unknown at this period in the West; Jerome knew of no Greek or Latin version of it; his designation of it 'according to the Hebrews' indicates its circle of readers; it was used by Hebrew-speaking Christians, not by others. 4. The identification with the Apostle Matthew shows that it resembled our First Gospel more than the others; yet Jerome knew that it was in many respects different from the canonical Matthew, else he need not have translated it.

2. From Epiphanius, Jerome's contemporary, who also spent part of his life in the East, we have various statements as to the Gospel used in Palestine, and on the whole a confirmation of the facts obtained from Jerome. It is from Epiphanius that we derive our fragments of the Gospel according to the Ebionites. He tells us that that Gospel began with John the Baptist, without any genealogy or story of the Infancy, and that the early Docetics,

[¶] The numbering of the Fragments in this article is that of Preuschen's Antilegomena.

Cerinthus and Carpocrates, had used it. The fragments show an ascetic tendency, and in one of them there is an account of the baptism of the Lord quite different from that in the Gospel 'sec. Hebr.' Nicholson, however, prints them as part of the same book; for which he can allege the passage of Jerome given above, and also a statement of Epiphanius, who says that the Ebionites called this Gospel 'according to the Hebrews,' and that it was the Hebrew Matthew. The latter statement the extracts plainly disprove; and if we add to it the statement made by the same Father, that Tatian's Diatessaron was called by many 'according to Matthew,' we have some measure of the confusion which, in this Father's mind at least, rested on the whole subject. As to the Nazarenes, whom he treats as another set of heretics, but in his description of whom we may recognize the features of the ordinary Jewish Christian of the East who cherished the Law as well as the Gospel, Epiphanius says they have a 'very full Matthew in Hebrew.' This book, however, he has never seen; he cannot even tell whether or not it opened with a genealogy.

3. The work with which Jerome made such close acquaintance was known to Fathers of the two centuries before him; some of the extant fragments are found in their writings, and we find them considering how much authority is to be allowed to a Gospel which, though not recognized by the Church, was not suppressed, but in some quarters warmly cherished. Eusebius, who lived half a century before Jerome, and was much interested in the question of the books to be adopted by the Church, quotes several times 'the Gospel which has reached us in Hebrew characters,' or 'the Gospel which is with the Jews in the Hebrew language.' He does not speak of any translation of it into Greek, and we do not know how he got the Greek versions he gives us. In his famous list of the New Testament Scriptures (HE iii. 25) he gives 'sec. Hebr.' a place, not among the acknowledged books of the Church, but among the Antilegomena, the books which are accepted in some quarters of the Church but not generally, such as the Shepherd of Hermas, the Teaching of the Apostles, and, in the view of some, the Johannine Apocalypse. 'In this class,' he says, 'some count the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is most used by those of the Hebrews who have accepted Christ' (ᾧ μάλιστα Ἑβραίων οἱ τὸν Χριστὸν παραδεξάμενοι χαίρουσιν). Harnack sees in these words an implied statement that there were Greek-speaking as well as Hebrew-speaking Christians who used this Gospel, and holds them to prove the existence in Eusebius' day of a Greek translation, which had disappeared when Jerome wrote. But the μάλιστα may be taken with ᾧ rather than with Ἑβραίων, and may indicate that the Christians of Syria clung to this Gospel more than to the Diatessaron or any other Syriac translation. Similarly, Eusebius says (iii. 27) that 'sec. Hebr.' was used by the better set of Ebionites, i.e. by the Christians of Syria who kept up their attachment to the Law, as their only Gospel: 'by the others they set small store.' Eusebius, then, respects the practice of the Jewish Christians in using a Gospel which had come down to them in their own tongue; but a work of such limited circulation could not be taken to belong to the accepted collection of the Church. He nowhere identifies it with the Hebrew of Matthew, though he does speak of that work, in which early tradition firmly believed, when he says (v.^{10}) that Pantænus found in India the Gospel of Matthew in Hebrew, which had been carried there by the Apostle Bartholomew. What he knew of 'sec. Hebr.' is all in the direction of the difference of that work from Matthew, not of their similarity. In a statement about Hegesippus, who travelled from the East to Rome in the latter half of the 2nd cent., he tells us that that Father wrote a book of Memoirs, in which he gave extracts from the Gospel according to the Hebrews and the Syriac, translating them himself. Whatever may be the precise meaning of this, whether it credits Hegesippus with using two Gospels of Semitic language or only one, it shows Eusebius to have considered 'sec. Hebr.' to have been in the possession of the Christians of the East from a very early period.

4. Going back more than a century to Clement and Origen, with whom, as is well known, the Canon of Christian Scriptures was only emerging into definite form, we find 'sec. Hebr.' in the position of a well-known book, which, while it may not rank as Scripture,—yet in one passage of Clement (see below) it almost seems to do so,—is treated with respect, and regarded as a possible source of genuine information as to the Gospel narrative and teaching. Of Origen, Jerome tells us that he frequently used this Gospel; and there are three passages in the works of the great commentator in which he is seen to do so. He furnishes two of the extant fragments, introducing one of them (Jn 2^{12}) with the words: 'If any one gives credence to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, where the Saviour Himself says' (No. 5*a*), and saying of another (Mt 19^{16}), 'It is written in a certain Gospel which is called "according to the Hebrews," if at least any one choose to accept it not in the way of authority, yet (this phrase is thought by Zahn to be a gloss) for the bringing out of the question before us' (No. 11). Origen, then, who firmly believes that the Church had only four Gospels (Hom. in Luc. 1), knows of another to which some attach value, and he does not condemn that work as either heretical or absurd, but leaves it open to those who are so inclined to accept its statements, and regards them himself with great interest.

With regard to Origen's predecessor, Clement, we have the one fact that he twice quotes a saying from 'sec. Hebr.,' on one occasion (Strom. ii. 9. 45) introducing it with 'So also in the Gospel according to the Hebrews it is written' (No. 24); where the phrase 'it is written,' the ordinary formula for quotation from Scripture, is held by some to indicate that he regarded 'sec. Hebr.' in that light. But with Clement the Canon is not a very definite quantity; he names as Scripture a number of books which, according to Eusebius (vi. 14, 1), he does not seem to have held to belong to the NT. That Origen and Clement had 'sec. Hebr.' in a Greek translation is asserted by Harnack; but he does not succeed in accounting for the disappearance of such a version, if there was one, before the time of Jerome; and both Fathers were in a position to quote from a work in Aramaic.

5. It is not necessary to go further back. The Muratorian Canon, drawn up at Rome in the last quarter of the 2nd cent., does not name our Gospel. Irenæus, writing in the West some time after, knows that there are Christians, whom he calls Ebionites, who use only the Gospel of Matthew, and repudiate the Apostle Paul as an apostate from the Law. He shows no knowledge of the Gospel 'sec. Hebr.,' and his statement may be understood as a vague reflexion in the West of the fact that there were believers in Christ in the East who used only one Gospel and connected it, in the way we have seen, with the name of the Apostle Matthew. Of Papias, first author, so far as we can discern, of the statement that Matthew had written a Gospel-work in Hebrew, Eusebius tells us that he had the story of the woman accused to the Lord of many sins—a story which Eusebius says 'sec. Hebr.' also contained (No. 23). He does not say that Papias derived it from that source. Finally, it is a very curious circumstance that Ignatius, in the early part of the 2nd cent., quotes the narrative in which the risen Christ summons His disciples to satisfy themselves that He is 'not a bodiless spirit' (No. 19). Eusebius, who knew our Gospel, declares that he does not know from what source Ignatius derived this; and to conclude, as Harnack does, that Ignatius knew 'sec. Hebr.,' seems scarcely necessary.

6. The history of our Gospel after Jerome translated it is soon told. In a Stichometry, or list of the books of Scripture with the number of lines in each, appended to a copy of the chronography of Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople 806–813, the Gospel according to the Hebrews is named among the Antilegomena of the NT. It is in company here with the Apocalypse of John, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Epistle of Barnabas. Good reasons have been given for thinking that the copy containing this list originated, not at Constantinople but at Jerusalem, and that the list was drawn up in Palestine. It may have been a century or two old when the MS was written; and thus we are given to know that though the Canon of the Church prevailed in Jerusalem as well as elsewhere, yet the work which had once been the only Gospel of the Christians of the East was still held in affection there, and read, if not in Church, yet privately. Its appearance on this list shows that it was in Greek when the list was made. And we may suppose that it was Jerome's translation which was thus half canonized. The Stichometry informs us how large a book our Gospel was, and how it compares in this respect with those of the Canon. 'Sec. Hebr.' had 2200 lines; it was longer than Mark, which had 2000, but shorter than Matthew, which had 2500.

The last fact of the external history of our Gospel is derived from a minuscule codex of the First and Second canonical Gospels, which dates from the 9th or 10th cent., and was brought by Tischendorf from the East to St. Petersburg. The Gospel according to Matthew is said in it to have been taken from old copies at Jerusalem. There are four marginal notes on Matthew, giving readings from τὸ Ἰουδαικόν; and one of these agrees with matter quoted by Jerome from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. We thus learn that that work was extant in Greek, and was a matter of interest in the East up to the time when this copy was made, and probably some time after. It is open to us to believe, with Zahn, that here also we are on the track of Jerome's Greek translation. From this point the Gospel according to the Hebrews is lost, and, till the book itself turns up in some corner in the East, we are left for our knowledge of it to the shadowy history which has been traced, and to what may be learned from the scanty fragments which are preserved.

ii. Extant fragments.—The fragments are 24 in number. They are collected in a very convenient form in Preuschen's Antilegomena (Giessen, 1901), the passages in which they occur being also given; and also in Nestle's Novi Testamenti Græci Supplementum (Leipzig, 1896); also in Nicholson, Zahn, and Handmann. They are various in their nature—some being linguistic, stating a different word, phrase, or name which stood in our Gospel; while some give a piece of narrative of a different tenor from that in the canonical Gospels, or additional to what they supply. A few give isolated utterances of the Lord not found in our New Testament. The fragments show that the Gospel contained the baptism of Jesus by John, a piece which may be connected with either the Transfiguration or the Temptation, the Lord's Prayer, the story of the man with the withered hand, the confession of Peter, the piece about forgiving seven times, the interview with the rich young man, the triumphal entry, the impeachment of the Pharisees, the parable of the Talents, Peter's denial, Barabbas, a catastrophe in the temple at the crucifixion, two appearances of the risen Lord; to which is to be added the story of the woman accused of many sins. That the narrative proceeded after the same scheme as our Matthew cannot be proved or even shown to be probable; some narratives are fuller than in that Gospel, and some additional to it; yet the work was considerably shorter than Matthew. A Gospel for the use of Hebrews would probably contain a genealogy, though on this point Epiphanius confesses ignorance; it might also have a narrative of the Infancy, though the evidence on this point is not conclusive.

The linguistic variations have been thought by many scholars to show that 'sec. Hebr.' was a translation from Greek; but recent writers take a different view, and hold our Gospel to give valuable corrections of the Greek Gospels of the Church, and to show an earlier tradition. Thus its reading Bethlehem Juda is better than Bethlehem of Judæa in Matthew, pointing to the district, not the country; and when Barabbas is explained to mean 'the son of their Master' (Jerome; No. 16), we remember Origen's statement, that the name of this person was Jesus, and see that our Gospel may have been right in taking Barabbas, not as a name but as a title. Origen also says that the word is to be translated 'son of the teacher.' In the Lord's Prayer the fifth petition ran, 'Give us this day to-morrow's bread' (No. 7). Here it has been held that the Aramaic mahar was a translation of ἐπιούσιος, taken as derived from ἡ ἐπιοῦσα, 'the coming day.' But the converse is possible; ἐπιούσιος may be a translation of mahar (see Lightfoot, Fresh Revision, App. I. 195): in this prayer as originally given only very simple terms would be employed, which can scarcely be said of ἐπιούσιος if derived from οὐσία, and denoting 'necessary,' or (as Jerome) 'supersubstantial.' To-day's work is done among simple people for the bread of to-morrow, and the prayer in this form might accompany the work without implying the anxiety forbidden in Mt 6^{31}.

The narrative pieces are of extreme interest.

No. 3: 'Behold, the Lord's mother and brothers said to him, John the Baptist is baptizing for remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But he said to them, What sin have I done that I should go and be baptized by him; unless perhaps what I have now said is ignorance?' Here the title 'Lord' applied to Christ, and that of 'the Baptist,' belong to a time when the tradition was already formed; but the revelation of Christ's family circumstances at an early time, and the words He utters, appear such as could not have been invented. The absence of any consciousness of sin, and at the same time the attitude of humility, agree with all we know of His early life; but, as we see from Mk 10^{18} with its parallels, the tradition tended to discard His self-depreciation. Mt 3^{14} shows that reflexion early took place on the meaning of Jesus' baptism by John.

No. 4. The Baptism: 'It came to pass when the Lord had ascended out of the water, the whole fountain of the Holy Spirit came down and rested upon him, and said to him, My son, in all the prophets I was looking for thee, that thou shouldest come, and that I should rest in thee. For thou art my rest; thou art my firstborn son, who reignest to eternity.' Here more distinctly than in any of the canonical Gospels the baptism is the act by which Jesus is made acquainted with His destiny to bring about the highest revelation of God. The dove is not mentioned; the Holy Spirit itself descends on Him. The heavenly voice is that not of the Father but of the Spirit, afterwards spoken of as feminine, and is addressed as in Mark, not to the bystanders or to John but to Jesus Himself. The Spirit is to dwell with Him, not as in the prophets occasionally and provisionally, but in full and ultimate manner; He is firstborn of the Spirit, and is to have an endless reign. This passage also can scarcely be thought to be invented. It has the appearance, like the next extract, of a communication made by Jesus Himself to His intimate friends, and setting forth His experience, as does also that of the Temptation, in a symbolic narrative.

No. 5. The Flight to Mount Tabor: 'The Holy Spirit, my mother, took me just now by one of my hairs, and carried me away to the great Mount Tabor.' This extract occurs 5 times in Origen and Jerome; it must have made a great impression. Jesus appears to be telling of an experience He has just had; it seems scarcely possible to connect it with either the Temptation or the Transfiguration, though early tradition held Tabor to be the scene of the latter: Jesus has been carried off, not as in the former by the devil, or as in the latter with any companions. The Holy Spirit, the Heb. word for which (רוּחַ) is usually feminine, has taken Him (cf. Ezk 8[3], Bel and the Dragon v.[36]) for some communication which He alone is to hear.

No. 7. The man with the withered hand (Mt 12[9-13]) is in this Gospel said to be a builder, and to entreat help in such words as these: 'I was a builder, seeking my living with my hands; I pray thee, Jesus, restore to me my health, that I may not basely beg my bread.' The R.C. commentator Stapula states, when dealing with this story in Matthew, that the man with the withered hand made a strong appeal to Jesus' compassion; accepting this as a fact from Jerome citing this Gospel. The story reads awkwardly without this feature; in its absence the energy of Jesus appears to be called forth by His indignation against the Pharisees, or by the desire to establish the view that cures may be wrought on the Sabbath: neither alternative is very satisfactory.

The simple freedom which is apparent in these narratives meets us also in the Christophanies recorded in the Gospel. In one of them (No. 18) we are told how 'the Lord after handing over the linen cloth to the servant of the high priest (the guard at the tomb is accordingly not Roman but Jewish), went to James and appeared to him (cf. 1 Co 15[7]); for James had sworn that he would eat no bread from the hour at which the Lord had drunk the cup (of death), till he should see him rising again from those who are asleep. . . . Bring, the Lord says, a table and bread.' . . . And then it goes on: 'He took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave it to James the Just, and said to him: My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man is risen from those who are asleep.' Here, as in the former pieces, the embellishing touches of a later time are unmistakable, while the tradition itself has a look of originality, and is independent of our NT.

The narratives from the ministry also present surprising variations from those of our NT, as when we hear the Lord (No. 11) addressing the second rich man with the exhortation to part with his possessions, and showing him that he has not kept the Law, since there are people dying of hunger about his gates and no supplies are sent them out of his well-furnished house. The parable of the Talents (No. 14) had three types of service, not only two as in our NT, and the hard sentence was directed not to him who hid his lord's talent in the earth, but to the servant who had devoured his lord's substance with harlots and flute-players. It was not the veil of the temple that was rent at the Crucifixion, but the lintel (No. 17), a stone of immense size, that was broken in two; in which, however we may compare the two physical facts, we see at least a different symbolism.

We find, lastly, a number of sayings of the Lord not recorded in the canonical Gospels, but which are accepted by scholars as not unfit to stand with those formerly known to us. It is reckoned among the greatest crimes 'that one should have saddened the spirit of his brother' (No. 20). 'Never be glad but when you have looked upon your brother in charity' (No. 21). The following is more difficult: 'I will choose for myself the well-pleasing; the well-pleasing are those whom my Father in heaven gave me' (No. 22; from a work of Eusebius in Syriac; the translation is disputed; cf. below, p. 346[a]). Could this come from the same mouth which said, 'I came not to call the righteous, but sinners'? It speaks at least of a more Jewish colouring in this tradition. Yet the same Gospel contained the story of the woman accused to the Lord of many sins, which, whether parallel to Jn 8[1-11] or to Lk 7[36-50], or a different story, must have had a lesson of compassion for human infirmity.

iii. THEORIES OF ORIGIN AND CHARACTER.—From these extracts, reminding him now of one of the Gospels of the NT and now of another, and in some cases appearing to add to what these Gospels give, the reader will readily see what questions are here suggested to scholarship. That 'sec. Hebr.' was a translation from Greek into Aramaic, drawing its information from the canonical Gospels, mostly, no doubt, from Matthew, but also from Luke, has now ceased to be believed. If, however, Matthew wrote a Gospel-work in Hebrew, as Papias declares and as early Christendom believed, our Gospel may be related to that Apostolic work. This is held by Hilgenfeld, Nicholson, and Zahn, in different ways. Hilgenfeld, as the principal opponent of the now prevailing view of the priority of Mark to Matthew, is naturally led to claim for 'sec. Hebr.,' which agreed on the whole with Matthew, but was more Jewish and less universalistic, a very early and independent position. He considers 'sec. Hebr.' to be the work of Matthew of which Papias speaks, and to be the earliest Gospel, from which the study of the Gospels must set out as its point of Archimedes. Nicholson, in a book full of learning and of interest, concludes that 'Matthew,' not necessarily the Apostle, wrote both 'sec. Hebr.' and canonical Matthew, the latter of which may have been translated from Aramaic, and was probably first produced. This would be another instance in the NT of an author who wrote two versions of his book, both of which got into circulation. Zahn considers that Matthew wrote, as Papias says, in Hebrew, and that 'sec. Hebr.' followed him, but was written in a broader and more popular style (as some of the fragments show), which caused the original Matthew to disappear before it. It follows that on points of language the non-canonical Gospel, being nearer Matthew's original than the canonical, is more correct, but that its tradition is derived from Matthew, and is to be regarded as secondary.

The present state of opinion as to the origin of the Synoptic Gospels is opposed to the views of these scholars, and none of them has found followers on this subject. If, as is now generally believed, the sources of Matthew, Mark, and Luke alike were Greek; and if Matthew, as appears to many to be capable of demonstration, composed his Gospel with Mark before him, and another work, also Greek, before him from which Luke also drew, then any Aramaic work Matthew used must have been subsidiary to his main sources. That canonical Matthew was originally composed in Greek, not translated, is not now questioned.

The position, accordingly, is that we know the Gospel tradition to have been put into Greek by A.D. 70, when attempts were made to construct out of it continuous Gospels for the use of Christians. These underwent various modifications, the textual critics assure us, after they were written, and tended to become always more dignified, more intelligible to men of all lands, and to part with any features they might have at first of too great naïveté and simplicity. But the tradition, though translated into Greek, continued to exist in its original Aramaic; and it is no matter of wonder if it was seen in course of time to be different in some respects from that of the Church, if it remained more Jewish, more particular, and in many instances more realistic and quaint. Zahn explains these features of 'sec. Hebr.' as due to the exuberance of a popular preacher, and therefore quite secondary; but they may also be explained as signs of an earlier stage of the tradition which, while the Church outgrew it, survived among 'the Hebrews.'

The date of the work Jerome translated cannot be fixed with any precision. Papias may not have known it, as Hilgenfeld thinks, nor Ignatius, as Harnack. Its anonymity, its primitive character, and the authority it afterwards enjoyed, point to a very early origin. It may have come into existence about the same time as the Synoptic Gospels, and in obedience to some at least of the same motives as led to their appearance.*

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works mentioned in the body of the above article, which are the most recent and important, the student may consult, for the history of the subject, Lessing's Theol. Nachlass, p. 45; the NT Introductions of Eichhorn, Hug, de Wette, Reuss, and Hilgenfeld; Weizsäcker's Untersuchungen über die evangelische Geschichte; Baur's and Holtzmann's works on the Gospels; Lipsius' art. 'Apocryphal Gospels' in Smith's Dict. of Christian Biography. The subject is discussed by Strauss and Keim in their works on the Life of Christ, while the most recent publication of this kind, Oscar Holtzmann's Leben Jesu (1901), treats 'sec. Hebr.' as a coordinate source with the Synoptic Gospels and weaves its statements into the narrative.

i. NAME.—The name Agrapha was first used in 1776 (J. G. Körner, De sermonibus Christi ἀγράφοις, Leipzig) for the Sayings purporting to come from Jesus Christ but transmitted to us outside of the canonical Gospels. The term was suggested by the idea that these Sayings are stray survivals from an unwritten tradition, orally preserved and running parallel with the written Gospels. It is now recognized that this description does not strictly apply to many Sayings which must be included in any collection of such material; but the name has proved convenient, and since the publication of Resch's elaborate monograph ('Agrapha: Aussercanonische Evangelienfragmente in möglichster Vollständigkeit zusammengestellt und untersucht,' in Texte und Untersuchungen, v. 4, 1889), has passed into general use.

ii. CERTAIN SAYINGS NOT TO BE INCLUDED.—In a collection of Agrapha it is, however, neither customary nor advisable to include all that falls under the definition just given. The long discourses ascribed to Jesus in such works as the Didascalia, or to the Risen Christ, as in the Pistis Sophia,* have no claim to authenticity, and are profitably studied only in their original context. The same is to be said of most of the comparatively few Sayings of Jesus found in the religious romances known as Apocryphal Gospels, whether Gnostic or Catholic, and in the Apocryphal Acts, as well as of the Letter of Christ to Abgar (Euseb. HE i. 13). And of some of the Sayings now usually and rightly included in the lists it must be said that if their full context were known it would probably at once appear that they were of this same sort, and were better omitted. Of a different character are the Sayings preserved from those uncanonical Gospels which were designed, like the canonical Gospels, to embody Evangelical tradition for serious public or private use. To this class of writings belong the Gospel according to the Hebrews, together with the (far less valuable) Gospel according to the Egyptians, and the Ebionite Gospel (mainly based upon the canonical Gospels) known to Epiphanius. With these would be placed also the Gospel according to Peter; but the only fragment of it extant contains no Saying of Jesus excepting a peculiar form of the word from the cross of Mk 15^{34}, Mt 27^{46}.

It is also to be remarked that in nearly all the published collections of Agrapha a considerable number of Sayings will be actually found which for various reasons have no right to be included as independent Agrapha. (a) Some of these are obviously mere parallel forms or expansions or combinations of Sayings found in the canonical Gospels.

For instance—

> Ephr. Syr. Testamentum (Opp. Græce, ed. Assemani, vol. ii. p. 232), τοῦ γὰρ ἀγαθοῦ διδασκάλου ἤκουσα ἐν τοῖς θείοις εὐαγγελίοις φήσαντος τοῖς ἑαυτοῦ μαθηταῖς· μηδὲν ἐπὶ γῆς κτήσησθε: 'For I heard the Good Teacher in the divine Gospels saying to his disciples, Get you nothing on earth.' Cf. Mt 6^{19} 10^{9}, Lk 12^{33}.

With regard to such cases, the process of alteration of some of the Sayings of Jesus to be seen within the Synoptic Gospels themselves, whether as shown by the parallel forms in the several Gospels, or by the variant readings of Greek MSS and the renderings of early Versions, should be a warning against assuming too easily the presence of an independent Saying. There is a strong presumption in favour of accounting for half-strange Sayings of Jesus from the universally current canonical Gospel tradition. But, in determining whether or not a Saying is to be regarded as an independent Agraphon, individual judgments will necessarily vary. For other Sayings which might be classed here, see below, 'List of Agrapha,' Nos. 38, 49.

(b) In other cases, by a mere slip a passage from Scripture has been wrongly ascribed to Jesus by an ancient writer. For instance—

> Didascalia Apostolorum Syriace (ed. Lagarde, p. 11, l. 12), 'For the Lord saith, Wrath destroyeth even wise men.' From Pr 15^{1}.—De aleatoribus, iii., 'Monet Dominus et dicit: Nolite contristare Spiritum Sanctum qui in vobis est, et nolite exstinguere lumen quod in vobis effulsit': 'The Lord also warneth and saith, Grieve not the Holy Spirit which is in you, and quench not the light which has shone in you.' From Eph 4^{30}, 1 Th 5^{19}.

* For certain Sayings found in the Pistis Sophia, which have a somewhat different character from the mass of that work, but are not included in the List of Agrapha given below, see Harnack, 'Über das gnostische Buch Pistis-Sophia' (TU vii. 2), 1891, p. 30 f.; Ropes, Sprüche Jesu, pp. 63 f., 117–119, 135 f., cf. p. 141.

(c) In another class of cases the ancient writer never intended to give the impression that he was quoting a Saying of Jesus, but has merely paraphrased in homiletical fashion Jesus' thought. Thus—

Hippolytus, Demonstratio adv. Judæos, vii., ὅθεν λέγει· γενηθήτω, ὦ πάτερ, ὁ ναὸς αὐτῶν ἠρημωμένος: 'Whence he says, Let their temple, Father, be desolate.' Here the context shows that the apparent quotation is meant simply as an explanatory paraphrase of Ps 69^{25}, of which the writer is giving a connected exposition.

Petrus Siculus, Historia Manichæorum, 34 (ed. Mai, Nova Patr. Bibl. iv. 2), ἑταῖρε, οὐκ ἀδικῶ σε, ἀπέλαβες τὰ σὰ ἐν τῇ ζωῇ σου· νῦν ἆρον τὸ σὸν καὶ ὕπαγε: 'Friend, I do thee no wrong, thou receivedst thy reward in thy lifetime; take up that which is thine and go thy way.' The context shows that this is an address to certain specific errorists, made up by combining Mt $20^{13f.}$ with Lk 16^{25}, and put by the author into the mouth of the Judge at the Last Assize.

(d) Other Sayings have occasionally been included through sheer mistake of some kind, as—

Epist. Barnabæ, iv. 9, 'Sicut dicit filius Dei, Resistamus omni iniquitati et odio habeamus eam': 'As the Son of God says, Let us resist all iniquity and hold it in hatred.' Here the Greek text (first published from Cod. ℵ in 1862) ὡς πρέπει υἱοῖς θεοῦ ἀντιστῶμεν, κ.τ.λ., makes it apparent that sicut dicit filius Dei is a textual corruption of sicut decet filios Dei.

(c) Still another class of Sayings to be found in the lists owe their places only to the guess of some modern scholar trying to discover the source of an ancient quotation. Resch, especially, has in a number of cases been led by his theory about the origin of the whole body of Agrapha to assume without sufficient ground that a quotation of unknown origin is from the words of Jesus.

Examples of this will be found in his treatment of 1 Co 2^9, Eph 5^{14}, Ja 4^5, or such a case as the following :—

Clemens Alex. Strom. i. 8. 41 (Potter, 340), οὗτοι οἱ τὰ κατάρτια κατασπῶντες καὶ μηθὲν ὑφαίνοντες, φησὶν ἡ γραφή: 'These are they who ply their looms and weave nothing, saith the Scripture' (cf. Resch, Agrapha, p. 226 f.).

A more plausible suggestion is that Rev 16^{15} (Resch, Agrapha, p. 310; Ropes, Spr. Jesu, No. 145) is an Agraphon.

iii. METHOD AND RESULTS OF CRITICISM OF THE AGRAPHA.—The criticism of the Agrapha has first to determine the source or sources by which, independently of other sources known to us, the Saying in question has been preserved. The Agrapha were much copied by ancient writers from one another, and even an imposing array of attesting authorities is in most cases reducible to one. This genealogical criticism of the sources accomplished, the next question is whether the earliest authority for the Saying is of such date and character that he might reasonably have had access to trustworthy extra-canonical tradition. For Papias or Justin Martyr this will be admitted; for a writer of the 4th cent. it will not. Finally, a third question must be considered, viz. whether the Saying is conceivable in the mouth of Jesus, in view of what the canonical Gospels make known to us of His thought and spirit. On the answer to this question will depend the ultimate decision as to the probable genuineness of the Agraphon. But, even if a negative conclusion is here reached, the proof is not complete until a fair explanation of the actual rise of the Agraphon has been furnished.

The criticism of the Agrapha is in most cases more difficult and less satisfactory than that of the Sayings of Jesus contained in the Gospels, because the history of their preservation and early transmission is, as a rule, utterly obscure, and because of their isolated character, lacking, as they often do, all context. The setting of the canonical Sayings in a great body of material all of the same general character, touching on the same topics, and transmitted to us by the same process, is a factor of unspeakable significance and value in Gospel criticism.

For detailed criticism of the Agrapha the reader must be referred to the literature of the subject. Here only a general summary can be furnished.

(a) Of the following list of Agrapha, Nos. 1, 17, 19, 21, 34, 35, 38, 39, 42, 43, 44, 46, 48, 59, 60 are, for various reasons, certainly not genuine Sayings of Jesus.

(b) Of most of the others so positive a statement cannot be made, but to the present writer Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 22, 28, 40, 41, 45, 50, 54, 56, 63, 64, 65, 66 seem decidedly to lack the marks of genuineness; while in favour of Nos. 7, 8, 10, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 23, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 37, 49, 51, 52, 53, 61, 62 a better, though not a conclusive, case can be made out. Some of them may have concealed within them a genuine kernel.

(c) Nos. 4, 11, 13, 15, 24, 25, 47, 55, 57, 58 (distinguished by an asterisk) all seem with considerable probability to possess historical value. At the head in trustworthiness stands No. 13 (Ac 20^{35}), which possesses the same right to be accepted as any Saying in the Gospel of Luke. The others vary in the strength of their claim.

The fact that after all Christian literature has been thoroughly searched there can be found outside of the New Testament only a bare handful of Sayings of Jesus which can possibly be thought to convey trustworthy tradition of His words, is striking and important. Its significance is increased by the comparatively trifling intrinsic interest which attaches even to these few Agrapha. The cause of this state of things seems to be that the authors of the First and Third Gospels gathered up practically all that the Church in general possessed of traditions of the life and teaching of Jesus Christ. Any tradition embodied in the Fourth Gospel seems to have belonged to a comparatively small circle, if to more than one person. Living tradition may have persisted for a time in Palestine (possibly leaving a trace in the Gospel according to the Hebrews), but it was cut off by the destruction of Jerusalem and the withering of Jewish Christianity. The treasures that the earliest tradition had brought to the Gentile Churches were collected and arranged in our Synoptic Gospels; and the Evangelists did their work so well that only stray bits here and there, and these of but slight value, were left for the gleaners.

The Agrapha from Mohammedan sources are chiefly of merely curious interest.

iv. LIST OF AGRAPHA.—

[Note.—In the following list, numbers preceded by R. refer to the numbered Sayings in Ropes, Sprüche Jesu; numbers with Ag. to the 'Logia' enumerated in Resch, Agrapha; and with Ap. to the 'Apokrypha' given by Resch.]

(a) 1–15. Agrapha from the NT or from some NT manuscripts.—

1. (R. 113) Mt 6^{13} (TR), ὅτι σοῦ ἐστιν ἡ βασιλεία καὶ ἡ δύναμις καὶ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. ἀμήν.

2. Mt 17^{21} (TR), τοῦτο δὲ τὸ γένος οὐκ ἐκπορεύεται εἰ μὴ ἐν προσευχῇ καὶ νηστείᾳ.

3. (R. 114) Mt $17^{26f.}$ (Arabic Diatessaron; cf. Cod. 713^{syr}), 'Simon said unto him, From strangers. Jesus said unto him, Therefore the sons are free.

Simon saith unto him, Yea. Jesus said unto him, Give thou also unto them as if a stranger. And lest it should distress them, go thou to the sea, and cast a hook.'

5. (R. 115) Mk 9^{49} (TR), καὶ πᾶσα θυσία ἁλὶ ἁλισθήσεται.

6. (R. 116) Mk 16^{15-18} (TR), καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· πορευθέντες εἰς τὸν κόσμον ἅπαντα κηρύξατε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει· ὁ πιστεύσας καὶ βαπτισθεὶς σωθήσεται, ὁ δὲ ἀπιστήσας κατακριθήσεται. σημεῖα δὲ τοῖς πιστεύσασιν ἀκολουθήσει ταῦτα, ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου δαιμόνια ἐκβαλοῦσιν, γλώσσαις λαλήσουσιν, καὶ ἐν ταῖς χερσὶν ὄφεις ἀροῦσιν, κἂν θανάσιμόν τι πίωσιν οὐ μὴ αὐτοὺς βλάψῃ, ἐπὶ ἀρρώστους χεῖρας ἐπιθήσουσιν καὶ καλῶς ἕξουσιν.

7. (R. 132; Ag. 27) Lk 6^{4} (Cod. D), τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ θεασάμενός τινα ἐργαζόμενον τῷ σαββάτῳ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· ἄνθρωπε, εἰ μὲν οἶδας τί ποιεῖς, μακάριος εἶ· εἰ δὲ μὴ οἶδας, ἐπικατάρατος καὶ παραβάτης εἶ τοῦ νόμου: 'On the same day, seeing one working on the Sabbath, he said to him, Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the Law.'

8. (R. 136) Lk $9^{55f.}$ (TR), καὶ εἶπεν· οὐκ οἴδατε οἵου πνεύματός ἐστε ὑμεῖς· ὁ γὰρ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἦλθε ψυχὰς ἀνθρώπων ἀπολέσαι ἀλλὰ σῶσαι.

9. Lk 11^{2} (Greg. Nyss. de Orat. Dom. iii. p. 738), ἐλθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρισάτω ἡμᾶς: 'Let thy Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us.'

10. (R. 137) Lk 23^{34} (TR), ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς ἔλεγε· πάτερ, ἄφες αὐτοῖς· οὐ γὰρ οἴδασι τί ποιοῦσι.

*11. (R. 146; Resch, p. 341) Jn 7^{53}–8^{11} (TR), Pericope Adulteræ.

12. (R. 138) Ac 1^{5} 11^{16}, Ἰωάνης μὲν ἐβάπτισεν ὕδατι, ὑμεῖς δὲ ἐν πνεύματι βαπτισθήσεσθε ἁγίῳ οὐ μετὰ πολλὰς ταύτας ἡμέρας.

*13. (R. 141; Ag. 12) Ac 20^{35}, μνημονεύειν τε τῶν λόγων τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ὅτι αὐτὸς εἶπεν· μακάριόν ἐστιν μᾶλλον διδόναι ἢ λαμβάνειν.

14. (R. 139) 1 Co $11^{24f.}$, τοῦτο ποιεῖτε εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν. τοῦτο ποιεῖτε ὁσάκις ἐὰν πίνητε εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν.

*15. (R. 154) 1 Th 4^{15-17}, τοῦτο γὰρ ὑμῖν λέγομεν ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου, ὅτι ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλειπόμενοι εἰς τὴν παρουσίαν τοῦ κυρίου οὐ μὴ φθάσωμεν τοὺς κοιμηθέντας· ὅτι αὐτὸς ὁ κύριος ἐν κελεύσματι, ἐν φωνῇ ἀρχαγγέλου καὶ ἐν σάλπιγγι θεοῦ, καταβήσεται ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ, καὶ οἱ νεκροὶ ἐν Χριστῷ ἀναστήσονται πρῶτον, ἔπειτα ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλειπόμενοι ἅμα σὺν αὐτοῖς ἁρπαγησόμεθα ἐν νεφέλαις εἰς ἀπάντησιν τοῦ κυρίου εἰς ἀέρα. καὶ οὕτως πάντοτε σὺν κυρίῳ ἐσόμεθα.

16. (R. 134; Ap. 11) Clemens Alex. Strom. ii. 9. 45 (Potter, 453), ἦ κἂν τῷ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγελίῳ, ὁ θαυμάσας βασιλεύσει, γέγραπται, καὶ ὁ βασιλεύσας ἀναπαύσεται; v. 14. 96 (Potter, 704), ἴσον γὰρ τούτοις ἐκεῖνα δύναται· οὐ παύσεται ὁ ζητῶν ἕως ἂν εὕρῃ, εὑρὼν δὲ θαμβηθήσεται, θαμβηθεὶς δὲ βασιλεύσει, βασιλεύσας δὲ ἐπαναπαύσεται: 'For those words have the same meaning with these others, He that seeketh shall not stop until he find, and when he hath found he shall wonder, and when he hath wondered he shall reign, and when he hath reigned he shall rest.'

17. (R. 93; Ap. 14) Origen, in Joann. tom. ii. 6 (cf. in Jerem. hom. xv. 4), ἐὰν δὲ προσίεταί τις τὸ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγέλιον, ἔνθα αὐτὸς ὁ σωτήρ φησιν· ἄρτι ἔλαβέ με ἡ μήτηρ μου τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα ἐν μιᾷ τῶν τριχῶν μου καὶ ἀπήνεγκέ με εἰς τὸ ὄρος τὸ μέγα Θαβώρ: 'And if any one goes to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there the Saviour himself saith: Just now my mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor.'

18. (R. 150; Ap. 17) Origen, in Matt. tom. xv. 14 (vetus interpretatio), 'Scriptum est in evangelio quodam, quod dicitur secundum Hebræos, si tamen placet alicui suscipere illud non ad auctoritatem sed ad manifestationem propositæ quæstionis: Dixit, inquit, ad eum alter divitum: Magister, quid bonum faciens vivam? Dixit ei: Homo, leges et prophetas fac. Respondit ad eum: Feci. Dixit ei: Vade, vende omnia quæ possides et divide pauperibus et veni, sequere me. Cœpit autem dives scalpere caput suum et non placuit ei. Et dixit ad eum Dominus: Quomodo dicis, legem feci et prophetas, quoniam scriptum est in lege, Diliges proximum tuum sicut te ipsum; et ecce multi fratres tui, filii Abrahæ, amicti sunt stercore morientes præ fame, et domus tua plena est multis bonis, et non egreditur omnino aliquid ex ea ad eos. Et conversus dixit Simoni discipulo suo sedenti apud se: Simon, fili Joannæ, facilius est camelum intrare per foramen acus quam divitem in regnum cœlorum': 'It is written in a certain Gospel, the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, if any one likes to take it up not as having any authority but to shed light on the matter in hand: The other, it says, of the rich men said unto him, Master, by doing what good thing shall I have life? He said to him, Man, do the law and the prophets. He answered unto him, I have. He said to him, Go, sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor, and come, follow me. But the rich man began to scratch his head, and it pleased him not. And the Lord said unto him, How sayest thou, I have done the law and the prophets, since it is written in the law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; and behold, many brethren of thine, sons of Abraham, are clad in filth, dying of hunger, and thy house is full of good things, and nothing at all goes out from it to them. And he turned and said to Simon his disciple, who was sitting by him: Simon, son of John, it is easier for a camel to enter through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.'

'Also the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was recently translated by me into Greek and Latin, which Origen, too, often uses, relates after the resurrection of the Saviour: But when the Lord had given the linen cloth to the priest's servant, he went to James and appeared to him. For James had taken an oath that he would not eat bread from that hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord, until he should see him rising from them that sleep.

'And again, a little further on: Bring me, saith the Lord, a table and bread. And there follows immediately: He took the bread, and blessed, and brake, and gave to James the Just, and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread, inasmuch as the Son of Man hath risen from them that sleep.'

*47. (R. 152) Aboda Zara 16*b*, 17*a*, 'The Rabbis have the following tradition: When Rabbi Eliezer was once imprisoned for heresy (minuth, i.e. inclination to the forbidden Christian religion), he was brought before the (Roman) court to be judged. The judge said to him, Does such a mature man as thou occupy himself with such vain things? Eliezer replied, The Judge is just to me. The judge thought that Eliezer was speaking of him; in fact he referred to his Father in heaven. Then the judge said, Because I am held by thee to be just, thou art acquitted. When Eliezer came home, his disciples came to comfort him, but he would accept no comfort. Then R. 'Aḳiba said to him, Permit me to say to thee something of that which thou hast taught me. He answered, Say on. Then R. 'Aḳiba said, Perhaps thou hast at some time heard a heresy which pleased thee, because of which thou wast now about to be imprisoned for heresy. Eliezer replied, 'Aḳiba, thou remindest me. I was once walking in the upper street of Sepphoris; there I met one of the disciples of Jesus of Nazareth, named Jacob of Kephar Sekhanya, who said to me, In your law it reads: Thou shalt not bring the hire of an harlot into the house of thy God (Dt 23^{18}); is it lawful that from such gifts one should have a draught-house built for the high priest? I knew not what to answer him to this. Then he said to me, Thus taught me Jesus of Nazareth: Of the hire of an harlot hath she gathered them, and to the hire of an harlot shall they return (Mic 1^{7}); from filth it came, to the place of filth shall it go. This explanation pleased me, and therefore have I been arrested for heresy, because I have transgressed the word of Scripture: Remove thy way far from her (Pr 5^{8}), i.e. from heresy.'

The philosopher answered them, Then have thy share. But Gamaliel said to him, We have the law: Where there is a son, the daughter shall not inherit. The philosopher said, Since the day when you were driven from your country, the law of Moses has been done away, and the Gospel has been given, in which it reads: Son and daughter shall inherit together. The next day Gamaliel brought to the philosopher a Libyan ass. Then the philosopher said to them, I have looked at the end of the Gospel; for it says: I, the Gospel, am not come to do away with the law of Moses, but I am come to add to the law of Moses. It stands written in the law of Moses: Where there is a son, the daughter shall not inherit. Then Imma said to him, May your light shine like the lampstand! But Rabban Gamaliel said, The ass is come, and has overturned the lampstand.'

Rom. iv. 5, διὰ τοῦτο, ταῦτα ὑμῶν πρασσόντων, εἶπεν ὁ κύριος· ἐὰν ἦτε μετ' ἐμοῦ συνηγμένοι ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ μου καὶ μὴ ποιῆτε τὰς ἐντολάς μου, ἀποβαλῶ ὑμᾶς καὶ ἐρῶ ὑμῖν· ὑπάγετε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς πόθεν ἐστέ, ἐργάται ἀνομίας: 'For this cause, if ye do these things, the Lord said, Though ye be gathered together with me in my bosom, and do not my commandments, I will cast you away, and will say unto you, Depart from me, I know you not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity.'

51. (R. 149; Ap. 10) 2 Clem. Rom. v. 2-4, λέγει γὰρ ὁ κύριος· ἔσεσθε ὡς ἀρνία ἐν μέσῳ λύκων. ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος αὐτῷ λέγει· ἐὰν οὖν διασπαράξωσιν οἱ λύκοι τὰ ἀρνία; εἶπεν ὁ 'Ιησοῦς τῷ Πέτρῳ· μὴ φοβείσθωσαν τὰ ἀρνία τοὺς λύκους μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν αὐτά· καὶ ὑμεῖς μὴ φοβεῖσθε τοὺς ἀποκτέννοντας ὑμᾶς καὶ μηδὲν ὑμῖν δυναμένους ποιεῖν, ἀλλὰ φοβεῖσθε τὸν μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν ὑμᾶς ἔχοντα ἐξουσίαν ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος, τοῦ βαλεῖν εἰς γέενναν πυρός: 'For the Lord saith, Ye shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves. But Peter answering said unto him, What, then, if the wolves should tear the lambs? Jesus said unto Peter, Let not the lambs fear the wolves after they are dead; and ye also, fear ye not them that kill you and are not able to do anything to you; but fear him that, after ye are dead, hath power over soul and body, to cast them into the Gehenna of fire.'

52. (R. 5; Ag. 7) 2 Clem. Rom. viii. 5, λέγει γὰρ ὁ κύριος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ· εἰ τὸ μικρὸν οὐκ ἐτηρήσατε, τὸ μέγα τίς ὑμῖν δώσει; λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν ὅτι ὁ πιστὸς ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ καὶ ἐν πολλῷ πιστός ἐστιν: 'For the Lord saith in the Gospel, If ye kept not that which is little, who shall give unto you that which is great? For I say unto you that he who is faithful in the least, is faithful also in much.'

53. (R. 110; Ap. 95) Irenæus, v. 33. 3 f., 'Quemadmodum presbyteri meminerunt, qui Ioannem discipulum Domini viderunt, audisse se ab eo, quemadmodum de temporibus illis docebat Dominus et dicebat: Venient dies in quibus vineæ nascentur singulæ decem millia palmitum habentes, et in uno palmite dena millia brachiorum, et in uno vero palmite (lege brachio) dena millia flagellorum, et in unoquoque flagello dena millia botruum, et in unoquoque botro dena millia acinorum, et unumquodque acinum expressum dabit vigintiquinque metretas vini. Et cum eorum apprehenderit aliquis sanctorum botrum, alius clamabit: Botrus ego melior sum, me sume, per me Dominum benedic. Similiter et granum tritici decem millia spicarum generaturum, et unamquamque spicam habituram decem millia granorum, et unumquodque granum quinque bilibres similæ claræ mundæ: et reliqua autem poma et semina et herbam secundum congruentiam iis consequentem: et omnia animalia iis cibis utentia, quæ a terra accipiuntur, pacifica et consentanea invicem fieri, subiecta hominibus cum omni subiectione. Hæc autem et Papias, Ioannis auditor, Polycarpi autem contubernalis, vetus homo, per scripturam testimonium perhibet in quarto librorum suorum: sunt enim illi quinque libri conscripti.

'Et adiecit dicens: Hæc autem credibilia sunt credentibus. Et Iuda, inquit, proditore non credente et interrogante: Quomodo ergo tales genituræ a Domino perficientur? dixisse Dominum: Videbunt qui venient in illa.'

'As the elders, who saw John the disciple of the Lord, relate that they had heard from him how the Lord used to teach concerning those times, and to say: The days will come, in which vines shall grow, each having ten thousand shoots, and on one shoot ten thousand branches, and on one branch again ten thousand twigs, and on each twig ten thousand clusters, and in each cluster ten thousand grapes, and each grape when pressed shall yield five-and-twenty measures of wine. And when any of the saints shall have taken hold of one of their clusters, another shall cry, I am a better cluster; take me, bless the Lord through me. Likewise, also, that a grain of wheat shall produce ten thousand heads, and every head shall have ten thousand grains, and every grain ten pounds of fine flour, bright and clean; and the other fruits, seeds, and the grass shall produce in similar proportions; and all the animals, using these fruits which are products of the soil, shall become in their turn peaceable and harmonious, obedient to man in all subjection. These things Papias, who was a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp, an ancient worthy, witnesseth in writing in the fourth of his books, for there are five books composed by him.

'And he added, saying, But these things are credible to them that believe. And when Judas the traitor did not believe, and asked, How shall such growths be accomplished by the Lord? he relates that the Lord said, They shall see, who shall come to these (times).'

Hippolytus, Comm. in Danielem, lib. iv. (ed. Bratke, p. 44), τοῦ οὖν κυρίου διηγουμένου τοῖς μαθηταῖς περὶ τῆς μελλούσης τῶν ἁγίων βασιλείας ὡς εἴη ἔνδοξος καὶ θαυμαστή, καταπλαγεὶς ὁ Ἰούδας ἐπὶ τοῖς λεγομένοις ἔφη· καὶ τίς ἄρα ὄψεται ταῦτα; ὁ δὲ κύριος ἔφη· ταῦτα ὄψονται οἱ ἄξιοι γινόμενοι: 'So when the Lord told the disciples about the coming kingdom of the saints, how it was glorious and marvellous, Judas, amazed at what was spoken, said, And who then shall see these things? And the Lord replied, These things shall they see who become worthy.'

54. (R. 88; Ag. 21) Justin Martyr, Dial. xxxv., εἶπε γάρ· πολλοὶ ἐλεύσονται ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου, ἔξωθεν ἐνδεδυμένοι δέρματα προβάτων, ἔσωθεν δέ εἰσι λύκοι ἅρπαγες· καί· ἔσονται σχίσματα καὶ αἱρέσεις: 'For he said, Many shall come in my name, clad without in sheepskins, but within they are ravening wolves; and, There shall be schisms and heresies.' Cf. Didascalia Syr. vi. 5 (ed. Lagarde, p. 99, l. 9).

*55. (R. 142; Ag. 39) Justin Martyr, Dial. xlvii., διὸ καὶ ὁ ἡμέτερος κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς εἶπεν· ἐν οἷς ἂν ὑμᾶς καταλάβω, ἐν τούτοις καὶ κρινῶ: 'Wherefore also our Lord Jesus Christ said, In whatsoever things I apprehend you, in those I shall judge you.'

56. (R. 91; Ag. 51) Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 15, εἶπε δὲ οὕτως· οὐκ ἦλθον καλέσαι δικαίους, ἀλλ' ἁμαρτωλοὺς εἰς μετάνοιαν· θέλει γὰρ ὁ πατὴρ ὁ οὐράνιος τὴν μετάνοιαν τοῦ ἁμαρτωλοῦ ἢ τὴν κόλασιν αὐτοῦ: 'And he said this, I came not to call righteous but sinners to repentance; for the heavenly Father desireth the sinner's repentance rather than his punishment.'

Origen, de Orat. ii., τὸ μὲν ὃ δεῖ· αἰτεῖτε τὰ μεγάλα, καὶ τὰ μικρὰ ὑμῖν προστεθήσεται, καί· αἰτεῖτε τὰ ἐπουράνια, καὶ τὰ ἐπίγεια ὑμῖν προστεθήσεται: 'That which is needful: Ask for the great things, and the small shall be added to you; and, Ask for the heavenly things, and the earthly shall be added to you.'

*58. (R. 144; Ag. 43) Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 28. 177 (Potter, 425), εἰκότως ἄρα καὶ ἡ γραφή, τοιούτους τινὰς ἡμᾶς διαλεκτικοὺς οὕτως ἐθέλουσα γενέσθαι, παραινεῖ· γίνεσθε δὲ δόκιμοι τραπεζῖται, τὰ μὲν ἀποδοκιμάζοντες, τὸ δὲ καλὸν κατέχοντες: 'Rightly, therefore, the Scripture also, in its desire to make us such dialecticians, exhorts us, Be approved money-changers, disapproving some things, but holding fast that which is good.'

59. (R. 87; Ag. 17) Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 10. 64 (Potter, 684), λέγει γὰρ ὁ προφήτης· παραβολὴν κυρίου τίς νοήσει εἰ μὴ σοφὸς καὶ ἐπιστήμων καὶ ἀγαπῶν τὸν κύριον αὐτοῦ; ἐπὶ ὀλίγων ἐστὶ ταῦτα χωρῆσαι. οὐ γὰρ φθονῶν, φησί, παρήγγειλεν ὁ κύριος ἔν τινι εὐαγγελίῳ· μυστήριον ἐμὸν ἐμοὶ καὶ τοῖς υἱοῖς τοῦ οἴκου μου: 'For the Prophet saith, Who shall know the parable of the Lord except the wise and understanding and that loveth his Lord? It belongeth to a few only to receive these things. For not grudgingly, he saith, did the Lord declare in a certain Gospel, My mystery is for me and for the sons of my house.'

60. (R. 107; Ap. 53) Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 15. 97 (Potter, 555), πάλιν ὁ κύριός φησιν· ὁ γήμας μὴ ἐκβαλλέτω καὶ ὁ μὴ γήμας μὴ γαμείτω· ὁ κατὰ πρόθεσιν εὐνουχίας ὁμολογήσας μὴ γῆμαι ἄγαμος διαμενέτω: 'Again the Lord saith, Let him that is married not put away, and let him that is unmarried marry not: let him that with purpose of celibacy hath promised not to marry remain unmarried.'

61. (R. 129; Ag. 8) Clem. Alex. Excerpta ex Theodoto, ii. (Potter, 957), διὰ τοῦτο λέγει ὁ σωτήρ· σώζου σὺ καὶ ἡ ψυχή σου: 'Therefore the Saviour saith, Be saved, thou and thy soul.'

62. (R. 128; Ag. 5) Origen, Hom. in Ieremiam, xx. 3, 'Legi alicubi quasi Salvatore dicente, et quæro sive quis personam figuravit Salvatoris, sive in memoriam adduxit, an verum sit hoc quod dictum est. Ait autem ipse Salvator: Qui iuxta me est, iuxta ignem est; qui longe est a me, longe est a regno': 'I have read somewhere what purports to be an utterance of the Saviour, and I query (equally if some one put it into the mouth of the Saviour, or if some one remembered it) whether that is true which is said. But the Saviour himself saith, He who is near me is near the fire; he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.'

63. (R. 90; Ag. 36*b*) de montibus Sina et Sion, xiii., 'Ipso (sc. Domino) nos instruente et monente in epistula Johannis discipuli sui ad populum: Ita me in vobis videte, quomodo quis vestrum se videt in aquam aut in speculum': 'He himself instructing and warning us in the Epistle of John his disciple to the people: Ye see me in yourselves, as one of you sees himself in water or mirror.'

64. (R. 85; Ag. 3) Epiphan. Hær. lxxx. 5, ἄξιος γὰρ ὁ ἐργάτης τοῦ μισθοῦ αὐτοῦ· καί· ἀρκετὸν τῷ ἐργαζομένῳ ἡ τροφὴ αὐτοῦ: 'For the labourer is worthy of his hire; and, Sufficient for the labourer is his maintenance.'

65. (R. 125) Augustine, Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum, ii. 4. 14, 'Sed apostolis, inquit, Dominus noster interrogantibus de Iudæorum prophetis quid sentiri deberet, qui de adventu eius aliquid cecinisse in præteritum putabantur, commotus talia eos etiam nunc sentire, respondit: Dimisistis vivum qui ante vos est et de mortuis fabulamini. Quid mirum (quandoquidem hoc testimonium de scripturis nescio quibus apocryphis protulit) si de prophetis Dei talia confinxerunt hæretici, qui easdem litteras non accipiunt?' 'But (he says) when the apostles asked our Lord what ought to be thought about the prophets of the Jews, who were believed formerly to have prophesied his coming, he, angry that they even now had such thoughts, answered, You have sent away the living who is before you, and prate about dead men. What wonder, seeing he has brought out this quotation from some apocryphal scriptures, if heretics who do not accept the same writings, have invented such things about the prophets of God?'

66. (R. 97; Ap. 24) Ephr. Syr. Evang. conc. expos. (ed. Mösinger, p. 203), 'Quod autem turbatus est consonat cum eo, quod dixit: Quamdiu vobiscum ero et vobiscum loquar? et alio loco: Tædet me de generatione ista. Probaverunt me, ait, decies, hi autem vicies et decies decies': 'Now that he was distressed agrees with what he said, How long shall I be with you and speak with you? and in another place, I am weary of this generation. They proved me, he said, ten times, but these twenty times and ten times ten times.'

1. Castalani, Commentary on Bukhari, i. 163, 'Jesus asked Gabriel when the hour (i.e. the day of judgment) was to come? Gabriel answered, He whom thou askest knows no better than he who asks.'

2. Jakut's Geographical Lexicon, i. 1, 'Jesus said, The world is a place of transition, full of examples; be pilgrims therein, and take warning by the traces of those that have gone before.'

3. Baidawi, Commentary on the Koran, p. 71, ed. Constantinop., 'Jesus said, Be in the midst, yet walk on one side.'

4. Zamakhshari, Commentary on the Koran, p. 986, 'In the sermons of Jesus, son of Mary, it is written, Beware how ye sit with sinners.'

5. El-Mustatraf, etc., i. p. 20, 'Jesus said, I have treated the leprous and the blind, and have cured them; but when I have treated the fool, I have failed to cure him.'

6. El-Hadaik El-Wardiyyah, i. p. 27, 'God revealed unto Jesus, Command the children of Israel that they enter not my house save with pure hearts, and humble eyes, and clean hands; for I will not answer any one of them against whom any has a complaint.'

The following are from El-Ghazzali, Revival of the Religious Sciences:—

7. i. 8, 'Jesus said, Whoso knows and does and teaches, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.'

8. i. 26, 'Jesus said, Trees are many, yet not all of them bear fruit; and fruits are many, yet not all of them are fit for food; and sciences are many, but not all of them are profitable.'

9. i. 30, 'Jesus said, Commit not wisdom to those who are not meet for it, lest ye harm it; and withhold it not from them that are meet for it, lest ye harm them. Be like a gentle physician, who puts the remedy on the diseased spot.' According to another version: 'Whoso commits wisdom to them that are not meet for it, is a fool; and whoso withholds it from them that are meet for it, is an evildoer. Wisdom has rights, and rightful owners; and give each his due.'

10. i. 49, 'Jesus said, Evil disciples are like a rock that has fallen at the mouth of a brook; it does not drink the water, neither does it let the water flow to the fields. And they are like the conduit of a latrina which is plastered outside, and foul inside; or like graves, the outside of which is decorated, while within are dead men's bones.'

11. i. 50, 'Jesus said, How can he be a disciple who, when his journey is unto the next world, makes for the things of this world? How can he be a disciple who seeks for words in order to communicate by them, not to act according to them?'

12. i. 52, 'God said unto Jesus, Exhort thyself, and if thou hast profited by the exhortation, then exhort others; otherwise be ashamed before me.'

13. i. 177, 'Jesus said, If a man send away a beggar empty from his house, the angels will not visit that house for seven nights.'

14. i. 247, Prayer of Jesus—'O God, I am this morning unable to ward off what I would not, or to obtain what I would. The power is in another's hands. I am bound by my works, and there is none so poor that is poorer than I. O God, make not mine enemy to rejoice over me, nor my friend to grieve over me; make not my trouble to be in the matter of my faith; make not the world my chief care; and give not the power over me to him who will not pity me.'

15. ii. 119, 'God revealed to Jesus, Though thou shouldst worship with the devotion of the inhabitants of the heaven and the earth, but hadst not love in God and hate in God, it would avail thee nothing.'

16. ii. 119, 'Jesus said, Make yourselves beloved of God by hating the evil-doers. Bring yourselves nearer to God by removing far from them; and seek God's favour by their displeasure. They said, O Spirit of God, then with whom shall we converse? Then He said, Converse with those whose presence will remind you of God, whose words will increase your works, and whose works will make you desire the next world.'

17. ii. 134, 'Jesus said to the apostles, How would you do if you saw your brother sleeping, and the wind had lifted up his garment? They said, We should cover him up. He said, Nay, ye would uncover him. They said, God forbid! Who would do this? He said, One of you who hears a word concerning his brother, and adds to it, and relates it with additions.'

18. ii. 154, 'They say that there was no form of address Jesus loved better to hear than "Poor man."'

19. ii. 168, 'When Jesus was asked, How art thou this morning? he would answer, Unable to forestall what I hope, or to put off what I fear, bound by my works, with all my good in another's hand. There is no poor man poorer than I.'

20. iii. 25, 'Satan, the accursed, appeared to Jesus, and said unto him, Say, there is no God but God. He said, It is a true saying, but I will not say it at thy invitation.'

21. iii. 28, 'When Jesus was born, the demons came to Satan, and said, The idols have been overturned. He said, This is a mere accident that has occurred; keep still. Then he flew till he had gone over both hemispheres, and found nothing. After that he found Jesus the son of Mary already born, with the angels surrounding him. He returned to the demons, and said, A prophet was born yesterday; no woman ever conceived or bare a child without my presence save this one. Hope not, therefore, that the idols will be worshipped after this night, so attack mankind through haste and thoughtlessness.'

22. iii. 28, 'Jesus lay down one day with his head upon a stone. Satan, passing by, said, O Jesus, thou art fond of this world. So he took the stone and cast it from under his head, saying, This be thine together with the world.'

23. iii. 52, 'Jesus was asked, Who taught thee? He answered, No one taught me. I saw that the ignorance of the fool was a shame, and I avoided it.'

24. iii. 52, 'Jesus said, Blessed is he who abandons a present pleasure for the sake of a promised (reward) which is absent and unseen.'

25. iii. 65, 'Jesus said, O company of apostles, make hungry your livers, and bare your bodies; perhaps then your hearts may see God.'

26. iii. 67, 'It is related how Jesus remained sixty days addressing his Lord, without eating. Then the thought of bread came into his mind, and his communion was interrupted, and he saw a loaf set before him. Then he sat down and wept over the loss of his communion, when he beheld an old man close to him. Jesus said unto him, God bless thee, thou saint of God! Pray to God for me, for I was in an ecstasy when the thought of bread entered my mind, and the ecstasy was interrupted. The old man said, O God, if thou knowest that the thought of bread came into my mind since I knew thee, then forgive me not. Nay, when it was before me, I would eat it without thought or reflexion.'

27. iii. 81, 'Jesus said, Beware of glances; for they plant passion in the heart, and that is a sufficient temptation.'

28. iii. 87, 'Jesus was asked by some men to guide them to some course whereby they might enter Paradise. He said, Speak not at all. They said, We cannot do this. He said, Then only say what is good.'

29. iii. 87, 'Jesus said, Devotion is of ten parts. Nine of them consist in silence, and one in solitude.'

30. iii. 92, 'Jesus said, Whosoever lies much, loses his beauty; and whosoever wrangles with others, loses his honour; and whosoever is much troubled, sickens in his body; and whosoever is evilly disposed, tortures himself.'

31. iii. 94, 'Jesus, passing by a swine, said to it, Go in peace. They said, O Spirit of God, sayest thou so to a swine? He answered, I would not accustom my tongue to evil.'

32. iii. 107, 'Jesus said, One of the greatest of sins in God's eyes is that a man should say God knows what he knows not.'

33. iii. 108, 'Malik, son of Dinar, said, Jesus one day walked with his apostles, and they passed by the carcass of a dog. The apostles said, How foul is the smell of this dog! But Jesus said, How white are its teeth!'

34. iii. 134, 'Christ passed by certain of the Jews, who spake evil to him; but he spake good to them in return. It was said to him, Verily these speak ill unto thee, and dost thou speak good? He said, Each gives out of his store.'

35. iii. 151, 'Jesus said, Take not the world for your lord, lest it take you for its slaves. Lay up your treasure with Him who will not waste it,' etc.

36. iii. 151, 'Jesus said, Ye company of apostles, verily I have overthrown the world upon her face for you; raise her not up after me. It is a mark of the foulness of this world that God is disobeyed therein, and that the future world cannot be attained save by abandonment of this; pass then through this world, and linger not there; and know that the root of every sin is love of the world. Often does the pleasure of an hour bestow on him that enjoys it long pain.'

37. iii. 151, 'He said again, I have laid the world low for you, and ye are seated upon its back. Let not kings and women dispute with you the possession of it. Dispute not the world with kings, for they will not offer you what you have abandoned and their world; but guard against women by fasting and prayer.'

38. iii. 151, 'He said again, The world seeks and is sought. If a man seeks the next world, this world seeks him till he obtain therein his full sustenance; but if a man seeks this world, the next world seeks him till death comes and takes him by the throat.'

39. iii. 152, 'Jesus said, The love of this world and of the next cannot agree in a believer's heart, even as fire and water cannot agree in a single vessel.'

40. iii. 153, 'Jesus being asked, Why dost thou not take a house to shelter thee? said, The rags of those that were before us are good enough for us.'

41. iii. 153, 'It is recorded that one day Jesus was sore troubled by the rain and thunder and lightning, and began to seek a shelter. His eye fell upon a tent hard by; but when he came there, finding a woman inside, he turned away from it. Then he noticed a cave in a mountain; but when he came thither, there was a lion there. Laying his hand upon the lion, he said, My God, Thou hast given each thing a resting-place, but to me thou has given none! Then God revealed to him, Thy resting-place is in the abode of my mercy: that I may wed thee on the day of judgment . . . and make thy bridal feast four thousand years, of which each day is like a lifetime in this present world; and that I may command a herald to proclaim, Where are they that fast in this world? Come to the bridal feast of Jesus, who fasted in this world!'

42. iii. 153, 'Jesus said, Woe unto him who hath this world, seeing that he must die and leave it, and all that is in it! It deceives him, yet he trusts in it; he relies upon it, and it betrays him. Woe unto them that are deceived! When they shall be shown what they loathe, and shall be abandoned by what they love; and shall be overtaken by that wherewith they are threatened! Woe unto him whose care is the world, and whose work is sin; seeing that one day he shall be disgraced by his sin.'

43. iii. 153, 'Jesus said, Who is it that builds upon the waves of the sea? Such is the world; take it not for your resting-place.'

44. iii. 153, 'Some said to Jesus, Teach us some doctrine for which God will love us. Jesus said, Hate the world, and God will love you.'

45. iii. 154, 'Jesus said, Ye company of apostles, be satisfied with a humble portion in this world, so your faith be whole; even as the people of this world are satisfied with a humble portion in faith, so this world be secured to them.'

46. iii. 154, 'Jesus said, O thou that seekest this world to do charity, to abandon it were more charitable.'

47. iii. 159, 'Jesus used to say, My condiment is hunger, my inner garment fear, and my outer garment wool. I warm myself in winter in the sun; my candle is the moon; my mounts are my feet; my food and dainties are the fruits of the earth; neither at eventide nor in the morning have I aught in my possession, yet no one on earth is richer than I.'

48. iii. 161, 'The world was revealed unto Jesus in the form of an old woman with broken teeth, with all sorts of ornaments upon her. He said to her, How many husbands hast thou had? She said, I cannot count them. He said, Hast thou survived them all, or did they all divorce thee? She said, Nay, I have slain them all. Jesus said, Woe unto thy remaining husbands! Why do they not take warning by thy former husbands? Thou hast destroyed them one after another, and yet they are not on their guard against thee.'

The following two Sayings are quoted by Levinus Warnerus, in notes to his Centuria proverbiorum Persicorum, Lugd. Batav. 1644, p. 30 f. (see Fabricius, Cod. apocr. NT, iii. p. 394 f.):—

49. 'Jesus, son of Mary (to whom be peace), said, Whoso craves wealth is like a man who drinks sea-water; the more he drinks, the more he increases his thirst, and he ceases not to drink until he perishes.'

50. 'Jesus, son of Mary, said to John, son of Zacharias, If any one in speaking of thee says the truth, praise God; if he utters a lie, praise God still more, for thereby shall thy treasure be increased in the list of thy works, and that without any labour of thine, that is, his good works are carried to thy list.'

Finally, we have the following Saying:—

51. Koran, Sur. 5 fin., 'Remember, when the apostles said, O Jesus, Son of Mary, is thy Lord able to cause a table to descend unto us from heaven? he answered, Fear God, if ye be true believers. They said, We desire to eat thereof, and that our hearts may rest at ease; and that we may know that thou hast told us the truth; and that we may be witnesses thereof. Jesus, the son of Mary, said, O God our Lord, cause a table to descend unto us from heaven, that the day of its descent may become a festival-day unto us, unto the first of us, and unto the last of us; and a sign from thee; and do thou provide food for us, for thou art the best provider. God said, Verily I will cause it to descend unto you; but whoever among you shall disbelieve hereafter, I will surely punish him with a punishment wherewith I will not punish any other creature.'

LITERATURE.—Much of the material relating to the Agrapha was collected by the older editors of Patristic texts. Especially the notes of Cotelier (Patres apostolici^{2}, Antwerp, 1698; Ecclesiæ Græcæ monumenta, Paris, 1677–86) have been quarries of erudition for later workers. In recent years important contributions have been made by Anger (Synopsis Evangeliorum, Leipzig, 1852); Hilgenfeld (NT extra Canonem Receptum^{2}, Leipzig, 1884); and Zahn (Gesch. d. neutest. Kanons, 1888–92), as well as by the writers who have discussed the fragments of the Gospel according to the Hebrews (notably Nicholson, Handmann, Zahn). Collections of Agrapha have been frequently made since those of Grabe (in his Spicilegium, Oxford, 1698) and Fabricius (in his Codex apocr. NT, Hamburg, 1703). See, among others, R. Hofmann, Leben Jesu nach den Apokryphen, 1851; Westcott, Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, Appendix C, 1860, ^{8}1894; J. T. Dodd, Sayings Ascribed to Our Lord, Oxford, 1874; Schaff, History of the Christian Church, vol. i., 1882, pp. 162–7; Nestle, NT supplementum, Leipzig, 1896, pp. 89–92; Preuschen, Antilegomena, 1901, pp. 43–47, 138 f.; J. de Q. Donehoo, Apocryphal and Legendary Life of Christ, 1903. Resch brings together a vast amount of material relating to the whole subject, and uses the Agrapha as a leading argument for his theory (founded on that of B. Weiss) of the origin of the Synoptic Gospels. He holds to an original Gospel, called in ancient times τὰ λόγια, and composed in Hebrew by Matthew shortly after the death of Christ. This document is supposed to have been the main source of the three Synoptic Gospels (its matter constituting four-fifths of Matthew, three-fourths of Luke, and two-thirds of Mark), to have been used by St. Paul and St. John, and to have been known for many centuries to the writers of the Church. From it are derived the Agrapha, and to varying translations of it are due not only the variations of the Synoptic Evangelists, but also many of the countless textual variants in the Gospels, especially those of the 'Western Text,' as preserved both in MSS and in Patristic quotations. A reconstruction of the 'Logia' is attempted in Resch, Die Logia Jesu nach dem griechischen und hebräischen Text wiederhergestellt, 1898; see also his 'Aussercanonische Paralleltexte zu den Evangelien' (TU x. 1–5), 1893–96.

Resch's contention that 75 Agrapha are probably genuine Sayings of Jesus would, if accepted, furnish some reason for supposing a single common source of such material. In fact, however, most of Resch's Agrapha do not commend themselves to other scholars as probably genuine; and his solution of the Synoptic Problem has been generally rejected. See J. H. Ropes, 'Die Sprüche Jesu die in den kanonischen Evangelien nicht überliefert sind: eine kritische Bearbeitung des von D. Alfred Resch gesammelten Materials' (TU xiv. 2), 1896. PAPYRI.—The manner in which papyrus was used as writing-material in the ancient world, the dates of its adoption and abandonment, and the countries in which it was employed, have been described in vol. iv. of this Dictionary (art. WRITING). The object of the present article is to show what actual writings on papyrus, bearing upon the study of the Bible, have come down to us, and what kind of information is to be derived from them.

i. THE DISCOVERIES OF PAPYRI.—The first papyrus rolls to be brought to light were the product of the excavations on the site of Herculaneum in the middle of the 18th century. In 1752 a small room was discovered, which proved to be a library; and on the shelves round its walls were found several hundreds of rolls, calcined to the semblance of cinders by the eruption of Vesuvius, which buried the town in A.D. 79. These, however, when patiently unrolled and deciphered, were found to contain philosophical treatises of the Epicurean school, and do not concern us here. All other papyri that have hitherto come to light are derived from Egypt, where alone the conditions of soil and climate are such as to admit of the preservation of so perishable a material. The date of the first discovery of papyri in Egypt is 1778, when a collection of rolls was discovered by fellaheen, probably in the Fayum; but, since no purchaser was immediately forthcoming, all were destroyed but one, now in the Museum at Naples, containing a list of labourers in the reign of Commodus. For a century after this date discoveries were merely sporadic, though some important literary papyri were among the fruits of them.

The first find upon a large scale was made in 1877, on the site of the city of Arsinoë, in the Fayum, from which several thousand papyri (nearly all fragmentary) were derived, most of which are now at Vienna. With this event the modern period of papyrus discovery begins, and the quarter of a century that has elapsed since that date has witnessed an ever-increasing flood of papyri, partly due to the systematic searches of European explorers, and partly to the irregular zeal of the natives. The principal localities from which papyri have been drawn are the Fayum, a detached province lying to the west of the Nile in Central Egypt, and the neighbourhoods of the towns of Oxyrhynchus, Hermopolis, Heracleopolis, and Thebes. They are found in the rubbish-heaps of buried towns or villages, in the cartonnage of mummy-cases of the Ptolemaic period (in which layers of papyrus, covered with plaster, took the place of wood), and in cemeteries; one remarkable discovery (by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt, on the site of the ancient Tebtunis) being that of a cemetery of crocodiles, in which the animals were found wrapped in rolls of papyrus, while other rolls had been stuffed inside them. There are now tens, or even hundreds, of thousands of papyri (the majority, no doubt, being mere fragments) in the possession of the museums and learned societies of Europe, many of which have not yet been unrolled or deciphered. Some of these are literary works, relics of the books which once circulated among the educated classes, native or foreign, of Egypt; but the vast majority consists of non-literary documents, including official and commercial papers of all descriptions (census-rolls, tax-registers, receipts, petitions, sales, leases, loans, etc.), as well as private letters and accounts. It is from these that some of the most instructive materials for our present purpose are obtained.

ii. Egyptian Papyri.—The papyri of which we have chiefly to speak are Greek, belonging to the period after the conquest of Egypt by Alexander and the establishment of the Ptolemaic dynasty. But in addition to these some mention must be made of papyri in the ancient Egyptian language, which precede the Greek period or coincide with the earlier part of it; and in the later Egyptian language, commonly known as Coptic, which coincide with the latter part of the Greek period and continue after the practical disappearance of Greek. Ancient Egyptian papyri have only an indirect bearing upon the study of the Bible. Concurrently with the monuments of stone, they give us records of the history of Egypt, with which that of the Hebrews is in contact in so many places; while many of them contain copies of the Book of the Dead, the principal document of the Egyptian religion, with which the Israelites may possibly have become acquainted to some extent through their intercourse with their neighbours. These are written in hieroglyphics, the earliest form of writing practised in Egypt. Two other forms were successively developed from it—the hieratic and the demotic. Hieratic papyri are relatively scarce, and contain nothing to our purpose; demotic are very difficult to translate, and are mostly of the nature of business documents or stories. One document of the latter class, written about the end of the 1st cent., has been held to show certain resemblances to the narrative of the Nativity of our Lord; but the resemblance is, in truth, very slight and unessential (Griffith, Stories of the High Priests of Memphis, 1900, pp. 43, 44). On the whole, therefore, the later Egyptian papyri contain little that concerns the biblical student as such.

iii. Hebrew Papyri.—If papyrus was used in Palestine at all as writing material (see art. Writing, l.c. § ii.), no specimens of it could be expected to survive in that country; and even in Alexandria, where the colony of learned Jews no doubt possessed copies of the Hebrew Scriptures on papyrus, the soil is too damp to admit of their preservation. Consequently it is not surprising that, up to a very recent date, no Hebrew papyrus was known to exist. The first publication (containing fragments of prayers and business documents, from papyri in the Berlin Museum) was made by Steinschneider in 1879; but these are not earlier than the 7th century. Portions of a liturgical papyrus-codex, assigned to the 9th cent., are in the Cambridge University Library, and there are a few fragments at Oxford and Vienna. Far earlier and more valuable than these is a fragment acquired in 1902 by Mr. W. L. Nash, and by him presented to the Cambridge University Library. It is assigned on palæographical grounds to the 2nd cent. after Christ, though the materials for comparison (consisting mainly of inscriptions) are very scanty. It contains the Ten Commandments and the commencement of the Shema' (Dt $6^{4ff.}$), in a text differing markedly from the Massoretic. The Decalogue is in a form nearer to Dt 5^{6-21} than to Ex 20^{1-17}. The Sixth and Seventh Commandments are transposed, as in Cod. B and in Lk 18^{20}. The Shema' immediately follows the Decalogue, but has the introductory words, 'These are the statutes and the judgments which Moses commanded the children of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt,' which appear in the LXX (and OL). So far as it goes, therefore, this interesting fragment tends to support the theory that the LXX not infrequently represents a genuine pre-Massoretic Hebrew text. (S. A. Cook, PSBA xxv. 34, 1903).

iv. Greek Papyri.—Up to the present time, out of all the great mass of Greek papyri which have been brought to light, not many have any direct bearing on the Bible text or history. Nevertheless, all lists speedily become antiquated by the publication of fresh discoveries. The following list is believed to be complete up to June 1903:—

A. *Biblical texts—

1. Gn 1^{1-5}, in versions of LXX and Aquila. 4th cent. Amherst Pap. 3*c* (Grenfell and Hunt, Amherst Papyri, pt. i.).
2. Gn 14^{7}; probably a quotation in a theological treatise, since the text on the verso, in the same hand, is not biblical. 3rd cent. Brit. Mus. Pap. 212.
3. Ex $19^{1. 2. 5. 6}$, Dt 32^{3-10}. 6th cent. Amherst Papp. 191, 192 (op. cit. pt. ii.).

3*a*. 2 S 15^{36}–16^{1}. 4th cent. Strassburg Pap. 911. Archiv. f. Papyrusforschung, ii. 227.

4. Job $1^{21. 22}$ 2^{3}. 7th cent. Amherst Pap. 4 (ib. pt. i.).
5. Ps 5^{6-12}. 5th or 6th cent. Amherst Pap. 5.
6. Ps 10 (11)^{2}–18 (19)^{6} 20 (21)^{14}–34 (35)^{6}. 7th cent. Brit. Mus. Pap. 37 (Tischendorf, Mon. Sac. Ined., Nov. Coll. i. 217).
7. Ps 11 (12)^{7}–14 (15)^{4}. Late 3rd cent. Brit. Mus. Pap. 230 (Kenyon, Facsimiles of Biblical MSS., pl. 1).
8. Ps 39 (40)^{16}–40 (41)^{4}. Berlin Museum (Blass, Zeitschr. f. äg. Sprache, 1881).
9. Ps 107 (108)^{13} 108 (109)$^{1. 2. 12. 13}$ 118 (119)$^{115-122. 127-135}$ 135 (136)$^{19-28}$ 136 (137)$^{1. 6-8}$ 137 (138)$^{1-3}$ 138 (139)$^{20-26}$ 139 (140)$^{1-6. 10-14}$ 140 (141)$^{1-4}$, with several additional small fragments. 7th cent. or later. Amherst Papp. 6, 200 (Grenfell and Hunt, op. cit. pts. i. and ii.).

* In addition to the papyri here enumerated, there are several biblical fragments in the Rainer collection at Vienna and the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, as to which no precise details have yet been published.

10. Ca 1^{6-9}. 7th or 8th cent. Bodl. MS. Gr. Bibl. g. 1 (P) (Grenfell, Greek Papyri, i. 7).
11. Is $38^{3-5. 13-16}$. 3rd cent. Rainer Pap. 8024 (Führer durch die Ausstellung, 1894, No. 536).
12. Ezk 5^{12}–6^{3}, with Hexaplaric symbols. 3rd cent. Bodl. MS. Gr. Bibl. d. 4 (P) (Grenfell, Greek Papyri, i. 5).
13. Zec 4–Mal 4. 7th cent. (?) Heidelberg University Library (Specimen facs. in Times, Sept. 7, 1892; to be edited by Deissmann).
14. Mt $1^{1-9. 12. 14-20}$. 3rd cent. Pennsylvania Univ. Library (Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, i. 2).
15. Lk 1^{74-80} 5^{3-8} 5^{30}–6^{4}. 4th cent. Paris, Bibl. Nat. (Scheil, Mém. de la Miss. arch. française au Caire, ix.).
16. Lk 7^{36-43} 10^{38-42}. 6th cent. Rainer Pap. 8021 (Führer, No. 539).
17. Jn $1^{23-31. 33-41}$ $20^{11-17. 19-25}$. 3rd cent. Brit. Mus. Pap. 782 (Grenfell and Hunt, Oxy. Pap. ii. 208).
18. Ro 1^{1-7}. 4th cent. Harvard University Library (ib. ii. 209).
19. 1 Co 1^{17-20} 6^{13-18} $7^{3. 4. 10-14}$. 5th cent. Uspensky Collection at Kiew.
20. 1 Co 1^{25-27} 2^{6-8} $3^{8-10. 20}$. 5th cent. St. Catherine's, Sinai (Harris, Biblical Fragments from Mt. Sinai, No. 14).
21. 2 Th 1^{1}–2^{2}. 4th or 5th cent. Berlin Museum P. 5013.
22. He 1^{1}. 3rd or 4th cent. Amherst Pap. 3*b* (Grenfell and Hunt, Amherst Papyri, pt. i.).

B. Extra-canonical writings—

23. Fragment from narrative of St. Peter's denial, consisting of parts of seven lines. 3rd cent. (?) Rainer Pap. (Bickell, Mitth. Erzh. Rainer, i. 52).
24. Logia Jesu; one leaf, containing seven sayings of our Lord, with remains of an eighth. The first (imperfect) agrees, so far as it goes, with Lk 6^{42}; part of the sixth is nearly identical with Lk 4^{24}; the seventh is an expansion of Mt 5^{14}; the rest are new. Found at Oxyrhynchus. 3rd cent. Bodl. MS. Gr. th. e. 7 (P) (Grenfell and Hunt, Sayings of our Lord).
25. The Ascension of Isaiah, ch. 2. § 4–4. § 4; the only extant MS of any part of the work in the original Greek. 5th or 6th cent. Amherst Pap. 1 (Grenfell and Hunt, Amherst Papyri, pt. i.).

C. Theological works—

26. Philo, τίς ὁ τῶν θείων κληρονόμος and περὶ γενέσεως 'Αβέλ. 3rd cent. Formerly at Gizeh, now in the Louvre (Scheil, Mém. de la Miss. arch. française au Caire, tom. ix.).
27. Hermas, Pastor, Sim. ii. 7–10, iv. 2–5. 3rd cent. Berl. Mus. Pap. 5513 (Diels and Harnack, Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad. 1891).
28. Hermas, Pastor, Vis. i. 2–3, 12–13; Mand. xii. 1; Sim. ix. 2, 12, 17, 30; the last fragment contains a portion of the text hitherto known only in translations. 6th cent. Amherst Pap. 190 (Grenfell and Hunt).
29. Tract on prophecy, including quotation from Hermas, Mand. xi. 9. Harnack suggests that it may be part of the work of Melito περὶ προφητείας. 3rd–4th cent. Oxyrhynchus Pap. 5 (Grenfell and Hunt).
30. Fragment on the higher and lower soul; according to Harnack, from a Gnostic work of the Valentinian school. 3rd–4th cent. Oxyrhynchus Pap. 4 (ib.).
31. Theological fragment of uncertain character. 3rd cent. Oxy. Pap. 210 (ib.).
32. Early Christian hymn, in irregular metre. 4th cent. Amherst Pap. 2 (Grenfell and Hunt).

32*a*. Admonitions, perhaps logia, very fragmentary. 4th cent. Strassburg Pap. 1017. Archiv. f. Papyrusforschung, ii. 217.

33. Basil, Epp. v. 77 E, vi. 79 B, ccxciii. 432 B, cl. 239 C, ii. 72 A. 5th cent. (?) Berlin Museum (Philologus, 1884).
34. Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Moses; extracts. 5th cent. Berlin Museum (Blass, Zeitschr. f. äg. Sprache, 1880).
35. Cyril of Alexandria, de Adoratione, p. 242 E–250 D, 286 B. 6th or 7th cent. In private hands (Bernard, Royal Irish Acad. xxix. pt. 18).
36. Prayer to our Lord for deliverance from sickness and evil spirits, including elements of a creed; regarded by its first editor as drawn from the Gospel of the Egyptians, but without adequate grounds. 4th–5th cent. Gizeh Pap. 10263 (Jacoby, Ein neues Evangelienfragment, Strassburg, 1900).
37. Fragments of lives of SS. Abraham and Theodora. Louvre Papp. 1704–8 bis (Wessely, Wiener Studien, 1889).

38–44. Unidentified fragments of theological works. 5th–7th cent. Amherst Papp. 194–199, 201 (Grenfell and Hunt).

45–48. Ditto. 6th–7th cent. Brit. Mus. Papp. cxiii. 12*a–c*, 13 (Kenyon, Catal. of Greek Papyri, vol. i.).

49–51. Ditto. 6th–7th cent. Brit. Mus. Papp. 455, 462, 464 (ib. vol. ii.).

52. Ditto. 6th cent. (?) Brit. Mus. Pap. 873 (Catal. of Additions to Dept. of MSS in British Museum, 1894–99).
53. Hymn or incantation in Christian terms. 7th cent. (?) Brit. Mus. Pap. 1029 verso (unpubl.).
54. Prayer. 7th cent. Brit. Mus. Pap. 1176 (unpubl.).
55. Unidentified theological fragment. Berlin Museum. (Blass, Zeitschr. f. äg. Sprache, 1881).
56. Liturgical fragments, apparently choir slips. 7th–8th cent. Amherst Pap. 9 (Grenfell and Hunt).
57. Fragments of a Hebrew-Greek Onomasticon Sacrum. Heidelberg University Library (Deissmann, Encycl. Biblica, iii. 3560).

D. Documents illustrative of Church history—

58–60. Reports of appeals by Jews heard by the Roman emperors (Claudius and Trajan). Berl. Pap. 7118 (Gr. Urk. 511), Paris Pap. 68 + Brit. Mus. Pap. 1, Berl. Pap. 8111 (Gr. Urk. 341). See Wilcken, Hermes, xxx. 485 ff.; Bauer, Archiv für Papyrusforschung, i. 29, who compares these documents to the early Christian Acta martyrum.

61, 62. Libelli, or certificates of conformity to the State religion, issued by magistrates during the Decian persecution, A.D. 250. Berl. Pap. 7297 (Gr. Urk. 287) and Rainer Pap. (Krebs, Sitzungsb. d. k. Akad. zu Berlin, 1803, No. 48; Wessely, Anzeiger d. k. k. Akad. in Wien, 3rd Jan. 1894).

63. Letter from a Church dignitary in Rome to a Christian community in the Fayum, containing references to Maximus (bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 264–282) and his successor Theonas. Amherst Pap. 3*a* (Grenfell and Hunt, Amherst Papyri, pt. i.; Harnack, Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad., Nov. 1, 1900).

64. Letter from the presbyter Psenosiris to the presbyter Apollo with regard to a woman sent to the Great Oasis by the prefect of Egypt (perhaps a Christian banished during the persecution of Diocletian). Brit. Mus. Pap. 713 (Grenfell and Hunt, Greek Papyri, ii. p. 115; Deissmann, The Epistle of Psenosiris).
65. Inventory of furniture of a Christian church in the village of Ibion (in the Fayum). 5th–6th cent. Bodl. MS. Gr. th. d. 2 (P) (Grenfell and Hunt, op. cit. p. 160).
66. Festal letter from a Patriarch of Alexandria to his clergy. Probably A.D. 577. Brit. Mus. Pap. 729 (ib. p. 163).
67. Rescript from the emperors Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. to Apion, bishop of Syene and Elephantine, in reply to his petition for protection. Reference is made to churches on the island of Philæ. A.D. 425–450. Leyden Pap. Z (Wilcken, Archiv für Papyrusforschung, i. 396 ff.).
68. Christian amulet, including the Lord's Prayer. 6th cent. Papyrus found at Heracleopolis in 1899, but since burnt (ib. p. 429 ff., where references are given to other amulets).

V. VALUE OF THE PAPYRI.—The direct value to biblical science of the papyri above enumerated can be briefly estimated. The earlier biblical fragments (those of the 4th cent. or earlier) are too few and too small to be of much textual importance; but so far as they go their evidence in the NT supports the now dominant textual theory associated with the names of Westcott and Hort. They range themselves with the Codices ℵB and their allies, thus supporting not merely the type of text which WH have shown to be earlier than the Textus Receptus, but that particular form of it (WH's 'Neutral') which there is good reason to associate with Egypt. In the OT nearly all the papyrus fragments yet discovered are later than the great vellum uncials, and throw no new light on the textual problems of the LXX; but No. 12 is noticeable as containing a Hexaplaric text, with the earliest extant specimens of the symbols used by Origen. Outside the range of the canonical books, the Vienna fragment (No. 23) is too small to admit of any secure deductions; but the 'Logia' papyrus is exceptionally interesting, though there is no evidence to establish either the immediate source of its contents or the amount of authenticity which can be allowed to them. The 'Ascension of Isaiah' MS is also of considerable value as the only extant witness to the Greek text of the work; and the same may be said, to a less degree, of the Hermas fragments (No. 28). The other theological papyri do not amount to very much.

The greater part, however, of the value of the papyri lies in another direction, and arises from the light which they throw on the circumstances under which the LXX and the NT were written and circulated in the earlier ages. Occasionally they provide us with direct evidences of early Christianity, as in the case of Nos. 61–63 in the foregoing list; but the indirect evidence is greater, both in bulk and in importance. In the Greek papyri of the Ptolemaic period we have a mass of documents, literary and non-literary, written in the very country in which the LXX was produced and at the very same time, and showing us both how books were written at that time and what manner of Greek was spoken by the foreign residents in Egypt. Similarly, in the papyri of the early Roman period, from the 1st to the 4th cent., we have examples of books, letters, and business documents contemporary with the writers of the NT books, and illustrating the methods of book production and book circulation before the adoption of vellum and the date of the great vellum uncials which are the foundation of our textual knowledge. The results can be indicated only in outline within the limits of this article.

(a) Linguistic.—Previous to the great discoveries of papyri, it was usual to treat biblical Greek as a thing apart, due to a combination of Hebrew influences with the common Greek dialect, which operated only in Hellenistic (Jewish-Greek) circles. There is, no doubt, a considerable amount of truth in this view. Hebrew idioms naturally influenced the translators of the LXX, and acquaintance with the LXX naturally affected the style of the writers of the NT; but it is a view which requires modification. The papyri show us the dialect of Greek Egypt in many forms,—the language of the Government official, of the educated private person, of the dwellers in the temples, of the peasantry in the villages; and in many of them, which cannot be suspected of being subject to Jewish influences, we find words and phrases previously known only in the LXX or the NT. Thus the 'instrumental' use of the preposition ἐν by St. Paul in 1 Co 4^{21} (ἐν ῥάβδῳ ἔλθω πρὸς ὑμᾶς) has habitually been regarded as a Hebraism; yet an exact parallel to it occurs in a group of petitions from a village in the Fayum (Tebtunis Papp. 16^{14} 41^{5} 45^{17} 46^{15} $47^{11.12}$ 48^{19} Μαρρείους σὺν ἄλλοις πλείοσι ἐν μαχαίραις παραγινομένου, ἐπελθὼν Λύκος σὺν ἄλλοις ἐν ὅπλοις, κ.τ.λ.). Another papyrus from the same neighbourhood (50^{12}) contains the expression ἐπιβαλὼν συνέχωσεν, in the sense 'he *turned to and blocked up' (a canal), which may be compared with the obscure use of the same participle in Mk 14^{72} καὶ ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιεν. Prof. A. Deissmann, who, if not the first to notice this topic of interest in the papyri, was the first to develop it at length, has given the following list of words occurring in the LXX or NT, the use of which is elucidated or confirmed by the papyri:—

ἀγγαρεύω, ἀδελφός (of members of religious communities), ἄδολος, ἀθέτησις, ἀκατάγνωστος, ἀμετανόητος, ἀναφάλαντος, ἀντιλήμπτωρ, ἀντίλημψις, ἀπέχω, ἄρκετος, ἀρχισωματοφύλαξ, ἀσπάζομαι, ἄφεσις (ὑδάτων), γῆ ἐν ἀφέσει (but here D.'s explanation cannot be accepted, the phrase meaning land not held directly of the king), βαστάζω, βεβαίωσις, γένημα, γογγύζω, γραμματεύς, γράφω (γέγραπται), διάδοχος, διακούω, διῶρυξ, δοκίμιος, ἐάν (=ἄν), εἰ μήν, ἐλαιών, εἰς (=dat. commodi), ἐνταφιαστής, ἔντευξις, ἐνώπιον, ἐργοδιωκτής, ἐρωτᾶν (=request), ἔσθησις, εὔίλατος, θεμέλιον, καθαρὸς ἀπό, κατάκριμα, κυριακός, λειτουργία, λικμάω, λίψ (=west, which is normal in the papyri), λογεία, μετὰ καί (or σὺν καὶ), μικρός (=iunior), νεόφυτος, νόμος (=nome, the territorial division of Egypt), ὄνομα (in such phrases as ἔντευξις εἰς τὸ τοῦ βασιλέως ὄνομα), ὀφειλή, ὀψώνιον, παράδεισος, παρεπίδημος, πάρεσις, παστοφόριον, περιδέξιον, περίστασις, περιτέμνεσθαι (but D.'s interpretation of ἄσημος as=ἀπεριτέμνητος is untenable), ἀπὸ πέρυσι, πῆχυς (genitive πηχῶν), ποτισμός, πρᾶγμα ἔχειν, πράκτωρ, πρεσβύτερος (designating an official), πρόθεσις (ἄρτων), προφήτης, πυρράκης, σιτομέτριον, σκευοφύλαξ, σμαράγδινος, σουδάριον, συγγενής (as court-title), συμβούλιον, συνέχω, σφραγίζω, σφυρίς, σῶμα (=slave), τήρησις, υἱὸς θεοῦ (used as title of Augustus), ὑποζύγιον (=ass), ὑποπόδιον, φίλος (as court-title), χάραγμα, χειρόγραφον, χωρίζομαι.

In addition to the light thus thrown on the vocabulary of the Greek Bible, the papyri furnish evidence with regard to the orthography and the grammatical forms in use in Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt; but on these topics it is impossible to say much until the work of classifying the materials provided by the papyri has proceeded further than is at present the case. A beginning of the application of the material to biblical study has been made by A. Thumb (Die sprachgeschichtliche Stellung des biblischen Griechisch).

* ἐπιβαλών might also be taken to mean 'heaping up (earth)'; but the construction without an object would be strange, and the expression somewhat tautological, since συνέχωσεν alone would give the same sense.

(b) Historical.—On the historical side, the papyri provide a mass of information with regard to the usages, official and private, of Egypt under Ptolemaic and Roman rule, which from time to time throws light on the biblical narrative. We have letters with which to compare those which St. Paul wrote to his fellow-Christians; some of them recalling, by the number of salutations with which they conclude, the terminations of the Epistles to the Romans or Colossians (e.g. Brit. Mus. Pap. 404); others, in which a large autograph signature closes a letter written by a scribe, illustrating St. Paul's expressions in Gal 6^{11} (e.g. Brit. Mus. Papp. 311, 413). We have official, legal, and business formulæ in large numbers, including, for example, reports from one magistrate to another, similar to that sent by Claudius Lysias to Felix (Ac 23^{26-30}, where it may be observed that the doubtful word of salutation, ἔρρωσο, in v.^{30}, which is omitted by the best MSS, is decisively condemned by Egyptian usage, which admitted the use of this phrase only in letters addressed to an inferior). We have records of trials before magistrates, including brief summaries of the speeches of counsel, which recall the report of the speech of Tertullus in Ac $24^{2ff.}$. The double name of St. Paul (Σαῦλος ὁ καὶ Παῦλος) ceases to be remarkable or to cause any difficulty, when we find in the Egyptian census-lists scores of such double names, showing that it was customary for the natives of Oriental provinces to assume a Greek or Roman name in addition to that which they had among their own people (e.g. Ἡρώδης ὁ καὶ Πετενεφρῆς, Ἰσίδωρος ὁ καὶ Πανᾶς, κ.τ.λ.). The same census-records throw an interesting light on the census of Quirinius recorded in Lk 2^2. They prove that a census was held every 14 years in Egypt under Roman rule, at least as far back as A.D. 20; while at the same time all the extant indications tend to show that this system did not exist under the Ptolemies. It is natural, therefore, to regard these facts as having some bearing on the statement in Luke; but the only attempt to work out the problem in detail is that of Prof. W. M. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? 1898, p. 131 ff.). A.D. 5–6 (the Egyptian year beginning on Aug. 29), the date of the unquestioned governorship of Quirinius, is one of the census-years: B.C. 10–9, the natural date for the immediately preceding census, is too early for the Nativity; but Ramsay argues that the special circumstances of Judæa under Herod's rule would account for the census having been held a few years later in that province—probably in B.C. 6. Complete evidence on the subject is not yet forthcoming; but the instance is suggestive of the way in which the papyri may elucidate the chronology of the NT.*

(c) Textual.—Yet another branch of biblical study which is illustrated by the papyri is that of the history of the text. They furnish us with numberless examples of Greek writing of the period in which the LXX and NT were produced, and enable us to realize the conditions under which books circulated in the early ages of the Christian Church; and thereby they suggest a natural explanation of the genesis, at a very early date, of the divergent types of text which we find already established by the time that our most ancient vellum codices were written. This topic has, however, been already dealt with (see art. WRITING in vol. iv. pp. 951, 952), and need not be reconsidered here.

vi. COPTIC PAPYRI.*—The importance of the Coptic versions of the Bible for the purposes of textual criticism is well known (see vol. i. p. 672); but, as in the case of Greek MSS, the majority of the Coptic biblical MSS are on vellum. Only one Bohairic papyrus (a number of small fragments of a Psalter of the 10th cent., divided between the British Museum and the Rylands Library) is in existence; all the rest are in the Sahidic or Middle Egyptian dialects. With one or two notable exceptions, to be named below, the biblical papyri hitherto discovered are small and unimportant fragments. On the other hand, Coptic papyri have proved unexpectedly valuable in respect of apocryphal writings (some orthodox and others heretical) which were hitherto unknown, or known only by name and in a few quotations; while they also include a considerable number of Patristic texts and a very large quantity of documents bearing upon monastic and ecclesiastical life in Upper Egypt. Catalogues of these papyri are, however, still almost wholly wanting, so that no complete lists can be given: the following are the most notable individual MSS of which the existence has yet been notified:—

1. Brit. Mus. MS. Or. 5000; a large and complete codex, containing the entire Psalter in the Sahidic dialect. Prob. 7th cent. Edited by E. A. W. Budge (The earliest known Coptic Psalter, London, 1898). Its text agrees markedly with that of the largest Greek papyrus Psalter (No. 6, above).

2. Brit. Mus. MS. Or. 5984; part of a very large codex, containing considerable portions of the Sapiential books (Prov., Eccles., Song, Wisdom, Sirach), with one small fragment of Job, in Sahidic. Portions of the Song, Wisdom, and Sirach are wholly new, and in the other books the text sometimes differs from that published. Prob. 7th cent. Described in the forthcoming catalogue of Coptic MSS in the British Museum, by Mr. W. E. Crum.

3. Sixteen leaves (apparently out of an original 32) of a papyrus book at Cairo, containing a narrative of the Resurrection and conversations between our Lord and the disciples. It appears to purport to be a document issued by the Apostles to the Church in general, for its information. It is orthodox in teaching, and directed against the early Gnostics, Cerinthus (MS Κόρινθος) and Simon being mentioned by name. The MS may be assigned to the 4th or 5th cent., the work itself to the first half of the 2nd cent. Described by C. Schmidt (Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad. 1895, p. 705 ff.), but not yet published.

4. Papyrus at Heidelberg, containing the Acta Pauli in Sahidic, and showing that (1) the Acts of Paul and Thecla, (2) the apocryphal correspondence between Paul and the Corinthians, (3) the Martyrium Pauli, all hitherto generally regarded as independent works (but cf. opinions quoted by Harnack, Altchrist. Litteratur, i. 128 ff.), are really parts of this early and popular romance, which for a time circulated with the canonical books. Prob. 7th cent. Described by C. Schmidt (Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher, vii. 217 ff., 1897), but not yet published.

5. Twenty-two leaves of a book, partly at Berlin and partly at Paris, in Akhmimic dialect, containing (a) an anonymous vision of Heaven and Hell, imperfect at the beginning and perhaps at

---

* They may also assist Patristic chronology; e.g. Justin's Apology is fixed to a point shortly after A.D. 150 by the mention of the prefect Munatius Felix in Brit. Mus. Pap. 358.

* For information with regard to this section the present writer is much indebted to Mr. W. E. Crum.

the end; (b) prophecies of the history of the world and the coming of Antichrist and Messiah, entitled 'Apocalypse of Elias.' A Sahidic papyrus at Paris contains six leaves of the latter work, coinciding with and supplementing the Akhmimic MS, together with one leaf of the Apocalypse of Zephaniah. The Akh. MS is assigned to the 4th-5th cent., the Sah. to the 5th (the published facsimiles would perhaps rather suggest the 4th cent. for the former and the end of the 5th for the latter). Published by Steindorff (Texte u. Unters., N. F. ii. 3*a*, 1899).

6. Papyrus at Strassburg, containing two mutilated leaves of an apocryphal Gospel in Sahidic, which, however, there is no reason to identify (with the editor) with the Gospel according to the Egyptians. The narrative appears to relate to the period between the Resurrection and the Ascension. The papyrus is of the 5th-6th cent., but there seems no reason to place the composition of the Gospel earlier than the 3rd cent. Published by A. Jacoby (Ein neues Evangelienfragment, Strassburg, 1900).

7. Papyrus at Turin, containing the Gesta Pilati or Gospel of Nicodemus in Sahidic, of which Greek and Latin texts are already extant. Published by F. Rossi (I Papiri Copti del Muséo Egizio di Torino, 1887).

8. Papyrus at Berlin, containing (a) the Evangelium Mariæ (also called the Apokryphon Johannis), (b) Σοφία Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, (c) Πρᾶξις Πέτρου, in Sahidic. Prob. 5th cent. The Evangelium Mariæ is quoted (without title) by Irenæus (i. 29) as a Gnostic work, and is consequently earlier than circ. 185. This discovery is especially interesting as enabling us to test the accuracy with which Irenæus represents his opponents' views. Described by C. Schmidt (Sitzungsb. d. Berl. Akad. 1896, p. 839 ff.); the Πρᾶξις Πέτρου has recently been published by him (Texte u. Unters., N. F. ix. 1, 1902), but the other treatises have not yet appeared.

9. Bruce Gnostic Papyrus, at Oxford, containing (a) the two 'books of Jeu,' a work akin to the Pistis Sophia, but earlier in date, belonging probably to the first half of the 3rd cent.; (b) an unnamed work, somewhat earlier still, being assigned by Schmidt to the end of the 2nd cent. Both are in Sahidic dialect. According to Schmidt, the first belongs to the Severian type of Gnosticism; the second to the kindred, but not identical, Sethite-Archontican type. Edited by C. Schmidt (TU, Bd. viii. 1892).

10. Papyrus at St. Petersburg, containing fragments of apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, viz. the Acts of Bartholomew, Philip, and Andrew and Matthew, in Akhmimic. Edited by O. von Lemm (Bull. de l'Acad. Imp. des Sciences de St. Petersburg, nouv. sér. 1, No. 4, 1890).

11. Papyrus at Leyden, containing (a) a magical prayer and exorcism attributed to St. Gregory; (b) the correspondence of Christ and Abgar, in Sahidic. Edited by Pleyte and Boeser (Manuscrits Coptes du Musée d'Antiquités à Leide, 1897, p. 441 ff.).

12. Brit. Mus. MS. Or. 5001, a large and complete codex of 174 leaves, containing ten Patristic homilies, in Sahidic. Described in Crum's catalogue of Coptic MSS in the British Museum.

13. Brit. Mus. Pap. 36, containing the Canons of Athanasius, in Sahidic. Described by Crum, op. cit., and to be edited by him shortly in the publications of the Text and Translation Society.

14. Papyrus at Turin, containing the Life of Athanasius and records of the Council of Nicæa. Edited by F. Rossi (I Papiri Copti, 1884).

15. Legends of saints, homilies, etc., in papyri, at Turin, edited by Rossi, op. cit. (1885-1892).

The numerous papyri (mostly small) containing letters and other documents which illustrate ecclesiastical life in Egypt, fall outside the scope of this article.

F. G. KENYON.

WAGES.—The usual OT term for 'wages' is שָׂכָר sākhār; less frequently the cognate מַשְׂכֹּרֶת maskōreth, and פְּעֻלָּה pĕ'ullah. אֶתְנַן 'ethnan is the reward paid to a prostitute. As wages are the price paid or the reward given for labour, מְחִיר mĕḥîr, 'price,' may sometimes[*] be translated 'wages' or 'hire'; and conversely the terms for 'wages' are sometimes translated 'reward.'[†] The usual NT term is μισθός, misthos. The term ὀψώνιον, opsōnion, is translated 'wages' in Lk 3^{14} (of soldiers), Ro 6^{23} ('the wages of sin is death'), and 2 Co 11^{8}. According to Sanday-Headlam on Ro 6^{23}, ὀψώνιον '=(1) "provision-money, ration-money, or the rations in kind given to troops"; (2) in a more general sense, "wages."' It is used in the Apocrypha of wages paid to soldiers.[‡]

(A) OLD TESTAMENT.—There are only a few references to wages in the Old Testament, because in Israel, as in the ancient world generally, most work was done either by members of the family or by slaves. We may, however, take 'wages' in a broad sense as the price of labour without regard to the status of the labourer. From this point of view we may consider wages as paid to five classes: (i.) the farmer and his family living chiefly on the actual produce of their work; (ii.) relations outside the family in its narrow modern sense; (iii.) slaves; (iv.) priests, soldiers, hired labourers, etc., giving all their time to a master; (v.) craftsmen, smiths, carpenters, etc., working for different customers. It may be as well to say at once that the available data are extremely meagre, so that only general statements are possible.

i. A farming family living chiefly by its own labour on its own land depended for the return for its labour on its industry, the fertility of the land, and the stage of development of agriculture. These, of course, varied: for the general condition of things, see AGRICULTURE (in vol. i.), PALESTINE (in vol. iii.), etc. But the accounts which we have of the families of Saul and of Jesse of Bethlehem suggest that in earlier times the yeomen-farmers, as we should call them, obtained a good return for their labour. The prophets of the 8th cent. (Is 3^{14} 5^{8} 10^{32}, Am 2^{6-8} $3^{9.\ 10}$ $5^{11.\ 12}$) and the Book of Nehemiah (ch. 5) show that towards the close of the monarchy, and after the Return, the small farmers were burdened with various charges,[§] taxes, usury, etc., and hardly made a livelihood.

ii. Remuneration of dependents.—There were often associated with the actual family, more distant relations and other dependents. These shared the work and the life of the family, probably, as a rule, on no fixed terms, but receiving, as we should say, board and lodging; living 'as one of the family,' but often with inferior comfort and less consideration. Thus the 'poor relation' would be provided for; and 'the poor within thy gates and the Levite,' who are so often commended to the charity of the pious Israelite (Ex 23^{11}, Dt 12$^{18. 19}$ 14$^{26-29}$ 15$^{7. 8}$), would no doubt be expected to render some service to their benefactors. Thus Moses kept the flocks of his father-in-law Jethro (Ex 3^{1}); and Jacob, at the beginning of his sojourn with Laban, rendered similar service for board and lodging (Gn 29^{15}). The sequel (cf. § iv.) shows that dependents might also become hired servants at fixed wages.

[*] e.g. Mic 3^{11}.

[†] e.g. Ru 2^{12}.

[‡] 1 Mac 3^{28} 14^{32}, and (apparently) 1 Es 4^{56}.

[§] This is rather an inference for the period of the close of the monarchy.

iii. Remuneration of slaves.—Their remuneration, like that of the previous class, consisted of 'all found,' and varied according to the circumstances, character, and goodwill of the master. We should gather that the slaves were well treated, as is commonly the case in the East. See also art. SERVANT in vol. iv.

iv. Wages of hirelings in continual employment.—The class of whom we read most are the priests; their wages in earlier times consisted of a share of the sacrifices, and of freewill offerings. Probably, as a rule, either a priest had land as a family inheritance, or the sanctuary held land. Some priests received a stipend from the owners of a private or tribal sanctuary. Moses' grandson was hired by Micah of Ephraim to be priest of his sanctuary for a yearly salary of 10 pieces of silver (shekels), a suit of clothes, and his board and lodging (Jg 17$^{10. 12}$). No doubt this was fairly liberal; yet when the Danites invited him to go with them 'he was pleased' (Polychrome Bible), probably expecting a larger income. Thus he became priest of the sanctuary of the northern Danites at Dan. The Priestly Code has very large ideas as to the proper revenues of priests and Levites, but these were never fully realized; see art. PRIESTS AND LEVITES (in vol. iv.), § 8 f, § 10 b.

In early times there were no professional soldiers; probably the leader or the king may have made some contribution of provisions or arms to the levy engaged in actual warfare. The chief wage of the soldier was plunder. The bodyguard, the foreign mercenaries, and the forces of horsemen and chariots must have received some regular pay and have been provided with fodder and stabling, board and lodging (1 K 4$^{26-28}$). In 2 Ch 25^{6} Amaziah hires 100,000 mercenaries for 100 talents of silver; the hiring would be for a single campaign, which might perhaps last a month. The wages of a successful soldier would be augmented by royal gifts, as in the case of David (1 S 17^{25}), and grants of land. Thus we read in 1 S 8$^{14f.}$ 'The king will take your fields, and vineyards, and oliveyards, even the best of them, and will give them to his servants. And he will take the tenth of your grain, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants.'

Little is said about the pay of other classes of hirelings. Jacob purchased a wife by seven years' service (Gn 29^{18}), and of course had 'all found' during the period; afterwards he was paid by a portion of the increase of the flock (30$^{31ff.}$); but we do not know the normal price of wives; it probably depended on the eagerness of the would-be son-in-law.

The hireling is not referred to in the JE legislation (Ten Commandments, Book of the Covenant, etc.), so that, apparently, work for wages was rare in early times. It increased with the growth of civilization. The hirelings were sufficiently numerous to be the subject of ordinances in the later codes, Dt 24^{14}, Lv 22^{10} (H), Ex 12^{45} (P). The payment of wages would be increased by the attempt of the Priestly Code (Lv 25$^{39-55}$) to minimize slavery amongst the Jews. The hireling seems to have been at the mercy of his employers as to the amount of his wages, and even as to getting them paid at all. Laban changed Jacob's wages ten times (Gn 31^{7}). Both the Prophets and the Law intervene on behalf of the wage-earner (Dt 24^{14}, Jer 22^{13}, Mal 3^{5}); he was to be paid promptly, usually, as it seems, at the end of each day (Dt 24^{15}, Lv 19^{13}, Job 7^{2}), but Lv 25^{53} refers to a 'servant hired year by year.' The hireling was considered inferior in industry to a slave, of whom it is said in Dt 15^{18} 'to the double of the hire of a hireling hath he served thee.' In the earlier periods of Israelite history, when almost every family had its own land, it would be the exceptionally poor 'ne'er-do-well' who was on bad terms with his kin, or the foreigner, that hired himself into service. Dt 24^{14} speaks of the hireling as 'poor and needy . . . of thy brethren or of thy strangers.' Naturally the connexion of the hireling with the family was less close than that of the slave; he has no share in the family sacra; he may not eat the passover (Ex 12^{45} [P]); nor may the hired servant of a priest eat the holy food (Lv 22^{10}). When we consider these facts, together with the control of the labour market by the employer, and the full advantage which the latter took of the situation, we may be sure that the usual rate of wages afforded only a bare subsistence to the free labourer. The description of the miserable condition of the working classes in Job 24$^{1-12}$ will refer to hired servants. In the case of the corvée, or compulsory service for public works, no wages were paid beyond food and lodging. The corvée was used by Solomon to build the temple (1 K 5^{13} 12^{4}), and doubtless by other kings and nobles (Jer 22^{13}).

v. Wages for occasional pieces of work.—Prophets, priests, judges, etc., received payment under different names for the occasional services rendered by them to their clients (Mic 3^{11}). These payments or fees were variously known as gifts, shares of victims (cf. above), or even bribes. The gifts or bribes varied with the importance of the occasion, the wealth of the giver, and the standing of the recipient. Saul considered that Samuel would accept a quarter of a shekel as a sufficient fee for information about his lost asses (1 S 9^{8}). Jeroboam's wife going to Ahijah, disguised as an ordinary woman, took him 'ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruse of honey' (1 K 14^{3}). But the princes who consulted Joseph (Gn 41$^{41f.}$), Balaam (Nu 22^{17}), and Daniel (Dn 2^{6} 5^{16}), made them munificent offers of wealth, power, and honour.

There are references to various kinds of craftsmen who must have worked 'by the job' so to speak, especially to smiths and carpenters, but we are not told how they were paid. Judah's payment of a kid to Tamar (Gn 38^{17}) may be mentioned here.

Code of Hammurabi.—This code, which is dated about B.C. 2285–2242 (Johns), includes provisions as to the fees to be paid to doctors and builders; and as to the wages of boatmen, reapers, threshers, shepherds, labourers, brickmakers, tailors, stonecutters, and carpenters; and as to the hire of oxen, cows, waggons, and boats. If a doctor performs for a noble a successful operation for a wound or an abscess in the eye, he receives ten shekels of silver; if for a poor man, five; if for a slave, two. But if the noble dies or loses his eye, the doctor's hands are cut off; in the case of a slave, the doctor replaces him if he dies; pays half his price if he loses his eye. For minor operations, the doctor receives five, three, or two shekels, according to the rank of his patient. A cow- or sheep-doctor receives one-sixth of a shekel of silver for a cure, and pays the owner a quarter of the animal's value if it dies. A builder is to be paid in proportion to the size of the house; and if it collapses through faulty construction and the owner is killed, the builder is to be put to death; if other damage is caused, suitable compensation is to be paid.

Oxen, boatmen, reapers, threshers, and shepherds were hired for the year; the hire for the ox being 4 *gur of corn, of a boatman or thresher 6, of a reaper or shepherd 8.

There were also hirings by the day, as follows: (a) reckoned in *ka of corn; for threshing, ox 20, ass 10, calf 1; oxen, waggon, and driver, 180; or waggon, 40; (b) reckoned in še† of silver; boat, 3; carpenter, 4; tailor, brickmaker, or stonecutter, 5; labourer, for first five months of the year, 6; for the last seven months, 5. A freight boat to carry 60 gur of corn could be hired for one-sixth of a shekel a day.

---

* Worth, according to Johns, a shekel of silver per gur.

In this code many regulations are laid down as to slaves; little is said as to their treatment or the provision made for their maintenance, but we may conclude that they were treated with the comparative humanity and consideration usually accorded to them in the ancient East. For instance, the code implies that a master would be willing to pay two shekels, or the equivalent of three months' wages to a shepherd, for the cure of a slave. Moreover, if a slave married a free woman, the children were free.

It will be noticed that wages, as in mediæval codes, are fixed by law. We may surmise, from the analogy of the Middle Ages, that these regulations were made in the interests of the employers; and that, practically, the rates fixed were a minimum, and that higher wages were often paid.

(B) THE APOCRYPHA AND THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The references to wages in the Apocrypha and the New Testament are still comparatively few, and do not suggest that any very important changes had taken place.

i. The farmers, etc., profited by the order maintained by the Roman government and the Herods, but probably this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the weight of taxation and the fraudulent extortions of the publicans.

ii. Dependents, poor relations, etc., probably were very much in the same position as of old.

iii. Slaves were still well treated in the East, and fairly well when serving in the households of Greeks or even Romans, but the provision made for slaves working in factories or on large farms, or manning ships, was often scanty and sordid. Cf. art. SERVANT in vol. iv.

iv. Wages paid for continuous service.—In To 5^{14} the angel Raphael, professing himself to be a member of a distinguished Jewish family akin to Tobit, is hired by the latter as travelling companion to his son, and subsequently sent to collect a large debt; so that hired servants were sometimes placed in positions of trust. Raphael's wages were to be a drachma a day and 'all found,' with the promise of a bonus at the end of the engagement if he gave satisfaction. Similarly, the labourers in the vineyard (Mt 20) received a denarion or denarius, whose value 'was the same as that of' the drachma 'in ordinary transactions' (art. MONEY in vol. iii. p. 428^b). The shekel contained rather more silver than a half-crown, and the denarius about $\frac{4}{5}$ as much silver as a shilling; probably, too, the labourers received food. The mere statement of the weight of silver, however, tells us nothing as to real wages; and to a large extent our data rather serve to fix the value of silver than the real wages of labour. If we may reckon the price of wheat in NT times at from 16s. to £1 a quarter, a denarius or drachma, about 9½d. a day, with food, would be very roughly equivalent to the present wages of a London charwoman, about 2s. a day with food, wheat being about 29s. a quarter.

We are told‡ that before the time of Julius Cæsar a foot-soldier was paid $\frac{1}{3}$ of a denarius a day, a centurion $\frac{2}{3}$, a horse-soldier a denarius; that these wages were doubled by Julius Cæsar, and further increased by Augustus, and again by Domitian. The Prætorian guards received double pay.

There are various references to the payment of wages and the services of wage-earners. Sir 7^{20} speaks of the 'hireling who giveth thee his life' (marg. 'soul'). On the other hand, we are bidden (Sir 37^{11}) not 'to take counsel . . . with a hireling in thy house about finishing his work.' It was still necessary (Sir 34^{22}, and later still Ja 5^4) to denounce those who kept back the wages of their hired servants. Mercenary soldiers appear in 1 Mac 6^{29}.

In Mk 1^{20} Zebedee has a paid crew (μισθωτοί) for his fishing-boat; and hired servants (μίσθιοι) appear in the parables of the Prodigal Son (Lk $15^{17.19}$) and of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt $20^{1.2}$). The former implies that the household of a wealthy man included several hired servants; and the latter, that there was a class of free labourers who were, as in the Old Testament, hired and paid by the day. So, too, the reaper receives wages (Jn 4^{36}, Ja 5^4). The service of the 'hireling' or free labourer is still lightly esteemed: 'the hireling . . . fleeth because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep' (Jn 10^{13}); and the Apostles style themselves and their fellow-Christians the 'slaves' (δοῦλοι), never the 'hired servants,' of Christ. The preachers of the gospel receive wages, 'hire' (μισθός), from men whom they serve (Lk 10^7, 2 Co 11^8, 1 Ti 5^{18}). God is said to give 'hire' or wages (Mt 5^{12} 20^8, He 11^6 etc.); on the other hand, there are 'the wages (ὀψώνια) of sin' (Ro 6^{23}) and 'the wages (μισθοί) of unrighteousness' (2 P 2^{15} etc.).

Mt 5^{41} 'whosoever shall impress thee to go one mile' implies the existence of the corvée or exaction of forced labour.

v. The wages of occasional service.—The Apocrypha and the New Testament give us no definite information as to the payment for pieces of work done by smiths, carpenters, etc.

SHIPS AND BOATS.—Under the designation 'ships' are included in the Bible vessels of all sizes, from the sea-going ships whose Phœnician crews 'did their business in great waters' (Ps 107^{23}), and traded for kings Solomon and Hiram (1 K $9^{26.27.28}$) from the head of the Gulf of 'Aḳabah in the Red Sea to OPHIR in the Indian or Arabian Sea, down to the mere fishing-boats of the Sea of Tiberias (Jn 6^1 21^1; called Sea of Galilee in Mt 4^{18}, Mk 7^{31}, Jn 6^1; and Lake of Gennesaret in Lk 5^1), such as that in which our Lord was awakened from sleep during a storm and rebuked the wind and sea and reproached His timid disciples for their want of faith (Lk 8^{22-25}). 'Boats' are mentioned in the AV only twice. The term is applied once to what were, apparently, lake fishing-craft (Jn $6^{22.23}$ πλοιάριον). It is used again, in the story of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck, of the boat (σκάφη) of a sea-going ship which was hoisted up on account of bad weather after being towed astern during the first part of the voyage (Ac 27^{16}). This boat was afterwards lowered again by the crew of the ship, but cut adrift by the soldiers on St. Paul's advice (vv.$^{30.32}$).*

A. SHIPS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—It seems proper to make mention here, as belonging to the category of 'ships,' although denominated an 'ark' (תֵּבָה), of the huge three-decked vessel said to have been built by Noah under Divine direction (Gn $6^{14.15.16}$), and apparently without mast, sail, or any means of steering or propulsion. It was to be of gopher wood (an unknown timber), and was intended as a means of saving Noah and his family, and such animals as were necessary for the perpetuation of the species, from destruction by water. If we assume the form of the ark to be conceived as that of an ordinary ship, we have no historical mention of its dimensions as given in Gn 6^{15} being exceeded until the construction of the Great Eastern steamship, built at Millwall by Brunel in 1858, with accommodation for 4000 passengers, and with a capacity of 24,000 tons, which is slightly in excess of the apparent size of the ark. See, further, art. FLOOD in vol. ii. p. 16. The earliest Scripture mention of ships properly so called (אֳנִיֹּת) is in Gn 49^{13}, where Zebulun is spoken of in the Blessing of Jacob as a haven for them. The next is in Nu 24^{24}, where the Balaam oracles speak of ships from the coast of KITTIM as taking part in the destruction of Assyria. These latter would be ships of war as distinguished from commercial ones. Merchant ships are mentioned in 1 K 9^{26} (cf. 10^{22} 'a navy of TARSHISH'); and in Ps 107^{23-30} is given the heart-stirring description of a sailor's life in a sea-going ship. In Pr 31^{14} the foresight of the thrifty housewife forms the point of comparison between her and the merchant ships which bring goods from afar. In Pr 30^{19} 'the way of a ship in the midst of the sea' is mentioned as one of the four things which were too wonderful for the writer. The absence of chart and compass, with the sun and stars only for a guide to the Phœnician mariner, and these often, as in St. Paul's voyage (Ac 27^{20}), invisible, made the art of navigation a mystery known only to those who, like these experts, were gifted with the hereditary instinct of their profession. Moreover, the pressure of the wind on the sails from a direction opposed to the ship's course, nevertheless urging her through the water on the way she would go, seems almost as wonderful as that the disposition of the muscles and feathers of an eagle should enable it to soar to invisible heights, or swoop to the earth in a moment without apparent motion of its wings, or that the slippery serpent should glide rapidly over a smooth rock without any external means of locomotion. In 1 K 9^{26} (‖ 2 Ch $8^{17f.}$) and 10^{22} (‖ 2 Ch 9^{21}) we have the account of the building of Solomon's merchant ships at 'Ẹzion-geber at the head of the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, and the furnishing of them with experienced Phœnician pilots by Hiram king of Tyre, the friend of Solomon's father, David; and of their voyage to Ophir and back with 420 talents of gold (equal to £2,583,000). The last of the above passages has a notice of the triennial visit of Solomon's and Hiram's ships 'to Tarshish,'* bringing back gold and silver (the latter being considered so plentiful as to be regarded of no account), ivory, apes, and peacocks. These were genuine sea-going ships, and the whole of the above references, except those from Genesis and Numbers, relate to the same century and to the 40 years of Solomon's reign (c. 970–930 B.C.), when Tyre was at the height of its prosperity, and Shashank (Shishak) I., of the 22nd dynasty, or his immediate predecessor, was the ruling Pharaoh of Egypt. Unfortunately, the Phœnicians have not left us either literature or sculptures from which we can form an idea of the kind of ships used on these voyages; nor have we any Assyrian representations of them until two centuries later in the time of Hezekiah and Sennacherib, when all the sea trade of the Assyrians was in the hands of the Phœnicians, who had also absorbed that of the Egyptians (Herodot. i. 1). A century later still Ezekiel (27^{5-8}) speaks of the royal merchant ships of Tyre, which traded with Syria and various Mediterranean ports and to the far East, as having planks of fir and masts of cedar, whilst the oars were of oak of Bashan, and the benches of the rowers of ivory inlaid in wood from the isles of Kittim, the sails of fine embroidered linen, their crews from Ẓidon and Arvad, and their pilots from Tyre. But this description, although no doubt applicable to the royal yachts, may be considered to some extent poetical as applied to commercial ships.

* A 'ferry-boat' is perhaps mentioned in 2 S 19^{18}, if the MT וְעָבְרָה הָעֲבָרָה is correct, although such a meaning of עֲבָרָה is not found elsewhere. But prob. Wellhausen (followed by Driver, et al.) is right in reading וַיַּעַבְרוּ ה׳, 'and they crossed over the ford.' This is implicitly supported by the LXX καὶ ἐλειτούργησαν τὴν λειτουργίαν (i.e., by confusion of ד and ר, וַיַּעַבְדוּ הָעֲבֹדָה, the reading adopted by Budde in SBOT).

The question of the much disputed situation of the port of Ophir to which Solomon's ships traded from 'Ẹzion-geber in the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, bringing back gold, ivory, almug trees, and peacocks (1 K 9^{28} 10^{22}), belongs to another section of this Dictionary (see art. OPHIR in vol. iii.); but the length of time occupied in the voyage, inferred from the interval of three years (1 K 10^{22}) between the arrivals of the ships at 'Ẹzion-geber, indicates a great distance, such as Central or Southern Africa, or the island of Ceylon, where peacocks still abound. Such voyages would necessitate the ships being laid up in some safe port between the months of May and October, during the bad weather and heavy sea which accompany the S.W. monsoon, as is the case at the present day with the Indian and Arab trading vessels which annually frequent the port of Berbereh opposite to Aden.*

Although we have no contemporary representations of Phœnician sea-going ships of Solomon's time, we have drawings of Egyptian ones to refer to of a much more ancient date, and of a type after which we may suppose the ships of the early Phœnicians and those of Hiram and Solomon to have been constructed. These drawings, no doubt, give us a faithful picture of the ships, their crews, and their merchandise from a general point of view; but they are more or less conventional, and the technical errors in our own marine historical pictures point to the necessity of not relying too much upon accuracy of nautical detail, as the drawings may have been made by artists who did not take part in the expeditions and were not seamen. Unfortunately, also, many important details are missing from the models of ancient ships in the museums. The Egyptian ships were for the most part unloaded at a port in the Red Sea, and their cargoes transferred overland to Koptos on the Nile.

The first Red Sea voyage of which we have any knowledge is mentioned in an inscription at Wady Gassûs, near Kosseir, in the Valley of Hammamât, on the road from Koptos to the Red Sea. This commemorates the expedition sent by Pharaoh Sankh-Ka-Ra of the 11th (a Theban) dynasty to the 'Land of Puânit' (or Punt), the site of which is as much disputed as that of Ophir or Tarshish, and is considered by M. Edouard Naville to be but a 'vague geographical designation.' See, further, art. PUT in vol. iv. p. 176 f. The destination of the expedition was evidently, however, somewhere in Tropical Africa, and was in all probability in the vicinity of the present Somaliland on the east coast, where there existed an entrepôt for the ivory, frankincense, myrrh, gold dust, and ostrich feathers, and for the ostrich eggs so much prized by the Egyptians of those days. This first expedition to Punt must have taken place, according to Brugsch, 250 years after the founding of Tyre, if Herodotus (ii. 44) was correctly informed by the Tyrians, i.e. about 1500 years before the time of Solomon, and 500 years before the birth of Abraham; but, according to Mariette, even earlier than this. We have no account of this expedition, nor any sculptures showing the kind of ships employed on it.

* The Chronicler here confuses a 'ship of Tarshish' (i.e. a large vessel fitted to go long voyages) with a ship going to Tarshish. Wherever the latter port was, whether (as most believe) identical with Tartessus in Spain, or Tarsus, or some district in Greece or Italy, it could not have been reached by a vessel sailing from 'Ẹzion-geber unless by circumnavigating [on every ground a most unlikely supposition] the continent of Africa.

* Findlay's Directory for the Navigation of the Indian Ocean, 1870, p. 559.

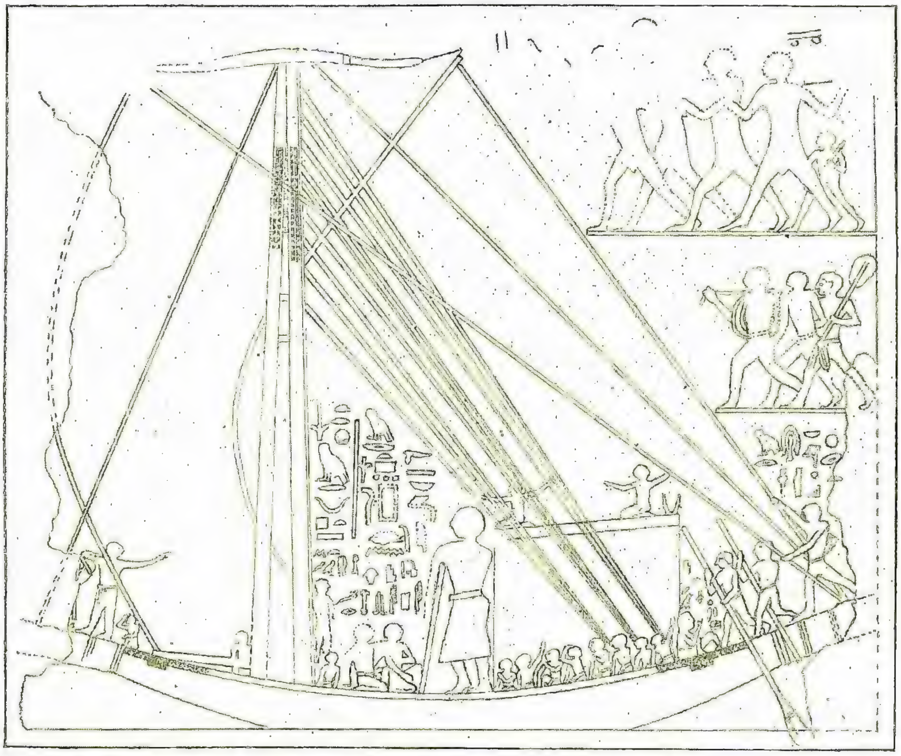
The next important Red Sea expedition mentioned on the monuments was sent during the 18th dynasty, also to the Land of Punt, in the reign of queen Hatsepsu I., sister of Thothmes II. (during the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt); the sculptures on the walls of Deir el-Bahri, near the Tombs of the Kings at Thebes, fully illustrate this important event, including the ships used (see Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt, ii. 82 ff.). The place of departure by the overland route from the Nile to the Red Sea, on the outward voyage, as well as the port of reshipment of the goods brought by the expedition on its return by the same route, was doubtless the ancient Koptos (now Qoft), as in the earlier expedition before mentioned; the Red Sea port of embarkation and disembarkation being Tua or Œnnun, known later as Philoteras (after it had been so renamed by the Ptolemies), and now as Old Kosseir, not far from the modern port of that name in lat. 26° 7′ N., and distant from Koptos about 100 miles. As regards the African port depicted in the sculptures as the object of the expedition, and called the Land of Punt, there is some doubt. But for the African ebony (Dalbergia melanoxylon, G.P.R., so much in request for temple furniture in Egypt) and other trees which are represented as growing near the place of landing,[*] the land-locked port of Berbereh already spoken of, which has always been a great mart for the products of the interior, might be intended; and even these trees may have been artistically introduced to indicate a part of these products.



1. DESHÂSHEH (MIDDLE EGYPT). W. WALL, N. HALF. TOMB OF ANTA, B.C. 3600. SAILING SHIP WITH ANTA STANDING BY THE CABIN.

Although the Children of Israel must, at the time of queen Hatsepsu's expedition, have been at the height of their prosperity in the land of Goshen (Gn $47^{14.27}$, Ex 1^{7}), which they had inhabited for more than a century, it is probable that, as their occupation was that of shepherds and cattle-dealers located in the midst of the Delta, they would see and know but little of what was going on so far south of them as Koptos and Thebes, and absolutely nothing of the sea-going ships of which the expedition was composed. Consequently, no knowledge of the building or handling of ships or boats was carried away with them from Egypt at the time of the Exodus; and the forty years of subsequent wandering in the wilderness would have sufficed to ensure the obliteration from their memories of any such knowledge had it been acquired.

It was not until the reign of Solomon that the Israelites commenced to build ships (1 K 9^{26}), an art which, through the friendship of Hiram king of Tyre for David and his son (2 S 5^{11} ‖ 1 Ch 14^{1} and 1 K 5^{1}), they learned from the Phœnicians, who supplied the pilots and mariners for these ships (1 K 9^{27}). Whether the Phœnicians brought their knowledge of shipbuilding with them from Western Arabia at the time of their early migration (Herod. i. 1, vii. 89) or learnt it from the Egyptians, is a mystery. Boatbuilding was certainly a very ancient art in Egypt, as in the tomb of Ti at Sakâra (5th dynasty, c. 3680–1500—3660 B.C. [Petrie]) it is represented in the wall sculptures in all its details.

The merchant ships of queen Hatsepsu's expedition to the Land of Punt, as delineated on the walls of the temple of Deir el-Bahri,[*] are long vessels curved upwards at each extreme, as we see the Phœnician triremes of the 7th cent. B.C. depicted on the Assyrian monuments, but without their figureheads; the stern is recurved towards the bow like the uplifted trunk of an elephant, and ends in a trumpet mouth—the conventional representation of the papyrus plant—a form adopted also by the Phœnicians and Assyrians; there is also a raised forecastle and poop. The mast, instead of being of the more ancient 'sheerlegs' form (as we see it in fig. 1 on the walls of the tomb of Anta at Deshâsheh, 5th dynasty, c. B.C. 3600), consists of a single spar, placed a little forward of the centre of the ship, and is kept in its place by 'shrouds' and a 'stay'; whilst additional support, when the sail is set, is given by a pair of very stout 'jeers,' or halliards, attached to each side of the 'bunt,' or middle of the 'yard,' and secured to the gunwale of the vessel. The sail is of the square form and secured to two yards, the lower of which is as long as the ship herself, but the upper one is a good deal shorter. Each yard is in two pieces, 'fished' together in the middle of its length by means of cordage, the centre of the lower yard being securely lashed to the mast near the level of the gunwale. This lower yard is supported by numerous 'lifts'[] at uniform intervals (apparently about seven in number on each side), which are 'rove' through 'sheaves' or 'snatches' placed one above the other at the head of the mast, so that one rope answers for a lift on both sides of the yard. These lifts are so tightened as to give to the yard the form of a bow curving upwards at each extremity. The head of the sail is attached, in accordance with modern usage, to the upper yard, which can be hoisted to the masthead when the sail is set, or lowered so as to lie on the lower yard or remain aloft with the sail 'brailed up' at pleasure. This upper yard has a single lift on each side, attached half-way between the mast and the yardarm. The 'foot' of the sail is attached to the lower yard at intervals when the sail is set, but quite detached from it when the sail is furled. The 'braces' of the upper yard (not always represented in the drawings) are single ropes attached to the upper yard at the same spot as the lifts, and lead thence to the deck or gunwale; they were usually under the control of the helmsman, as we see them on the walls of the tomb of Anta at Deshâsheh. There are 15 oarsmen, seated on either side of the ships, all engaged in rowing (not pushing the oars), although the sails are set (pl. lxxiii.), and only one man plies each of the 30 oars—a universal rule in ancient ships. The distance between the rowers in a fore and aft direction is, apparently, about 4 ft., but possibly only 2 cubits, as we see in Greek and Roman ships of later date. A noticeable arrangement for strengthening these sea-going ships is a tightly stretched and very stout cable secured to the bow and stern in the centre of the ship, inside, passing high over the heads of the rowers, and supported on strong wooden props with forked heads. This is doubtless to afford support to the weakest or curved portion of the ship at her two ends, neither of which is water-borne—a very necessary precaution under such conditions when a vessel is straining in a heavy sea. Assuming the distance between the rowers to be 4 ft., the space between the foremost oar and the extremity of the bow is about 18 ft. in length, so that the total length of the ships appears to have been 102 ft., of which a length of about 58 ft. only is water-borne, the remainder being the curves of the bow and stern. A row of port-holes, corresponding in number to the oars, is indicated on the side of the ships below the gunwale. These were probably intended for a second tier of oars, as we see in the Phœnician and Assyrian triremes of the 7th and 8th cents. B.C. The ships are steered, not 'by a single rudder passing through the keel,' as in the more modern arrangement described by Herodotus (ii. 96), but by two very stout paddles, one on each quarter, having simple broad blades without the remarkable letter D form of the Phœnician ones represented on the Assyrian monuments in the time of Sennacherib, but having long 'looms' or handles, which first pass through 'strops,' or loops of rope, placed on the gunwale midway between the upper end of the stern-curve and the point where the stern first touches the water; immediately above these strops, at a vertical height of about 4 ft., the upper portion of the looms rests on the summit of a post fixed to the gunwale close to the strop; here is placed a crutch or notch in which the loom revolves by means of a tiller fixed to its upper portion and curving downwards to the hand of the helmsman below. The ordinary mode of steering was precisely as by the modern rudder, the normal position of the blades of the paddles being nearly vertical and 'fore and aft.' We see the same arrangement of tiller in the papyrus sail-boats painted on the tomb of the priestess of Mera at Deshâsheh,[] a few miles south of the Fayum (not to be confounded with the tomb of Mera at Sakârah, belonging also to the 5th dynasty), nearly 2000 years before queen Hatsepsu's time. A stout stirrup of rope is attached to the upper part of the post on which the loom rests, and hangs over the outside of the ship, apparently for the helmsman to put one of his feet in whilst he placed the other against the outside of the ship in order to obtain leverage in working the paddle on special occasions when the loom must have been previously lifted out of the crutch; but the stirrup may also have been used to support the rudder-paddle when not in use, or when it was 'triced up.' Occasionally ships had only one rudder-paddle, as shown in tomb paintings and in the model of the Scandinavian ship lately found at Christiania, to be seen in the Pitt-Rivers Collection at Oxford, which rudder-paddle being on the starboard side explains the derivation of this word from 'steer-board.' Other tomb paintings show as many as three rudder-paddles on one side. Four-oared boats, without masts or sails, are also represented in the Deir el-Bahri paintings of queen Hatsepsu's expedition as bringing off goods to the ships, and these have only one paddle-rudder, which is shipped in a crutch in the centre of the stern, but with the same stirrup as shown in the ships.

There is no visible anchor of any kind on board the ships, nor any arrangement for using one; but the pilot on the forecastle has a long pole in his hand with which he is sounding the depth of the water. The only anchor used in those early days was a heavy weight, generally a large stone or a basket full of smaller ones. No anchor, properly so called, is represented in any Egyptian sculpture or painting. The hooked anchor (ἄγκυρα) is first mentioned by the poet Pindar (I. v. 18) in the 5th cent. B.C.; it was without flukes. Homer always uses the word εὐναί, meaning a stone anchor; and Ephorus, the historian of the 4th cent. B.C. (Strabo, vii. 3), attributed the invention of the two-armed anchor to Anacharsis, a Scythian prince of the 6th cent. B.C. In the time of Herodotus (ii. 96) the merchant ships of the Egyptians on the Nile, when sailing down stream, used a heavy stone attached to a rope from the stern as a drag to keep their heads straight, in conjunction with a raft of tamarisk floating on the water, attached to the bow, so as to be acted on by the current which pulled the ship down stream, whilst the stone held her back, as is still the practice on the river Euphrates;[*] but there is no mention of the use of a bow anchor, whether of stone or any other material.

The form of the Egyptian ships admitted of their lying at anchor as easily by the stern as by the head, and, paddles which could be lifted out of the water being used instead of rudders, there was no fear of the latter being broken by the sea, as was the case when the modern rudder, hung on 'gudgeons' by means of 'pintles,' was substituted in later times. The advantage of anchoring by the stern in narrow waters or when suddenly shoaling water at night, as in the case of St. Paul's ship off the island of Melita (Ac $27^{28.\ 29}$), where the rudder-paddles were triced up clear of the water, is obvious. But this vessel had means of anchoring by the bows if desired (v.^{30}), and no doubt the Egyptian ships also; large stones, wooden tubes, or sacks filled with lead or other heavy weights being used as anchors.

The masts of queen Hatsepsu's ships were probably derived, like the Egyptian ships in the time of Herodotus (ii. 96), and even at the present day, from the gum-arabic tree of Nubia (Acacia nilotica, Delile), known to modern Arabs as the sont, a corruption of the ancient Egypt name shant, which is as old as the 4th dynasty, or of one of the many varieties of this tree in that region. The equally common seyâl, or 'ash' of the ancient Egyptians (Acacia seyâl, Delile), which Canon Tristram supposes to be the 'shittim' wood of the Bible (Ex 25. 26. 37. 38), is scarcely more than a variety of the sont, and, like it, is frequently mentioned in the hieroglyphs, and is of the same antiquity.

The ships of Solomon built at 'Eẓion-geber (1 K 9^{26}) were probably of the fir and cedar supplied by Hiram (1 K $5^{8.\ 9.\ 10}$), which do not grow in Egypt or Nubia, although much imported for use in Egyptian temples from the 5th dynasty downwards. No mention, however, is made in the Bible of the material used in shipbuilding. According to Onesecritus, chief pilot to Alexander the Great (Pliny, vi. 24), the ships which traded in the 5th cent. B.C. between Taprobane (Ceylon) and the country of the Prasians (Calcutta) during four months of the year, the voyage lasting 20 days, were rigged like the Nile boats, and were built of papyrus stems as we see them in process of construction depicted 3000 years earlier on the walls of the tomb of Anta at Deshâsheh; but these were only coasting vessels. The Egyptian merchant vessels in the time of Herodotus are described by him (ii. 96) as being built without ribs, the planks, 2 cubits in length, being arranged 'like bricks' (i.e. probably the planking was double, the middle of the outer plank overlaying the two ends of the inner one), and joined together by long 'tree-nails'; the planks were caulked with stems of 'byblus' (Papyrus antiquorum, L.), the sails being made of the same material, which seems incredible; but whether of flax or byblus, the 'cloths' of the sails were placed horizontally instead of vertically as now. The ropes of Egyptian ships continued to be made of byblus (Herod. vii. 25, 34) or of palm fibre as late as the 27th or Persian dynasty (B.C. 480), and, according to the same authority (Herod. ii. 96), the sails also,—whilst those of the Phœnicians were made of flax. But it is doubtful if the Nile boats, described by Herodotus, were really sea-going vessels like those of queen Hatsepsu and Solomon, though they carried many thousand talents (more than 100 tons) of cargo; and, as the making of linen cloth was an Egyptian speciality, it was probably used for the sails of sea-going ships by them as well as by Solomon and Hiram, who imported it from Egypt (Ezk 27).

At Deir el-Bahri[*] we see the queen's ships being laden in a port of the Land of Punt after the same fashion as we may suppose those of Solomon to have taken in their cargoes at Ophir, by means of porters and 'gang-boards' connecting the ships with the shore. The cargo, which is being carried and stowed on the deck by the crew, consists of sacks of frankincense of various kinds (especially that called 'anti'), gold dust, ebony, elephants' tusks, gum, ostrich eggs and feathers. Live apes are climbing about the rigging as we see them in the boat depicted on the tomb of Mera at Deshâsheh 2000 years earlier—an indication probably of the fauna of the Land of Punt, which includes the giraffe, peculiar to tropical Africa.

We may safely assume that Solomon's Mediterranean ships were similar to those built by him at 'Eẓion-geber, on the Phœnician model, and that the latter, again, resembled those of queen Hatsepsu, although with possibly some modifications of no great importance. There seems, also, no reason to suppose that the ships built at 'Eẓion-geber by Jehoshaphat king of Judah a century later (1 K 22^{48}), or the passenger ship in which Jonah embarked at Joppa some thirty years later for Tarshish (Jon 1^{3}), and in which the vain use of the oars in the ships to endeavour to make the land is so graphically described, belonged to a different type.

Ships of war.—The Egyptian sailors or boatmen formed, according to Herodotus (ii. 164), one of the seven classes into which the population of the country was divided, the office of pilot or steersman ranking above all other grades. Probably those belonging to merchant ships formed a superior subdivision of these. We may take it for granted that the Phœnicians and Tyrians followed the same practice in the time of Solomon as with certain modifications the Greeks did in later times. The crews of war ships seem to have been placed in a separate category with the soldiers, who, from constant practice at the oar on the Nile, were themselves expert galleymen. Whether any of these latter were on board queen Hatsepsu's or Solomon's ships we are not told; but, although these were both commercial expeditions, it is probable that the ships were prepared to fight if need be. That men-of-war were specially fitted out by the Egyptians for fighting purposes in the Arabian Gulf we know from Herodotus (ii. 102) and Diodorus (i. 55), who both mention the fleet of 'long vessels' built expressly for war (called by them ua) to the number of 400, whilst the transports were called usch (broad), and the galleys mensch;[*] and the employment of such vessels on the expeditions of the Pharaohs to Ethiopia was frequent, the officers who commanded them being mentioned on the monuments, and the title of 'chief or captain of the king's ships' being not uncommon. A sea fight is represented at Thebes, in which the Egyptian soldiers in military dress are seen rowing. In the men-of-war of the 4th and 5th dynasties slingers are stationed in a 'top' or cage at the masthead. During the engagement the sail was 'brailed' up, and there was apparently no lower yard to the square sail as we see in the ships of queen Hatsepsu of a later date. According to Wilkinson (iii. 204), ramming was used in the attack; but the ships had no beak for this purpose as in Roman days, a lion's, ram's, or other animal's head covered with metal taking its place.

There seems to be little doubt that the Egyptian men-of-war also took part in the Mediterranean in the transport of troops and in sea fights during the reign of the Ramses Pharaohs against the ships of various nations inhabiting the littoral, as they did in the time of Pharaoh-necho (Herod. ii. 159); their victories over combined forces of Dardanians, Teucrians, Mysians, and, apparently, over Pelasgians, Daunians, Oscans, and Sicilians, being recorded on the monuments.

Of the Phœnician war vessels which were contemporaneous we have no knowledge; and it is to the Assyrian monuments of a later date that we are indebted for pictorial representations of them in a very crude way. During the three invasions of Syria and Phœnicia by Shalmaneser IV. in the reigns of Hezekiah king of Judah and Hoshea king of Israel (B.C. 726–721, 2 K $18^{9.19}$), Josephus tells us, on the authority of Menander (342–291 B.C.), that the Assyrian monarch, in order to quell a revolt in the island of Tyre, made use of 60 Phœnician galleys with 800 men to row them, but was utterly defeated by the Tyrians with 12 ships, which took 500 prisoners.*

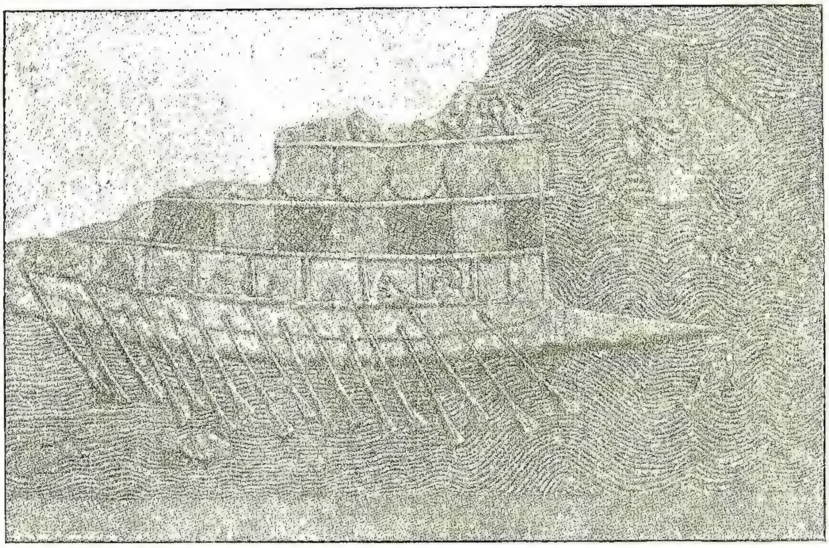
Sennacherib, who had sent the Rabshakeh to Hezekiah to reproach the living God (2 K $19^{20.\ 34}$), and demand the surrender of Jerusalem the second time within three years, took, a few years later, his Phœnician shipwrights across Mesopotamia to the Tigris and built a fleet of his own, with which he made a successful raid on the Chaldæan settlement in Susiana at the north end of the Gulf of Persia. It is these Phœnician cataphract triremes, with two tiers of oars, and having beaks, masts, and sails, that we see represented in the sculptures of Kouyunjik.† In Sargon's sculptures the Phœnician vessels of this time have 4 or 5 oarsmen on each side, but in Sennacherib's they have 8, 9, or 11, and also two steersmen. It was not until Sennacherib's time that the Assyrians began to build war vessels, which even then were only imitations of Phœnician ones. These trireme war galleys were what is called aphract, i.e. the upper tier of rowers were unprotected and exposed to view. The apertures for the oars are like those in queen Hatsepsu's ships, no oars being shown in them in the drawings in either case. The beak is somewhat like the snout of a fish; the shields of the soldiers are seen suspended inside the bulwarks, they themselves being partly visible; the pilot is in the bow, and the steersman aft, with part of the crew standing near the mast, the two steering-paddles having blades in the form of the letter D, which is perhaps only conventional.



5. WAR GALLEY IN THE SERVICE OF SENNACHERIB, KING OF ASSYRIA.

The war ships of Kittim (Dn 11^{30}), which were to conquer Antiochus Epiphanes, are Roman vessels. In 2 Mac 4^{20} we have the first mention of galleys (τριήραι).

B. New Testament Ships and Boats.—An account of Greek and Roman ships of war (νῆες μακραί, naves longæ), of which ample details are given by Boeckh,‡ Graser,§ Guhl and Koner,‖ and Torr,¶ seems to be out of place here, as, apart from the fishing and passenger vessels on the Sea of Galilee, in which our Lord embarked (described in the AV as 'ships' [except in Jn $6^{22.\ 23}$, where it has 'boats'], and in the RV as 'boats' [Mt 4^{22} $14^{22.\ 24.\ 32.\ 33}$, Mk $6^{32.\ 45.\ 47.\ 51.\ 54}$, Lk $5^{2.\ 3.\ 7.\ 11}$ $8^{22.\ 37}$, Jn $6^{17.\ 19.\ 22.\ 23.\ 24}$]), the interest in ships mentioned in the NT centres in the voyage of St. Paul from Cæsarea to Puteoli, about 60 A.D. During this voyage he and his fellow-traveller, St. Luke the physician, experienced what seems to have been his fourth shipwreck (2 Co 11^{25}). The account of this voyage is remarkable for accuracy and conciseness in the use of nautical terms, though wanting in the descriptive details which a professional seaman would have added. In the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux of Naucratis in the Egyptian Delta, written about a century and a half later, we have a collection of Greek nautical terms, containing most of those used in St. Luke's description of the voyage. Of the ship of Adramyttium, a seaport of Mysia (which had then been for half a century part of the Roman province of Asia Minor), in which they embarked at Cæsarea, no details are given; but the two Alexandrian corn-ships in which the voyage was completed from Myra (Ac $27^{6.\ 7.\ 8}$), a port of Lycia, to Fair Havens in Crete, and to the island of Melita (28^{1}), and thence to Syracuse, Rhegium, and Puteoli ($28^{11.\ 12.\ 13}$), were evidently of large size, if the reading in both AV and RV of 276 as the number of persons on board, including the crew, besides a cargo of wheat, is correct.* This number was not extraordinary, as Josephus tells us that only a few years later he himself was wrecked on a voyage from Palestine to Puteoli in a ship having about 600 persons on board.

For the type of these ships we can refer to contemporary paintings found at Herculaneum and Pompeii which 'afford valuable details, and have the advantage of synchronizing perfectly with the voyage of St. Paul, the catastrophe to which they owe their preservation having happened less than twenty years after his shipwreck.'† The term πλοῖον used by St. Luke throughout his account of this voyage, except in Ac 27^{41}, when ναῦς is used, was a common one for a merchant ship in general, but does not point to any one in particular of the many kinds of sea-going ships (phaseli, corbitæ, cybææ, etc.), of the 'round' or merchant class (στρογγύλη ναῦς, navis oneraria) in use at that time; but the fact of the wrecked vessel being a corn-ship of Alexandria suffices. Lucian (2nd cent. A.D.) in one of his dialogues* gives an account of one of the great merchant ships employed in carrying corn from Egypt to Italy about 150 A.D. Her length was 180 ft., and breadth 45 ft., the depth from upper deck to keel being 43½ ft. Such a ship would carry a burthen of 10,000 talents or amphoræ, equal to 250 tons. But ships of much larger capacity were built for special purposes, such as the one described by Pliny as having, about twenty years before St. Paul's voyage, taken the Vatican obelisk, by order of the emperor Caligula, from Egypt to Rome, together with four blocks of stone to form its pedestal, the whole weighing nearly 500 tons, in addition to 1000 tons of lentils in the hold as a bed for the obelisk to rest on. The mast of this ship, which Pliny describes as the most wonderful vessel ever seen afloat, was a single fir spar, and required four men with extended arms to encircle it. This event occurred within Pliny's own knowledge as a youth of seventeen; but if he is correct as to the size of the ship, that of the mast is almost incredible, unless he was in error as to its not being a built one.† Julius Cæsar tells us that these ships carried movable three-storeyed turrets on the upper deck for defensive purposes.‡

According to Lucian's description, the ship had both bow and stern curved upwards like those of the ancient Egyptian and earliest Greek ships, the ends terminating in a gilded cheniscus, one of which was in the form of the head and neck of a swan, and the other either similar or a 'figure-head.' Somewhere between the stem and stern was a statue of the presiding deity of the State or port of origin of the ship. On each bow was painted a large eye, or a figure illustrative of her name.

From a painting still to be seen in a tomb at Pompeii, and another found at Herculaneum,§ we know that such ships had projecting galleries at bow and stern, with bulwarks of open rails, and that the upper ends of the two paddle-rudders (πηδάλια, gubernacula) passed through holes in the ship, as described by Herodotus, instead of being externally attached to rope straps on the gunwale as in the Egyptian vessels and in the Scandinavian one already spoken of, and were often connected together by a rope attached to the tillers stretched across the ship, called χαλινός, which kept the two paddle-blades parallel to one another;‖ but this, from St. Luke's account of the shipwreck, must have been done in such a way as not to prevent the rudders from being triced up clear of the water in case of anchoring by the stern. We also see in the Herculaneum painting a portion of one of the ship's cabins described by Lucian. There are also depicted what are, apparently, cable arrangements for anchoring by the stern, though no anchor is visible. She has two masts with 'square' yards and sails, as we see represented on the coins of the 2nd and 3rd centuries A.D.; and this seems to have been the normal number, though occasionally there were three at this period; but only one mast is shown in the Pompeii ship. The masts were supported by 'shrouds' placed abreast of and abaft the mast, with 'stays' to support it from the bow as now. These as well as the 'running rigging' were made of hide, flax, or hemp, or, probably in many cases, a combination of them and papyrus.

The ships of this—the merchant—class were built almost exclusively of fir or pine, as also the masts and yards, the latter (κεραῖαι or antennæ) being in two pieces 'fished' together like those of both ancient and modern Egyptian vessels. The sails at this period were almost universally made of flax as now; the 'bolt rope' surrounding them being of hide. One of the sails is called ἀρτέμων by St. Luke (Ac 27^{40}), and, although this word is not found in Julius Pollux or in any other ancient or mediæval Greek author, a mast and sail, each termed artemon, are mentioned by the Romans, Lucilius, Labeo, and Seneca, almost contemporaneously with St. Paul's shipwreck, as being, apparently, inferior in importance or magnitude to the principal mast and sail of a ship; they are represented on an Alexandrian coin of A.D. 67 * as a sort of bowsprit and spritsail, and again on a Roman coin of A.D. 186 in the Museum at Avignon as a foremast and square foresail.† The word artemon is translated in the AV 'mainsail,' but in the RV 'foresail'; and there can be little doubt but that the latter is the more correct term as applied to the sail hoisted when the ship was purposely run aground. The word is still in use in the French marine as the name of the mizen or sternmost mast, and the sails on it; whilst the term misaine is applied to the foremast and its sails. The word artemon is now obsolete in the Italian language, but in the 16th cent. it was applied at Venice to the largest sail of a ship, which appears then to have been the foresail; and, possibly, the ignorance of this fact, as suggested by Smith, may have led the AV translators into error.‡

The sails were triced up to the yards by numerous 'brails' (καλώδια) when it was desired to reduce or take them in, and these were worked by the crew from the deck below; the yards were also furnished with 'lifts' and 'braces' for trimming the sails. The anchors (ἄγκυρα), which were suspended as now, one on each bow from 'catheads' (ἐπωτίδες), were made of lead, iron, or wood coated with lead, and of the modern form, as on the coins of Pæstum we see the stock and flukes or palms and ring duly represented; besides the 'bower' anchors there were others, four of which were let go at the stern of St. Paul's ship when shoaling water (Ac $27^{29.30}$), whilst a pretence was made by the crew of also laying out the bower anchors by boat.

Oars (κώπη, remus) are not mentioned as being used on board; and as these were often absent from large merchant vessels, or only sufficient in number to be used as 'sweeps' during a calm, this was probably the case here. Such vessels had movable 'topmasts,' to the summit of which was hoisted the upper corner of the triangular sail, called in Latin supparum. It is to the lowering down to the deck of these topmasts that the expression (Ac 27^{17}) 'strake sail' in the AV and 'lowered the gear' in the RV probably refers; to 'strike' a topmast is the proper nautical term in use at the present day. Seneca tells us that Alexandrian wheat-ships,§ on arrival at Puteoli, alone had the privilege of keeping their topsails up, all others being obliged to lower them down on entering the bay. The phrase ἀντοφθαλμεῖν τῷ ἀνέμῳ (Ac 27^{15}), translated in the AV 'bear up into the wind,' and in the RV 'face the wind,' would be, in nautical language, 'beat up against the wind.' To 'bear up' is the sea phrase for doing exactly the reverse of what is expressed in the AV, and means to put a ship before the wind. Captain Sturmy[*] in describing a naval sea fight says, 'Bear up before the wind that we may give him our starboard broadside,' and again, 'He bears up before the wind to stop his leaks'; ἀντοφθαλμεῖν, as a nautical expression, may have reference to the eyes painted on each bow of ships in general; the term 'eyes of the ship' is still in general use as a sea term for the inside part of her which lies nearest to the stem. The rope cables (σχοινία, ἀγκύρια, ancoralia or funes ancorales) which passed, as now, through holes on each side of the bow, were of from 6 in. to 4½ in. in diameter, equal to from 13½ in. to 18 in. modern hemp cables, and were 'hove in' by a capstan (στροφεῖον) to weigh the anchor. Chain cables were then used only by ships of war, and, in so far as the English Navy is concerned, were not introduced till the beginning of the 19th century.

The terms 'helps' and 'undergirding' (Ac 27^{17} βοήθειαι, ὑποζωννύντες) refer to the modes in use of strengthening an old or weak ship in bad weather by bracing the two curved ends of the ship, which were not water-borne, together by means of a stout rope or cable passing along the outside of the ship longitudinally, and generally below the water-line, several times; or by passing it under the keel and round the hull in a direction transverse to its length, and probably sometimes by a combination of both these methods. 'Undergirding' is a literal translation of the Greek nautical term for the operation of passing the above ropes or cables (ὑποζώματα) around or under a ship; but it has never been an English sea term, although the process of transverse undergirding has occasionally been resorted to by our sailing ships when dangerously overstrained, and was then termed 'frapping' the ship.[†] The internal longitudinal rope support of the ancient Egyptian ships seems to have been still in use in Roman ships to some extent under the name of tormentum,[‡] probably from the two or four parts of rope of which it consisted being tightened, as required, by means of a piece of wood inserted between them and twisted round; the transverse external support was termed mitra. The longitudinal support became unnecessary when the length of the ends of the ship not water-borne became greatly diminished and the amount of deck increased; with improved shipbuilding the long curves disappeared. All Greek and Roman ships of war of the rank of triremes and upwards seem to have had the hypozomata permanently fixed in their places on board to enable them to better withstand the shock of ramming, and were also supplied with extra ones as part of their stores; but, in the case of merchant vessels (φορταγωγαί) such as St. Paul's ship, these 'helps' were probably improvised out of their ordinary gear. The term σκευή, translated 'tackling' (AV and RV Ac 27^{19}), which the crew (and passengers [AV]) threw overboard with their own hands on the third day of the gale, probably refers to the spare stores of various kinds which followed some heavier undescribed weights (v.^{18}), and it was only as a last resort that the cargo of wheat (v.^{38}) (on which the commercial success of the voyage depended, and which was in charge of the 'supercargo' (ναύκληρος, v.^{11}), to whose ill advice and that of the sailing-master (κυβερνήτης) St. Paul attributed their mishap) was 'jettisoned' in order to so lighten the ship, that, when the cables were slipped (v.^{40}) and the foresail hoisted, she might run high up on the beach they had selected (v.^{39}).

From the depth of water in which soundings were taken (Ac 27^{28}), viz. in 20 and 15 fathoms, it is evident that a sounding-lead attached to a line (καταπειρατηρία, catapirates) was used, as we see it on a bas-relief in the British Museum, suspended from the volute of the bow,[*] and probably 'armed' with grease at its lower end to determine the nature of the bottom, as in the time of Herodotus (ii. 5) and Lucilius.[†] The anchoring by the stern when rapidly shoaling water at night (Ac 27^{29}) was good seamanship, and, in a vessel shaped alike at both ends, offered no practical difficulties, the rudder-paddles being afterwards triced up clear of the water. The ship carried at least one boat (σκάφη), like all others of her class, for general purposes, such as laying out anchors (v.^{30}), communicating with the shore or with other ships; and this boat was towed astern in charge of one of the crew,[‡] in accordance with usual practice in fine weather, being either hoisted up to 'davits' outside the ship, or hoisted on board altogether, for greater security (v.^{16}), when bad weather came on.

The ship in which St. Paul embarked from the island of Melita seems to have been of the same type as the wrecked one, but we have the additional detail given of her 'sign' (παράσημον, insigne) (28^{11}), indicating her name Διόσκουροι, translated 'Castor and Pollux' in the AV and 'The Twin Brothers' in the RV. Whether the parasemon was, in this case, a painting on either side of the stem denoting the fratres Helenæ, sons of Jupiter, who were then specially venerated as the patrons of sailors,[§] like St. George and St. Nicholas in modern days, or whether they formed her 'figurehead,' we do not know; but both modes of indicating a ship's name, and, occasionally, a combination of the two, were in vogue at that time in Roman ships. That these ships were capable of 'working to windward' like modern sailing ships there can be no manner of doubt, although, possibly, not lying so close to the wind as within 5 or 6 points of the compass; but the quotation from Pliny (HN ii. 48) does not refer to 'beating,' and merely states that ships with the same wind sail in opposite directions according to the 'tack' they are on, and often meet one another, which can obviously be done with the wind fair or abeam.[‖] The modern nautical term corresponding to the Greek περιελθόντες κατηντήσαμεν εἰς Ῥήγιον (Ac 28^{13}), translated in the AV 'we fetched a compass and came to Rhegium' (RV 'made a circuit'),[¶] would be 'we beat up to Rhegium,' the only course open to her in making for that port from Syracuse with a northerly wind, which is clearly indicated by her waiting there a day for a change of wind to the south. That these ships were fast sailers we know from contemporary statements of ancient authors, and especially from Pliny, who, in speaking of the marvellous utility of the flax plant, of which sails were made, in reducing the time occupied in a voyage from Egypt to Italy, instances a voyage recently made from the Straits of Messina to Alexandria, by two Roman prefects, E. Galerius and Balbillus, in 7 and 6 days respectively; and another voyage from Puteoli to Alexandria by Valerius Marianus, a Roman senator, 'lenissimo flatu,' in 9 days.[] St. Paul's voyage from Rhegium to Puteoli (180 miles) was effected in 2 days (but see art. ROADS AND TRAVEL (IN NT), p. 379).

Of the fishing and passenger boats on the Sea of Galilee (Lake of Tiberias), which were evidently very numerous in our Lord's time, we have no description.

I. ROADS.—i. POSITION AND CONFORMATION OF PALESTINE.—The land inhabited by the Israelites seemed from its position to have been predestined to form a meeting-point in the world's lines of communication. On the western side its situation brought it into connexion with the Mediterranean coasts; on the south-west the country was closely bound to Egypt, that land of ancient civilization; on the south to Arabia, which was traversed by richly laden caravans; while on the north there were approaches from the coast by the Merj 'Ayyûn ('the entering in of Hamath,' Nu 34^{8}, Jos 13^{5}, and often), and by the S.E. side of Antilibanus, to the cultured lands beyond, and further to the great empires of the Euphrates. It was only on the east that an insurmountable barrier to communication was presented by the cheerless desert.

For the Israelites themselves, however, these advantages of situation had not the significance that might have been expected. The seacoast with its harbours, some of which were poor enough, was (apart from the period referred to in Gn 49^{13}) in the hands of the Phœnicians and the Philistines, to whom thus belonged the important points at which the caravans coming from Damascus or Arabia unloaded their goods for further transport by sea. Consequently the Israelites, when they sought to take a share in international commerce, found themselves compelled to make the distant port of 'Ezion-geber the starting-point of their shipping trade. It was not till the latest period of Jewish history that they got Joppa into their hands, a possession afterwards supplemented by the harbour of Cæsarea, which had been repaired by Herod.

The ancient caravan road connecting Damascus with Arabia, the modern Pilgrim Road, ran along the eastern side of the territory of the Israelites, and thus was of no service to them. In like manner the important caravan road from Gaza to Arabia touched only a small and thinly peopled tract of their country. On the other hand, the great caravan road connecting Damascus with the middle part of the Mediterranean coast and with Egypt ran right through the territory of Israel, and offered its people a variety of advantages, which they did not fail to utilize when the State reached under Solomon the culminating point of its culture.

In the interior of the country the extensive stretch of mountains, interrupted by steep descents, presented a serious obstacle to communication. Any one who has made journeys in Palestine knows from experience how travelling is a course of up hill and down, and how at every turn declivities have to be passed which it is a severe task for one's horse to mount or to descend. For the most part, one has to ride at a walking pace; it is but rarely that valleys are encountered with a level surface where horses can gallop for any long stretch. Besides, the tract on the western side of the Jordan is separated from that on the eastern side by the deep depression of that river. In the dry season, it is true, communication between the two parts of the country is kept up by numerous fords, but during the rainy season these are for the most part impassable; while, on the other hand, the winding and impetuous course of the stream makes it impossible to use it as a waterway between north and south. The only exception in this respect is the broad expanse of the Lake of Gennesareth, offering great advantages to the dwellers upon its shores.

Nevertheless, the gradually developed high civilization of the Israelites led to the difficulties of communication being overcome as far as was practicable, and there arose, as the Old Testament shows, a network of roads covering all the inhabited parts of the country. From this point of view, the monarchical period, from the reign of Solomon onwards, must have been of special significance; but, on the other hand, the difference between the earlier and later periods must not be exaggerated. The country to which the Israelites came as settlers already possessed a certain measure of civilization. The Tel el-Amarna letters, which in so many respects have enlarged our knowledge of the pre-Israelite history of Canaan, mention, amongst other things, caravans which the Egyptian vassal-princes in Canaan were in the way of sending under escort to Egypt.* This points to the existence of routes of communication. We gather also from the Song of Deborah that in the period of the Judges there were roads with a brisk traffic in the Northern kingdom, for the condition of things that had supervened owing to the weakness of the Israelites is described in these terms: 'The highways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through byways' (Jg 5^{6}).†

ii. HEBREW TERMS FOR 'ROAD.'—The usual Hebrew word for 'road' is דֶּרֶךְ (derekh), which, from its etymology, probably means 'ground trodden upon.' Side by side with it we have the word מְסִלָּה (mĕsillāh), which occurs also in the Inscription of Mesha, and whose radical meaning is undoubtedly that of a road which has been constructed by the filling up of hollows, and which is kept up by artificial methods. More poetical is the employment in Hebrew of the word אֹרַח ('ōraḥ), which, on the other hand, is the usual term in Aramaic. Likewise more poetical are נָתִיב (nāthîbh) or נְתִיבָה (nĕthîbhāh) and (common in Aramaic and Arabic) שְׁבִיל (shĕbhîl). A narrow road shut in on both sides was called מִשְׁעוֹל (mish'ōl, Nu 22^{24} only); the road that ran right through a valley or led over a stream was מַעֲבָר (ma'ăbhār) or מַעְבָּרָה (ma'bārāh); the steep road up a declivity, מַעֲלֶה (ma'ăleh), or, down it, מוֹרָד (môrād).

In the figurative language of the OT the notion of 'road' or 'way' plays a prominent part, a circumstance probably connected not with the increase of communication but with recollections of the nomadic pre-historic period of Israel's history. In the desert the discovery of the right path is often a question of life, for the wanderer who fails to find a well of water or who stumbles upon an enemy's quarters speedily falls a prey to death. In this way the language of the OT is to be understood when it speaks of a way to life and one to death (Pr 6^{23} 10^{17} 12^{28} 14^{12} 21^{16}, Jer 21^{8}), or of a way that perishes (Ps 1^{6}), or that is shut up (Job 19^{8}). When God means to destroy a nation He closes up its way with a wall [*] or with thorns (Hos $2^{6\,(8)}$). His law teaches Israel the right way, from which, however, the people constantly wander (Jer 3^{13}, cf. Is 2^{3}). He who follows the example of another walks in his ways (1 K 15^{26} and often). Illustrations of similar usages might be multiplied indefinitely. The same figurative mode of expression prevails also in the Ḳoran, whose first hearers must have been familiar with the importance of path-finding to the Bedawîn.

† That there were much frequented roads also in the southern portion of the land is evident from the narrative of Gn 38, where the ḳĕdēshah takes her seat by the wayside to be seen by passers-by.

iii. VARIOUS KINDS OF ROADS.—In many passages of the OT the word 'way' or 'road' undoubtedly stands for a simple bridle-path. It is the latter that is the initial stage in the process whereby men and beasts tread the same ground year after year. Thus the very old Pilgrim Road from Damascus to Arabia consists merely of a number of parallel tracks without any artificial construction, and recalls the passages in the ancient Arab poets where such roads are compared to striped cloths from S. Arabia. On the hills of Palestine the hard limestone soil forms a firm foundation for the roads, which for long stretches require nothing more in the way of construction, and present no inconvenience to the traveller except at spots where the winter rains have washed down accumulations of stones. The existence of artificially formed roads is not necessarily implied in the passages where chariots or waggons are spoken of. According to the OT, the great plain between the hills of Samaria and Galilee was the proper home of chariots of war, which could move here with ease (Jg 4^{2}, cf. 2 K 9^{20}). But besides this we hear also of vehicles traversing the hill-country proper—e.g. Gn 45^{27} (from Ḥebron to Egypt), 1 S 6 (from 'Eḳron by way of Beth-shemesh to Ḳiriath-jearim), 2 S 6 (from Ḳiriath-jearim to Jerusalem), 2 S 15^{1}, 1 K 1^{5}, Is 22^{18}, Jer 17^{25} (from and to Jerusalem), 1 K 12^{18} (from Shechem to Jerusalem), 1 K $22^{22\text{ff.}}$ (from Ramoth-gilead to Samaria), 2 K $7^{14\text{f.}}$ (from Samaria to the Jordan), 2 K $5^{9.\,20\text{ff.}}$ (from Damascus to Samaria), 2 K $10^{15\text{f.}}$ (from Jezreel to Samaria, cf. $9^{27\text{ff.}}$). With reference to Gn 45^{27} Robinson (BRP^{2} i. 214 f.) declares that the road from Ḥebron to the south cannot possibly have been traversed by waggons, and hence he assumes that they must have made a circuit by the Wādy el-Khălîl. In like manner he asserts that the road between Ḥebron and Jerusalem must have been impracticable for anything on wheels. But in that case the OT could not have spoken at all of vehicles travelling from and to Jerusalem, for none of the roads leading to the capital are a whit better than the Ḥebron road. Nor can it well be doubted that the chariots which Absalom collected in connexion with his projected rebellion (2 S 15^{1}) were procured at Ḥebron. As a matter of fact, there is no ground for Robinson's remark if one keeps in mind that the light two-wheeled chariots of war and the clumsy ox-waggons (1 S 6) could travel not only on perfectly primitive roads, but even along unbeaten ground.[*] Of course the progress under such conditions was often very slow, and the journey was attended with inconveniences and dangers such as are expressly alluded to in 2 S 6^{6}.

But, although a number of the roads mentioned in the Bible are nothing more than primitive natural tracks, it is a well established fact, on the other hand, that the Israelites had also artificially constructed roads. It is a circumstance of special importance from this point of view that the Moabite king Mesha records in his Inscription (l. 26) how he caused the road along the Arnon to be constructed (עשתי מסלה). For it may be inferred that what was done by this prince would also be done by the Israelite monarchs of the same period. A testimony in favour of this may be found in the very word מְסִלָּה (mĕṣillāh) noticed above. It is also expressly said in Dt 19^{3} that the roads leading to the three Cities of Refuge are to be kept in good repair (הכין). In Sir 21^{10} the writer says figuratively, 'The way of sinners is made smooth with stones.' Contrariwise, Job (30^{13}) speaks of a tearing up or destroying (נתס) of the road, which likewise presupposes one that has been artificially formed. The expression 'the king's highway' (דֶּרֶךְ הַמֶּלֶךְ) used for the great trunk-road of the country (Nu 20^{17}, cf. v.^{19} מְסִלָּה) appears to point to the fact that it was especially the kings who saw to the repairing of the roads, a procedure which was natural even on military grounds.[†] We are not, of course, to think of such roads as possessing any special excellence; they were probably similar in character to the 'Sultan's roads' as these existed in Palestine down to recent years. Accordingly, when kings went upon a journey, people were sent out to prepare the roads, for instance by removing loose stones from the surface (cf. Is 40^{3} 57^{14} 62^{10}, and Diod. Sic. ii. 13). It is also related by Josephus that Vespasian took workmen along with his army, whose duty it was to remove inequalities in the roads, and to cut down any bushes that might be in the way.[‡] On the other hand, it is improbable that the Israelites built any bridges, as there is no word in the OT (nor even 2 Mac 12^{13}) which can be proved to mean 'bridge,' and none of the existing remains of ancient bridges over the Jordan are earlier than the Roman period. Any one who wanted to cross the Jordan had to avail himself of the fords, unless he followed the example of Jonathan the Maccabee (1 Mac 9^{48}) and swam over.[§] In desert regions a 'waymark' (צִיּוּן ẓîyyûn, or תַּמְרוּר tamrûr) was set up for the guidance of travellers (Jer 31^{21}), a practice which is also mentioned frequently by the ancient Arab poets. But milestones were first introduced by the Romans; the Israelites reckoned distances by the number of days' journey (Gn 30^{36} 31^{23}, 1 K 19^{4}, 2 K 3^{9}), and appear in general to have had no measure for long stretches of road.[‖]

iv. THE ROADS OF THE OT.—The mention in the OT of the then existing roads is naturally of a somewhat incidental character, and is influenced exclusively by regard to the scenes of the history that is being narrated. Nevertheless, it is worth while to enumerate the most important of these roads, since we thus obtain at all events a view of the condition of things at the time. They were supplemented by the later Roman roads, which as a rule followed the old lines of communication (cf. the following article).*

[*] The method of blocking a road by means of a wall (גָּדֵר) formed of loose stones is described by Guthe in Mitteil. u. Nachrichten des deutschen Pal. Vereins, 1896, p. 9.

[*] Cf. e.g. the illustrations in W. Max Müller, Asien u. Europa, 301, 366.

[†] But when Josephus (Ant. VIII. vii. 4) records that Solomon caused the roads leading to Jerusalem to be paved with black stone, it is certain that he attributes to this monarch the work of a later age. A stone pavement is mentioned in the OT in 2 K 16^{17}, Ezk 40^{17}, Neh 3^{8}(?), 2 Ch 7^{3}, cf. Aristeas, 38.

[‡] BJ III. vi. 2. Cf. vii. 3, where it is recorded how Vespasian, when he had determined to besiege Jotapata, first despatched workmen in the direction of the city to level the mountain road, which was difficult for foot-passengers to traverse and wholly impracticable for horsemen. Josephus adds that in four days they succeeded in making a wide military road.

[§] On the other hand, it may be assumed that the Phœnicians understood how to build some kind of bridge, for the deep Liṭâny gorge which is crossed by the undeniably ancient road between Ẓidon and the Merj 'Ayyûn cannot be passed in any other way (cf. Robinson, BRP iii. 50).

[‖] Whether the word כִּבְרָה (kibhrah, Gn 35^{16} 48^{7}, 2 K 5^{19}) really stands for a larger measure of length, is very uncertain.

1. We shall first examine the roads that connected Palestine with the surrounding countries.—(a) From Arabia it was possible to reach Palestine by a variety of roads. One led in a straight line from Elath, by way of Lysa (Wādy Lussan), to Gaza.† At Aboda ('Abde) it met the road coming from Ḥebron by Beersheba and Elusa. The portion of this road lying between Lysa and Elath is probably to be identified with 'the way to the Yam Ṣuph' mentioned in Nu 14[25] 21[4], Dt 1[40] 2[1]. Another road ran up from Elath to the north through the 'Arabah depression. The traveller who made choice of it in order to reach Judah, might either make his way to Ḥebron by the ancient Ascent of 'Aḳrabbim; or he might journey through the 'Arabah as far as the south end of the Dead Sea and thence gain the hills and reach Ḥebron by way of Zuwêre et-Taḥta and el-Fôḳâ; or he might pursue his way along the west side of the Dead Sea and make use of the ascent at Engedi (see below). These roads must have been under the control of the Israelites at the time when Solomon opened the sea trade from 'Ezion-geber. Close by the watershed a road parts from the 'Arabah route and goes down to the metropolis, Petra. This city, however, may be reached also by a direct road over the high land. From Petra a main road leads by eṭ-Ṭafila to Kerak in Moab. This may perhaps be identified with 'the king's highway' of Nu 20[17]. But it is extremely doubtful whether it is the same that is referred to in the parallel narrative, Dt 2[8], for here the road from Elath to Ma'ân and thence (coinciding with the great Pilgrim Road) to the east side of Moab suits much better. The Pilgrim Road itself, which leads on further by Edre'i and Muzêrîb (probably the ancient Ashtaroth-ḳarnaim) to Damascus, marks an old established and very important connexion between Syria and Arabia, and also opens up, by means of various branches running westwards, a further connexion between Arabia and Palestine. At Edre'i it takes up a road coming from Dumah (Dumât al-Jandal). The oasis of Tema mentioned in the OT (Job 6[19], Is 21[14]) may be reached both from Dumah and from the southern continuation of the Pilgrim Road. Along these roads travelled not only peaceful caravans, but also the Bedawîn tribes upon the occasion of their forays upon the civilized districts east of the Jordan, or their plundering campaigns to the west of that river.

(b) Palestine was connected with Egypt by two roads. One of these ('the way of the land of the Philistines,' Ex 13[17]) ran along the shore of the Mediterranean, and is probably identical with the present caravan road which leads past Ḳanṭarat el-Khazne.‡ By this road Sargon advanced against the Egyptians, and defeated them at Raphia; and Necho doubtless availed himself of it when he set out to march through Palestine (2 K 23[29]). At a later period Titus made his way from Egypt to Judæa along this road, his halting-places being Ostrakine, Rhinocorura, Raphia, Gaza, Ascalon, Jamnia, Joppa, and Cæsarea.* The other road is called in the OT 'the way to Shur' (Gn 16[7], 1 S 15[7]). The researches of F. W. Holland have shown that it deviated from the caravan road from Beersheba, and ran north from Jebel Yelek, then by Jebel Mughara, and finally over undulating ground to Isma'îlîya.† See, further, art. SHUR in vol. iv.

(c) On the northern frontier of Palestine there were three entrances to the country. These marked the connexion not only with Syria but also with the Euphrates lands, Assyria and Babylonia, for any direct communication with the latter through the waterless Syrian desert was difficult. We shall look first at the points of entrance, and then at the routes which converged upon them.

The first entrance is the road along the Mediterranean coast, leading from Beirut by Ẓidon to Tyre and on to the south. Somewhat to the north of Beirut it was blocked by a rocky projection at the Nahr el-Kalb, but even in pre-Israelite times this obstacle had been overcome, for among the figures cut on the rocky wall, at the spot where the course of the road is hewn past the rock, is that of Ramses II.—a circumstance which throws an interesting light upon the conditions of communication in these early times.—The second entrance was the Merj 'Ayyûn, into which debouched the road leading from Riblah (2 K 23[33] 25[6. 20f.]) through the valley between Lebanon and Antilibanus.—The third starting-point was Damascus, from which several roads led to the west and the south. One ran along the foot of Hermon to Dan, whence the traveller could reach Ẓidon, Tyre, and Galilee (see below). Another ran in a S.W. direction past el-Ḳunêtra in Golan, and struck the Jordan at the spot where afterwards the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters was built. We shall presently describe more fully how from this point it traversed Western Galilee and led by one branch to Acco and by another to the Plain of Jezreel. By means of its further continuation along the Mediterranean coast it formed the principal connexion between Damascus, with its hinterland, and Egypt. In the Middle Ages it was called Via Maris, and there is a strong probability that it is to be identified with the road that bears the corresponding name דֶּרֶךְ הַיָּם (derekh hayyām, 'way of the sea') in Is 9[1].‡ Besides this there was still another road from Damascus through the trans-Jordanic territory, which crossed the Jordan at Bethshean, and thence led to the Plain of Jezreel or into the hill-country of Samaria.

Having now learned what were the points of entrance to North Palestine, we must notice briefly the roads leading thence to Syria and the Euphrates lands, for the Israelites had not infrequently the misfortune to see armies advancing against them along these roads, or had themselves to tread them as deported captives. The oldest principal line of communication between North Palestine and the Euphrates lands contrived to avoid the desert by a long circuitous route through Syria, passing Riblah (2 K 23[33] 25[6. 20f.]), Ḥamath, Emesa, and Aleppo, and along the Upper Euphrates till in the fertile Belikh Valley it reached the city of Ḥarrân, where the roads from Armenia and Babylonia met. This was probably the route chosen, for instance, by Pharaoh-necho (2 K 23[29]), who was met by Nebuchadrezzar at Carchemish. It was doubtless along the same road that the Assyrian kings advanced on their expeditions of conquest.* From Ḥarrân a road led direct to Nineveh, while Babylonia could be reached through the Mesopotamian Plain. At a later period Thapsacus was a favourite crossing-place. It was here, for example, that the younger Cyrus and Alexander the Great crossed the Euphrates. This brought one nearer to the desert on the west of the river, but it was still possible to keep on the edge of the cultured land. In the Roman period, on the other hand, a much frequented route was the shorter road from Damascus by way of Palmyra and a number of water stations in the desert to the spot where the Chaboras joins the Euphrates.† It is possible, however, that in much earlier times this desert road had a predecessor. H. Winckler ‡ seeks to show that as early as the 14th cent. B.C. the Babylonian king Kadašman-ḫarba, finding the old road through N. Mesopotamia closed against him by the extension of the sway of Assyria, caused water stations to be established in the desert, in order that he might have a direct road from Babylon to Damascus after his conquest of the Suti who lived in this desert. The circumstance that Palmyra is first mentioned towards the close of the pre-Christian period is of course no argument against this view, for a water station may very well have existed there prior to the building of the famous city. Which of these roads was followed by the exiles on their way back from Babylon cannot be determined with certainty. The descriptions in Is $40^{1ff.}$ $43^{14f.}$ $49^{9ff.}$ presuppose that a desert has to be traversed by the returning company. We may also recall the circumstance that those who accompanied Zerubbabel took with them, according to Ezr 2^{66}, not only horses and mules and asses, but 435 camels, and that those who returned with Ezra were exposed to danger from 'liers in wait' (Ezr 8^{31}). But this will suit equally well a journey through the mostly unpeopled N. Mesopotamia, and does not point of necessity to a course through the desert proper. According to Berosus (ap. Jos. c. Apion. i. 19), Nebuchadrezzar, after he had cleared Syria of the Egyptian troops, being informed of his father's death set off for Babylon by forced marches through the desert. At the same time he left instructions with his generals to conduct the Jewish, Phœnician, and other prisoners of war, along with the baggage of the army, thither. In this latter instance, evidently, the way round about the desert was to be followed.

2. Roads in Palestine.—(a) When we turn to Judæa, we are best informed as to the roads leading from Jerusalem. The ancient main road from the capital to the Maritime Plain led past Gibeon and Beth-ḥoron, from which there was a steep ascent to the plain (cf. e.g. Jos 10^{10}, 2 S 2^{24} 13^{34} [LXX] 20^{12}, Ac $23^{23.\,31}$; Jos. BJ II. xii. 2, xix. 8). The present road from Jerusalem to Jaffa or Lydda is first mentioned a few times by Eusebius.§ From the Philistine Plain various passes led into the mountains and to the capital.* From Ashdod the main road led through the Wādy es-Sunṭ, called in earlier times the Vale of Elah (cf. the narrative of 1 S $17^{1ff.}$). From 'Eḳron a road ran to Beth-shemesh in the Wādy es-Ṣurâr further to the north. Hither the kine brought the ark of Jahweh, and thence it was afterwards conveyed to Ḳiriath-jearim and finally to Jerusalem (1 S 6, 2 S 6).—Towards the south Jerusalem was connected by an ancient road with Ḥebron and beyond it with Beersheba (cf. e.g. 2 S 15^{9} 16^{15}, 1 K 19^{3}). By this road Lysias, according to 1 Mac $4^{29ff.}$, attempted to reach the capital, but was completely routed by Judas at Beth-ẓur. It was presumably this road also that was chosen when a journey was undertaken from Judæa to Edom. The ancient highroad, before it was modernized a few years ago, bore every trace of having been always the main route between Jerusalem and the south; it was carried in a straight line, and was in many places artificially constructed, and that apparently from early times. Like the generality of such roads, it presented not a few difficulties, leading as it did over steep hills, and being covered at not a few spots with large stones.† An hour's journey south of Jerusalem a road strikes off from it, which brings one in 13 minutes to Bethlehem (cf. Jg $19^{1ff.}$). — From Jerusalem to En-gedi there was also a much frequented road. It is mentioned in 2 Ch 20. As the הַצִּיץ (Haẓẓîẓ) of v.^{16} is no doubt to be identified with the modern Wādy Haṣâṣâ, the ancient road followed exactly the same course as the later Roman road. A part of this road is probably in view also in 1 S $24^{2f.}$, whereas the road named in the parallel narrative (26^{3}) should more likely be found in that between En-gedi and Ḥebron, if, that is to say, the hill Ḥachîlah is rightly identified with Ḍahr el-Kôlâ. From En-gedi one can proceed further to the southern shore of the Dead Sea and to Edom.—The ancient main road between Jerusalem and Jericho (Lk 10^{30}) probably coincided with the Roman road.‡ It ran, according to 2 S 15^{23} [LXX] 16^{5}, over the Mount of Olives and then by the city of Baḥurim. Its further course, which may be presumed to have been the same as that of the later road (before it was modernized), led through the waterless and sun-scorched desert to Tal'at ed-Dâm, a name which probably points back to the old 'Ascent of Adummim' by which the low ground is reached (Jos 15^{7} 18^{17}). This was the usual road taken by pilgrims coming from the east of the Jordan. The latter, as a rule, included also Galilæans who desired to avoid the road through Samaria. There was another, but a longer, road from the capital to the N.W. shore of the Dead Sea and Jericho. It first follows the lower Ḳidron Valley by Mar-saba; then passes the Munṭar hill, and crossing the small plain of Buḳa' finally arrives through beautiful scenery at the low ground. It was probably by this road that king Ẓedeḳiah fled from Jerusalem to the Jordan (2 K $25^{4f.}$, Jer 39^{4}).—The present main road from Jerusalem to the north, which at some spots is very bad and uncomfortable, meets us in the narrative of Jg 19^{13}, where the Levite, turning aside from Jerusalem, proposed to pass the night at Gibeah or Ramah.§ Its northern continuation, which ran past Gophna, is mentioned in Onom.^{2} 300. 94. It is the same road which is called in Jg 20^{31} the way from Bethel to Gibeah. By this road Titus moved on § Ramah is the modern er-Râm; Gibeah in all probability is Tulêl el-Fûl, somewhat to the south of it.

Jerusalem, for he passed the night at Gophna, then at Gabath-Saul, i.e. Gibeah, and came finally to Scopus, from which he descried Jerusalem with its magnificent temple.* On the other hand, Isaiah ($10^{28\text{ff.}}$) makes the Assyrian conqueror advance against Jerusalem by another road further to the north-east—a circumstance which at least suggests that in olden times armies coming from the north approached Jerusalem by this road, and not by the one first named. As a matter of fact, the two roads unite further to the north, but it is strange all the same that considerable armies should have preferred the very difficult passage by the Suweinîṭ gorge (cf. 1 S 14^{4}). The road named by the prophet, which can be reached either by way of 'Anathoth or by the present road to the south of Tulêl el-Fûl, runs past Ḥizma and Geba' to the Suweinîṭ gorge, north of which Michmash is reached. At all events Michmash was, as 1 S 13^{18} shows, an important meeting-point, from which roads ran in all directions. Towards the south one could go to 'Ai and 'Ophrah. A road running west connected Michmash with Beth-ḥoron and the Maritime Plain. And, lastly, there was a fourth road going in a south-eastern direction to the Valley of Zeboim, by which we should no doubt understand the great Wādy el-Ḳelt, from the northern edge of which an ancient road leads down to Jericho.† It is very probable that it was this route that the Israelites followed when they moved into the country to the west of the Jordan; so that here again we have to do with a road of extreme historical interest.‡ Since there is a direct course from Michmash to 'Ai, everything is in favour of the latter city having been the first to be attacked by the Israelites; and by the same road they could always retire upon their fixed camp in the Jordan Valley (cf. Jos 9^{6}).

(b) The continuation of the road leaving Jerusalem for the north leads to Samaria, namely by way of Bethel to Shechem (cf. Jg. 21^{19}, a passage which shows that the ancient road, like the modern one, ran to the west of Shiloh).§ The scene of Jos $4^{5\text{ff.}}$ is the spot where this road bends to the west and leads into the Vale of Shechem. The different roads leading from Shechem are referred to generally in Jg 9^{25}, and in v.^{37} there is special mention of the way that came from 'the Soothsayers' Oak.' But several of these roads were of special importance, and the scanty allusions to them in the OT must be explained on the ground that detailed narratives are so seldom connected with this district. As the well-watered and fertile Wādy Sha'îr, running west from Shechem, opens a connexion with the Maritime Plain, so does the Wādy el-Fâri'a, which runs east, provide an approach from the Jordan Valley. Neither of these roads is mentioned in the OT, except in the narrative of Jacob's immigration (Gn $33^{17\text{f.}}$); but in later times we read of Vespasian coming from Emmaus and descending by way of Shechem to Koreæ, i.e. the beautiful oasis Ḳurâwa at the mouth of the Wādy el-Fâri'a.‖ The story of Abimelech's march from Shechem to Thebeẓ (Jg 9^{50}) introduces us to another main road leading out from Shechem, namely that which runs in a north-eastern direction by way of Tûbâṣ to Bethshean, and thus connects Shechem with the trans-Jordanic region and Damascus.—Lastly, there is a road to the north, running from Shechem to Jenîn, where opens one of the approaches that lead from the Plain of Jezreel into the hills of Samaria. Here we are at the starting-point of the great road which led from the Plain and from Galilee past Shechem to Jerusalem and to the south of the country.* Hence we find king Aḥaẓiah of Judah at this spot when he sought to flee to his home before Jehu—an attempt, however, which failed because his wounds compelled him to hasten to Megiddo, westward from Jenîn (2 K $9^{27\text{f.}}$). At Jenîn we encounter also those Galilæans who in their pilgrimage to the temple passed through Samaria (cf. the story of the murder of Galilæans perpetrated here by the Samaritans, Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 1; BJ II. xii. 3). Special importance attached to this Jenîn road for the further reason that it formed the approach from the north to the capital, Samaria, the great Jenîn-Shechem road throwing off two side-roads to Sebastiyeh. One of these branches off at the beautifully situated village of Jebna, the other at the more southerly Beit Imrîm.† Here then we have the route followed, for instance, by Jehu when he drove from Jezreel to Samaria (2 K $10^{12\text{ff.}}$), and probably also by an enemy advancing from the Jordan against the capital ($7^{14\text{f.}}$).

In addition to the two roads already mentioned which gave access from the north to the hill-country of Samaria by way of Bethshean and Jenîn, there were a number of other passes at the choice of travellers coming from the Plain of Jezreel. The most important of these is the road leading by Lejjûn (probably the ancient Megiddo) over the hills in a S.W. direction to the Judæan and Philistine Maritime Plain; for this is the continuation of the above-mentioned great caravan road (the Via Maris) connecting Damascus with Egypt. This road was traversed not only by patient caravan camels, but by many great armies —e.g. by the Assyrians when marching against Egypt; by Necho's troops on his march to the Euphrates, which king Josiah made a vain attempt to stop at Megiddo (2 K 23^{29}); by Cambyses in his Egyptian campaign, etc. It was presumably followed also by the Aramæan kings of Damascus, when they extended their military expeditions to the Philistine Maritime Plain (2 K 12^{18} 13^{22} [LXX]).‡—But besides this main route there was another caravan road to the southern Maritime Plain, which was preferred by those who crossed the Jordan at Bethshean. It is described by Robinson (BRP iii. 158 f.) as running west from Jenîn into the hill-country and touching the Plain of Dothan between Kefr Ḳud and Ja'bud. Its great antiquity is shown by Gn 37^{25}, where a caravan travelling from Gilead to Egypt passes Dothan.—Finally, it was possible for one coming from the northern part of the country to reach the Judæan Maritime Plain by keeping right along the seashore, for an artificially widened passage led by the foot of Carmel; but this route was chosen only by those who from their start in the north had followed the way by the coast.

(c) Among the roads in Galilee we have first to deal with that part of the Via Maris which touched this district. After passing the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters, the road ascends to Khan Jubb Yusuf, from which it runs to the N.W. shore of the Lake of Gennesareth at Khan Minyeh.[*] Thence it runs up through the Vale of el-Ḥammâm to Khan et-Tujjâr, and reaches the Plain of Jezreel in the neighbourhood of Tabor. At Karn Ḥaṭṭîn it throws off a branch in a westerly direction to Acco.—Of the remaining roads in Galilee, which, owing to the dense population of this part of the country, must have been very numerous, we may notice the following. The cities which Tiglath-pileser conquered in succession (2 K 15^{29}) lay on the road from Kedesh to the Merj ʿAyyûn.[†] But the main road from the Merj ʿAyyûn to the south probably kept closer by the Jordan, till it finally united with the Via Maris. From Âbil (the ancient Abel beth-Maacah) a road ran westwards to Tyre; it connected the latter city with Damascus. On the western side of the Galilæan hills the protuberance known as the Ladder of Tyre (Scala Tyriorum) presented an awkward obstacle to communication. Nevertheless, the Phœnicians succeeded in making this difficult point passable even for chariots, as is proved by the ancient marks of wheels; and so we hear of various armies moving from Syria along the seacoast.[‡] What roads are referred to in the narrative of 1 K 17^9 and Mt 15^{21} cannot be determined with certainty owing to the brevity of the descriptions.

* Jos. BJ v. ii. 1 ff. From Gibeah a road led to Gibeon, if Budde's very attractive emendation in Jg 20^{31} is correct. In any case such a road exists, and in all probability it was followed by the legion which came from Emmaus to join Titus at Gibeah.

† The name Wādy Abu Ḍabâ', recalling the name Ẓĕbō'îm, is still attached to a branch of the Wādy el-Ḳelt.

‡ Cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL 264.

§ In Dt 11^{30} it is usual to discover a reference to the main road which passes to the east of Shechem, but perhaps Steuernagel is right in questioning the correctness of the text in this passage.

‖ Jos. BJ IV. viii. 1.

* In Jth 4^{7} the high priest writes to the inhabitants of Bethulia, directing them to seize the mountain passes because by them was the way to Judæa, and it was easy to hinder an approach, as the pass was narrow, with space for two men at most. It is plain that the author has in view here the narrow valley of Jibleam, behind Jenîn.

† Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 311. Samaria is connected with Shechem by a road which turns off to the right from the Wādy Sha'îr.

‡ On the ground of these passages, Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex. 254) identifies the Aphek mentioned in 1 K $20^{26.\,30}$, 2 K 13^{17}, with the Aphek of the Maritime Plain, on the situation of which cf. especially G. A. Smith, HGHL^{4} 675.

(d) In the Jordan Valley an ancient road on the western side of the river supplies the connexion between north and south. On the west shore of the Lake of Gennesareth, where the bordering hills leave only a somewhat narrow strand clear, this road connected the numerous villages that were found here in ancient times. From the crossing-place at Bethshean it was followed by Pompey in his campaign against Aristobulus.[§] Along its northern portion, between the Lakes of Gennesareth and Ḥûleh, Jonathan marched (1 Mac 11^{67}).[‖]

The Jordan, as already remarked, possesses a considerable number of fords. The most southern of these is called el-Ḥenu; next comes the ford at the pilgrims' bathing-place; and, further up the river, that at the road from Jericho to es-Salt, where the crossing is now made by a bridge. At one or other of these points we must seek the ford of Pĕṣîlîm (Jg 3^{26} [see art. QUARRY in vol. iv.], cf. 2 S 19^{16}). At the next principal entrance to the hill-country, namely the Wâdy el-Fâriʿa coming from Shechem, we encounter the ford ed-Dâmiye, likewise with a bridge, which by the way stands at present on dry ground, the river having hollowed a new bed for itself.[¶] This much frequented crossing to the central part of the trans-Jordanic district meets us in the OT under the name Adam (Jos 3^{16}, and probably also 1 K 7^{46}, where Moore happily suggests reading 'the ford (maʿabhrath) Adam'). Further north is the most important crossing-place, the ford ʿAbâra at Bethshean, which was that chosen, for example, by Judas on his return march from the east of the Jordan (1 Mac 5^{52}), and by Pompey in his above-mentioned campaign. The importance of this spot is readily intelligible in view of the fact above noted, that a whole series of great caravan roads from east and west converge upon it.—There are yet other two crossing-places further up the river—one by the bridge el-Mujâmi, ½ hour south of the mouth of the Jarmuk; the other immediately south of the exit of the Jordan from the Lake of Gennesareth, a point (Bâb el-Tumm) where some traces of an ancient bridge remain. The ford last named had special importance for such of the dwellers on the shore of the Lake as did not avail themselves of boats. Between the Lake of Gennesareth and that of Ḥûleh is the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters, at the spot where the old caravan road, already referred to more than once, crosses the Jordan.[*]—Lastly, in the northern Jordan Valley there is a road from Galilee to Dân, where the different sources of the Jordan have to be crossed, a task now accomplished for the most part by bridges. In the OT this road is alluded to in such passages as Jg 18^7.

(e) About the roads on the east side of the Jordan the Bible gives us little information. On the other hand, the Roman roads give a good picture of the later routes of communication, and from these we may draw backward inferences as to the earlier roads. The way from Maḥanaim to the Jordan Valley (2 S 2^{29} 4^7) probably ran through the Wâdy ʿAjlûn. Nothing can be said about the road mentioned in 2 K 10^{16} until the site of Ramoth-gilead has been determined. Coming down to a later time, the route followed by Judas Maccabæus after his conquests in the districts to the west of the Ḥauran range can be fixed with tolerable certainty. Ephron (1 Mac 5^{46}) is in all probability identical with Gephrun (Polyb. v. lxx. 12), a name which is recalled by that of the deep Wâdy Ghafr, in which the city will thus have lain which Judas had to pass through.[†] Josephus speaks incidentally of the roads which led from the city of Julias to Gamala (the modern Jamli (?)) and Seleucia (now Selûḳiye).[‡] We have already spoken of the road from Damascus to the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters.

II. TRAVEL.—i. MOTIVES FOR TRAVELLING.—Journeys were undertaken only on a very small scale by the Israelites after they had exchanged the shifting nomadic stage of existence for a settled life; for the inconveniences and dangers attached to travelling were many and the advantages few. Any one who left his home and family gave up, according to the ancient Oriental conception, the best part of his human rights, and became a gêr (see art. GER in vol. ii.), whose welfare and whose life were entirely at the mercy of those with whom he sojourned. This was, above all, the case if he lived in a foreign land, where, as David expresses it (1 S 26^{19}), he had to serve other gods. The traveller was frequently exposed to the risk of being plundered and maltreated on the way.[§] In the desert he was threatened with all the perils characteristic of such places (Is 30^6, Jer 2^6 etc.). On the sea his life was in constant danger (Jon 1^4, Ps $107^{23ff.}$, Enoch 101^4).[‖] Journeys for pleasure in our sense of the term were thus quite unknown to the Israelites. Nor do we find any who undertook travels for purposes of research, moved by a scientific interest, like Herodotus or Ibn Batûta; although they enjoyed listening to the tales of those who had visited foreign parts (cf. Job 21^{29}). The Israelite who travelled had a definite and practical aim in view. Such aims might of course be purely accidental and individual, as, for instance, when one did not dare or wish to remain at home, like Jacob, or the Levite who was dissatisfied with his abode at Bethlehem-judah (Jg 17$^{7ff.}$); or when one had to go in pursuit of runaway slaves or a fugitive wife (1 K 2$^{39f.}$, Jg 19$^{1ff.}$); or when a prophet was commanded to betake himself for concealment to another country (1 K 17), etc. But, in addition to such casual instances, there were regularly recurring occasions which necessitated the facing of the hardships of a journey.

[‖] Cf. the diverting poem in Nöldeke's Delectus carminum arab., Carmen 62, in which a Bedawî describes the terrors that had beset him on his passage by sea.

(a) In part these occasions were connected with religious observances. Even in earlier times the Israelites were accustomed to assemble for the great festivals at certain of the more important sanctuaries (1 S 1^{3}, Ex 34$^{23f.}$); and when, after the Deuteronomic reformation, the temple at Jerusalem was recognized as the only legitimate sanctuary, these festival pilgrimages received a strong impulse, and became a main element in the life of an Israelite. From all parts of Palestine, and afterwards from all quarters of the then world (see art. DIASPORA in the present volume), Jews poured into Jerusalem, which, on the occasion of these festivals, was a seething mass of humanity. Those who had most acquaintance with the dangers of such a journey were the Galilæan Jews, who had to pass through the hostile territory of the Samaritans (Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 1). On this account many of them preferred to take the roundabout way by the east of the Jordan, where they were liable to no such misadventures.*—It must be remembered, moreover, that in early days men often visited a sanctuary for the purpose of obtaining oracles or receiving instruction on a point of ritual (Gn 25^{22}, 2 K 1^{2}, 1 S 3^{20} 9^{6}, Zec 7^{3}).

(b) Further, the increasing Jewish commerce supplied many with a motive for travelling. In the earlier period it was mostly foreigners that travelled through the land and carried on trade with its inhabitants (cf. the story of Joseph, Gn 37$^{28ff.}$, Ex 21^{8}, Dt 14^{21}, and the term ṣōḥēr used for the trader by whose standard money was weighed, Gn 23^{16}, 2 K 1$^{2.5}$). But as early as the monarchical period and still more in the later post-exilic times the Israelites began to take an active part in both home and international trade, and this involved frequent journeys in their own land as well as to foreign parts. The trade in horses carried on by Solomon led his buyers to the neighbouring States (1 K 10$^{28f.}$), while the shipping trade from 'Eẓion-geber inaugurated by him gave the Israelites an acquaintance with travelling by sea. Israelitish merchants established factories in foreign cities, as at Damascus, where Ahab was able to obtain State permission for his subjects to erect dwellings in a certain quarter of the city (1 K 20^{34}). In the later post-exilic period Jewish commerce made a great advance, particularly after the Jews came into possession of some seaports on the Mediterranean; and it was all the easier for them to undertake trading journeys, because they could count with certainty on meeting with countrymen of their own in all foreign trading towns. The wife of an Israelite now knew that it meant a distant journey when her husband on setting out took the money-bag with him (Pr 31^{14}).

(c) A third motive for travelling was supplied by the political and diplomatic relations into which the Israelites entered with other peoples. A nation that was in vassalage to another required to send men to hand over the tribute (Jg 3$^{15ff.}$). The later kings of Israel had often to go in person to a foreign court to pay homage to their powerful suzerain (2 K 16^{10}, Jer 51^{59}). But more especially attempts to arrange political alliances led to a constant coming and going of ambassadors (Is 30$^{2ff.}$ 31^{1}; and on the other side 14^{32} 18. 39, Jer 27^{3}).—Journeys of an involuntary character are seen in the deportation of conquered peoples, a fate which befell the Israelites more than once. But there were also occasions when one voluntarily left his home to find safety in a foreign land (Jer 43). A happier condition was that of the travelling companies which by the grace of their sovereign were permitted to return to their homes (Ezr 1. 8). Moreover, the sojourn of a portion of the people of Israel in the Diaspora gave occasion for frequent journeys between the foreign land and the home country, as we see from Jer 29^{3}, Zec 6^{10}, Neh 2$^{5ff.}$ 13$^{6ff.}$.

(d) A special motive for undertaking a journey was ill-health, which led to the visiting of foreign places in the hope of a cure (cf. 2 K 5). This habit finds illustration particularly in later times, when the various hot springs in the Jordan Valley were much frequented.*

(e) Lastly, wars of conquest and plunder may in a certain sense be reckoned among the motives to travel, which brought great multitudes of men to foreign lands.

Travelling on the part of Jews was beset by a peculiar difficulty in the shape of the Sabbath law, after so strict an observance of it had been introduced that on the Sabbath day and on those festival days on which sabbatical rest was enjoined it was unlawful to walk more than a fixed number of paces. Thus Josephus (Ant. XIII. viii. 4) mentions incidentally that the Syrian king, Antiochus Sidetes, out of consideration for Hyrcanus who accompanied him, remained for two days by the river Lycus, on account of a Jewish festival being then in progress. On the other hand, the Law accommodated itself to the needs of travellers in so far as it permitted those who were on a journey in the month of Nisan to celebrate the Passover in the following month (Nu 9$^{10f.}$).

ii. MODES OF TRAVEL.—Those who were not particularly well-to-do, especially if they were young, strong men, went for the most part on foot (Gn 28, Jos 9^{13}, 1 K 19$^{4ff.}$, Is 52^{7}, and the Gospel narratives). Hence the first attention shown to an arriving guest was to wash his feet (Gn 18^{4}, Jg 19^{21}). Women and elderly well-to-do men rode upon asses, which also carried the baggage (Jg 19^{3}, 1 S 25^{20}, 2 S 17^{23}, 1 K 2^{40}, 2 K 4^{24}, Lk 10^{34}); people of high rank also used mules (2 S 13^{29}, 1 K 1^{38}). Camels were less frequently employed, and only when the journey led through the desert (Gn 24). Horses, on the other hand, were used only in war, being either ridden or harnessed to the chariots. The chariots mentioned in the OT are, as a rule, chariots of war, but they were used by kings also in journeying from one part of the country to another (1 K 12^{18}, 2 K 10^{16}; and the story of Naaman in 2 K 5, where, however, we have to do with a foreigner). In 1 S 6^{7} we meet with an ox-waggon as a vehicle of transport; and in the case of the waggons sent from Egypt to convey the old men, the women, and the children, we should probably think also of similarly simple vehicles (Gn 45^{19}). From a later period we have the story of the Ethiopian chamberlain (here again a foreigner) driving in a chariot (Ac 8$^{27ff.}$). Josephus (Ant. XIX. viii. 1) speaks of a larger kind of chariot (ἀπήνη), in which Agrippa, accompanied by other kings, drove out to meet the Roman prætor.† In Ca 3^{9} we read of a sedan chair or palanquin (אַפִּרְיוֹן, φορεῖον) being used by people of high rank.

---

* Special risks naturally attended those travelling companies that carried with them large sums of money, as, for instance, in connexion with the transmission of the poll-tax of the Babylonian Jews. Hence these companies included many thousand persons (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ix. 1).

* Cf. Dechent, 'Heilbäder u. Badeleben in Palästina' in ZDPV vii. 173 ff.

† When Josephus (Ant. VIII. vii. 3-4) relates how Solomon often drove out to his gardens at Etham, he is simply adding a picturesque touch of his own.

On account of the attendant risks, one did not care to go on a long journey alone,[*] but had at least one companion, who received a daily wage and, if the journey terminated happily, a present besides (To $5^{15f.}$). When Nehemiah travelled from the Persian court to Jerusalem, he carried with him letters from the king to the governors of the various provinces commanding them to grant him free passage and an armed escort (Neh $2^{7ff.}$). The favourite method was to combine into large companies (caravans, originally a Persian word), which were accompanied by armed men (cf. Ezr 8^{22}). Such caravans, travelling under military protection, are referred to in the Tel el-Amarna letters (see above, p. 368^{b}). In the wilderness they were conducted by the Bedawîn tribes, e.g. the Dedanites (Is 21^{13}). When unknown regions had to be traversed, a guide acquainted with the roads had to be procured (Nu 10^{31}), or parties were sent in advance to make inquiry about the way and about the cities that had to be passed (Dt 1^{22}). The deadly danger of a caravan when the water of which it has come in search is found dried up, is portrayed with poetic beauty in Job 6^{18}.

iii. PROVISION FOR THE WANTS OF TRAVELLERS.—For the comfort and the refreshment of travellers very little provision was made. In the wilderness the inhabitants of the oases might, as described in Is 21^{14}, meet the exhausted caravans with water and bread; but, in the main and as a matter of course, a traveller through the desert had to provide for himself by bringing the necessaries of life with him (Gn 21^{14}). But the same was the case even in travelling through inhabited regions. The Levite of Jg 19 takes with him fodder and straw for the asses as well as bread and wine (v.^{19})'; and a similar course is followed by the Gibeonites when they seek to give themselves the appearance of having come from far (Jos 9). In Nu $20^{17ff.}$ we read of a great company binding itself, as it passed through a country, to keep to the highway, to touch nothing in the vineyards or the fields, and to pay for the water drunk by man and beast.

Of inns in the proper sense of the term we do not hear till NT times (Lk $10^{34f.}$); and the very circumstance that the Greek word πανδοχεῖον there employed was adopted by the Jews as פנרוק, proves that the whole institution was a new and foreign appearance.[†] In earlier times there may have been establishments at least somewhat akin to the modern khans—large empty buildings surrounding a courtyard, in which travellers can pass the night, but where the necessaries of life are not sold.[‡] Some have thought to find the corresponding word in Hebrew in the גֵּרוּת (gērûth) of Jer 41^{17}; but the real meaning of this word is very uncertain, and even the text is doubtful, for Josephus (Ant. X. ix. 5) read the word גדרות ('hurdles,' 'sheep-pens'). Likewise the word מָלוֹן (mālôn) has to be considered; for, even if in some passages it appears to mean simply the place where one takes up his quarters at night, the sense of khan fits very well passages like Gn 42^{27} 43^{21}, Jer 9^{2}. The king was attended on his journeys by a שַׂר מְנוּחָה (sar mĕnûḥah, lit. 'captain of the resting-place,' RV 'chief chamberlain,' RVm 'quarter-master'), whose duty was to look after night quarters for the royal party (Jer 51^{59}).

In general, then, in early times the traveller, unless he carried his victuals with him and preferred, like Jacob, to sleep in the open air, had to fall back on the hospitality of the inhabitants of the place; but this he could do with confidence, for in all ages hospitality has been one of the most beautiful virtues of the Oriental. Although it is not expressly enjoined in the Law,[*] narratives like Gn $18^{1ff.}$ 24^{31}, Ex 2^{20} show how highly it was esteemed; and Job, in the passage where he casts a backward glance on his former life in order to prove his integrity, says, amongst other things, 'The stranger did not lodge in the street, but I opened my doors to the traveller' (31^{32}). Passages like Jg 19^{15} indicate how severe was the judgment passed on those who suffered the traveller to pass the night outside; while the story related in Gn 19 and that in Jg 19 are meant to show the enormity of the offence of offering violence to the defenceless guest. The deed of Jael alone is praised (Jg $5^{25ff.}$), although, according to ancient Semitic notions, her guest ought to have been specially sacred to her, because he had drunk from her milk-bowl. But in this instance duty to a guest is regarded as overshadowed by duty to one's country.

When one reached a city at nightfall he took up his position on the open space before the gate, and waited to see if any one would invite him in (Jg $19^{15ff.}$). In like manner a traveller in the country took his stand before the tent or the house into which he desired to be invited (Gn 18^{2}). When the guest entered, his feet were washed, and a meal was prepared for him. In the latter instance, a wish to honour him was marked, as still happens regularly in the East at the present day, by the killing of an animal from the herd (Gn 18^{7}, 2 S 12^{4}). At his departure he was expected to eat heartily to strengthen him for his further journey (Jg 19^{5}, cf. 1 S 28^{22}). To take payment from a guest was contrary to good manners, and hence it is a perfectly genuine touch that Josephus adds to the narrative of Gn 24, when he makes Rebekah decline Eliezer's offer to pay for his entertainment by telling him not to think they were parsimonious people (Ant. I. xvi. 2). In later times hospitality specially flourished among the Essenes, who, according to Josephus (BJ II. viii. 4), took nothing with them on a journey, as everything belonging to their co-religionists was at their command. There was even an official appointed in every city, whose duty it was to provide travelling Essenes with clothing and all other necessaries. An instance of a permanent guest-friendship is supplied by the story of Elisha and the wealthy lady of Shunem (2 K $4^{8ff.}$). In later times, under Roman and Greek influence, this practice was greatly extended. Thus we hear for instance of guest-friends in Jotapata, whose death was bewailed at Jerusalem, after the little fortress was taken by the Romans;[†] cf. also Ac 10^{6} 21^{16}. That a guest's lot, however, was not always a happy one, and that he was exposed to many disagreeable experiences, is noted by that always acute and dispassionate observer, Ben Sira (Sir $29^{21ff.}$).

ROADS AND TRAVEL (IN NT).[‡]—I. ROUTES BY LAND AND BY SEA.—i. ROME THE CENTRE OF THE EMPIRE.—The system of communication in the world of the first century after Christ was dominated and determined by one single motive, viz. to seek direct connexion with Rome, the capital and centre of the Empire and of the world. Within the bounds of the Empire, the principle of Roman Republican government had originally been to connect every subject, country, and district as closely as possible with Rome, and to keep them as much as possible disconnected from one another, so that each should look to Rome as the centre of all its interests, its trade, its finance, and its aspirations, and regard all other subjects as rivals and competitors for the favour of the governing city. Though the ideal and the ultimate aim of the Imperial government was different, and did not tend to make Rome the governor of subjects, but rather to educate and elevate the subjects to equality with Rome by a slow but steady process, yet in the first century the older idea still was practically effective to a large extent, and governed the system of communication. Hence the first point is to examine how each province of the Empire communicated with Rome.

[‡] See Table of Contents, p. 402.

Along the great arteries that led to Rome all new ideas and movements of thought and religious impulses naturally moved, without any definite purpose on the part of the originators, even perhaps in spite of their intentions in some cases. It was, as a rule, an easier and more rapid process for a new idea to spread from a distant province to Rome than to spread from that province to its neighbour, if the neighbour did not lie on the road to Rome, or was not connected with the first province by some old bond of intimacy. Hence the fact, for example, that Christianity spread very early to Rome constitutes no proof, and does not even afford a presumption, that there was any purpose or intention of carrying it thither. Such conscious, deliberate purpose can be proved only by some clear evidence of its existence, and especially by deliberate statement on the part of those who entertained the purpose.

For example, we know that the purpose of visiting Rome was distinctly expressed by St. Paul (Ac 19^{21}) several years before he was able to carry it into effect; and we can infer from the general character of his action that the purpose was in his mind, latent or perhaps expressed orally, long before the date at which he first mentions it in his extant letters. But even at that time Rome contained already a body of Christians, and St. Paul's aim was twofold—partly to extend the limits and affect the character of the Church in Rome, 'to impart unto you some spiritual gift,' and 'that I might have some fruit in you also, even as in the rest of the Gentiles' (Ro $1^{11.13}$); but still more to use Rome as a basis from which to affect the West, especially Spain, 'to be brought on my way thitherward by you' (Ro 15^{24}). Just because Rome was the centre and meeting-place of all roads, it lay on the way for any traveller or missionary going from Syria to the West: he could not go direct, but must tranship in Rome.

When one keeps this principle clearly in mind, the interpretation of Clem. Rom. i. 5 becomes evident and certain. Clement says of St. Paul that 'after he had preached in the East and in the West, he won the noble renown which was the reward of his faith, having taught righteousness unto the whole world, and having reached the furthest bounds of the West.' If Clement had caught the least spark of the Pauline and the Roman spirit and thought, he could not have called Rome (as some modern scholars maintain that he did)* 'the goal of the West' or 'his limit towards the West,' τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως; and Lightfoot has rightly expressed the general Roman point of view in that age, which looked on Rome as the centre of empire, not as its limit, nor as belonging to the Western part of the Empire.

ii. SEASONS AND ROUTES OPEN FOR TRAVELLING. — The route of communication was not always the same throughout the whole year. When the crossing of any considerable stretch of sea formed an essential part of a line of communication, the route in question was closed almost completely during a considerable part of the year. The times were stated by the ancients themselves as follows:—The sea was closed from 10 November to 10 March; but perfectly safe navigation was only between 26 May and 14 September,* while there were two doubtful periods 11 Mar.–26 May, and 15 Sept.–10 Nov., when merchants might risk sailing, but fleets of war vessels were loath to do so.

It is not the case that the closure was absolute. In case of necessity or urgency a voyage was at times attempted in the season when navigation was closed. Julius Cæsar's army crossed from Brundisium to Epirus during Nov. 49,† and Pompey's army had crossed similarly in Jan. 49.‡

Again, Claudius proposed great inducements to traders who carried corn to Italy during the winter, guaranteeing a certain rate of profit, and insuring them against loss of their vessels by storm. His proposal probably applied chiefly to the short voyages from Sardinia and Africa, in which it was possible to watch an opportunity for a less dangerous voyage even in the stormy season; but, in the long voyage from Alexandria, such waiting upon opportunities would be a much more serious matter. See Suet. Claud. 18.

When Flaccus was recalled from the government of Egypt, early in October A.D. 38, he sailed immediately, and had much stormy weather at sea; but Philo (in Flac. 13–15) gives no information as to the route. Shortly afterwards Philo and four other envoys sailed from Alexandria, in urgent need, to present a petition to Caligula: their route also is not recorded, and the length of their voyage is uncertain; but they were in Rome in the spring of A.D. 39, and had an audience there of the Emperor; and Philo refers in feeling terms to their troubles on the sea.§ In both cases we need not doubt that the ships sailed along the coast, according to the opportunities of getting on from point to point.

But only the exigencies of government service, or of urgent religious and national duty (and to the ancients national duty was necessarily a matter of religion, for patriotism was a religious idea), would cause such winter voyages. Doubtless, Philo and the other four envoys had to pay largely to induce any ship to sail after 11 November. In ordinary circumstances the regular course was to lay up at the beginning of winter and wait for spring. Thus Horace speaks (Od. iii. 7. 5) of Gyges as returning from Bithynia, but detained at Oricum in Epirus until spring returned and the Adriatic was open; and of another Roman sailor waiting (probably in Syria, Od. iv. 5. 9)[*] till spring returned and he could cross the Carpathian Sea (the sea near Rhodes).

* It is, of course, necessary for those who believe that St. Paul was put to death at the conclusion of the two years' imprisonment in which he wrote Colossians and Philemon, to force this unnatural meaning on the plain words of Clement—words which no person at that time could have misunderstood. Only aloofness from the spirit of the first century makes it possible to doubt as to the meaning.

* Secura navigatio, Vegetius, iv. 39, v. 9; statos æstivis flatibus dies et certa maris, Tacitus, Hist. iv. 81.

† Nominally, Jan. 48 in the unreformed old calendar (which was 67 days wrong in B.C. 47).

‡ Nominally, March A.D. 49. When the old calendar differed by two months from the true calendar, obviously the rules could not be calculated by the days of the existing calendar, but by the stars.

§ They sailed μέσου χειμῶνος; but this phrase cannot be pressed to mean about the winter solstice: it might mean only 'in full winter,' as distinguished from Flaccus' departure ἀρχομένου χειμῶνος in October. The Jewish envoys had every reason to hurry after him in order to present their case to Caligula. Moreover, they sailed at no great interval after Agrippa had visited Alexandria in July or early August 38 (Philo, in Flac. 16, de Leg. 28). Their voyage probably began not later than November, perhaps already in October.

This dread of storms and dislike to travel in winter was not confined to voyages by sea. Even on land there are many proofs that, where mountain ranges or high plateaus had to be crossed, as in going across Asia Minor, ordinary persons avoided winter travelling and waited till spring. Basil of Cæsarea, who speaks in Epist. 20 of a 'continuous stream of travellers' on a great route, such as that which led from Cæsarea to Athens, says that in a severe winter 'all the roads were blocked till Easter' (Epist. 198), and that 'the road to Rome is wholly impracticable in winter' (Epist. 215). His meeting with the Bishop of Iconium must be fixed 'at a season suitable for travelling' (Epist. 191); yet the road between Cæsarea and Iconium is wholly on the level, and crosses no pass or elevated ground. Even a mild winter 'was quite sufficient to keep him from travelling while it lasted' (Epist. 27). A modern traveller or missionary would traverse the roads of the plateau at any time;[†] but for ancient travellers there was a close time, during which travelling was almost entirely suspended, and no journeys were planned or thought of, except by professional travellers (Basil, Ep. 198). Vegetius (iv. 39) mentions that land travel was stopped as completely as sea travel between 10 Nov. and 10 March.

The reason lay, not simply in the snow,—although Basil speaks in Epist. 48 of 'such a heavy fall of snow that we have been buried, houses and all, beneath it,'—but quite as much in the spring rains and the extremely cold winds of early winter, which are very trying, though not likely to keep an active traveller indoors. The Taurus is in some places, however, impassable in winter except with considerable personal danger: see, e.g., the account given by Prof. Sterrett in the Wolfe Expedition to Asia Minor, p. 80. In time of heavy rain the surface of the plateau becomes, in most places, a sea of mud, though perhaps the principal Roman roads may have been well enough built in the time of St. Paul to rise above that sea.

This is a factor of considerable importance in determining the chronology of St. Paul's journeys. The broad and lofty ridge of Mount Taurus is for the most part really dangerous to cross in winter, owing to the deep snow obliterating the roads. The roads leading from Perga direct towards Ephesus, and from Tarsus through the Cilician Gates towards Lycaonia and the north and west generally, cross a lower summit height, and are actually traversable by well equipped or determined travellers through most part of the winter, except during any temporary block caused by snowstorms. But we must estimate the time of year when St. Paul would be likely to cross Taurus (Ac 13^{14} 14^{24} 16^{1} 18^{23}) according to the customs of the period.

To estimate this factor rightly, we should know the precise limits of the close season in popular usage. This is difficult. For example, towards the end of May 1882 snow was lying in all these uplands. In the crossing of the Cilician Gates during the early part of June 1902 there was a thunderstorm, accompanied by severe cold and heavy rain, almost every day. During the season when such weather was fairly probable, we can hardly believe that it was customary or usual for ordinary persons among the ancients to arrange their journeys. Basil, as quoted above, may be taken as a fair specimen of ancient views.

It is true that even in ancient times Cicero crossed Taurus by the Cilician Gates in November 51 and April 50 B.C.[*] Antigonus vainly tried to cross Taurus from Cilicia in B.C. 314, but lost many soldiers owing to the snow. His second attempt at a more favourable opportunity succeeded (Diodor. xix. 69. 2).

To take another example from later history, in the autumn of A.D. 803 the Emperor Nicephorus broke the peace, thinking that he could do so safely at that late season with the winter at hand. Nicephorus relied on the customary closed time, when the march of an army was impossible. But he was taken unawares[†] by the Caliph Harun er-Rashid, who crossed Taurus in the winter season before the end of the year (the Mohammedan year ended about 20 December in A.D. 803). Harun did not consider himself bound by the ordinary custom, and he must have passed the Cilician Gates about November or early December.[‡]

The question, however, in such a matter is not what is possible, but what is customary. Just as it was possible to cross the sea during the closed season, so it was possible to traverse the Cilician Gates in the winter by taking a favourable opportunity, and yet the winter was a closed season, when ordinary people would not attempt to cross. The ordinary traveller had not the equipment of a Roman governor, like Cicero, nor was he like such a general as Antigonus, anxious to surprise an enemy, and willing to risk the lives of his soldiers in the attempt. Yet even Antigonus must wait a favourable opportunity.

Although the exact limits of the travelling season must remain uncertain, yet probably the ordinary custom of the sea ruled also on land. If there was any difference, it would naturally be that on land the closed season began and ended a little later than on sea. All travel across the mountains was avoided between the latter part of November and the latter part of March; and ordinary travellers, not forced by official duties, but free to choose their own time, would avoid the crossing between October (an extremely wet month on the plateau) and May.

iii. VARIATIONS IN THE ROUTES AT DIFFERENT SEASONS.—Where a long sea passage was involved, it does not follow that the route from the province to Rome was the same as the return from Rome to the province. The winds which favoured the voyage from Rome might prohibit the return voyage, or vice versâ. We shall see one such case below: in summer the winds favoured a quick voyage from Italy to Alexandria, but seriously hindered the return voyage. In general, the path from Rome to the East followed a different line from the path which led from the East to Rome; and an envoy from the East would go to Rome by one path and return by another.

Both these causes contributed to complicate the communications between the province of Syria (including Palestine) and Rome. There were four lines of communication: (1) by sea to or from Puteoli on the Gulf of Naples, and by land between Puteoli and Rome; (2) by sea to Corinth, and thence to Brundisium, and by land between Brundisium and Rome; (3) by land to Ephesus, thence by sea to Corinth, etc., as in the preceding route; (4) the land route across Asia Minor, and, after crossing to Europe, along the Egnatian Way to Dyrrachium, and thence across the Adriatic Sea to Brundisium.

[*] In the incorrect calendar current at that time (which varied sixty-seven days from the true calendar in B.C. 47) he started north from Tarsus on 5 January, and reached Tarsus on his return journey on 5 June. But, according to the true calendar, he evidently avoided the most snowy season in Taurus.

[†] Weil, Gesch. der Khalifen, ii. p. 159.

[‡] The other road, by Germanicia, which the Arabs often employed, seems never to have been used by Harun, and would be more unsuitable for a winter expedition.

The first-named was the great route, preferred by trade and by travellers who desired to make a rapid journey eastward from Italy. It was closely connected with the Egyptian communication with Rome; and in fact it was the splendid and regular service of ships between Alexandria and Puteoli that made this route so important and so rapid. We shall therefore describe the Alexandrian service at this point. The Syrian service connected itself with the Alexandrian as it best could, and used the latter as much as possible. The excellence of the Alexandrian service was due to the fact that Egypt was the mainstay of the Imperial corn supply for feeding the gigantic city of Rome. When one considers the vast population of Rome (probably not very much under a million), the smallness of the Italian harvest (for Italy was naturally far more productive of wine, oil, and fruits than of grain; and Italian wheat could no longer be grown at a profit in competition with sea-borne grain), and the fact that scarcity in Rome meant discontent, mutiny, and probably revolution after the murder of the Emperor who had let the corn supply fail, it becomes obvious that the maintenance of a steady and trustworthy service between Rome and the principal corn-producing countries was an Imperial concern of the very first importance. With the defective means of commerce and transport then available, private enterprise was quite incapable of feeding the great population of Rome; the corn supply was a most important department of the Imperial administration; and, in particular, the long transport from Egypt was mainly performed by a fleet in the Imperial service. Transport from the other chief producing countries—Sicily, Sardinia, and Africa—was easier, and private enterprise had probably greater scope there; but the Egyptian corn was the greatest source of supply for Rome.

Of course it is not to be supposed that there was no private trade between Puteoli and Egypt; on the contrary, there was doubtless a good deal. But the corn trade seems to have been an Imperial business, carried in Imperial ships (III. § ix.). Egypt was kept far more closely under the immediate Imperial administration than any other part of the Empire, and practically the whole supply available for exportation was marked for the Roman service and managed by the Emperor's own private representatives. No great Roman nobles were allowed even to set foot in Egypt, except on rare occasions by special permission. The land of Egypt was managed as a sort of great private appanage of the reigning Emperor. In a few cases we read of corn from Alexandria being brought to other cities of the Empire; but this was in case of famine, and must have required the special grace of the Emperor, to relieve the distressed population of one of his towns.

iv. VOYAGE FROM ROME TO EGYPT DIRECT AND THENCE TO PALESTINE.—Communication from Puteoli to Alexandria was maintained direct across sea. The prevalent summer wind in the east Mediterranean waters was westerly; and the ships ran in a direct course from the south of Italy to the Egyptian coast, keeping at the outset well out south from the Italian coast, in order to avoid the land winds and to get into the steady Mediterranean currents of air.

The pilots or sailing-masters had acquired great skill in these long voyages, and could make their harbour with almost unerring accuracy: they are compared by Philo to skilful charioteers driving their teams of horses. Such a service required also careful study of the seasons and the winds. Experience showed that there were seasons when the winds could be reckoned upon with confidence, and others when the long voyage was unsafe or impossible. The important period to notice is that of the Etesian winds; and it is doubtful whether the direct voyage was hazarded (as a rule) except when they were blowing. In the year A.D. 38, when Agrippa was eager to go quickly from Rome to occupy his kingdom in northern Palestine, he was advised to wait for the Etesian winds, and then sail direct to Alexandria and thence cross to Palestine. He reached Alexandria in a few days,[*] arriving apparently early in August. This passage of Philo (in Flac. 5) is extremely important for the system of communication with Syria and Egypt.

In the open Mediterranean Sea and the Levant the Etesian winds are said to have blown from the north-west steadily for forty days after 20 July (or thirty days from 1 August); and at this season it was difficult for news from the East to reach Rome (Tac. Hist. ii. 98); and the Etesian winds prevented a voyage from Alexandria to Italy (Cæsar, de Bell. Civ. iii. 107),[†] or from Rhodes to Athens (Cicero, ad Att. vi. 7). They began to blow each day towards noon, but never earlier in the morning. There is much difference among the ancients as to the direction and duration of the Etesian winds; but the diversity is due doubtless to the facts that (1) they vary in different seas, (2) any regularly recurring time of fairly steady wind was Etesian (i.e. annual).

The statements as to the Etesian winds drawn from the ancient writers (see the quotations in Facciolati and Forcellini's Lexicon) are entirely confirmed by modern meteorological experience, except that 'the north-west winds prevail in the summer months' generally, and not exclusively during the forty days from July 20. These winds prevail in that season 'throughout the whole of the Mediterranean, but mostly in the eastern half.' In fact it is probable that, to the sailors of the Alexandrian Roman fleets, the Etesian winds meant simply the summer winds, and roughly corresponded to the period of open sea from the end of May to the middle of September. The statements restricting the number of days during which the winds blow are probably taken from Greek writers who were speaking more of the Ægean Sea.[‡]

But Agrippa had to wait some little time for a ship. The delay is explained by Philo as due to waiting on the winds; but in all probability this is not quite a complete account. It was necessary also to wait until a fleet of ships was ready. Single vessels did not venture on the long sea course.

The reason why the long voyage was made by a whole fleet in company was, doubtless, safety. One ship could aid another. There is, of course, a good deal of exaggeration in Philo's account of the certainty with which the ships reached their goal. A single ship could not be certain of making directly the harbour of Alexandria after being six or eight days out of sight of land; and might easily miss Egypt altogether and sight Cyrene on the one hand or Syria on the other. But with a large fleet sailing with a widely extended front, the ships keeping within signalling distance of one another, the experience of one would guide the others; when the ship on the extreme right came in sight of the Cyrenaic or Egyptian coast, it would signal accordingly, and the news would spread to the extreme left immediately; or if, on the other hand, after having run far enough, the ship on the right had not sighted any land, or that on the left of the fleet had sighted Crete,[*] this would show that all had taken too northerly a course; and sailing directions would be signalled over the whole fleet.

[*] The expression ὀλίγαις ἡμέραις must not be pressed too closely; it is opposed to the long coasting passage (see p. 379^{b}), and probably indicates a period of 15 to 20 days: see below.

[†] Here the Etesian winds are spoken of as blowing in early October; but this is due to the disorder of the Roman calendar. Cæsar reached Alexandria on 3 Oct.; but this date was really equivalent to late July or early August.

[‡] See the excellent discussion, with quotations from modern experience at sea, in James Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, pp. 64, 76 ff.

Similarly, the westward-going vessels tried to sail in a body, as we see from Seneca, Epist. Mor. 77, 1. But exceptions occurred on this route, if vessels were belated and obliged to make the voyage alone (as in Ac 27^{6} 28^{11}).

It is not to be supposed that all the corn vessels sailed in one single fleet at the same time. There could not possibly be facilities for loading nearly all the vessels simultaneously; and it would have been an absurdly wasteful method for the first to wait until the last were loaded. Beyond a doubt, there must have been several successive companies, which sailed together: when a certain number were ready they would start. Moreover, it is known that even single corn ships were occasionally engaged on a voyage, as we have seen in the preceding paragraph. A dedicatory inscription, erected by the master of a corn ship which was evidently wintering in the harbour of Phœnix, is quoted by James Smith (Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, p. 261; also in CIL iii. 3).

It cannot be supposed that a passage on government vessels was allowed to every one, any more than that the Imperial postal service by land was open to every one. In the latter case it is known that no one could use the Imperial service without a diploma signed by the Emperor (who made a rule of entrusting a certain number of diplomata to governors of provinces, which the governors gave to persons travelling on public service, and to some others in exceptional circumstances).[†] But, naturally, officers on government service, like the centurion in Ac 27^{9-11}, took advantage of an Imperial corn ship with full authority; and it is evident from the language of Ac 27^{11} that in such a case the centurion was in supreme command of the vessel as the highest officer of the Imperial service on board, and, after consulting with the sailing-master and the captain and with any other persons whom he chose, settled how far the ship was to go and when it was to be laid up for the winter (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 324).

As regards the time which news from Rome took to reach Egypt, a much exaggerated idea of the speed of communication has been propagated by Friedländer (Sittengeschichte Roms, ii. p. 31), and has been incautiously quoted from him as the foundation of their argument by many modern scholars.[‡] This distinguished scholar infers from Pliny and Diodorus that ships frequently sailed from the Sea of Azoff to Alexandria in fourteen days, and from Rhodes to Alexandria in four; and that on a fortunate voyage a ship could reach Marseilles in twenty days from Alexandria, and Alexandria in seven days from Utica or in nine days from Puteoli (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xix. 1; Diodor. iii. 34: see also below, § vi.).

These, if correctly recorded, must have been quite exceptional voyages, and cannot be used as examples of ordinary life.

But when Agrippa sailed from Puteoli, as above described, in A.D. 38 (probably in July, possibly as early as June),[*] he reached Alexandria in a few days (ὀλίγαις ὕστερον ἡμέραις, Philo, in Flac. 5), before any news of his elevation had reached the East. This seems to imply a very short voyage; but Philo is of course speaking comparatively, and we need not suppose that he means less than ten days, but rather even a little more than ten. Still this seems to be a case in which the time from Rome to Alexandria can hardly have exceeded twenty days. With this as a standard, it must be inferred that in the open season it would be a tedious and unfortunate voyage which failed to bring passengers and news from Rome to Alexandria under twenty-five days.

The speed with which the news of a grave Imperial event like the death or accession of an Emperor reached the provinces would be the test of extremest ordinary speed. There can be no doubt both that such news would be carried by quick special messengers faster than ordinary travellers would go, and that the State messengers would travel at a fairly uniform speed (except so far as winds or storms favoured or prevented them). Yet the statistics collected by Wilcken (Griech. Ostraka, i. p. 799 ff.) vary in a very perplexing way. But this variation is more in appearance than in reality. Setting aside mere examples of the ignorance in small villages or remote towns of events at Rome,[†] we find that probably sixty to sixty-five days was an ordinary period for news of such great events to penetrate from Rome to Egypt. A good example is afforded at the accession of Pertinax (1 Jan. A.D. 193): the prefect of Egypt issued at Alexandria instructions with regard to the celebration of that important event (ἐπὶ τῇ εὐτυχεστάτῃ βασιλ(ε)ίᾳ).[‡] It cannot be supposed that any time was lost in such a case. The instructions are dated 6 March, and the news is not likely to have been then more than a day old. At that season, therefore, in the slowest and most difficult time for travelling, the news travelled from Rome to Alexandria in sixty-four days. The route by which messages of this kind were transmitted will be considered hereafter: see below, §§ ix. xii.

But, on the other hand, there are cases of much more rapid transmission; as, for example, the accession of Galba was known officially in Alexandria within twenty-seven days.[§] This speed, however, was due to the fact that Galba was proclaimed on 9 June, and at that season news would come by the direct sea route from Puteoli to Egypt, whereas the clearest examples of news of such events taking about sixty days to arrive in Egypt belong to the winter or spring. We have seen that the direct sea route to Alexandria was hardly ventured upon except between 27 May and 15 September.

v. VOYAGE FROM ALEXANDRIA TO ROME.—The voyage from Alexandria to Rome was a much more difficult and tedious matter than the voyage from Rome to Alexandria, owing to the prevalence during summer of westerly winds in the

---

[*] This must have been common, for the lofty Cretan mountains are visible far out at sea; probably it may have been the usual intention to get bearings by sighting Crete.

[†] Pliny apologized to Trajan for permitting his own wife to use the public service with a diploma in a case of pressing haste.

[‡] So, for example, von Rohden in Pauly-Wissowa (Realencycl. i. 2, p. 2621), and against him Wilcken (Griech. Ostraka, i. p. 799).

[*] Ships ready to sail from Puteoli in June must doubtless have started from Alexandria in the previous year (like St. Paul's ships); those which started from Alexandria at the very beginning of the open season would not be able to sail from Puteoli till the end of July. See below, § vi.

[†] Mere carelessness must also be allowed for in remote places: thus Nero's death was matter of current knowledge in Elephantine within fifty-seven days; and yet on the fifty-eighth day a document was dated in Thebes by his reign (though Thebes must have received the news before Elephantine). Again, in (villages of the city) Arsinoë the accession of Pertinax (1 January) was currently known on 19 May, but ignored on 2 June: it was known in the Fayum before 1 April. Wilcken (loc. cit.) also gives examples of an Emperor ignored in common documents five or even eight months after his accession.

[‡] Berl. Gr. Urkunden, No. 646, Wilcken, l.c. p. 802.

Mediterranean. The ships had to help themselves by the uncertain and fitful breezes on the coasts. Now it was unsafe to keep too southerly a course owing to the great quicksands, Syrtes, on the African coast: even if the winds permitted, ships could not venture from Alexandria on a course which would keep them near the Cyrenaic shore lest the wind might shift round towards the north and drive them too far south (Ac 27^{17}). They were compelled to take a northerly course, keeping as much to the west of north as the wind would allow. Thus they might fetch the Lycian coast, or, in very favourable circumstances, possibly ships might even make the Rhodian or Cretan coast; but it may be regarded as absolutely certain that they could never attempt a course across sea from the Egyptian coast direct to Italy or Sicily. Rather they would make for the south-east end of Crete—at the best—though with the prevailing west or north-west winds such a course could rarely have been sailed. In ordinary circumstances, the usual aim of ships from Alexandria undoubtedly was to reach the Lycian coast, keeping west of Cape Akamas in Cyprus; but sometimes they made too much leeway, and failed to clear the western point of Cyprus. In the former case the harbour of Myra was, apparently, the usual point to which ships ran (Ac 21^{2}). In the latter case ships seem to have run for the Syrian coast, perhaps because the south coast of Cyprus was dangerous from its shallow and harbourless character. Examples of voyages northwards from Alexandria are given below: on the voyage south from Rhodes to Alexandria, see p. 382^{b}.

After reaching some point on the south coast of Asia Minor the westward-bound ship was obliged to work along the coast from point to point, taking advantage of the land breezes. Dion Chrysostom in his second Oration at Tarsus speaks of the fitful and uncertain character of those breezes, comparing to them the policy of a city governed for brief periods by a succession of magistrates.[*] Not a moment could safely be lost in taking advantage of such a breeze, lest it should fall again, or change its direction, before the ship got past the promontory ahead. The progress along the coast in this part of the voyage was necessarily slow, and sometimes exceedingly tedious. St. Paul's ship took fifteen days from Cæsarea to Myra (Ac 27^{5} [Western text]).

This part of the voyage frequently ended with the harbour of Rhodes. Vespasian touched at Rhodes on his voyage from Alexandria to Rome in A.D. 70.[†] So did Philotimus on his way from Cæsar in the East to Cicero at Brundisium in July, B.C. 47 (see footnote on p. 387^{a}). Herod the Great sailed in winter from Alexandria by the Pamphylian coast and Rhodes to Rome by way of Brundisium in B.C. 40, and in B.C. 14 touched at Rhodes on his voyage from Cæsarea to the Black Sea,[‡] as did St. Paul when making the reverse voyage (Ac 21^{1}).

Gregory of Nazianzus in the 4th cent. sailed from Alexandria to Greece, keeping under (i.e. south and west of) Cyprus, and reached Rhodes apparently on the twentieth day (Carm. de vita sua, 128 ff.; de rebus suis, 312; Or. xviii. 31).

The ship on which St. Paul sailed for Rome is not stated to have touched at Rhodes, and the expression that it came over against Cnidus (Ac 27^{7}) suggests that it kept north of Rhodes as if intending to cross among the Cyclades to Malea. Lucian's Ship, also, sailed north of Rhodes.

After reaching the south-western extremity of Asia Minor the ships ran down to the eastern promontory of Crete, Salmone, and proceeded to work along its south coast in the same way as before (Ac $27^{7.13}$). This was the safe course, in preference to the north side of Crete, because there, if a north wind came sweeping down the Ægean, the ship would be in danger of being driven on the coast, which has few harbours.[*] On the south coast there was not the same danger of running ashore, partly because the harbours were more numerous, and still more because the south winds in this sea are much more gentle, as a rule, than the north winds.[†]

Only one piece of evidence (see below) known to the present writer describes the voyage between Crete and the Italian coast. But the course of such a voyage is indubitable: the ships would take an opportunity of running for the south point of Cythera, and thence off Zakynthos and across the mouth of the Adriatic to the south coast of Italy, usually to Hydruntum (Itin. Mar. p. 489). They would not shrink from running direct to Italy if the wind at any moment were from the north. An ancient fleet could safely run from Cythera or Zakynthos for the wide angle between Italy and Sicily; the ships on the wings would guide the whole fleet by signal.

The evidence of Lucian in the beginning of his dialogue, Navigium, is clear: the corn ships in ordinary course sailed across from the south-west of Crete to sight Cythera;[‡] but they sometimes missed their course under the influence of southerly winds and got into the Ægean Sea.

There is not in the Ægean or the Adriatic the same prevalence of westerly winds in summer as in the Levant and the open stretch of the Mediterranean. Northerly and southerly winds are more characteristic of those seas; and therefore this part of the voyage would in general be much more easily accomplished than the preceding part. Hence in a favourable voyage the runs from Alexandria to Myra, and from Crete to Rhegium and thence to Puteoli, would not be slow; but, even at the best, a considerable time would necessarily be spent on the coasting voyage from Myra to the west end of Crete.

It is noteworthy that this wide stretch of sea between Crete and Italy, being affected by the prevalent winds of the Adriatic, was called by the sailors Adria (Ac 27^{27}). We note also that westward-bound ships kept well to the north in this part of the sea to catch the Adriatic winds, while eastward-bound ships must have kept more to the south in order to profit by the general Mediterranean current of air setting for the Syrian coasts and the hot deserts behind them (see § iv).

On the other hand, in unfavourable times, if the ship failed to clear Akamas, or did not get suitable winds west of Crete, all three parts of the voyage might be tedious. The scene in which Lucian's dialogue, Navigium, is laid is most probably taken from a real event. The ship failed to clear the point of Akamas on the seventh day from Alexandria, and, after being driven to Ẓidon, and on the tenth day from Ẓidon[§] reaching the Chelidonian Islands (east of Myra), it met a storm, narrowly escaped sinking, and thereafter had a run of bad luck south of Crete, and was finally driven by southerly winds into the Ægean, and had to put into the Piræus after a voyage of 70 days.

[‡] ἔδει τὴν Κρήτην δεξιὰν λαβόντας, ὑπὲρ τὸν Μαλέα πλεύσαντας, ἤδη (i.e. before the seventieth day from Alexandria) εἶναι ἐν Ἰταλίᾳ. A glance at the map shows with perfect certainty how this must be interpreted.

[§] The exact course is mentioned: the ship sailed through the Aulon or channel between Cyprus and the Cilician-Pamphylian coast, the same course as St. Paul's ship took. That course was necessarily and invariably followed by westward-bound ships from the Syrian harbours.

vi. TIME BETWEEN ALEXANDRIA AND ROME.—From this voyage, as described by Lucian, combined with the statement in Ac 27^{5}, that St. Paul's ship reached Myra on the fifteenth day from Cæsarea, we can state with very considerable accuracy the fair time to Myra from Alexandria as nine days, and from Zidon as twelve to thirteen. Now two days was ample time from the Straits of Messina to Puteoli (Ac 28^{13}), when the wind favoured; and ten to twelve days must be allowed from Crete to the Straits. This leaves thirteen to eighteen days for the coasting voyage from Myra to the west extremity of Crete, in the passage described in the next paragraph as a favourable one. Gregory of Nazianzus took twenty days to Rhodes (say ten to Myra, and ten from Myra to Rhodes); this is a little slower.

Examples of the average length of passage from Alexandria to Rome are difficult to get, as most of those which are mentioned are exceptional and tedious voyages. But the following may be taken as probably a fair average voyage in the best season. No. 27 of the Berlin Greek Papyri is a letter written from Rome on 2 August, towards the end of the 2nd cent., by a sailor or officer on an Alexandrian ship. He mentions that he 'came to land' on 30 June, finished unloading on 12 July (perhaps in Puteoli),* and reached Rome on 19 July. Now the ship cannot be supposed to have left Alexandria long before 26 May, for the statement of Vegetius about the period when the sea was fully open was almost certainly inspired by the rules for the Alexandrian corn ships. If the ship in question sailed in the first fleet it would probably be ready to start on the first day of open sea, and the voyage would have occupied thirty-six days. But, further, the ships would probably be ready to take advantage of a favourable opportunity some days before the 26th, for it cannot be supposed that the day was fixed with absolute precision (Ac 28^{11}). The voyage in this case, therefore, may be taken as lasting probably about forty days; and we must understand that it was a favourable passage. In this argument we have assumed that the ship arrived as one of a fleet and not as a single stray ship; but it may fairly be assumed that stray ships came in at unusual times, very early or late, and that a ship reaching Puteoli on 30 June was sailing in the ordinary course. Probably this was near the ordinary time for the first fleet of the year to arrive, as described by Seneca (Epist. Mor. 77, 1), in a year when the voyage was very good. As a rule, vessels with a heavy cargo like corn did not unload at Puteoli, but went on thence to Ostia, whereas valuable cargo was discharged at Puteoli and carried to Rome by land.

On the other hand, Lucian, in the passage quoted above, says that the ship which he describes, at the time when it was forced to put into the Piræus by stress of weather on the seventieth day from Alexandria, ought in ordinary course to have been already in its harbour in Italy if it had not been driven astray into the Ægean Sea.† This seems to imply that the voyage to Italy just mentioned was an unusually quick one. Had forty days been about the usual length, Lucian would naturally have said that his Ship should have been already for a long time in an Italian harbour on the seventieth day.

Accordingly, we conclude that, when not detained unduly, fifty days was a more common length of passage from Alexandria to Rome. It would be roughly divided thus—

6 days to Akamas in Cyprus.
3 ,, ,, Myra.
10 ,, ,, Rhodes (Gregory's time).
15 ,, ,, west end of Crete.
13 ,, ,, the Straits.
1 day in the Straits.
2 days to Puteoli.

When a ship was delayed beyond sixty or seventy days the passage would begin to be considered an unfortunate one; but no anxiety would be felt, for it must often have been the case that ships were carried far from their course,* and detained even till the following year. Phœnix, in the south-west of Crete, was evidently a common harbour for laggard ships to spend the winter in (Ac 27^{12}; also p. 379^{a}): it was convenient as being near to the west end of the island, so that ships could there be on the outlook for promise of a fair passage across the wide sea to Cythera and Italy.

There can hardly be any doubt (though no proof formally exists or could be expected) that the remarkably early Christianization of Crete was due to the ships from Alexandria and Syria having occasionally to winter there. Such a result was natural when crew and passengers were doomed to remain for some months in harbour. On the other hand, the many voyages along the coasts of Pamphylia and Lycia appear to have produced little or no effect, for those provinces seem to have been less affected by Christianity in the early centuries than any other part of Asia Minor. The reason, doubtless, was that passengers in ships on the coasting voyage could never count on an hour's delay. The fitful land winds might change or begin or end at any time, and the passenger was bound to the ship.† Only those who have had the experience can realize how absolutely prohibitive this uncertainty is as regards any intercourse with the country along which the coasting voyage leads. Pamphylia or Lycia could not be Christianized in the same way as Crete, but only by deliberate and intentional missionary effort such as that of Ac 12^{13}.

vii. VOYAGES TO ASIA, THE ÆGEAN AND EUXINE SEAS, PALESTINE AND EGYPT.—During the rest of the year, except the open season, the voyage to Egypt was made by way of the coasts of Asia Minor and Syria—the same route that war vessels would take even in the very height of summer. Caligula intended to sail by that course, viâ Brundisium, when he thought of going to Egypt. This was the more luxurious though the slower route, as he could rest quietly on land every night (Philo, de Leg. 33, cf. in Flac. 5).

Smaller vessels or ships of war never ventured on such long sea courses as were needed in the voyages hitherto described, but kept closer to the shore. Only the large, heavily-built merchant vessels were suited for such a voyage (Philo, de Leg. 33); they alone had sufficient spread of canvas, or strength of build, or storage room, to go a long voyage and remain out of sight of land for a number of days. The war ships were slighter in construction, moved in a more agile way, and were not dependent on the wind or able to make such use of the wind, for they trusted chiefly to oars.

* If we assume that he started as soon as unloading was finished, Puteoli would be certain. The Berlin editor gives μηδὲν ἀναπολελύσθαι: read μηδέναν ἀπολ., 'that none of the corn-traders has got leave to depart.'

† It would appear probable that this ship, which sighted Akamas on the seventh day from Alexandria, was on the extreme right of the fleet. It would signal the others, but was itself too far east to be able to clear the promontory.

* Lucian's Ship carried to the Piræus; two to Malta, Ac $28^{1.11}$.

† Cf. Dion Chrysostom as quoted on p. 380^{a}, note *.

The voyages made by the south coast of Asia Minor are naturally similar in many respects to voyages between Rome and the ports of the Ægean Sea or the Euxine. These also may therefore be suitably noticed at this point. Puteoli was the chief harbour of this trade in the Roman Republican times and the first century after Christ. When Delos was the great centre and market of the Ægean, before the massacre of Roman traders by Mithridates in B.C. 88, Puteoli was called Lesser Delos.* When Delos was destroyed, no other harbour of the Ægean was heir to its greatness, and Puteoli became more important than ever. It was crowded with traders and settlers from all the Eastern lands and harbours. These brought their religion with them; and Puteolanian inscriptions reveal a mingled, strange picture of foreign deities, cults, and societies and traders (see the interesting article by M. Dubois on 'Cultes et Dieux à Pouzzoles' in Mélanges d'Histoire et d'Archéologie, 1902, p. 23).

From Puteoli thus started, and to it came in, a vast body of trade. After the completion of the great works by which Trajan improved the harbour, Portus Augusti, at the mouth of the Tiber, which Claudius had planned and in part made, that port supplanted Puteoli to a considerable extent as the emporium of the Eastern trade. But in New Testament times it claimed most of that trade, though some part (especially the heaviest goods) always went direct to Ostia without breaking bulk at Puteoli.

All ships trading between one or other of these harbours and any part of the East passed through the Straits of Messina. Beyond that, there were the three lines—one keeping well south to seek Alexandria, one keeping as near the line to Cythera as was possible, but often tending northwards towards Zacynthos. The ships from and to the Ægean kept north of Cythera, rounding Cape Malea. Trading vessels coming from Egypt and Syria kept south of Cythera: as to those which were going to Egypt or Syria, it is probable that they kept north of Cythera and through among the Cyclades: such at least was Jerome's course—see the end of this section. Doubtless, war vessels and small trading ships always kept north of Cythera, and crept on from harbour to harbour and island to island. Thus a very large number of vessels must constantly have been passing and repassing through the southern Greek waters.

There can be no doubt that all, or almost all, heavy merchandise travelled by this route between Rome and the Ægean or Black Sea harbours. The alternative route by Corinth required transhipment and transportation across the Isthmus of Corinth, which would have seriously added to the cost of freight. In earlier times, when Cape Malea was an object of dread to sailors in small ships, the trouble of the Isthmus crossing might be incurred in carrying goods, but the Roman merchant ships seem to have lost the old dread: on a gravestone at Hierapolis in Phrygia we read that a certain Zeuxis had rounded Cape Malea seventy-two times. Though Nero revived the old scheme of a ship canal through the Isthmus, he was probably impelled more by the tradition than by any real apprehension felt in his own time; and the canal would not produce any great saving in hours of voyage except to ships from (and to) the Adriatic, or Epirus, or Acarnania. These facts, or the disturbed state of the Empire soon after, caused the scheme to be abandoned; and there was no good reason to bring about its resumption by a later Emperor, though Herodes Atticus talked about it.

Ephesus was the great harbour of the Asian produce, though Smyrna vied with it; and other harbours also were used, such as Miletus, Caunos, etc. But most ships seem to have put in at Ephesus, even though bound to other ports; and it became a custom for the Roman governors of Asia to land first there. This custom was finally recognized and made compulsory by a formal enactment of the Emperor Antoninus Pius. The enactment probably sprang from some complaint on the part of the great rival cities, Smyrna and Pergamus; and the Imperial rescript marked and confirmed the recognition (perhaps originating from Hadrian) of Ephesus as the capital of Asia. Ephesus was de facto the capital of the province long before it was formally recognized as such by the Imperial law.*

Passengers, also, as well as goods went sometimes by this route to the Asian coast. Pliny the younger went in this way in August A.D. 111 to Ephesus, and experienced contrary winds. There he changed ship, and went on northwards in small coasting vessels to his Bithynian province.

Trade with the Black Sea harbours followed the same route as far as Ephesus, and then went on through the Hellespont and the Thracian Bosporus. At Ephesus it met the line of ships trading between the north Ægean or Euxine harbours and Syria or Egypt. This latter line of ships was now far less important than it had been under the Greek kings in the last centuries B.C., when Canon Hicks thinks it safe to assert that daily ships ran on the line.† The causes stated above prevented such trade on any great scale between the provinces of the Empire. Still there was an appreciable trade, and Diodorus (iii. 34) gives a statement of the length of voyage from the Sea of Azoff to Crete and Egypt (which, as we saw reason to think, conveys a very exaggerated idea of the swiftness of the voyage).‡

From this passage of Diodorus it is clear that the long over-sea voyage to Alexandria was made direct from Rhodes: with a westerly or north-westerly wind that was the natural line, and not any longer than the run from the Lycian coast. With a west wind the ancient ships could hardly have reached Alexandria from Lycia on a direct course; now the object was to make Alexandria on a straight run. Thus we see that there were three long lines common in the Levant voyages: (1) from Rhodes to Alexandria; (2) from Alexandria past Akamas towards Myra, though the latter part of this voyage could not have been made on a straight course; (3) from Myra or Patara to one of the Syrian harbours, as in Ac 21.

It is impossible that ancient ships ordinarily sailed from the Sea of Azoff to Crete in ten days. A voyage from Crete to Alexandria in four days is more credible, because ships could often have a continuous run with a steady breeze, and a lucky voyage might reach Alexandria in four days. But there is a great variety inevitable in the former part of the voyage—changes of direction, changes of wind, passing from sea to sea, and through the long narrow passages of the Bosporus and Dardanelles. Finally, the statement that ten days was the time from Alexandria up the Nile to Ethiopia is entirely inconsistent with the tendency of all the evidence that Wilcken has collected as to the length of time needed for even great Imperial events to become known in Upper Egypt (even though in many cases the indifference and carelessness of the peasants may account for their ignorance).

In an admirable excursus to his posthumously published Commentary on First Peter, Dr. Hort traces the course of the messenger who carried that letter from Rome to a harbour on the south coast of the Black Sea: he considers that Sinope was the harbour, but Amastris seems more probable. Sinope was no longer so important a harbour under the Romans as it had been in older times: Amastris surpassed it, and bore the title Metropolis Ponti. Moreover, if the messenger had landed at Sinope, he would naturally have visited Cappadocia before Galatia, whereas Dr. Hort has rightly argued that the strange order of enumeration of the provinces is due to the order of the messenger's journey. He landed at Amastris, visited Pontus first, then passed through North Galatia to Cæsarea and perhaps Tyana, and thence through South Galatia to Asia, and finally reached Bithynia.

‡ Diodorus is more probably speaking of ships in his own time than quoting from some Greek account of older voyages.

It may be added to Dr. Hort's examination of the facts, that the journey in its eastern part probably corresponds to the actual order in which Christianity spread; that is to say, the new religion was carried by ship to the Bithynian and Pontic harbours, and thence spread south into the northern and north-eastern regions of the province Galatia, including inner Pontus* and the north of Cappadocia. Thus we find that this new thought and teaching, 'floating free on the currents of communication across the Empire,' spread first directly along the great tracks that led to Rome, as every free and natural movement of thought necessarily did owing to the circumstances of that period, and from that centre was redirected to the outlying parts of the Empire. As Christianity spread from Syria and Cilicia through the Cilician Gates, it did not radiate out west and north and north-east, but passed along the great route that led by Ephesus, Corinth, and the sea-way, or by Troas and Philippi and the overland way, to Italy.

It is extremely difficult to get even an approximate idea of the time required on these courses between Rome and the various eastern provinces. There was no rule possible in this case, such as we could determine roughly in the direct Alexandrian passages, and as we shall be able to determine more accurately in the overland postal route (see § ix.). The ships generally were merchant vessels, liable to minor variations in their course according to the conditions of the carrying trade, and sometimes waiting in harbours for some time to unload or take in fresh cargo, as in Ac 20. Thus their voyages were evidently slow, as a rule. Probably they were generally much smaller than the Alexandrian ships, and some would not venture to do more than make short runs from harbour to harbour or point to point, in the ancient Greek fashion: the last class of vessels had more reason to dread Malea than the better built traders. Even war vessels, which were comparatively independent of winds, evidently required much longer time for the eastern voyage than the large Alexandrian trading vessels.

Statistics as to the time which despatches during the Republican period, or private letters under the Empire, required to reach a distant destination on this course, are of little value as indications of the rate of travel: there was no regular postal service, and the letter-carriers were liable to many delays and interruptions. Hence the recorded facts vary widely. Friedländer (p. 31) quotes two cases of letters from Syria addressed to Cicero in Rome: one, dated 31 Dec., took over a hundred days in delivery; the other, dated 7 May, hardly over fifty:* presumably the latter was carried straight through, while the other was carried by a messenger who was detained on the way. The slow letter was sent during the worst season of the year, the quick letter during the best; but in the case of land travelling (if either went in that way), the season ought not to make any serious difference. Both were sent by men of high standing, who could command all the resources of the State for quick transmission; but the period was disturbed, and the machinery of government was dislocated and liable to stoppages. The quick letter travelled at much the same rate as the Imperial postal service organized by Augustus (see below, § ix.), taking only a few days more than Imperial despatches probably required. The slow letter perhaps went by ship.

A business letter written in Puteoli on 23 July, A.D. 174, was delivered in Tyre a hundred and seven days later,† though it was sent in the most favourable season for sailing. This letter would not be transmitted by the Imperial service, but by private agents, travelling doubtless by ship. It could hardly have been sent by one of the large ships running direct to Alexandria, but was more probably sent on a trading vessel which went by Cape Malea and the Asian coast, and probably spent time in various harbours. St. Jerome sailed in August from Portus Augusti, by Malea, through the Cyclades, by the Asian coasts and Cyprus to Syrian Antioch, whence he went on to Jerusalem, which he reached in winter;‡ this voyage was made along the same route by which the letter to Tyre travelled, but seems to have been quicker.

With similar variation in speed, letters from Rome in Cicero's time reached Athens—in one case arriving on 14 October in twenty-one days, in another case in forty-six days during July and August:§ the former is mentioned as showing great activity on the part of the messenger; the latter, though so slow, came in the most settled season of the year.

viii. OVERLAND ROUTE AND IMPERIAL POST-ROAD FROM ROME TO THE EAST.—While passengers to and from Egypt or Syria seem frequently to have travelled along the coasts of Asia Minor and Crete, it is not probable that the Imperial despatches and news went regularly by that route, which was uncertain and (at least during a considerable part of the year) liable to great variation in time. The fast sea passage (see § iii.) was of course preferred during the open season; but it may be regarded as probable that during the rest of the year the Imperial service to the eastern provinces was conducted by the overland route through Macedonia and Thrace. Only in this way could that regularity of communication which was important for administrative purposes be attained. For those purposes reasonable certainty as to when instructions would be received was in many cases even more important than the chance of the messages being delivered more quickly; and, where speed was important, it was always possible to send a special messenger in addition by the route which offered the chance of more rapid delivery. Hence even Syria and Egypt probably communicated regularly with Rome by the overland route during the stormy and the doubtful seasons of the year.

Hudemann (Geschichte des röm. Postwesens, p. 163 f.) and other writers have rightly maintained that ships were used only as a subsidiary and occasional method of communication for Imperial purposes, and not as a regular and permanent part of the postal system, at least under the early Empire; but under Hadrian a procurator (procurator pugillationis et ad naves vagas) was stationed at Ostia (or Portus Augusti), possibly to regulate the transmission of despatches by occasional or special ships (CIL xiv. 2045).*

* See the article PONTUS in vol. iv., where emphasis is laid on the important, but often neglected, distinction between Provincia Pontus on the coast (which was united with Bithynia) and mediterraneus Pontus (a kingdom at first, in Prov. Galatia till about 106, thereafter in Prov. Cappadocia).

* Cicero, ad Fam. xii. 10. 2 (false number in Friedländer, p. 31, note), ad Att. xiv. 9.

† The case is quoted by Friedländer from Mommsen in Ber. d. Sächs. Gesellsch. 1850, ii. p. 61, to which the present writer has not had access.

‡ Hieron. c. Rufin. iii. 22, ed. Vallars. ii. 51.

§ Cicero, ad Fam. xvi. 21. 1; xiv. 5. 1. See also § xii. 5.

Moreover, the overland route was the shorter for many provinces, even in the open season, and had therefore to be maintained in full efficiency throughout the year. Hence it must have been the main route for administrative purposes; and every other route, even the short sea route in summer, was merely subsidiary and additional to the great way for the Imperial couriers.

An incidental proof of the preference of land to sea travel for Imperial communication is furnished by two of Pliny's despatches to Trajan. He mentions (Ep. 63) that a courier came to him at Nicæa from the king of Bosporus (Pantikapæum on the European side of the entrance to the Sea of Azoff); but it is also implied there and in Ep. 67 that the embassy from Bosporus on its way to Rome would pass through Bithynia, and be obliged in courtesy to pay a call on him as governor in passing. The official way, then, was not to sail from the Crimea to the Hellespont or to Byzantium, but to take ship to Amastris or Sinope, the shortest sea passage, and then travel by land. The purely land route from the Crimea through South Russia round the north-western coasts of the Black Sea was not open to the Roman service, because it led through foreign territory.

The regular course for the couriers carrying despatches from Rome was along the Appian Way to Brundisium. Then they crossed from Brundisium to Dyrrachium or Aulona, and thence went by the Via Egnatia to Thessalonica and Philippi and its harbour Neapolis. The direct and apparently easy route along the coast to Neapolis was avoided by the Roman road (as the Itineraries are agreed): the road turned away from the crossing of the Hebrus at Amphipolis (Ac 16) inland to Philippi, the great Roman colonia, before seeking the harbour; but there was, doubtless, always a path in local use from Amphipolis direct to Neapolis.

Very little evidence exists as to the exact route beyond Neapolis. The way to Syria under the later Empire was by Byzantium, Nicomedia, and Ancyra; but it is certain that that route was not in use so early as New Testament times, for the roads of the provinces Galatia and Cappadocia seem not to have been constructed until the end of Vespasian's reign; and Cappadocia was not even properly organized as a province until about A.D. 74. Previously, viz. from A.D. 17 to 74, it had been a procuratorial province, which implied that it was governed not after the fully developed Roman system (which permitted a considerable degree of autonomy or home rule in internal matters), but after the native fashion and on monarchical lines by a procurator who represented the Emperor. The procurator represented the native king, whose rule had been deliberately chosen by the people, when the Romans had offered them their liberty and autonomy in B.C. 95 (Strab. p. 540): when the last king proved incapable, and the province was still unfit for real Roman provincial organization, a procurator was sent in place of the king, who gradually raised the country to the Roman level. After A.D. 74 Roman roads began to spread over the combined provinces of Galatia—Cappadocia (united under one governor, but as a double, not a single uniform homogeneous province). Thus there gradually grew up a great through route from the Bosporus opposite Byzantium by Juliopolis to Ancyra, Archelais-Colonia and Tyana, and the Cilician Gates, joining the older line of the Overland Route and also that of the Central Route * to the Gates at Colonia Faustiniana or Faustinopolis, which was founded by Marcus Aurelius beside the old native village of Halala (the Byzantine Loulon), 23 miles S.S.W. from Tyana, and named after his wife, who died there. That new through route, the 'Pilgrims' Route,' is described by the present writer in Hist. Geogr. of Asia Minor, p. 240 ff., and more fully in sections in the Geograph. Journal, 1903, and by Anderson in Journ. of Hell. Stud. 1899, p. 53 ff.

It is therefore highly probable that messengers for Syria and Egypt during the first and early second centuries went by the same route as messengers to Asia.† They sailed from Neapolis, the port of Philippi, to Alexandria Troas (Ac 16^{10} 20^{6}). Galen, it is true, sailed (from Troas) to Thessalonica; but he implies that this was an unusual course, taken for the special purpose of visiting Lemnos (Op. ed. Kühn, xii. 171).‡ Those who preferred to avoid even this short voyage seem to have crossed the Hellespont at Lampsacus and thence followed the route given in the Antonine Itinerary, p. 334, by Ilium to Troas.

In general, travellers from the East would prefer the less fatiguing route by Corinth (§ x.); but there would always be many travellers from the northern provinces on the overland road, and in winter it was the only route that was always open. Hence Aristides, when he travelled to Rome in the winter (probably of A.D. 143–144), went by that road. He describes the hardships of the journey—the rain, the frozen Hebrus, the snow, the wretched inns, the sullenness and ill-will of the barbarous natives; he lay long sick in Edessa; and thus, although for a time he went as fast as the Imperial post, he finally reached Rome on the hundredth day from his own home (which probably is to be understood as Hadrianoutheræ in Mysia, though Pergamus or Smyrna are also possible).§

From Lampsacus or Troas the way for Syrian couriers doubtless went by Pergamus (still the capital of Asia in the 1st cent.), Philadelphia, and on through the Cilician Gates to Tarsus, Antioch, Palestine, and Egypt. The way from Philadelphia to the Gates is described more fully below, § xi.

An important and typical route deserves fuller discussion. In the reign of Trajan, Ignatius was conducted to Rome from Syrian Antioch by land through many cities (the only one mentioned by name being Philadelphia) to Smyrna,‖ thence he went (probably on shipboard) to Troas and Neapolis for Philippi, and then went along the Egnatian Way, and so on to Rome. There is one unusual feature in this journey, viz. the detour to Smyrna. Presumably, some special duty required the escort to go to Smyrna; possibly prisoners under sentence were to be taken from thence; but the exact reason must remain uncertain. The ordinary course for such a party would have been

---

* Mommsen, Staatsrecht, ii.^{3} p. 1030 (approved by O. Hirschfeld), denies this, and understands that the procurator's duty was to register the ships as they singly entered the harbour. Accepting this, however, we must observe that such registration was necessary for the postal service, and might naturally be combined with it.

* See below, § x.

† A new route came into use before A.D. 193: see § xii.

‡ Returning from Rome to Asia, he again wished to visit Lemnos; but this time he took ship from Neapolis for Thasos, and thence to Lemnos.

§ Or. 24, p. 305 (i. 481 f., ed. Diudorf).

‖ Friedländer, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms, p. 30, mentions only the absurd account of the Acta (Antiochian), that Ignatius went by sea from Seleucia to Smyrna, and says that this ignorant statement, whether true or invented, is at least the work of one thoroughly acquainted with the way. On the contrary, it proceeds from one who mixes up and confuses quite inconsistent routes and methods of travel, as is shown in the sequel.

CHIEF ROUTES of the ROMAN EMPIRE

Explanation

=== Voyage from Italy to Alexandria and return.

→ → beside a sea-route indicate that it was used only in one direction, owing to the prevalent winds.

Coasting voyages imply frequent anchorage, which cannot be indicated.

to report to the governor at Pergamus; but special orders must have been sent to alter the usual course. From Smyrna the natural course would be to sail to Troas and Philippi; and it is certain that Ignatius passed through both of those towns, and that he sailed from Troas to Philippi.

If we could assume that the convoy travelled by the Great Highway, through Philomelium, Julia, Apamea, and Laodicea, it would be necessary to suppose that the call to Smyrna was received at Philadelphia. Had the orders to visit Smyrna been known at Laodicea, the natural course would have taken the party through Tralles and Ephesus. But it may be regarded as most probable that the Roman officer followed the direct path west from Julia straight through Prymnessus and near Acmonia to Philadelphia and Pergamus, and that the convoy, travelling by this ordinary route, was called away to Smyrna from Philadelphia. This establishes a probability that the path Julia-Prymnessus-Philadelphia was the usual one for Imperial business under the early Empire. That path was an important Roman road in the early Empire, and less important later (see Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, ii. p. 588 f.).

The reason why the officer who conducted Ignatius (with other prisoners) preferred the land road to the direct voyage from the Syrian coast, did not lie in the season of the year. Friedländer says the voyage from Seleucia to Smyrna was made in late autumn or winter; but, as we saw, there was no such voyage, and indeed that voyage could hardly have been made in winter: he is wrong also as to the period, for Ignatius was at Smyrna on 23 August, and is therefore likely to have started from Antioch in early July.* According to the Acta, he entered Rome and was martyred on the feast of the Sigillaria, 20 Dec., which would point to a later start; but no statement in the Acta as to the journey carries the smallest weight; and that authority must be disregarded except when confirmed by other evidence, especially that of the letters themselves. Better authorities† give 17 October as the day of his martyrdom and presumably of his entry into Rome, for those two days were wrongly identified by the hagiographers: see p. 386.

We must therefore suppose that the land road was followed because it was the ordinary official route for government messages and parties; and that for Imperial administration and communication ships were used only occasionally as opportunity offered: that conclusion was stated on general grounds at the beginning of this section, and is confirmed by the circumstances of this special case. A similar conclusion is distinctly suggested by Ac $27^{2.6}$ 28^{11}: it is evident that, but for the accidental meeting with a convenient Alexandrian corn ship at Myra, the centurion would have conducted St. Paul and the rest of his convoy to Smyrna, Troas, Neapolis, and so on by the same route as Ignatius travelled from Smyrna.

When Ephesus became the regular seat of government of the province Asia, the ordinary course for such a party would perhaps have been by Julia, Apamea, Laodicea, Tralles, and Magnesia to Ephesus, to report themselves there to the governor; but, as we have seen, it was probably not before the time of Hadrian that Ephesus became the official capital, as it had long been the practical and commercial capital of the province. Now by that time the road-system across Asia Minor was greatly developed: the roads of Galatia and Cappadocia were built on a great scale under the Flavian dynasty, when the administration of central and eastern Asia Minor was remodelled in A.D. 74. It is possible that under that dynasty the government couriers from Rome to Syria began to travel by Byzantium, Nicomedia, Juliopolis, Ancyra, Tyana, and the Cilician Gates, though the route followed by Ignatius's guards would suggest that the older and longer route through the province Asia was retained in ordinary use as late as Trajan's time. But during the 2nd cent. (before A.D. 192, see below, § xii.) the Bithynian route or 'Pilgrims' Road' was made official and ordinary. Already in A.D. 112 Juliopolis was an important point on a Roman route (Pliny, Epist. 77).

According to the Acta, Ignatius took ship at Dyrrachium and sailed through the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian Seas to Portus Augusti, the new harbour completed by Trajan at the mouth of the Tiber: he desired to land at Puteoli, but strong wind would not permit. There can be little doubt that this voyage, like that from Seleucia to Smyrna, is a pure invention: the short passage to Brundisium would be preferred as the natural and ordinary conclusion of the march along the Egnatian Way.

The truth is, as Hilgenfeld has seen (though Lightfoot* argues against him), that the writer of the Acta, who possessed no authority except the letters (of which he made very little use), and who had extremely little knowledge of roads and geography, tried to model the journey on St. Paul's so far as the few facts known to him permitted. He took the journey to Seleucia from Ac 13^4: there he made the martyr embark for Smyrna, i.e. on board a ship 'to sail by the coasts of Asia' (Ac 27^2), and afterwards on another which sailed close to Puteoli (Ac 28^{13}), but was blown past it to the great harbour (which the writer had heard of in his own time, but which had probably not been completed when Ignatius died). He speaks as if Ignatius exercised as much authority on this ship as St. Paul did on his (Ac 27^9), which is evidently absurd. The brethren come forth from Rome to greet the martyr, as they did to welcome St. Paul (Ac 28^{15}). Everything is fanciful and invented; and all is the invention of a person who had only rather vague ideas of the journey.

The distances by land on this route may be roughly estimated as follows, according to the Itineraries:—

Rome to Brundisium	360 miles
Brundisium to Dyrrachium or Aulona	2 days

ix. DURATION OF JOURNEYS ON THE POST-ROAD BETWEEN ROME AND THE EAST.—The time required to travel by the overland route requires a much more complicated investigation than is the case with the sea routes; the time would vary within very wide limits, according to the taste and character and equipment and physical powers of the individual traveller; as a rule, the government couriers went most rapidly; ordinary travellers in carriages came next to them, and sometimes equalled them; travellers on foot were of course much slower, and travelled shorter daily stages. But on the whole we shall find reason to think that current views, which are all founded on Friedländer, exaggerate the speed of travelling, and neglect the practical facts which restrict the rate over a long journey; the eminent authority just named takes exceptional cases (which are mentioned because they were exceptional, whereas the ordinary cases are not recorded, just because they were ordinary and familiar) as examples of the regular practice.

---

* See the calculation of time for the journey as given in the following section.

† The earliest are Chrysostom and the early Syrian Martyrology. See Lightfoot, Ignatius and Polycarp, ii. p. 416 f.

* Ignatius and Polycarp, ii. p. 389.

(a) Travellers on foot seem to have accomplished about 16 or 20 Roman miles per day. This estimate of 20, as stated in the present writer's Church in the Roman Empire, p. 65, was founded on experience and observation in the country. It is confirmed by a fragmentary itinerary of a journey through the Cilician Gates, dating from the 1st cent., in which the daily stages vary from 18 to 22 Roman miles,[*] and by the principle of Roman law (mentioned by Friedländer, p. 25) that the number of days' grace allowed by the prætor to parties at a distance was reckoned at the rate of one day for each 20 miles. The estimate may seem short, but a consideration of the distances, mutationes and mansiones, on the Bordeaux Pilgrim's Itinerary would suggest that the average daily stage was even shorter, viz. 16 to 18 Roman miles;[†] and this shorter estimate is in accordance with the following unbiassed testimony. Sir H. Johnston, in the Nineteenth Century, 1902, pp. 728, 729, speaking of the rate of travel on foot, suited for the presumably hardy and strong African workmen going to the Transvaal mines, says: 'It should be laid down as an absolute rule that not more than 15 miles [i.e. 16 or 17 Roman miles] are to be accomplished in one day.'

It may therefore be confidently assumed that the ordinary rate for a long journey on foot was about 17 Roman miles per day. At this rate the distance from Antioch to Rome would be completed by the party in which Ignatius travelled in about ninety-five days continuously: eighty-six being spent in walking, seven on shipboard between Smyrna and Neapolis,[‡] and two between Dyrrachium and Brundisium. To this some days must be added for detention in Smyrna and Troas, where evidently some halt was made, and there may possibly have been some other such stops by the way, especially in Tarsus, for the officer in command to report to the Roman governor of Cilicia,—say, about 104 days from start to finish.

Now of this total the journey to Smyrna would require forty-four, to which we may add two for delay in Tarsus and elsewhere, and four for the interval spent in Smyrna before the letter to the Romans was written (evidently on the eve of departure); and, as that letter was written on 24 August, the party must have started from Antioch about 6 July, and arrived in Rome about 17 October, on which day he reached Rome according to the oldest authorities (properly interpreted): see p. 385^a. By this rough yet not inaccurate reckoning we are forced to the conclusion that Ignatius is likely to have reached Rome about the day mentioned in the oldest tradition; and it seems not improbable that this day was correctly remembered in tradition, with the probably incorrect addition that he was put to death on the same day that he arrived.

But it is more natural and probable that the execution was postponed until some great festival, when, amid the sports of the amphitheatre, Ignatius formed one of the crowd of criminals collected from all parts of the Empire, who were made to struggle with, or die unresistingly before, the starved wild beasts. The later hagiography delighted to represent the Roman government as intent on and wholly absorbed in the punishment of the martyr, and as hurrying him to death the moment he reached Rome; whereas, in reality, no official in Rome thought or cared about the one individual amidst a crowd of criminals reserved to make the next Roman holiday.

The journey of Ignatius may serve as a fair example of numberless similar journeys made by martyrs to Rome to meet the same kind of death for the amusement of a populace, which was in this way kept in good humour by the Imperial policy. There seems to be nothing exceptional or unusual about this journey. Ignatius was treated somewhat harshly by the soldiers who guarded him and the other prisoners; but naturally the guards were severe with the criminals, whom they were bound to watch, and for whose safe custody they were responsible (Ac 27^{42}).

(b) Travellers driving along the road may probably be taken as going ordinarily at the rate of 4 Roman miles an hour. That is the rate which the writer calculated for the journey of Aristides from Smyrna to Pergamus,[*] and the minute details which Aristides gives make it possible to attain approximate certainty as to the rate. Ordinary travellers were weighted by luggage, and would not go faster than the heavy waggon on which it was carried. But where they wished, they were able to travel at the faster rate of the Imperial post: see below.

The regular day's journey for this class of travellers was perhaps only 25 Roman miles—half as long again as the foot traveller's ordinary journey (faster travellers went double distance, a few quadruple: see below). Twenty-five miles was the average distance between the mansiones on the roads; and, as Friedländer points out (p. 19), the distance between Bethlehem and Alexandria (which is about 400 Roman miles) was reckoned to be sixteen days' journey (mansiones).[†] Between each two mansiones the rule seems to have been that there should be two mutationes, though we have not a complete list for any road, for even the Bordeaux Itinerary omits some.

The roads, therefore, appear to have been divided into stages of about 8⅓ Roman miles in length. The length of the stages was, undoubtedly, closely related to the average daily distances in ordinary travelling.

(c) The rate at which the Imperial couriers travelled is difficult to estimate with any exactness. Chambalu (de magistratibus Flaviorum, p. 8) supposes that they travelled at the rate of 160 Roman miles per day; and Friedländer (p. 23) quotes this estimate with apparent approval. But such a rate is entirely inconsistent with the long interval which (as we have seen) elapsed before events at Rome of great importance in the Imperial family became known in Egypt. If the couriers travelled at that rate, important events in Rome, like the proclamation of an Emperor, ought to have been known at Alexandria within twenty days at all seasons of the year; but news seems to have taken three or four times as long, except when it could be carried by ship direct from Italy. We have seen in § iv. a clear case: the accession of Pertinax on 1 January had just become known (probably on the preceding day) to the prefect of Egypt in Alexandria on 6 March A.D. 193, implying a period of sixty-four days spent on the journey.

---

[*] The passage is discussed in the Appendix to a paper on 'Tarsus, Cilicia, and the Cilician Gates' in the Geographical Journal, 1903.

[†] Double the unit of distance, 8⅓ Roman miles, while the traveller in carriage or waggon went three units, as is shown below. No Itinerary gives a complete list of the stages or units.

[‡] Allowance for waiting on winds must be made (see Pliny, Epist. 15, 17, who travelled at nearly the same season, Aug. or Sept. A.D. 111); otherwise five days would be an ample allowance.

[*] Journal of Hellenic Studies, 1881, p. 49.

[†] Sulpicius Severus, Dial. i. 4. So twenty-five mansiones from Edessa to Jerusalem (S. Silviæ Aq. Peregrin. 47); the distance by Antioch is not much under 625 miles.

This may seem to imply a very slow rate of travel for government couriers; and even if we suppose that the prefect in early March A.D. 193 was absent from Alexandria, and had to be summoned, the delay cannot have been more than a day or two. Had the governor been far from Alexandria, he would not have waited till he returned there before issuing his edict. Neglect or delay in celebrating the accession would have been disloyal, and, in the Roman sense, impious. Moreover, another well-attested interval confirms this case. News of the death of Gaius Cæsar at Limyra on the coast of Lycia on 21 February A.D. 4 reached Pisa on 2 April.[*] If we allow that it reached Rome four days earlier, this would give thirty-six days from Limyra to Rome. News of this tragic event of Imperial importance would not linger on the way; and there seems no reason to think that it would be concealed on arriving in Rome. Doubtless, public mourning was ordered instantly by Augustus.

Moreover, for a long journey such a rate of travelling was sufficiently fatiguing. The couriers, undoubtedly, were soldiers;[†] only to them could such an important service be entrusted; and doubtless picked men alone were employed. The service must have been planned with a view to be consistent with what can judiciously be expected from good soldiers as a permanent duty. It would appear that a courier carried through to its destination the despatches with which he was entrusted, and that these were not passed from hand to hand. The latter method would have given greater possibility of speed, but the former was more safe and useful. Hence, for example, Tacitus (Hist. ii. 73) mentions that the couriers (speculatores) from Syria and Palestine gladdened Vitellius by describing how the Eastern legions had taken the oath to him. See Suet. Aug. 42.

Chambalu and Friedländer have been misled by some exceptional cases of rapid travelling. A great effort can be made for a few days; but the steady all-the-year-round rate of travelling for the couriers must be estimated on a very different scale. We are not told how many horses were killed in those exceptional rides. We have laid down as the ruling principle of the government courier-service that regularity and certainty were more prized than mere speed; the government desired to know confidently at what date it could be reckoned that instructions would be received and put in effect. The headlong speed of modern government messages had no analogy in ordinary Roman practice, though exceptional characters, like Julius Cæsar and some others, knew the value of speed in critical circumstances, and risked everything to attain it.

The postal service across Asia Minor before the railways were opened may be taken as a fair example of the probable rate per hour: horses were changed frequently; no halts were made except at government offices in the great cities; and the rate of riding was about 5 Roman miles per hour.[*] Friedländer (p. 22) rightly estimates that the Imperial post travelled at this rate, though he considers that military couriers travelled at exactly double the rate—10 miles per hour (loc. cit. p. 24).[†]

Aristides, on the journey to Rome by the Egnatian Way in A.D. 144, as above described, says he travelled as fast as the Imperial couriers; and this we may confidently take as 5 Roman miles per hour. Similarly, before the railways were opened in Asia Minor, private travellers often rode with the post when they desired to make a rapid journey.

The rate per day of the couriers depends on the number of hours they rode. As to this no certain estimate is possible; but it seems probable that double the ordinary traveller's journey was the distance required daily of the couriers. A faster rate seems inconsistent with the length of time which Imperial news took to reach distant places.

We conclude, then, that 50 Roman miles per day was the post rate for the Imperial couriers. At this rate about fifty-four days would be needed for despatches from Rome to Alexandria, forty-six to Cæsarea (the capital of Palestine), thirty-nine to Syrian Antioch, twenty-four to Byzantium, and seven to Brundisium. But, further, no allowance need be made for halts at the great administrative centres—Cæsarea, Antioch, Ancyra, and Nicomedia (or the Asian capital when that route was followed). The Turkish post used to halt to allow provincial governors to send on despatches to the more distant provinces, and some time must be allowed for preliminary consideration of the despatches which the courier had brought; Imperial couriers, however, carried their despatches, as a rule, from Rome to their destination, waiting for nothing by the way.

But, even if the Imperial couriers may sometimes have made such halts by the way, it is entirely improbable that the news of the death of an Emperor and the accession of his successor would be allowed to linger in such a fashion. Couriers would in such a case surely go straight on to their own destination. They would carry official intimations to the governor of each province, and it was the duty of the governor to circulate the news by special edict. Doubtless, a special courier started from Rome for each different province, and the Alexandrian message was carried direct without any serious halt by the way. Hence it can hardly be supposed that the news of the accession of Pertinax, which took sixty-three or sixty-four days to reach Alexandria, travelled by this route, unless we allowed for a long detention by stress of weather at Brundisium. But in § xii. we shall see that the news in that case probably travelled by a different route.

As we have seen, hurried travellers went as rapidly as the government couriers. Aristides mentions that he did so; and Friedländer (p. 24) quotes the following cases, which all evidently imply journeys of 50 miles per day:—

Tarraco to Bilbilis .	224 miles	—fifth day.
Mutina to Rome .	310 ,,	—sixth day.
Rome to Puteoli .	141 ,,	—third day.[‡]

[*] Orelli, Del. Inscr. Latin, No. 643. Philotimus took 36 days (July 9–Aug. 14) from Rhodes to Brundisium (Cic. ad Att. xi. 23; ad Fam. xiv. 24; pro Ligar. 7).

[†] They were called speculatores: a certain number were attached to each legion. The speculatores of the Prætorian guard were closely attached to the Emperor's person, and formed a sort of bodyguard, ready for confidential service at any time. They were, of course, selected men.

[*] The rate for ordinary travellers on horseback on a long journey is 3¾ or 4 Roman miles per hour; but one finds it quite easy to keep up with the post for a short time, as the writer knows from experience.

[†] It is not clear why he distinguishes the post rate from that of military couriers. The post was carried by military couriers.

[‡] Martial (x. 104) says that the fifth carriage will perhaps bring his correspondent from Tarraco to Bilbilis: he evidently Still more rapid journeys are mentioned. Julius Cæsar is said to have travelled for eight days from the Rhone to Rome at the rate of 100 miles per day. Couriers carrying urgent news sometimes rode for several days in succession at the rate of 150 miles per day. Friedländer gives 160, but the facts seem to point rather to 150, or six mansiones. Icelus carried the news of Nero's death to Galba in seven days or a little less (Plut. Galb. 7), presumably going to Tarraco by ship in four days, and thence over 300 miles by land. But such journeys were only performed in stress and need, and afford no standard for ordinary life.

The relation of all these varying rates to the fundamental 25 miles is manifest.

We have made a much more modest estimate of Roman rates of travel than Friedländer. He estimates the foot-traveller's daily journey at 26 or 27 Roman miles, that of the ordinary traveller by carriage at 40 to 50 miles, and that of the courier anywhere from 130 to 160 miles. We regard all these rates as exceptional, and as true even then only for short distances.

The rates which we have found reason to accept as customary may seem slow, but they are probably quite as great as is consistent with the climate and the character of the people. Travel was performed chiefly in the summer season, and there is no doubt that the day's journey began early in the morning, and that a stop was made by noon, after six hours (25 miles); while, in the case of ordinary travellers who were not in a hurry, it is probable that no second journey was begun after the heat of the day was passed.* Couriers and rapid travellers did one stage before noon and a second in the evening, each of five hours, 25 miles. As has been pointed out in art. TYRANNUS in vol. iv. p. 822^{b}, ordinary people regarded the day's work in summer as finished by the fifth hour, one hour before noon, though active, energetic persons still kept up the older Roman strenuous custom of a distinctly longer day.

Practical experience will show that walking 16 miles or driving 25 miles day after day without intermission, in the hot season, is quite sufficient for the strength of the ordinary man, and that only men of more than average strength and endurance can stand a long course of riding 50 miles per day. We have quoted the testimony of experience as to the rate of walking journeys; and as to carriage travelling, the following may be quoted from a Times telegram from the Transvaal about a journey performed in a carriage, with all the careful equipment that can now be commanded, in January 1903: 'Mr. Chamberlain's journey to-day amply testified to his physical strength and powers of endurance. The thirty miles constitute a formidable trek . . . and the sun proved very trying.' On the other hand, in the wet season or the winter a long course of travelling is even more fatiguing, from other reasons. During that period very few travellers except government couriers and carriers of goods would be on the road.

The question might be raised whether during the most temperate months of the year a quicker rate of travelling was required of the post couriers. The evidence at our disposal does not permit a certain reply; but it is most probable that the rate was uniform for the whole year. Every season offers, or may offer, its own special hindrances to rapid travel; and it would be necessary either to have one uniform rate, or to estimate the proper rate for each journey separately according to the weather and circumstances, which would be absurd.

x. THE CENTRAL ROUTE BETWEEN ROME AND THE EAST.—The routes which we have described were those by which goods were sent, and which were, as a rule, employed by travellers contemplating a steady, continuous journey, without halts. Travellers along the land route were indeed able to stop when they pleased, or when it was necessary to do so; but as a rule they undertook the journey for the sake of reaching Italy, and not with any thought of staying in the little civilized and rather inhospitable regions through which the Egnatian Way led. Thessalonica, Philippi, and a few other towns on that part of the road were doubtless much like the ordinary second or third rate cities of the Grecized countries east of the Ægean Sea; but west of Thessalonica the traveller passed into half-barbarous lands, where there was no temptation to stop, though occasionally (as was the case with Aristides through sickness, see p. 384) a halt was unavoidable. On the sea route there was, as we have seen, rarely any opportunity of stopping (except in Crete during a winter detention).

But the route most favoured by those travellers who intended to make halts by the way, whether for business or for pleasure, passed across the Isthmus of Corinth and through Ephesus, the two great business and commercial centres of the Ægean world. This was in many respects the greatest and most typical road to the East, most patronized by tourists and travellers, and by far the most important in the history of early Christianity; for along that road, incomparably more than by any other, travelled and intermingled the thoughts, the inventions, the intercommunication, of the busiest parts of the ancient world. Thus, as we have seen, the sea routes carried Christianity direct to Rome, and did not affect the lands and cities by the way except Crete. The overland route, also, was not very important in the diffusion of Christianity. Philippi and Thessalonica, two early centres of the new religion, were Christianized almost, as it might seem, accidentally, and hardly anything is known with regard to any important development along the road, nor did those two cities play any leading part in early Christian history. But Ephesus and Corinth are critical points in that history, and continued to be centres of activity and development for many centuries.

The great stages on this road were Cæsarea, Syrian Antioch, Tarsus, Cybistra,* Derbe, Iconium, Pisidian Antioch, Apamea, Laodicea, Ephesus, and Corinth or Athens. Each of these was a knot where the roads of a whole district met, and where its trade and intercommunication and education found a centre.

Thus this great artery was the channel in which the life-blood of the Empire mainly flowed. It was not the route along which goods mostly moved, but it was the route of those who directed trade, as well as of thoughts and inventions. Along this road it was St. Paul's early idea to move towards Rome. In his second journey, Ephesus attracted him as the city 'in which the East looked out on the West,' i.e. on Rome;† but he was diverted by Divine impulse to Philippi. Again, the last missionary idea which he had in mind before his final imprisonment and condemnation was to winter in Nicopolis (Tit 3^{12}), a point on thinks of five days as the post-distance. The distance is 214 miles in the Antonine Itinerary; but Friedländer gives 224. From Mutina to Rome he gives 317: the Antonine has 313, but even this seems too great (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 6. 1; Philost. Apoll. Tyan. vii. 41).

* Even in the Republican period it was not thought idle to be ready for the principal meal (after work and exercise and bath were all finished) full four hours before sunset.

* There was a more direct road from Cybistra by Hyde, Savatra, Laodicea Katakekaumene, Philomelium, and Julia, to Apamea (p. 390); but it did not lead through the great cities, and the list of names shows that it did not play such an important part in early Christian life as the longer road.

† See Hort, Lectures on Ephesians, p. 813.

the coasting voyage between Corinth and Brundisium.

The route involved a good deal of variety, change of transport and method in travelling. It was partly a sea route, partly a land road. From Syria to Ephesus it was usually a land road (though it was free to the traveller to vary it by using the sea for this part of the journey). Between Ephesus and Corinth the communication was by sea; and again between Corinth and the coast of Italy. Though a land road was possible for a great part of the way in this latter stretch, it was rarely or never employed except for purely local communication, since it traversed barren, mountainous, and sparsely populated, almost barbarous lands, and there were on it no great cities or centres of thought and trade. But the sea way touched several important centres before it reached Italy.

Either of two sea ways to Italy was open from Corinth. Probably the more common was along the coast of Acarnania and Epirus, by Nicopolis, to Brundisium, as described in part in the Itinerarium Maritimum, p. 488, and thence by the Appian Way, the 'Queen of Roads,' through Tarentum, Venusia, Beneventum, and Capua to Rome.

But Ostia or Puteoli was sometimes substituted for Brundisium as the Italian harbour in this route. Ælius Aristides travelled by this way from Rome to Miletus and Smyrna, starting in September A.D. 145. Friedländer (p. 28 f.) thinks he reached Miletus in fourteen days from Rome; but this is certainly erroneous, and the interpretation of Aristides's words must be incorrect. Masson reckons the fourteen days from Corinth to Miletus, which is much more probable. This would be a very slow and tedious passage, but not improbable, if winds were unfavourable. Friedländer supposes that Aristides sailed in thirty-six hours from Sicily to Cephallenia, which is incredible;* the steamers of the Messageries Maritimes would take nearly that time for the crossing. The distinguished German scholar has made the mistake of ignoring the halt which (as we have already pointed out) probably took place at Corinth, and perhaps at islands in the Ægean Sea as well as at Miletus. Finally, Aristides says that he did not reach Smyrna until winter had begun, which implies a journey of nearly two months, if not more; for he seems to mean that the bad weather of winter had begun, and it is rare for such weather to begin before the middle of December or even later.

In truth, it is vain to think of reckoning the average time required on this journey. It was not made continuously. Its importance and character arise from the fact that travellers frequented it with the intention of staying at various points on its course, seeing and talking and learning and teaching and transacting private or public business.

These statements should not be taken as involving an assertion that no one ever travelled without halts by this route: there are no universal rules in human conduct. But continuous unhalting travel was not the intention of this route; and even when halts are not actually mentioned, it cannot be assumed in any case without careful consideration that no halts were made. The two great breaks and changes, at Corinth and at Ephesus, required new arrangements at those places, thus caused at least some short delay, and easily led to considerable halts. The traveller from Rome landed at Lechæum, on the Corinthian Gulf, and had to find a new vessel at Cenchreæ for his eastern passage. He naturally waited for some time at so famous a city as Corinth while making the new arrangements. The diolkos, or portage of vessels across the Isthmus, could be used only for very small vessels, and cannot be reckoned as a factor in the ordinary travelling system.

This tendency, at a break between voyages, as at Corinth, or at a change from land to sea travel or vice versâ, to make a halt which might last for days, is illustrated in St. Paul's journey from Philippi to Jerusalem (Ac 20. 21). Philippi was so near Neapolis that no detention at the harbour need be expected. But at Troas there seems to have been a change of ship with detention of seven days; and at Cæsarea the change to land travelling was accompanied by a detention of some days and the preparation for a journey by road (see below, p. 398^{b}). On the other hand, the transhipments at Patara and at Myra (Ac 21^{1} 27^{5}) seem to have entailed no delay, as in each case the change of ship appears to have been unpremeditated, and due to the opportunity that presented itself of a larger and more convenient sea-going ship. The change at Troas from land to seafaring made it a good centre and starting-point for mission-work, 'a door opened' (2 Co 2^{12}).

This discontinuous character of travel on the Central Route to the East shows very clearly—what has been already stated, p. 382, on other grounds—that there was no serious need for a ship canal at Corinth under the Roman Empire, and little prospect of such a canal being any more remunerative than the modern canal is. It would have been disadvantageous to Corinth under the conditions of the Roman Empire that there should be continuous unbroken navigation past its gates. The scheme of Nero and of Herodes Atticus was an archaistic fancy, and not a sound practical scheme resting on a solid commercial basis.

Again, owing to the character of this route, the cities on it grew steadily in importance. Travellers did not pass through them as mere hostelries and stations for a night: they were visitors who stayed for a time, taught and learned, transacted business or performed political and social duties. Corinth, in particular, is mentioned as profiting by these opportunities. It was the half-way house between Italy and Asia. Hence Gaius of Corinth was 'the host of the whole Church' (Ro 16^{23}), and Corinthian hospitality is mentioned several times by Clement of Rome in his letter.*

We have described this route only as an Imperial highway, neglecting its local character and noticing only the great stages. It will be described more fully among the inter-provincial routes in the following section.

xi. INTER-PROVINCIAL ROUTES IN THE EAST.—These were, as has been said in § i., only of subordinate consequence in the Imperial time. But, of all inter-provincial routes in the Roman Empire, those in the East were the most frequented and important. The older Greek trade between the Levant and Ægean harbours had not been entirely destroyed; and many hundreds, doubtless, of small vessels were constantly plying along all those coasts from Egypt or even Cyrene round to Corinth. Travellers were always able to find readily a ship to carry them in either direction along the coast. They might not always find one to do exactly what they desired: the first ship might not be going as far as the harbour which they aimed at, and they might have to tranship (Ac 21^{2}): their ship might omit to visit a harbour where they would have liked to stop, or it might stay several days in a harbour where they had no wish to remain (Ac 20^{16}).[*] They would have to accommodate themselves to the course of the ship, and remain close to it even when it was lying at anchor, except when it went into harbour to load or unload, or when it was laid up for the winter (§ vi.).

* Aristides, Or. 24, p. 305 (ed. Dindorf, vol. i. p. 481). Eastward-bound ships made for Cyllene in Elis, six days from Sicily (Philost. Apoll. Tyan. viii. 15. 1; Paus. vi. 26. 3). Friedländer quotes Apollonius's voyage (vii. 10. 1), five days, Corinth to Puteoli; but common men needed longer time.

* Under CORINTH, vol. i. p. 480^{b}, the Corinthiaca of Dion Chrysostom, Or. 37, is erroneously referred to: the passage intended is in his Isthmiaca, Or. 8, pp. 138–139, which speaks of the Greek period, but is true also of the Roman.

There were also ships plying between the Euxine harbours and those of the Ægean and the Levant. Diodorus gives the time for vessels between the Sea of Azoff and Alexandria (see § iv.): such a vessel would run down to Amastris or Sinope, then coast to Rhodes, and thence run direct to Alexandria, if Egypt were its destination; or to Myra, and thence west of Akamas to the Syrian coast, if such were its aim.[†]

The land roads connecting the provinces of Asia Minor were fairly developed, because in many cases the same roads that led to Rome also connected the different provinces with one another: Asia Minor is a bridge stretching from east to west, from Asia to Europe; and the roads that passed across it westward, besides leading to Rome, traversed several provinces and connected their most important cities.

1. The great Trade Route by which the products of Cappadocia were carried to Ephesus was also the direct path from Cappadocia to Rome, and those products were carried to Ephesus as the harbour for the trade with the West: the Trade Route had been developed under the Greek kings, and became even more important under the Roman Empire. It is not to be supposed that all Cappadocian trade with Rome passed through Ephesus. All heavy merchandise would inevitably follow the natural law of seeking the nearest harbour, viz. Tarsus for southern Cappadocia and Amisus for northern Cappadocia. It is noteworthy that the single Cappadocian product which is expressly mentioned as carried to Ephesus by land—red earth used for colouring—would be in small bulk and of light weight (Strabo, p. 623). The Trade Route, which went from Ephesus by Laodicea, Apamea, Julia, Laodicea Katakekaumene to Cæsarea, is fully described in the Historical Geography of Asia Minor, chs. iii. iv.

In the east of Cappadocia the old Trade Route was in the time of Trajan, or perhaps already under Vespasian, merged in the military road system for the defence of the Euphrates frontier.[‡]

2. The Syrian Route coincided with the Trade Route from Ephesus through Tralles, Laodicea, Colossæ, Apamea, etc., as far as Laodicea Katakekaumene. From that city the most direct path kept away along the north edge of the low range of hills called now Boz-Dagh, by Savatra to Hiera Hyde and Kybistra. But general intercourse avoided this path and turned south to Iconium, Derbe, Laranda, and Kybistra.

We may call this route the Syrian, as the Gates through which it issued from Laodicea on the Lycus were called the Syrian Gates.[§] It was identical with the Eastern section of the Central Route of the Empire, § x., and coincided in part with the Overland Route, § viii.

An alternative for part of the way kept eastward from Apamea through Apollonia and Pisidian Antioch, Neapolis, and Pappa to Iconium, where it rejoined the other. This is the line that plays most part in the NT. More important cities lay along it; in practice it seems to have been the most important way.

A modification of this alternative route, made under the Emperor Augustus, was of some importance for a time. That Emperor founded a series of six military coloniæ, with Pisidian Antioch as the centre, to control the barely conquered tribes of the northern Taurus (i.e. Isauria and Pisidia). These six coloniæ were connected by a series of military roads, each of which was called Via Sebaste, the Augustan Way.[*] The road coming from Apamea coincided between Apollonia and Antioch with the Augustan Way coming from the western coloniæ; and again south of Antioch it coincided for a long distance with the Augustan Way that leads to Lystra.

This Augustan Way is mentioned in the Acts of Paul and Thekla as τὴν βασιλικὴν ὁδὸν τὴν εἰς Λύστραν φέρουσαν: starting from Antioch it coincided with the other road to a point about 24 miles from Iconium (west of the village Kizil-Euren), where it probably turned south to Lystra: in the story of Thekla, Onesiphorus went out to this point on the Basilike or Augustan Way and waited till Paul should pass.[†] This line had more importance in a military and official point of view than in practical life.

Another alternative to part of the Syrian Route ran between Ephesus and Pisidian Antioch; it traversed the higher Phrygian lands,[‡] and was useful only for travellers on foot or on horseback. It kept nearly in an easterly line from the one city to the other, ascending the Cayster valley, crossing the high and hilly region where the Cogamis rises, and through which the Mæander breaks in a deep cañon, going through Seiblia and Metropolis, and again crossing a ridge of mountains to reach Antioch. It is mentioned Ac 19^{1}.

3. An important route led from the harbours of the Propontis and Bosporus, and from Nicomedia and Nicæa, almost due east through Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, keeping nearly parallel to the Black Sea coast. It traversed the long valley of the Amnias in Paphlagonia—a valley which is divided both from the sea and from the Central Plateau by two parallel mountain ridges. Many of the campaigns in the history of the Pontic and Bithynian kings were fought along this valley. The road must have played a considerable part in the development of society and religion in those northern provinces under the Roman Empire; but hardly anything is known on the subject owing to the almost entire loss of evidence.

4. Another very important road from the Propontis and Bosporus harbours and from Nicomedia, ran south through Nicæa to Dorylaion. There was a road-knot at Dorylaion: here met many ways: from Smyrna and Philadelphia on the south-west: from Synnada and the south: from Iconium and Lycaonia: from the Cilician Gates and Cilicia: from Ancyra and the East. The last mentioned way was afterwards the great Byzantine military road, which is very fully described in the Historical Geography of Asia Minor, ch. G. The other roads that radiated from Dorylaion also became far more important in later times, when

[*] In St. Paul the Traveller, p. 64, the name is given not quite correctly as the 'Royal Way': the Greek term was βασιλικὴ ὁδός, which might be rendered rightly so in English: but the Latin name, recently discovered on three milestones, proves that βασιλική here is to be understood as 'belonging to the Emperor,' who was called Βασιλεύς in purer Greek, Σεβαστός in technical and common Greek.

[†] The line of the Basilike, as given in the map attached to St. Paul the Traveller, requires to be corrected near Lystra by recent discoveries: the difference does not affect the argument or any other opinions in the book.

Nicomedia first, and Constantinople afterwards, were successively capitals of the Roman world, and when the roads that connected the various districts of Asia Minor with the capitals acquired immensely greater consequence. But of them all only the road from Smyrna to Dorylaion was of considerable importance in Roman times, as it connected Bithynia with the two leading cities of Asia—Smyrna and Ephesus. It passed through Philadelphia, and coincided for a long distance with the road Philadelphia–Julia (see above, § viii.).

The road from the south to Dorylaion was evidently the one along which St. Paul travelled when he had been forbidden to preach in Asia (Ac 16^6). He turned away north towards Bithynia, intending to preach in the great Greek cities of that province, Nicæa and Nicomedia. But when he came nearer the frontier, probably at Dorylaion, he was forbidden to enter that province; and he then turned towards the west, keeping near the frontier, perhaps in the hope that he might be permitted to enter at another point. He was, however, impelled onwards towards the sea, until at last he came out on the Ægean coast at Troas. A possible memory of this journey is preserved in local tradition near the spot where he must have crossed the river.[*]

5. A road of considerable importance in Roman times connected Perga, the capital of Pamphylia, with Ephesus and the Asian cities. It crosses the Taurus at a low elevation, and comes down on the Lycus valley: there is no difficulty in the path, which is marked out by nature. According to some recent theories, St. Paul was thinking of making his way to Ephesus already on his first journey from Perga (Ac 13^{14}); but if Ephesus had been his aim, he would have taken the easy, natural, and frequented road which trade and intercourse ordinarily followed. Instead of doing so, he crossed Taurus by a very difficult path, which can never at any time have been of any importance, and which had no object except to permit occasional communication between the districts of Perga and of Pisidian Antioch: it seems beyond doubt that a person who went by this way as far as Antioch had as his aim simply to reach that city.

xii. Other Routes.—Of the many other important roads of the Empire, few played any part in the early history of Christianity, at least so far as the New Testament is concerned.

1. The road round the north of the Adriatic Sea, from Rome by the Flaminian Way, about 210 miles, to Ariminum, and thence through Ravenna, Altinum (by ship), and Aquileia, led to Mœsia, Dacia, and the regions of the Middle and Lower Danube generally, and on to Thrace and Constantinople.

This road was of growing importance in later times, as the countries through which it passed increased in civilization. It was of little importance in NT times, and was valueless as a through route for communication with the East because it traversed the still purely barbarian country of Thrace, which was formed into a procuratorial province[†] by Claudius in B.C. 46. Only under Trajan was Thrace constituted as a fully organized province of the Empire. From that time onwards the route which we are describing possessed some considerable importance, not merely as a connexion with many great and improving provinces, but also as an alternative, purely overland road, ultimately the Imperial post-road, to the East.

This route crossed the delta of the Padus by ship from Ravenna to Altinum; but the purely land road went round by Bononia (Bologna) along the Æmilian Way, then north to Verona, and east to Aquileia. By the latter way the distances were (according to the Itineraries)—

Rome to Verona 370, and to Aquileia	520	miles
Thence to Sirmium (Lower Pannonia)	400	,,
,, ,, Sardica (Thrace)	311	,,
,, ,, Constantinople	349	,,
Total: Rome to Constantinople	1580	,,
Rome to Alexandria	3130	,,
Courier's time, Rome to Alexandria	63	days
Rome to Cæsarea in Palestine	2680	miles
Courier's time, Rome to Cæsarea	54	days

But if we suppose that a courier went direct from Ariminum by Ravenna, thence by ship to Altinum, and thence riding to Aquileia,[*] and that he took even one or two days on ship and other two days for the land journey to Aquileia, 95 miles, he would save two or three days.

These results seem to show clearly that this was the road by which the news of the accession of Pertinax travelled from Rome to Alexandria: the messenger, starting on 1 Jan. A.D. 193, arrived only about the sixty-third or sixty-fourth day in Alexandria. If so, it would follow that this route was established as the regular official path to the East before the end of the 2nd cent., and after the time of Trajan.

The reason for the change of route was doubtless twofold. The northerly route was far the most important: it passed through many great military centres and the capitals of several provinces, while it communicated with the capitals of several others which lay off the line of the road. Moreover, the long and sometimes stormy crossing of the Adriatic Sea was avoided by the northern route, which necessitated no voyage except the short and always easy passage of the Bosporus. Thus we can imagine that the northern road developed more and more at the expense of the road through Brundisium. It may be asked whether the latter road would not be kept in use during the more temperate seasons of the year, even if the sea-crossing was avoided in the most stormy months. That may have been so: for the accession of Pertinax, the most conclusive case known to us, falls in January, the stormiest month of the year. But it is perhaps more probable that when the northern route was established it superseded the other: it was for many reasons convenient to have permanent and unvarying conditions of travel: moreover, at least during the decay that characterized the administration of the 3rd cent., it is unlikely that more than one route was maintained permanently with a full working postal establishment.

2. The country of the Upper Danube, Rhætia, etc., was approached by the Augustan Way over the Brenner Pass (viâ Claudia Augusta).

3. Gaul and its adjuncts and tyrants, the two provinces of the Rhine frontier, Lower and Upper Germany, were approached by several roads: (a) The Flaminian Way to Ariminum, and the Æmilian Way to Placentia, continued to Milan and the Alps, and across the Cottian Alps (Mont Genevre) to Arles (Arelate), or the Graian Alps (Little St. Bernard) to Vienna, Lugdunum, and Augusta Remorum (Rheims). The distance from Rome to the Rhone was not much short of 800 Roman miles, and was said to have been traversed by Julius Cæsar in eight days. The distance to Rheims is given as 1170 miles in the Antonine Itinerary, by a very circuitous route.

(b) The Aurelian Way led along the coast of Italy, Liguria, and Gaul to Massilia (Marseilles) and Arelate.

(c) The Cassian or the Clodian Way led to Florence, and thence it joined the Aurelian Way or else went across the Apennines to join the Æmilian Way at Bononia. This route had only local importance, and was then merged in the preceding.

4. Spain, which St. Paul hoped to visit from Rome (Ro 15^{24}), might be reached either by sea to Tarraco, or by the roads to South Gaul, which were continued across the Rhone through Narbo and over the eastern end of the Pyrenees to Tarraco, and thence by the Via Claudia Augusta to Valentia, Cordova, and Cadiz. News of the battle of Munda (not far from Cordova) is said to have been brought to Rome in thirty-five days, which is at the rate of about 50 miles a day; while Julius Cæsar reached Rome from Obulco (35 miles from Cordova) within twenty-seven days. The distance from Cordova to Rome was about 1700 miles.

5. The route to Britain went on from Lugdunum by the valley of the Saone (Arar), by Soissons and Rheims to Amiens and Boulogne, where the channel was crossed to Rutupiæ (Richborough). The distance from Rome to Bononia was about 1250 miles by the shortest route through Helvetia. Letters from Britain reached Cicero in twenty-three, or twenty-seven, or twenty-nine days:[*] there can be little doubt that all were carried by special military couriers, who came bearing Cæsar's despatches.

6. Africa was reached either by sea from Ostia or Portus, or by land and sea combined. The direct voyage in very favourable circumstances was made in three days; but this can only have been a rare and exceptional passage. Pliny's statement, that Africa could be reached on the second day, must be set aside as very doubtful. The land route followed the Appian Way to Capua, and thence the Popilian Way, keeping near the coast, to Rhegium, about 450 miles from Rome; thereafter it traversed Sicily from Messana to Lilybæum, and crossed the narrow seas to Africa. The total land journey was about 650 miles. A letter from Africa reached Rome in one case in twenty-two days:[†] doubtless it travelled either by the land route or by a coasting voyage.

II. THE GENERAL EQUIPMENT OF THE ROMAN ROAD SYSTEM.—i. MAINTENANCE, REPAIRS, AND SAFETY.—While the maintenance of the great roads in Italy was entrusted to special officials of prætorian or even of consular rank,[‡] the care of the roads in the provinces was part of the duty of the provincial governors. At important points, and especially at knots in the road system, permanent military guards in special guard-houses were stationed. These stationes were charged not merely with the care of the roads, but still more with the keeping of them safe from robbers or brigands, and in general with the safety of the public in the region around. In the more important stationes, at least, the commander was a centurion regionarius. A soldier in such a statio was called stationarius.[§] On the subject, see O. Hirschfeld in Berl. Sitzungsber. 1891, p. 864 f.; Mommsen, Strafrecht, p. 307 ff., esp. p. 312; Domaszewski, Röm. Mittheil. Instit. 1902, p. 330 ff.

Thus the charge of the roads was closely connected with the maintenance of peace and order in the districts served by the roads; and there grew up in the later time a tendency to name some districts of Italy according to the great road which connected them with Rome.

But, in spite of these attempts to keep the peace along the roads, there was a considerable amount of insecurity. The inscriptions often mention guards or travellers slain by robbers.[*] Juvenal speaks of the brigands of the Campanian roads, who when actively pursued in their usual haunts find it the safest course to take refuge in Rome itself (Sat. iii. 305 f.). The case described in Lk 10^{30} was no uncommon one. St. Paul's 'perils of robbers' (2 Co 11^{26}) were very real: it was especially in journeys through mountainous districts, where roads were not carefully guarded, that he had experienced those dangers, as Ac $13^{14.51}$ 14^{24} 16^{8}; but there was sometimes danger on the most frequented roads. Poorer travellers were those who suffered most, as was natural; the rich had large trains: important persons were granted an escort in some cases, e.g. Lucian was escorted by two soldiers through Cappadocia (Alex. 55).

The Roman roads were probably at their best during the 1st cent., after Augustus had put an end to war and disorder. In the troublous period at the close of Nero's reign, disorder crept in again; and it is doubtful if the Flavian rule ever succeeded in repressing it so completely as Augustus had done. Thus St. Paul travelled in the best and safest period, and yet the roads even then were in some places far from safe (though probably this was only in exceptional parts). In the decay of the Empire and the general relaxation of order during civil wars and during the growing weakness of administration in the 3rd cent., travelling was much less secure. On the whole subject see Friedländer, p. 46 ff.; O. Hirschfeld, 'die Sicherheitspolizei im röm. Reich' (Berl. Sitzungsber. 1891, p. 845 ff.), 'die aegypt. Polizei der röm. Kaiserzeit' (ib. 1892, p. 815 ff.).

The Roman roads only traversed properly organized provinces, and not either foreign countries or territory not yet administered on thorough Roman principles, such as Cappadocia. That province occupied a peculiar position in the Roman Empire, as we have described it above, § viii. In the Pauline time, therefore, there was no Roman road leading across it from Ancyra to the Cilician Gates. That road could not have been made before A.D. 74, when Vespasian made Cappadocia into a fully organized province.

There was one remarkable exception to this general rule. The road from Derbe to Tarsus led almost entirely through non-Roman territory (governed in St. Paul's time by Antiochus IV.). Yet that road had been necessary for Roman communication with the province Cilicia ever since that province was organized in B.C. 104. The precise authority which Rome exercised along the road, and the relation between Roman and regal power over it, are wholly obscure. It was impossible to leave a road, along which Roman officials and couriers were frequently obliged to travel in the exercise of their duties, entirely under non-Roman authority; and yet it seems practically certain that Rome did not exercise authority over the cities on the course of the road before the time of Vespasian. It is in accordance with this anomalous position of affairs that no reference is made in Acts to that part of the road: it is wholly dropped out of sight, and the author speaks as if St. Paul passed directly from Cilicia into the Roman territory of Galatia at Derbe. St. Paul and his historian were thoroughly penetrated by the Roman spirit, and simply ignored non-Roman, i.e. non-provincial, territory.

ii. CONSTRUCTION, MEASUREMENTS, MILESTONES.—As to the construction of the Roman roads, it is unnecessary to speak here. The manner and measure varied greatly; and in the East it is not probable that the roads were built on the same massive scale as the Appian Way. Ten feet seems to have been a common breadth. The road through the long pass over Taurus, which leads from Tarsus to Tyana and to Kybistra, and which was built in a very costly and grand style, was 10 feet broad; but this breadth was required to be entirely serviceable; and where the road was cut through solid rock, the distance left between the rock walls seems to have been always fully 13 or 14 feet. The road across Taurus from Laranda to Olba and Korykos seems to have been narrower: it remains in a fairly complete condition about one to five miles from Korykos. But, again, some miles south of Ancyra, near Gorbeous, the Pilgrims' Route seems to have been very much broader.

Milestones are frequently found in groups of three or four, new stones having been erected when repairs were made. But the later Emperors, especially those of the 4th cent., were usually satisfied with the substitution of their names for those of some earlier Emperors on an old milestone: this may be classed along with many other examples of slovenliness and carelessness during the degradation of the Empire. After the 4th century hardly any milestones are known—one of many proofs that the Byzantine government had greatly degenerated from the thoroughness of method that characterized the Roman Empire.

iii. INNS AND ENTERTAINMENT.—Inns, taverns, and places of refreshment certainly existed in numbers along the great roads. Little is known about them, and the little that is known gives no favourable picture of them. Aristides complains of their half-ruinous condition, with leaky ceilings and general discomfort and disagreeable conduct on the part of the owners, on the road from Neapolis to Dyrrachium. His account suggests that he found the inns on this road poorer than those to which he was accustomed in Asia. To judge from all that is mentioned,—though one must not press too closely the complaint of travellers,—in the less civilized countries they were, as a rule, dirty, ill kept, and badly managed by churlish and ignorant hosts.* Hence wealthier travellers carried their own equipment, and the hospitality of private houses was much sought after.

On the other hand, in the Eastern provinces inns seem to have been much superior and far more numerous: competition raised the standard of equipment (as Plutarch says, de vit. Pud. 8, p. 532), and the art of innkeeping was very ancient in the province of Asia.† Epictetus, who originated from Hierapolis in the Lycus valley, speaks of the traveller being tempted to linger long in a splendid hotel.‡ The Panhormus which is mentioned near the summit of the road above the narrow pass of the Cilician Gates, must have been at least a large establishment, though probably more of the nature of a khan (in which only room, but no furniture,§ was supplied) than of a hotel; but at least there can be no doubt that food was supplied, whereas in modern khans nothing but coffee can be procured by the traveller. The present reason for this defect, viz. want of capital or of trading instinct, did not exist in Roman times; but it is mentioned in earlier Greek times, when the land was poorer (Plutarch, Apophth. Lacon. var. 44).

The fact that Aristides, travelling in Asia between Smyrna and Pergamus,* went to an inn before going to a friend's house, which Friedländer rightly notes, may serve as an indication of the superior character of inns in that province, though it must be remembered that he was travelling by night (Or. 27, p. 347 ff.). His discontent with the inns in Macedonia on the Egnatian Way shows probably that he was used to better accommodation in Asia (see above, § viii.).

Imperial officials, judges, soldiers on the march, and even municipal magistrates,† had the right to free quarters in the towns through which they passed. They were billeted on residents (though physicians and teachers of grammar, philosophy, and rhetoric were exempted by Vespasian). The behaviour of many of those who enjoyed the right of free quarters was rude and oppressive; and Plutarch (Cat. 12), in describing the modest and courteous behaviour of the younger Cato in this respect, shows by contrast what was done by others. Towns might avoid the burden by erecting a public house of entertainment,‡ as is stated in the inscription published by Waddington, Inscr. de la Syrie, No. 2524, on which see the remarks of Domaszewski in Mittheil. des Instit. Röm. 1902, p. 333. Such oppressive conduct was frequent, in spite of all attempts to repress it.§ Trajan wrote about it to Pliny (Epist. 77). Provincial governors were charged by the general mandata of the Emperor to prevent it.‖

Inns, taverns, or houses of better class for the entertainment of high officials (prætoria) were often erected by municipalities: see CIL iii. 6123. Friedländer, p. 41, quotes Man in Bull. d. Instit. 1882, p. 116 (but it may be a private hospitium or inn).

In one respect, however, the ancient inns were almost universally bad. They were little removed in character from houses of ill-fame; and such are sure (like their owners) to degenerate in general character. The profession of innkeepers was dishonourable, and their infamous character is often noted in Roman laws.¶

The story of the birth of St. Theodore of Sykea bears witness to an equally depraved condition of things in the 6th cent. after Christ; and in the Middle Ages the pilgrims to Jerusalem saw no improvement, and found that a decent stranger, if his ship were lying in harbour, would be wise to return to it at night rather than stay in an inn. In ancient writers allusion is often made to the way in which hosts and hostesses tried to induce travellers to enter their inns, also to their cheating and shamelessness. Finally, hostesses were often said to practise witchcraft.

The bad character of the inns imparts new meaning and stronger emphasis to the repeated and emphatic references made in early Christian literature to the duty of hospitality. It was not necessary to recommend this virtue because it was neglected in the society of that period, as, e.g., purity and various other virtues are urgently pressed on the attention of the early Christians, because ordinary society lacked them and cared not for them. On the contrary, hospitality was in all probability generally and regularly practised in pagan society. Nor was hospitality recommended merely on the general ground that it is a good thing: the advice and exhortations in early Christian literature are always given with a clear reference to the actual position and failings and interests of the people concerned. The reason for recommending it lies in the needs of the Christian travellers: they ought not to be left to the corrupt and nauseous surroundings of the inns kept by persons of the worst class in existing society. Gaius of Corinth, that meeting-place of nations, was remembered by Paul as the host of himself and of the whole Church (Ro 16^{23}).

The reference in Lk 10^{35} opens up the question of the expense of inns. The Samaritan there pays two denarii, about two francs, for the expense incurred at an inn for two persons for one night; he can hardly have intended this to cover part of any future expense, as the wounded person needed further care; for he promised to pay any expenditure beyond that amount, and it is not clear that there was any surplus after paying the night's expenses. The pay of a private in the Roman legions during the 1st cent. was a little over half a denarius per day, of a prætorian apparently two denarii; but the soldiers were discontented and mutinied, claiming a full denarius of daily pay (Tacitus, Annals, i. 17 and 26). Perhaps the action of the Samaritan was only a liberal payment of the bill already incurred, with a promise to pay any further expenses.

iv. CUSTOMS, ROAD-TAXES OR TOLLS, AND FRONTIER DUTIES.—Among the incidents of travel, custom-house examinations did not fail. Personal effects were free from duty; but merchandise of every kind was liable to a duty, sometimes by tariff, generally ad valorem, at the frontier of each of the provinces. Duties collected from travellers to pay for the maintenance of roads may be summed up along with the customs duties: there is not enough of evidence about them, but their existence seems certain.

Attempts to defraud the customs officers were numerous and varied: mille artibus circumscribimur, says the advocate of the customs officials in Quintilian, Declam. 341. The result necessarily was greater strictness on the part of the officers: the law gave them the right of searching the luggage and the person of all travellers (except that personal search of matrons was forbidden):[*] they sometimes disturbed and turned over personal luggage in the search for contraband articles.[†]

Officials, soldiers, and certain distinguished persons, by special favour of the Emperor, travelled duty-free, and safe from such troublesome examination (ἀτέλεια).

The customs duties (portoria) formed a most important item in the revenues of the Roman State, and their regular and complete exaction was a matter of the utmost moment.[‡] They were levied at the frontier stations in the nearest cities, which all bore the title portus, λιμήν, whether they were maritime towns or frontier towns on the great land roads. Hence, e.g., Derbe, which was a frontier town of the province Galatia, is called λιμήν by Stephanus Byzantinus.[§]

Only in the case of the province Achaia was there an exception perhaps made. Dessau (Hermes, xix. p. 532) expresses the opinion that the Romans exacted no customs duties in that province during the Imperial period, and thinks that Athens collected customs in the harbour of Piræus for its own benefit at that time, according to an inscription of Piræus (published in Philologus, 1870, vol. xxix. p. 694). If he is right, there were no customs duties in the great harbour of Corinth (except in so far as that city was permitted to charge for its own advantage); and this freedom would greatly encourage the passage of intercourse through the city.

The duties payable at the frontier varied widely in amount. In Sicily, in all the provinces of Illyricum,[*] perhaps in Africa, the charge was five per cent. all round, in Gaul and in Asia two and a half per cent. In Syria it was levied by tariff (πινάκιον), varying for different wares and products, and reckoned according to a formal statement or invoice (professio, ἀπογραφή): the tariff system is known to have existed at the great Euphrates-bridge, Zeugma, and at Palmyra,[†] and may therefore be supposed general for the whole of Syria.

v. THE TELONAI IN THE GOSPELS.—With regard to the tax-gatherers, or 'publicans,' τελῶναι, mentioned in the Gospels, there are some incorrect views which have obtained practically universal acceptance in books relating to the NT. (1) The telonai are usually described by modern authorities as if they were identical with, or agents of, the publicani—those great financial corporations which in the Republican period had farmed the revenues of entire provinces: in fact, the current translation, 'publicans,' bears witness to the almost universal acceptance of this mistake. (2) The telonai are also described by modern writers generally as being collectors of customs duties, and it is regularly pointed out that Capernaum and Jericho were near the frontier[‡] (Lk 5^{27} $19^{1.2}$, Mk 2^{14} etc.). But it is impossible to suppose that mere custom-house officers on the frontiers could be either so numerous or the object of such bitter and fanatical hatred as were those telonai. To see the falseness of the current view, and the true nature of the telonai, it is necessary to recapitulate briefly the history of the recent Roman practice in Palestine, and we accept the views stated by Rostowzew.[§]

In B.C. 57 Gabinius reorganized Judæa. He did not (as many authorities have supposed) make it a part of Syria or treat it as a province: this is proved with great probability by Unger.[‖] Gabinius introduced a partial autonomy, dividing Palestine into five parts, each with a capital city and an aristocratic synhedrion to administer the government. But a direct tax, stipendium, instituted by Pompey in B.C. 63, was paid by each part.[*] For taxation Palestine was treated along with Syria, the collection of the taxes in both being contracted for by one society of publicani. The publicani made their arrangements with the five synhedria, and the five capitals formed so many centres of administration and collection of the stipendium for and by the publicani.

[*] The character of the Illyrian system during the first century is unknown. From the time of Hadrian onwards the eight provinces Rhætia, Noricum, two of Pannonia, two of Mœsia, Dacia, Dalmatia, were organized for this purpose as a single governmental district, though dues were levied at the frontier of each district, as in Africa dues were levied probably at the frontiers of the four districts into which the province was divided (Rostowzew, pp. 393, 402): quattuor publica prov. Africæ was the full title of the African customs.

Volkes*^{3}, i. p. 475, wrongly supposes that Palmyra collected the tax for its own benefit, following Dessau, loc. cit.; Rostowzew shows that it acted on behalf of the fiscus, and was assisted or watched by Imperial officials.

[‡] It is, however, by no means clear that Capernaum was the frontier city on the road, though it was not far from the frontier. Jericho was at the frontier between procuratorial Judæa and Herod Antipas's Peræa. Rostowzew (p. 481) makes some not quite accurate geographical statements on this point.

Julius Cæsar restored the single government with the capital and centre at Jerusalem (Mommsen, Provinces, ii. p. 175). With this was united a remodelling of the regulations regarding the stipendium. The tax, at first, had to be paid in Zidon (as the central office of the company of publicani, doubtless);[†] but, after a year or two had elapsed, the control of the publicani was abolished, so far as concerned Palestine, and the ethnarch was made solely responsible for the levying of the tax and the payment of it to the Roman government.[‡] The autonomy of Judæa was thus restored very completely, except for the payment of a stipendium, but the tax was collected by the ruler of the nation in native fashion. Hence the census of Syria (according to Lk 2^1), which began in B.C. 8, was probably conducted by Herod over Palestine according to the Jewish tribal divisions (Ramsay, Was Christ Born in Bethlehem? ch. viii.).

This financial system lasted till A.D. 6, when Quirinius, in his second governorship of Syria, made Judæa a province, and subordinated it to Syria. It is quite obvious that the system of publicani was not then reintroduced. The census which Quirinius made shows that the Roman State retained the tax under its own control; whereas the previous census between 8 and 6 B.C. had evidently been made in Palestine according to native methods, because the taxation was levied by such methods.

Perhaps collection of taxes by the Roman State was now introduced, and the division of Judæa into eleven toparchiai must have probably been intended to facilitate this: these had their metropoleis and komai, and were probably not divided into poleis on the Greek system.

Many taxes were paid in the province Judæa—a heavy poll-tax, customs duties payable at the frontiers, road-tax on those who used the roads, land-tax, and many others.[§] The system was probably much the same as in the Seleucid times.

The so-called 'publicans,' τελῶναι in NT, were the agents in collecting these taxes. It is obvious that these 'publicans' have no connexion with or relation to the old publicani of the Roman Republic. Those old publicani had been financiers on a vast scale, who farmed the taxes of an entire province, paid a lump sum to the Roman State, collected the taxes by their own staff of agents, and made large profits out of the revenue which they collected. Their staff was a highly trained band of clerks and agents, consisting chiefly of their slaves and freedmen, who were familiar with the work of tax-collecting, ready to be employed in any province farmed by the financial company, almost always foreigners and not natives of the province where they were stationed. But the telonai of the NT were Jews, who prayed in the temple, and with whom Jesus and His disciples sat at meat. They were contractors or farmers on a small scale: they arranged for the collecting of one tax in one town or small district. Their precise relation to the Roman government and their method of remuneration is not attested, but Rostowzew regards it as practically certain that they did not pay down a lump sum by contract and retain all that they could collect over that amount, and he suggests that they perhaps may have been paid through a percentage on the amount collected.

Hence the telonai in a town were very numerous (Lk 5^{27-30}, Mk $2^{16.\,17}$, Lk $19^{1ff.}$, Mt $9^{9ff.}$). Each had his own office, where he sat, where he collected his own special tax alone or with others, for associations or companies of telonai sometimes united to make the contract. Those telonai were persons of some property, as is quite distinctly implied in the Gospels (cf. also Josephus, BJ II. 14. 4 [Niese, § 287]). They were permitted by law to collect only a certain fixed duty according to law or tariff, though there were many instances in which they illegally collected more than the proper amount; see Lk $3^{12.\,13}$. They had no right of exacting arrears, but could merely denounce and accuse defaulters before the officers of the State (συκοφαντεῖν, Lk 19^8; Rostowzew, p. 343 f.): their powers, therefore, fell far short of those exercised by the old Republican publicani and their agents. These telonai were evidently all natives of the country; and the fiscal system was practically the same as in Roman Egypt, a slightly modified continuation by Augustus of the Hellenistic system, which utilized the native population as collectors.

The change which Julius Cæsar in B.C. 47–44 introduced, and which Augustus in A.D. 6 confirmed, in abolishing the sway of the publicani in Judæa,[*] was only part of the general change introduced gradually in the Empire. The exactions and tyranny of the publicani had been the greatest evil of Republican Roman government in the provinces. The Emperors gradually increased the activity of the government, narrowly watched the conduct of the publicani, reduced their gains, collected the new Imperial taxes (such as that on inheritances) without their aid, and finally abolished them entirely, as Rostowzew has shown with admirable skill in the dissertation from which we have so frequently quoted. The collection of customs duties (portoria) was the sphere in which the publicani had persisted longest, because in that department, through their immense staffs of trained agents, they had a great advantage; but even there they were superseded, at latest in the 2nd cent., in Judæa already by the arrangements of Julius Cæsar. The Imperial government rarely substituted direct collection by its own officials and staff; sometimes it employed the cities, e.g. Palmyra, as above pointed out, but generally it used a large staff of small farmers of revenue, who collected each one tax in a small district, and who were carefully superintended by Imperial officials, to whom they had to refer all doubtful cases.

In the Republican period the publicani had been, of course, subject to the jurisdiction of the proconsul or other governor of the province. But their situation, subject to the governor of a year,—who had no knowledge from his previous training of the facts and methods of tax-collecting, and was therefore quite unable to understand the real character of many of the complicated questions connected with the vast business-organization, whose correct working he was supposed to keep an eye upon,—was very different from the situation of the contractors under the Empire, who were watched over by an Imperial procurator, trained to the duty, selected by the Emperor, as a rule, on account of his familiarity with the duty, remaining for years in the same office, and commanding all the collected information that was stored up in the Imperial bureau. It was necessary under the Empire for the contractors to be very much more careful, when the regular methods of overseeing had gradually established fixed and minute rules of procedure, than under the Republican régime when there were only vague and general principles laid down as to the conduct of the collectors, and it was rarely difficult, and usually extremely easy, to hoodwink even a just and strict governor. The publicani of the Republic had been the masters, tyrants, and scourges of the provinces, able to seize, torture, and ill-treat as they pleased any provincial whom they declared to be in arrears—permitted by the governors of provinces (who were almost all ignorant and either feeble or corrupt) to exact what they wanted in any way they pleased—gaining great wealth with little or no responsibility in practice. The tax-contractors (telonai) of the Imperial time, or even the publicani where they continued in that period to exist, were far more closely and efficiently superseded: the amount which they could collect legally was much better known through the tariff: the telonai had not such a direct interest (though they had some interest) in collecting too much, and had no power to collect arrears at all, but could merely denounce the defaulter to the proper Imperial officials. It is probably the case that, if a telones failed to prove his case against a defaulter, he had to forfeit a penalty (possibly fourfold the sum claimed, for Zacchæus's obscure and unexplained statement in Lk 19^8 was perhaps founded on legal usage).[*]

---

[*] This stipendium, an unusual kind of tax in the Roman State, was probably imitated from the Seleucid custom in Syria.

[†] This, of course, implies that the tax in Palestine was collected, not by agents of the publicani but by the government of the land of Judæa, which in turn paid it to the publicani. This avoided the worst evils.

[‡] Mommsen and others suppose that Judæa was freed from the tax by Cæsar, and that the edicts on the subject (Josephus, Ant. Jud. XIV. v. 6) refer only to Joppa. Niese in Hermes, xi. 435, and Viereck, Sermo Græcus, p. 100, show that the text of Josephus must not be tampered with (as Mommsen has to do). Appian mentions Herod among the kings who paid tribute.

[*] Schürer does not admit this, Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes^{3}, i. p. 478; and sets aside Wieseler, Beitr. z. richt. Würdigung d. Evangelien, 1869, p. 78 f., who had seen rightly.

The telonai collected taxes paid in money, not tithes or other dues paid in kind. The Jews regarded it as a fundamental principle of their religion that they should pay no money except to the temple and the priests. But the telonai, exacting the many various kinds of taxes, intruded unpleasantly into the life of the people at every turn, and were a constant reminder of their subjection. Moreover, the fact that they were Jews, who made themselves the agents of the oppressor, and acquired money by exacting it from their own brethren, made them even more despised than if they had been Romans or slaves of Romans, like the agents of the old publicani.

So far as we can judge from the Gospels, the method of tax-collecting was, generally speaking, the same in the procuratorial province of Palestine and in Herod Antipas's kingdom of Galilee and Peræa. Small contractors for a single tax in a district performed the work of collecting both in the province and in the kingdom. The superintendence of these contractors lay with the supreme taxing authority. In the province the authority was, of course, the Imperial government. In the kingdom the authority is not quite certain. While it is possible that Antipas was permitted to collect the taxes for the Romans in his kingdom, as his father Herod had done, it seems more probable that he was not so honourably treated as Herod the Great had been, and that Roman officials supervised the telonai in his kingdom as in the province.

III. MEANS AND POPULARITY OF TRAVEL.—i. TRAVEL AS PICTURED IN THE CLASSICAL LITERATURE.—To judge from many expressions used by the leading men of letters and philosophic moralists in classical times, travelling might seem not to have been popular. Those writers often speak as if travelling, especially by sea, were confined to traders who risked their life to make money, and as if the dangers were so great that none but the reckless and greedy would incur them; and the opinion is often expressed, especially by poets, that to adventure oneself on the sea is an impious and unnatural act. The well-known words of Horace (Od. i. 3) are typical of that point of view.

But that point of view was traditional among the poets; it had been handed down from the time when travelling was much more dangerous and difficult, when ships were small in size and fewer in number, when seamanship and method were inferior, when few roads had been built, and travel even by land was uncertain. Moreover, seafaring and land travel were hostile to the contentment, discipline, and quiet orderly spirit which Greek poetry and thought loved to dwell on and to recommend: they tended to encourage the spirit of disorder, rebellion against authority, self-confidence and self-assertiveness, the ναυτικὴ ἀναρχία, stigmatized by Euripides in the Hecuba. In Roman literature the Greek models and the old Greek sentiments were looked up to and imitated as sacred and final; and those expressions of the Roman writers, like the Corinthian Canal and the dread of Cape Malea,[*] were a proof of their bondage to their Greek masters in thought.

When we look deeper, we find underneath and behind those superficial sentiments very different views expressed by the writers who wrote in closer contact with the real facts of the Imperial world. Writers like Philo and Pliny in the 1st cent., Appian, Plutarch, Epictetus, Aristides in the 2nd cent., are full of admiration of the Imperial peace and its fruits: the sea was covered with ships interchanging the products of different regions of the earth, wealth was vastly increased, comfort and well-being improved, hill and valley covered with the dwellings of an increasing population: wars and pirates and robbers had been put an end to, travel was free and safe, all men could journey where they wished, the most remote and lonely countries were opened up by roads and bridges: such is the picture of the Roman world which those writers place before us.[†]

It is the simple truth that travelling, whether for business or for pleasure, was contemplated and performed under the Empire with an indifference, confidence, and, above all, certainty, which were unknown in after centuries until the introduction of steamers and the consequent increase in ease and sureness of communication.

ii. TRAVEL IN THE CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.—The impression given by the early Christian writings is in perfect agreement with the language of those writers who spoke from actual contact with the life of the time, and did not merely imitate older models and utter afresh old sentiments. Probably the feature in those Christian writings, which causes most surprise at first to the traveller familiar with those countries in modern times, is the easy confidence with which extensive plans of travel were formed and announced and executed by the early Christians. In Ac 16^{1ff.} a journey by land and sea through parts of Syria, Cilicia, a corner of Cappadocia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, Mysia, the Troad, Thrace, Macedonia, and Greece is described, and no suggestion is made that this long journey was unusual or strange, except that the somewhat heightened tone of the narrative in 16^{7-9} corresponds to the rather perplexingly rapid changes of scene and successive frustrations of St. Paul's intentions. But those who are most intimately acquainted with those countries know best how serious an undertaking it would be at the present time to repeat that journey, how many accidents might occur in it, and how much care and thought would be advisable before one entered on so extensive a programme.

---

[*] ἐσυκοφάντησα in that passage is commonly misunderstood and mistranslated: it does not mean 'exacted': the passage means 'if I have accused any defaulter before the government and had him condemned to pay up arrears.' It is possible that, in mentioning this detail, Zacchæus was replying to the unspoken accusation of unfair conduct levelled at all his class, and that he meant 'as to this accusation, my reply is that when I have made an unfair claim for arrears, I forfeit as a penalty four times the sum claimed: this makes it practically impossible for us to act so unfairly and extortionately as we are accused of doing.' But the first part of his statement would still remain as obscure as it is on the ordinary interpretations.

[*] See above, pp. 382, 389.

[†] Friedländer quotes Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 7 and 21, pp. 552, 566; Plut. de fort Rom. 2; Appian, Præf. 6; Epict. Diss. iii. 13. 9; Plin. Nat. Hist. xiv. 2, xxvii. 2 f.; Aristides, Or. ix εἰς βασιλέα, p. 66 (Dind. i. p. 111).

Again, in 18^{21} St. Paul touched at Ephesus in the ordinary course of the pilgrim-ship which was conveying him and many other Jews to Jerusalem for the Passover. When he was asked to remain, he excused himself, but promised to return as he came back from Jerusalem by a long land journey through Syria, Cilicia, Lycaonia, and Phrygia: that extensive journey seems to be regarded by speaker and hearers as quite an ordinary excursion. In Ro 15^{24}, when writing from Corinth, St. Paul sketches out a comprehensive plan. He is eager to visit Rome: first he must go to Jerusalem, but thereafter he is bent on visiting Spain, and his course will naturally lead him through Rome, so that he will, without intruding himself on them, have the opportunity of seeing and affecting the Romans and their Church on his way. Throughout mediæval times nothing like this off-hand way of sketching out extensive plans was natural or intelligible: there were then, indeed, some great travellers, but those travellers knew how uncertain their journeys were, and they would hardly have expressed such rapid plans as a matter of serious business, because they were aware that any plans would be frequently liable to interruption, and that nothing could be calculated on as reasonably certain: they entered on long journeys, but regarded them as open to modification or even frustration: in indicating their plans they knew that they would be regarded by others as attempting something great and strange. But St. Paul's methods and language seem to show clearly that such journeys as he contemplated were looked on as quite natural and usual by those to whom he spoke or wrote. He could go off from Greece or Macedonia to Palestine and reckon with practical certainty on being in Jerusalem in time for a feast day not far distant: 'I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem; but I will return again unto you, if God will' (Ac 18^{21} AV). The last condition is added, not as indicating uncertainty, but in the usual spirit of Eastern religion, which forbids a resolve about the future, however simple and sure, to be declared without the express recognition of Divine authority—like the Mohammedan 'inshallah,' which never fails when the most ordinary resolution about the morrow is stated.

iii. TRAVEL CONFINED TO THE ROMAN EMPIRE.—One of the main causes for that certainty and confidence in travel lay in the unification of the Empire and the profound peace and security established by the Emperors over all the Mediterranean world. Travellers were everywhere in their own country. Travel in foreign countries was never common among the ancients. Although many considerable journeys in foreign and barbarous lands had been made, they were adventurous and exceptional, and stand on quite a different platform from the easy, sure journeys which we are describing as characteristic of the early Imperial period. The Roman traveller travelled in the Roman world; but that world was now so extensive that his journeys could be made on a much greater scale. Moreover, war was no longer to be dreaded; only civil war was now possible, since a foreign army could not be thought of within the Roman bounds; and when St. Paul was travelling, civil war had long ceased to be considered as a possible contingency (though it broke out shortly after his death). Again, Augustus had exterminated piracy by sea and brigandage by land, as Epictetus said; and though, as we have seen, the statement can only be accepted with certain limitations, it was fairly correct during a vigorous period of provincial government (such as that between A.D. 47 and 61, during which most of St. Paul's travelling was performed), and in the thoroughly organized parts of the Empire.

When St. Paul confined his work and his immediate plans so entirely to the Roman world, he was not merely acting in the spirit of his time, which he had unconsciously assimilated during his childhood as a Roman Tarsian, but he was guided by the practical possibilities of communication and travel at the time. The 'door' was open wide in the one direction, in the other it was closed. That the Scythian was ultimately to be included in the universal Church, was of course part of his ideal; but that lay further away and beyond the sphere of immediate work, and, moreover, the prevalent idea in the Roman world doubtless was that the Roman rule and Empire was steadily growing wider and taking in more and more of the alien world. New provinces were continually being added during St. Paul's lifetime. A little more than twenty years after his death, Dion Chrysostom was wandering among Scythians and Getæ through South Russia and Hungary from the mouth of the Borysthenes to the Upper Danube, and soon afterwards a new province of Dacia was formed on the north of the Danube.

iv. CLASSES OF TRAVELLERS, AND MOTIVES FOR TRAVELLING.—In the NT we find a large number and a great variety of travellers: Lydia, the 'Lydian woman' from Thyatira, dealing in turkey-red stuffs at Philippi:* Luke, the doctor, at Troas: Aquila, the Pontic tent-maker, with his wife at Rome and Corinth and Ephesus, and back at Rome again: Bar-Jesus, the Jewish magician at Paphos: Paul, taken in many cities for a lecturer on ethics and philosophy wandering in search of fame and a situation: Apollos coming to Ephesus probably in the same way: the agents of Chloe travelling between Ephesus and Corinth, probably for business purposes (Expositor, February 1900, p. 104): the centurion conducting a body of prisoners to Rome: besides these, many travellers for Church purposes, like the deputation in Ac 20 and 21, Titus at Corinth, Timothy and Silas sent to Macedonia, and so on.

There was a similar variety of travellers in the ordinary society of the Roman world. Then, as now, there was a tendency in the people to crowd into the cities: farming and country life were found to be hard and not very profitable. Officials and messengers were continually travelling backwards and forwards between Rome and the various provinces, or from province to province, as they were transferred from one to another: centurions and soldiers in charge of prisoners, a few occasionally for trial who were Romans, most mere criminals intended for the venationes (like Paul the Roman citizen and the criminals who were conducted along with him, Ac 27): many recruits, of whom at least 20,000 annually were needed for the armies, those of the west being filled up from the western provinces in general, those of the east from the eastern (though Hadrian changed that Augustan system, and arranged a series of territorial armies with local recruiting, which would diminish the number of travelling recruits). Embassies from the cities to Rome, or to provincial governors, are known from inscriptions to have been very common, e.g. Byzantium sent every year two complimentary embassies, one to the Emperor in Rome and one to the governor of Mœsia, until Trajan ordered the city to content itself with letters. Travelling for purposes of education, pleasure, or health kept thousands on the roads. Vast crowds flocked to the great festivals of Greece and Italy: Dion Chrysostom's account of the Isthmian festival is doubtless founded on what he had seen, though it is placed in the time of Diogenes.[*] Students flocked to the great universities, Athens, Alexandria, Rome, etc. Strabo mentions it as a peculiarity of Tarsus that no students came to it from abroad, but its lecture-rooms were crowded with native students, though some of the young Tarsians went abroad to study. Curative springs and the famous medical schools which were often attached to great religious centres (such as the temple of Men Carou, near Laodicea, of Asklepios at Pergamus, etc.) attracted large numbers of patients, often from great distances: thus we saw above that Spanish invalids visited Vicarello in Tuscany for centuries. Voyages were made for the sake of health: Gallio did so twice at least—once when he was governor of Achaia, another time long after from Rome to Alexandria (see St. Paul the Traveller, p. 261: these two voyages are often confused): we believe that St. Paul made a similar journey to the high country of Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13^{14}). Tourists for the mere pleasure of sightseeing were numerous, and Pliny expresses his wonder that Italian people went away in numbers to see foreign scenery and remained ignorant of the wonders and beauties of their own country (Epist. viii. 20).

Again, there was a great deal of emigration in search of employment. This led chiefly to the great cities, and, above all, to Rome. In the great city men of all nations were found; and the Syrian Orontes, as Juvenal (Sat. iii. 62) says, emptied itself into the Tiber. But in every city visitors or strangers resident for business purposes were common: they came as traders, actors, and artists, physicians, magicians, and quacks, teachers of grammar, philosophy, and rhetoric, and so on. The inscriptions of every province offer numerous examples.

Formal geographical accounts of the products, resources, cities, and monuments of various countries in the Roman world were in existence. Strabo's Geography, written about A.D. 19, and Pausanias's elaborate account of all that was worth seeing in Greece (written in the 2nd cent.), were the outcome of a great many previous works of similar kind.

v. Road Maps, Guide-books, and Statistics.—Maps of the roads, lists of halting-places and distances both by land and by sea journeys, and other means whereby intending travellers could plan out and reckon their route, were evidently common. A fragment of an account, indicated day by day, of a journey through the Cilician Gates, has been found in Rome;[†] and it is quite probable that such an itinerary on papyrus could be purchased in Tarsus in the time of St. Paul. Many such itineraries in more or less complete form have been preserved, belonging mostly to a later time. But similar ones were at the disposal of the geographers such as Strabo (B.C. 64 – A.D. 19), whose account even of countries which he had not seen is accurate to a degree otherwise impossible of attainment. Four silver vases have been found at Vicarello in Etruria, shaped like milestones, and inscribed with the full itinerary from Cadiz to Rome. They belong to different periods, and represent therefore a long-continued custom: they can hardly be explained otherwise than as dedications made at the famous baths of Vicarello by Spaniards, who in gratitude left a memorial of themselves and their journey as a votive offering to the Divine healing power at the baths.

vi. Means of Locomotion in Journeys by Land.—The land journeys mentioned in the NT seem to have been for the most part performed on foot. There is one evident exception. In Ac $21^{15.16}$ a journey of 68 Roman miles is described from Cæsarea to Jerusalem. That long distance was traversed in two days: that this was the duration of the journey is shown clearly in the Western text, which mentions that the travellers rested for the night in a village at the house of Mnason and went on to Jerusalem the next day, while the Cæsarean disciples returned home. Though this meaning is not so clearly evident in the accepted text of Ac 21^{16}, it appears on closer consideration to lie in it also: v.^{15}, they set about the journey to Jerusalem (imperfect tense): v.^{16}, they lodged with Mnason, to whose house the Cæsarean disciples conducted them: v.^{17} they reached Jerusalem and were welcomed (see Expositor, March 1895, p. 214 ff.).[*] It is clearly irreconcilable with the results which we have attained, that a miscellaneous body of travellers from various cities of Greece and Asia Minor, who must have had some personal luggage with them, could perform a journey of 68 miles in two days on foot without horse or carriage.

Now, in 21^{15} the preparation for this journey is described: the writer at the beginning of the land stage of the long journey felt it necessary to explain that some preparations were made. The word used is ἐπισκευασάμενοι,[†] which Chrysostom renders 'we took what was needed for the land journey' (τὰ πρὸς τὴν ὁδοιπορίαν λαβόντες). There must lie in this some allusion to the horses or vehicles for the journey; and it is not impossible that ὑποζύγια or ζῷα is to be understood with τά in Chrysostom's explanation. But, however that may be, equipment and preparation obviously imply means of conveyance. In the case of persons who simply rose up and walked to Jerusalem, there would have been no room or need, in this extremely concise narrative, for describing their preparations. The narrative, therefore, makes it clear that there was some amount of luggage to be carried to Jerusalem, and that horses or carriages had to be employed. Now ἐπισκευάσαι ἵππον means 'to saddle or to load a horse,'[‡] and it seems quite possible in Greek to take the middle voice as meaning 'we got ready or saddled horses for our use.'[§] Both horses and carriages could undoubtedly be hired for journeys in such a city as Cæsarea (see Friedländer, p. 20 ff.).

vii. Ships and Shipping Arrangements.—Little that could be said on this point has any bearing on the NT.

The art of shipbuilding had been so greatly improved that vessels of very considerable size were constructed. Lucian's Navigium describes an Alexandrian corn vessel towards the end of the 2nd cent. as 120 cubits, or 180 feet, in length; from which James Smith (Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul^{3}, p. 182 ff.) calculates the tonnage as between 1100 and 1200, a much more sober estimate than some scholars reach. Josephus (Vit. 3) sailed for Rome in a ship which carried 600 passengers, St. Paul in one carrying 276.[*]

[§] Grotius (as Professor Knowling mentions) understood it as sarcinas iumentis imponere. See also Expositor, March 1895, p. 216 f.

In shape and in rigging, however, there had not been much improvement on the more ancient and primitive vessels. There was still a great deal of unnecessary and useless length in the high bow and stern, which stood far out above the water; so that there was a great difference between the length of that part of the keel which was immersed and the total length of the ship. The ship was sailed mainly by one large sail on the single mast: hence it was always difficult to shorten sail and to adapt the ship to a wind as it grew stronger. Moreover, the leverage of the single huge sail on a single mast exercised a tremendous disruptive power on the hull of the vessel: hence ancient vessels encountered much greater danger in the open sea than modern sailing vessels have to face, and were often sunk owing to the timbers being wrenched asunder by the straining of the mast, and the ship being thus made leaky and unfit to keep out the water; whereas modern sailing vessels are usually safe in the open sea and more in danger near shore.

In addition to the great sail[†] other sails were also used, though apparently only as subsidiary; and they were not employed in every ship. There was sometimes a topsail (supparum) above the great sail. Moreover, there were one or more small storm-sails, which could be substituted for the great sail when the wind was too strong: some such subsidiary sails were an absolute necessity in a ship which had to go on a voyage far from home.

There were also small sails—one or more on the bow, and one behind the great sail towards the stern. These seem all to have been only occasionally used as supplementary. In Ac 27^{40} the artemon was set to work the disabled ship. A single sail, set to work a large ship, must have been either rigged on the great mast, or set further forward. If the mast was still fit to be used, the former would be more probable; but some analogous cases point to the artemon being rather a foresail, set on the bow, where a small mast was often placed (as is shown in several works of ancient art). The case mentioned by Juvenal (Sat. xii. 69), where a ship disabled by a storm manages to make its way into harbour by the sail on the prow, the only remaining one, which the scholiast explains as the artemon, must in this obscure subject be regarded as the strongest piece of evidence available.[‡]

Ships of war were more lightly built, for the sake of rapid manœuvring, and were as a general rule impelled partly at least by oars. Hence they were independent of the winds to a great degree. But, owing to the slightness of their build, they could not venture on long over-sea voyages: moreover, they had not storage room for the equipment needed for such voyages. See above, I. § vii. p. 381.

viii. Passenger Ships.—The ships of which travellers availed themselves were doubtless as a rule trading ships, whose movements were determined mainly by considerations of freight and lading, not of passengers; in other words, the ships made money mainly from the freight, and not from the passengers' fares. Hence regular services at stated intervals for the convenience mainly of passengers probably did not exist. Travellers embarked in a vessel that happened to be going in their direction, and were dependent on the chances of the trade; and, as we have seen above, this often affected the arrangement of their journey.

There must, however, have been certain exceptions. The large numbers of persons who visited the great religious festivals and games must have required special vessels where a sea had to be crossed; and just as special steamers now run from Smyrna and Athens for the festival of the Panagia of Tino, so in ancient times the people of the Ionian race were conveyed to the great national reunion in the festival of Apollo of Delos, whose place the Panagia has taken. In some cases, where presence at the festival was a national duty, the city probably sent the people at State expense. But in many cases, and especially in later times, when national ties were weakened, and the festivals were visited chiefly from motives of curiosity, artistic and athletic interest, or enjoyment, the ships were run from commercial motives, and the owners profited by the fares of passengers.

One case of this class is of great importance as affecting the NT. Thousands of Jews of the Diaspora were able to go up to the Passover at Jerusalem only by ship: the land journey from distant cities would have been too tedious and slow. It may, e.g., be regarded as certain that all Jews who went up to the Passover from the western, the northern, and even the eastern coasts of the Ægean, travelled on board ship; and that ships were run for their special benefit in order to make money from the passengers. Such pilgrim-ships would run for the special purpose of the festival, and would lose no time by the way from stopping for other purposes. Thus it would be safe to start from such a port as Corinth or Ephesus much later than would be prudent on an ordinary trading vessel, liable to stop for days in harbours on the way to load or unload. The time of absence from home and business required for the journey was thus much shortened.

The position of Jews in the Diaspora was affected in various ways by the pilgrim-ships. On the one hand, those ships immensely facilitated communication, and made it possible for far larger numbers of Jews to go up to the Feast: thus they strengthened the national feeling and sense of unity, which so marvellously resisted the dissociating influence of distance and of difference between the Diaspora and the Palestinian Jews in language, customs, and education. On the other hand, they offered opportunities for oppressing and annoying the Jews in every harbour that the ship had to enter: mere strictness in enforcing harbour regulations might cause delay, and this could be best avoided by bribery: greed or positive ill-will might prolong the detention so as to endanger the purpose of the voyage or compel the payment of large sums: the mere fact of a great number of Jews being collected in one ship gave opportunity for many acts of injustice and malevolence. Hence it is easy to see why numerous edicts of kings and Roman officials and Emperors in favour of the Jews reiterate the provision for unimpeded liberty to journey to Jerusalem.

[*] Some scholars say that the ship Dioscuri, which wintered at Malta, took on board the whole 276 (Ac 28^{11}); but this is not stated in the text, though it may possibly be true: if the Dioscuri could take on board 276 passengers beyond its own complement—even crowded in for a short voyage of a few days—it must have been a very large vessel.

[†] It is advisable to avoid the name 'mainsail,' which is a technical term with a different connotation in modern ships.

[‡] Quod superaverat unum, velo prora suo. The scholiast says artemone solo velificaverunt. It is possible that he was only making an inference from Acts or some other similar passage; but such a mere possibility cannot be considered to counterbalance the probability in his favour or to invalidate his evidence.

The right understanding of Ac $20^{1\mathrm{ff.}}$ is influenced by this fact. St. Paul was on the point of sailing from Corinth to Palestine: he was going to be for ten days or more in the company and the power of a body of Jews, including the most zealous and, in some cases, fanatical among them. The situation was at the best a dangerous one. It became known that some of the Jews were openly stating their intention of using this favourable opportunity to get rid of their enemy: murder on shore was too dangerous, but murder at sea on a ship where all except a few sailors were Jews[*] might be easily carried out in such a way as to defy investigation and probably even to escape notice: the loss of one pilgrim in a crowd might probably never even be observed. It was therefore resolved that St. Paul must avoid this obvious and serious danger. He was quite ready and resolute to adventure himself in Jerusalem, where the danger was equally great. But there in the great city at the Feast his death, if it came, would be a public protest in favour of truth and freedom: on shipboard it would be unknown and useless, so far as these high ends were concerned. Moreover, he was in charge of a considerable sum of money contributed at Corinth (see next paragraph), and was responsible for its safe delivery at Jerusalem. It was, however, impossible by that time to reach Jerusalem for the Feast by any ordinary vessel; and therefore St. Paul sailed for Philippi and spent the Passover there.

Presumably, the delegates who were to accompany him to Jerusalem carrying the voluntary contributions of the Pauline Churches (just as among the Jews then 'men of noble birth are entrusted with the conveyance to Jerusalem' of the accumulated annual dues paid by the Jews in the Diaspora)[†] had arranged to meet him at Ephesus. On the new arrangement the Asian delegates came on to Troas to meet him and the Macedonian delegates (Ac 20^{4}). The party was dependent now on the chances of trading vessels, and therefore the start was made from Philippi as soon as the Passover and the Days of Unleavened Bread were ended. There was no detention at Neapolis, which is not even mentioned. Owing to the great importance of the passage between Neapolis and Troas, as we have seen, vessels of one kind or another must have been constantly, probably daily, available there. At Troas, however, there was a detention of seven days; and then there seems to have been a choice of vessels—one going round the west and south coast of Asia Minor, making a short stay of three or four days at Miletus, but otherwise only the ordinary nightly halts of coasting vessels; the other intending to put in at Ephesus and make a considerable stay there for some purpose connected with her freight. In these circumstances Paul, though desirous of seeing the Church of Ephesus, chose the ship that sailed past that city, because he was desirous of reaching Jerusalem in time for the Feast of Pentecost, and did not wish to run any risk of being too late (Ac 20^{16}). Some commentators suggest that he was also unwilling to go to Ephesus, from fear lest trouble might arise there, as on his previous residence; but when a perfectly sufficient reason is stated in our authority, it seems unjustifiable to add another reason.[‡] This case is a very instructive example of what might happen in voyages made by common travellers.

ix. IMPERIAL TRANSPORT SHIPS.—We have, above, spoken about the Alexandrian corn ships as belonging to the Imperial service. In the strictest point of view that is not quite accurate. Those ships were not government vessels, like men-of-war. They belonged to private owners, or rather great trading companies, who contracted in open market with the Imperial government[*] for the conveyance of the corn. As in the collection of taxes, the government found it easier to give out the work to contract than to organize for itself the enormous machinery in men and equipment needed for that great service. But, on the other hand, those ships were exclusively used for the Alexandrian service (as other companies contracted for other special services and purposes);[†] the companies received certain subventions from the State (including a free gift of all the wood needed for building), and immunities for all members from various public burdens; and thus they were bound in a great degree to the State service, and became almost part of the State equipment. Gradually it was found advisable in the public interest to bind them more closely, until at last they became hereditary servants of the State for that duty, and unable to free themselves from the service, which descended from father to son, and which was remunerated by percentage[‡] at a rate fixed by law, and no longer given out at contract. See Marquardt, Röm. Privatalt. ii. 405 ff.

x. CORRESPONDENCE.—Communication by letter had been common from remote antiquity. The familiar use of writing leads to correspondence between absent friends as inevitably as the possession of articulate speech produces conversation and discussion. Now it is becoming more certain and evident through the progress of discovery that writing was widely and familiarly used from an extremely early period. There was, of course, a very marked line of distinction, in ancient society, between the educated section of the population, which could read and write, and the uneducated, which could not; and the distinction did not at all correspond to the distinction between free and slave; on the contrary, many of the slaves in households of the educated class were specially highly and carefully educated, when their abilities were such that education would make them more useful to their masters.

With the great development of travel and communication in the Roman Imperial period, it might have been expected that communication by letter should have been greatly developed and increased. It is, however, extremely doubtful if that was the case.

The weakest side of the Imperial system always was its comparative carelessness of the intellectual and spiritual well-being of the population. To feed and to amuse ('panem et Circenses') nearly summed up its ideal of treatment for the masses. Real education, which the Greek cities admired and aimed at, grew weaker and poorer as the Empire grew older. The fact that in the purely barbarian provinces, such as Pannonia, Mœsia, etc., the introduction of the Roman civilization and government caused an educated class to grow up, should not be allowed to conceal the real fact that the educated class was not enlarged proportionately over the whole Empire.

And, similarly, epistolary correspondence was probably not much, if at all, increased in those [*] Such ships may probably have been owned and perhaps in part manned by Jews; though the existence of Jewish sailors is not much attested at that time.

[†] As Philo, de Mon. ii. 3 (ii. 24, Mangey), says. The passage is quoted by Prof. Schürer in the art. DIASPORA, above, § v.

[‡] Moreover, it is quite unnatural to suppose that in the great city of Ephesus the return of a single Jew for a week or so must necessarily be observed.

[*] Ad hastam locamus ut nobis ex transmarinis provinciis advehatur frumentum (Columella, de Re Rust. 1, pr. 20).

[†] Special ships were built for the transport of the immense blocks and monolithic columns of coloured marble: the nature of the transport required that, and Pliny mentions that naves marmorum causa fiunt (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 2).

parts of the Empire where civilization and education had existed before the Roman conquest. The Imperial government made no attempt at, and never even seems to have thought about, carrying the correspondence of private persons, or facilitating such communication between them. The post, as we have seen, was absolutely confined to Imperial and strictly official needs. Private letters could be sent only by special messengers, or by the hands of friends or acquaintances, or by some other chance opportunity. Such opportunities were, it is true, more numerous when the number of travellers was greater; but this led to no permanent development of the idea. Such statistics as are preserved seem to show that the transmission of private letters continued slow, irregular, and uncertain: see p. 383.

It is probably true that a larger number of private letters has been preserved of the Imperial period than of an earlier time; but this is due to the naturally more nearly complete destruction of the memorials of the older period in the longer lapse of time, especially inasmuch as private letters were written for the most part on perishable materials, which survive nowhere and in no climate except in Egypt.

Only in one respect was there any real development of epistolary communication between private individuals under the Roman Empire; and this development was not so much in the frequency of letter-writing as in the purpose and character of letters written by private individuals. The Christians developed the letter into new forms, applied it to new uses, and placed it on a much higher plane than it had ever before stood upon. In their hands communication by letter became one of the most important, if not the most important, of all agencies for consolidating and maintaining the sense of unity among the scattered members of the one universal Church. The scattered congregations had for centuries no real unifying and directing centre of life: Jerusalem had been in some degree such a centre at first; but whether or not it could otherwise have maintained that authoritative position, all chance of its continuing to be the head and centre of the universal Church disappeared with its siege and capture by Titus and the changes that were forced on by that event; and no other city took, or could take, its place for several centuries. The unity of the separate and equal congregations was kept alive by travel and by correspondence. By such means the congregations expressed their mutual affection and sympathy and sense of brotherhood, asked counsel of one another, gave advice with loving freedom and plain speaking to one another, imparted mutual comfort and encouragement, and generally expressed their sense of their common life. Thus arose a new category of Epistles.

Deissmann, following older scholars, has rightly and clearly distinguished the two older categories, the true letter—written by friend to friend or to friends, springing from the momentary occasion, intended only for the eye of the person or persons to whom it is addressed—and the literary epistle—written with an eye to the public, and studied with careful literary art. But he has erred in trying to reduce all the letters of the NT to one or other of these categories. Though he shows some vague sense of the insufficiency of the two older categories, yet he has not seen with sufficient clearness, nor stated with sufficient precision, that in the new conditions a new category had been developed—the general letter addressed to a whole class of persons or to the entire Church of Christ. Letters of this class are true letters, in the sense that they spring from the heart of the writer and speak direct to the heart of the readers; that they rise out of the actual situation in which the writer conceives the readers to be placed; that they express the writer's keen and living sympathy with and participation in the fortunes of the whole class of persons addressed; that they are not affected by any thought of publication for a wider public than the persons immediately addressed. On the other hand, the letters of this class express general principles of life and conduct, religion and ethics, applicable to a wider range of circumstances than those which have called forth the special letter; and the letters appeal as emphatically and intimately to all Christians in all time as they did to those addressed in the first instance. Such letters have a certain analogy to the edicts and rescripts by which Roman law grew, documents arising out of special circumstances but treating them on general principles. As expressing general truths and universal principles, those letters must have been the result of long and careful thought, though the final expression was often hasty and called forth by some special occasion. This more studied character differentiates them from the mere hasty unstudied expression of personal affection and interest.*

Those general letters of the Christians express and embody the growth in the law of the Church and in its common life and constitution. They originated in the circumstances of the Church. The letter of the Council at Jerusalem (Ac 15^{23-29}) arose out of a special occasion, and was the reply to a question addressed from Syria to the central Church and its leaders; the reply was addressed to the Churches of the province of Syria and Cilicia, headed by the Church of the capital of that province; but it was forthwith treated as applicable equally to other Christians, and was communicated as authoritative by Paul and Silas to the Churches of the province Galatia (Ac 16^{4}).

The peculiar relation of headship and fatherhood in which St. Paul stood to the Churches which he had founded, developed still further this category of letters, as is well shown in the article on EPISTLES, vol. i. p. 730. A still further development towards general philosophico-legal statement of religious dogma is apparent on the one hand in Romans, addressed to a Church which he had not founded, and on the other hand in the Pastoral Epistles, addressed to friends and pupils of his own, partly in their capacity of personal friends,—such portions of the letters being of the most intimate, incidental, and unstudied character,—but far more in their official capacity as heads and overseers of a group of Churches—such parts of the letters being really intended more for the guidance of the congregations than of the nominal addressees, and being, undoubtedly, to a considerable extent merely confirmatory of the directions and instructions already given to the congregations by Timothy and Titus. The double character of these Epistles is a strong proof of their authenticity. Such a mixture of character could only spring from the intimate friend and leader, whose interest in the work which his two subordinates are doing is at times lost in the personal relation.

The Catholic Epistles represent a further stage of this development. First Peter is addressed to a very wide yet carefully defined body of Churches in view of a serious trial to which they are about to be exposed. Second Peter, James, and First John are quite indefinite in their address to all Christians. But all of them are separated by a broad and deep division from the literary epistle written for the public eye: they are informed and inspired with the intense personal affection which the writers felt for every individual of the thousands whom they addressed. A serious study of all the NT and early Christian Epistles from this point of view is much needed, and would bring out in strong relief their real, human, individual and authentic character. The seven letters to the seven Churches contained in Rev 1–3 are full of touches special to the individual Churches, many of which have hardly been observed in modern times, but which show close personal knowledge of the cities on the part of the writer; and yet they are written on a uniform plan, which gives them a certain literary type to a degree and of a kind differing from any of the other letters. They stand by themselves, written in the inspiration of one single occasion, which expressed itself suitably to the individual circumstances of each of the seven Churches, yet conformed to certain general lines.

This remarkable development, in which law, statesmanship, ethics, and religion meet in and transform the simple letter, was the work of St. Paul more than of any other. But it was not due to him alone, nor initiated by him. It began before him and continued after him. It sprang from the nature of the Church and the circumstances of the time. The Church was Imperial, the Kingdom of God, and its leaders felt that their letters expressed the will of God. They issued their truly Imperial rescripts: 'it seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us' is a bold and regal expression in the first Christian letter.

Christian letters in the next two or three centuries were often inspired by something of the same spirit. Congregation spoke boldly and authoritatively to congregation, as each was moved by the Spirit to write: the letter partook of the nature of an Imperial rescript, yet it was merely the expression of the intense interest taken by equal in equal, and brother in brother. The whole series of such letters is indicative of the strong interest of all individuals in the government of the entire body; and they form one of the loftiest and noblest embodiments of a high tone of feeling common to a very large number of ordinary, commonplace, undistinguished human beings.

Such a development of the letter in that widely scattered body of the Church was possible only through the greatly increased facilities for travel and intercourse. The Church showed its marvellous intuition and governing capacity by seizing this opportunity. In this, as in many other ways, it made itself really a rival to the Imperial administration. It did, and did better, what the Imperial policy was trying to do.

The bishop, as the representative of the congregation in its relations to other congregations, was charged with the maintenance of correspondence, just as he was charged above other members with the exercise of hospitality to Christian visitors. The letter which he wrote might be regarded either as emanating from the congregation or as his personal letter. The letter of Clement to the Corinthians is expressed as really the letter of the Roman Church to the Corinthian Church. It is the present writer's belief that the Epistle to the Hebrews was the letter of the Church in Cæsarea, and mainly of Philip as leader of that Church.

In the absence of a proper postal system, special messengers had to be found to carry these letters. These messengers may be assumed to have been, from the beginning, always Christians: such were Epaphroditus, Tychicus, Titus, Phœbe, and many others.

Dr. Hort, in the Appendix to his posthumous Commentary on First Peter, has shown that such a messenger carried that Epistle from Rome to the Churches of Asia Minor, sailing to Amastris, where he landed and went across Pontus into North Galatia, Cappadocia, South Galatia, Asia, and finally Bithynia.

i. FRENCH VERSIONS.—The earliest reference to the lingua Romana rustica, in connexion with France, comes to us in the 7th cent., when Mummolinus was elected bishop of Noyon because he could speak both German and Romance; but the oldest written French is found in detached words written in the 8th cent. as glosses on a Latin Bible, inserted to explain the meaning of the Latin words. These are the well-known Reichenau and Cassel glosses. The 9th cent. gives us, in the Strassburg oaths of 842, the first continuous French. Earlier in the same century, in 813, it had been ordered at the Synod of Tours that the Latin homilies were to be translated in linguam Romanam rusticam aut Theotiscam. This does not, however, imply more than an oral translation; but it is significant of the widening breach between the language of the common people and the Latin of the clergy—a breach which had no doubt been widened unnaturally by Charlemagne's efforts to prevent the deterioration of written Latin. By the next century, the 10th, we find the great broad division appearing, into the langue d'oïl of the centre and north of France, and the langue d'oc of the south. By the end of the 11th cent. the first of these was marked off into at least four dialects: Norman in the N.W. (and in England), Picard in the N.E., Burgundian in the east, and French in the Île de France. This last gradually became supreme as the literary dialect, owing to the widening political supremacy of the lords of France, with Paris as their capital, and by the 14th cent. its supremacy was complete. In the south, the langue d'oc attained its chief literary importance in the 12th and 13th cents., and after the defeat of the south in the Albigensian war in 1272 it was supplanted for literary purposes by the northern French, on which, however, it exercised a considerable influence.

1. The earliest MSS of a French version of any part of the Bible which have come down to us belong to the 12th century. These contain the Psalter, the Books of Kings, the Apocalypse, and five chapters of St. John's Gospel. All but the last are, in the earliest MSS, in the Norman dialect; the last is in Provençal, and was probably copied at Limoges.

(a) Two MSS of the Psalter, the so-called Eadwin Psalter in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, and a Paris MS of the 12th or 13th cent. (Fonds lat. 8846), translate Jerome's Psalterium Hebraicum, i.e. his rendering of the Psalter from the Hebrew. In the Cambridge MS, which was written by Eadwin at or near Canterbury about 1120, the French is an interlinear gloss written over the Hebrew in a triple Psalter. The Paris MS, which contains only Ps 1–98^{6}, has a Latin text which probably represents a revision made in Normandy at Bec under Lanfranc's influence. These Psalters were edited by Michel at Paris in 1876. Besides the Psalterium Hebraicum of Jerome, his Psalterium Gallicum, or Latin translation based on the Hexaplar text, was used as the version which underlies another group of early French Psalters. The most important MS of this group is that written at Montebourg in Normandy before the year 1200. This is now in the Bodleian Library (MS Bodl. Douce 320), and was edited by Michel at Oxford in 1860. It is written in the Norman dialect. Several other MSS belonging to this family are known, three of which are connected with England, viz. a Cotton MS (Brit. Mus. Nero C. iv.) of the end of the 12th cent. written at Shaftesbury; an Arundel MS 230 of the same date with an English calendar; and a 14th cent. MS also in the British Museum (MS Harl. 1770) from Kirkham in Yorkshire. In the Arundel MS the interlinear French gloss is put word for word over the corresponding Latin. Two other MSS of this family are Bibl. Nat. Fonds lat. 768, of the early 13th cent., and a Munich MS 16 of the 14th century. This version of the Psalter, of which the Arundel MS is perhaps the most ancient representative, and of which Berger mentions nearly a hundred MSS, was the basis of all the French translations of the Psalter down to the edition of Olivetan. Between this and the version based on Jerome's Hebrew Psalter there is 'no difference of glossary or of grammar.' The underlying Latin is of course different, but the French in both is the Norman dialect, resembling that of the Oxford MS of the Chanson de Roland of the latter half of the 12th century.

(b) The version of the Books of Kings is found in several MSS, the most important and the oldest of which is a Mazarin MS 70 of about the year 1170. Another MS mentioned by Berger is in the Arsenal Library at Paris, No. 5211, and to these P. Meyer (Romania, xvii. 126) adds Bibl. Nat. 6447, and in the same library Nouv. acq. fr. 1404. The version is not literal, but has many glosses, and is in parts versified. It is a translation of a text of the Vulgate not unlike the revision of Alcuin, written in Anglo-Norman, and not, as Leroux de Lincy thought, in the dialect of the Île de France.

(c) The Apocalypse is preserved in 'pure Norman of the 12th cent.' in an early 13th cent. MS (Bibl. Nat. fr. 403); in a slightly different version in Bibl. Nat. MS fr. 13096 (A.D. 1313); and in the dialect of the Île de France in Bibl. Nat. MS 1036. The version, originally one and the same, has been reproduced in more than eighty MSS and in various dialects. There is also an early 13th cent. version of 1 and 2 Mac., of which there have been several editions, in a dialect which has been the subject of much controversy.

(d) The five chapters of St. John are found in a MS dating from the end of the 12th cent. in the British Museum (MS Harl. 2928), and are the earliest representative of the Bible in the dialect of southern France.

2. About the same date we meet with several references to the existence of partial translations of the Bible in the south and east of France in connexion with the Waldenses, or followers of Peter Waldus of Lyons, and the natives of the Vaud. Thus Walter Mapes, who was himself present at the Lateran Council of 1179, tells how certain Waldenses librum domino papæ præsentaverunt lingua conscriptum Gallica in quo textus et glossa psalterii plurimorumque legis utriusque librorum continebatur. Again, Stephen of Bourbon, writing soon after 1225, says that a man named Waldus, a native of Lyons, arranged with two priests to translate the Gospels for him, and that besides this they also translated 'several books of the Bible.' Again, a Bull of Innocent III., dated 12th July 1199, refers to the translation into French of the Gospels, St. Paul, the Psalter, the moralia on Job, and other books, and bids the bishop and Chapter of Metz make inquiries about them. The moralia Leroux de Lincy edited with the Books of Kings from a late 12th cent. MS (Bibl. Nat. fr. 24764) in a dialect which he thought to be Burgundian, but which P. Meyer says belongs to the neighbourhood of Liège. The MSS connected with Provence and Vaud have been made the subject of two monographs by Berger in Romania, xviii. 353 ff. and xix. 506 ff. The MSS themselves belong to a later date than the references just mentioned, but probably the version goes back to the religious movements in the 12th and early 13th centuries—movements of which an important feature was a study of the Bible; and the text they contain has close affinities with one which circulated in the districts mentioned, in the 13th century. Amongst the Latin MSS of the Bible we find a group with a peculiar mixed text, quite local in its distribution, containing only the NT, and marked by curious divisions of the text. They 'present a recension quite peculiar, which cannot be confounded with any other family of text, and which can confidently be called Languedoc.' It is important to remember that these Latin MSS belong to the beginning of the 13th century. Now, the earliest of the Provençal MSS is in the library at Lyons, and is dated by P. Meyer in the third quarter of the 13th century. This translation is based on the local Latin text just mentioned (as in the long interpolation found in a few Latin MSS at Mt 20^{28}), and that a glossed text in which the Latin was written above the Provençal. Another Provençal MS (Bibl. Nat. MS fr. 2425) is not earlier than the beginning of the 14th cent., and Meyer regards the version as not much older, while its linguistic peculiarities indicate an origin in the south or south-east of Provence. The translation is more free than that found in the Lyons MS, but is not independent of that MS, with which it agrees in some misreadings or misrenderings of the Latin. The two MSS exhibit 'the greatest differences, and striking resemblances.' Thus, in St. Mark the texts differ widely, in St. John the resemblances and differences are both great; on the other hand, in the Epistle of St. James and those of St. Paul the text seems to be the same. A third MS (Bibl. Nat. MS fr. 6261) of the Provençal belongs to the 15th century. The version is 'free, often abridged, sometimes paraphrased or accompanied by glosses.' The Latin text on which the translation rests is 'that which was in use throughout France from the 9th to the middle of the 13th cent.,' and there is hardly any trace of the local Languedoc readings already mentioned. There are other indications that the translation is earlier than the end, and perhaps than the middle, of the 13th century. In Romania, xviii. 430, Meyer mentions another fragment of the 14th cent. containing the same translation, on the whole, as that found in the MS just mentioned—a translation independent of that in the first two MSS, and bearing marks of having its origin among the sect of the Cathari. Another Provençal MS of the 15th cent. (Bibl. Nat. MS fr. 2426) contains the historical books of the OT. This translation was made not from the Latin, but from the French. Berger thus sums up (Romania, xix. 559–561) the history of the Provençal Bible: 'The first Provençal translation comes to us from Limoges. It consists of five chapters of St. John. The MS which contains it was copied in the 12th cent., perhaps in the Abbey of St. Martial. There is no reason to think that it is a fragment of a more complete translation, for it is a liturgical section. About one hundred years after, in the south of Languedoc, and very probably in the department of Aude, an interlinear version of the NT was made over the text then used in that district. This version, preserved for us in the Lyons MS, was the official translation of the Cathari, and undoubtedly exercised a great influence in the south. It is difficult to believe that the Vaud version and the second Provençal version (MS fr. 2425) have not been, to some extent, influenced by it. . . . Finally, in the 15th cent., beyond a doubt, the Provençal Bible was completed by a translation of the historical books of the OT. . . . This new sacred history was not derived from the Latin, but from a French compilation, a composite work due to several translators.'

3. Another group of MSS contains a text certainly used by the inhabitants of the Vaud, but there is nothing at all to prove that the translation was their work. Five of these MSS have been carefully examined by Berger. The oldest is the Carpentras MS, No. 22, in the Municipal Library, which dates from the 14th cent., and contains, besides the NT, the Sapiential books. Another MS closely allied to the preceding is a Dublin MS, dated 1522, which 'would seem to be a reproduction of the MS of Carpentras,' only that it contains eight chapters of Ecclesiasticus not found in the latter. Two other MSS, one at Grenoble and another at Cambridge, are closely related. The first is particularly interesting because of a liturgical point, implying a connexion with Bohemia; and both have a curious translation of the latter part of the Acts derived from an Italian version. The last MS of this family, at Zürich, belongs to the 16th cent., and has been influenced by the text of Erasmus.

Of the relation of this group to the Provençal, Berger writes (Romania, xviii. 405) that 'it is not possible to give a decided answer. There are innumerable differences of all kinds between the two families, and the most important perhaps is that their Latin text is not absolutely the same. . . . It is not impossible that the relation of the Vaud and Provençal texts may be thus explained. After the first edition [i.e. of the Provençal text], represented by the Lyons MS, a redaction of the interlinear Provençal text might have been made into more modern language, and one which the translator believed to be more in accord with the Latin. Into this work variants of every kind, even of the Latin text, might have found their way.'

Of the OT, the only part which has found a place in these MSS is that which includes the Sapiential books, and that probably has a different origin from the NT. The version is based on the Latin, corresponding exactly with the revision made at Paris at the beginning of the 13th cent., and 'contains none of the peculiarities of the southern texts of the end of the 13th cent., of which the Vaud NT seems to be the translation.'

4. All these translations with which we have so far been engaged were local and partial; but the same century which gave birth to the translations of Provence and Vaud also saw the origin of the first complete French Bible. This dates from some time after the year 1226, the time to which Roger Bacon assigns the Paris revision of the Vulgate, the chapter divisions of which (as found in MSS Bibl. Nat. lat. 15185, 15467) are adopted by the French Bible. An inferior date is fixed by the second Dominican revision of the Vulgate made by Hugh of St. Cher about 1250. The limits of time within which this complete French Bible was made are therefore fixed pretty narrowly. The translation was made at Paris 'by several translators working under the same guidance and using several Latin MSS, of which the chief was a copy of the Bible, corrected by the University.' The character of the translations varies widely in the different parts of the Bible. Some books, for example Genesis, are glossed throughout; in the rest of the Pentateuch there are no glosses, in other books there are few. The translation also varies very much in merit in respect of style and accuracy. There are many resemblances between the Gospels and the Prophets. The translation of the Acts and Catholic Epistles is poor; on the other hand, that of St. Paul's Epistles, especially the Epistle to the Romans, is very good. Some MSS give two versions of the Epistle to Titus. All these things indicate that the work was not that of one translator, but of many.

Of the entire Bible we have only one perfect MS (Bibl. Nat. fr. 6 and 7), which dates from the end of the 14th century. Another MS in the same library (fr. 899) is a good deal older, dating from about 1250; but several books are not found in it, and it is mutilated at the beginning and end, for it begins with Gn 2^{14} and ends with 1 P 2^{21}. Of the first part of the Bible we have three MSS of the 13th and 14th cents., viz. Arsenal MS 5056, Brit. Mus. Harleian 616, and Cambridge MS Ee. 3. 52. Of the second part of the Bible we have very many MSS. Amongst the oldest and most important of these, all of them belonging to the 13th cent., are Mazarin 684, Bibl. Nat. fr. 398, Brussels MS A. 211, Bibl. Nat. fr. 12581. It is not, however, easy to distinguish between MSS of the second part of the French Bible and MSS of the second volume, the so-called Bible Historiale (which incorporated bodily the Bible text), unless the MSS are older than the date of the Bible Historiale. This work was a translation into French of the Historia Scholastica, composed by Peter Comestor about 1179. It was a résumé of Bible history, incorporating many legends and a good deal of secular history. The French translation, or edition, was made by Guiars des Moulins, of Aire, in the N.E. of France, at the end of the 13th cent. He dealt very freely with the original, sometimes abridging, sometimes inserting, extracts of Bible text. The Bible Historiale Complétée—of which the oldest MS (A.D. 1312) is Brit. Mus. i. A. xx.—is the name given to Guiars' work when accompanied by a translation of the actual text of the Bible. The smallest copies do not contain the text of Chron., Ezra, Neh., Job. Some add Job, while the so-called Grandes Bibles Historiales give the complete text of Chron., Ezra, and Nehemiah. The popularity rapidly attained by the work of Guiars des Moulins secured a wide circulation for the French translation of the Bible of which it incorporated so much.

5. In the 14th cent. there are only three translations which require to be noticed—

(a) The first is an Anglo-Norman version made in England, which never had any influence in France. The earliest MS (Bibl. Nat. fr. 1) ends with He 13, and belongs to the first half of the 14th century. A second MS (Brit. Mus. i. C. iii.) dates from the 15th cent., and contains from Genesis to Tobit. The translation is not a good one.

(b) The second translation belonging to this period is the so-called Bible of king John, at whose command the work was begun by John of Sy in the diocese of Rheims. It is found in a MS (Bibl. Nat. fr. 15397) of the year 1355. Berger describes it as an 'excellent revision of the Anglo-Norman Bible,' giving a text independent of the 13th cent. translation.

(c) Thirdly, we have to notice the incomplete version made by Raoul de Presles. This is the 'Bible of Charles V.,' a revised text of which, containing the whole OT, is found in MS Bibl. Nat. fr. 158, a 14th cent. MS.

6. The 15th cent. is 'the age of MSS retouched, and of the beginning of printed texts.' The earliest printed text is that which appeared in Lyons in 1477 or 1478 with the names of Jullien Macho and Peter Farget as editors. It reproduces the text of the 13th cent. Bible, but is an edition of no importance. Much more important is the edition printed by Verard (with no date on the title-page), at dates variously given as 1487 and 1496. This contains a text very much like that in MS fr. 159, and embodies a revision made by John de Rely, confessor of Charles VIII.

7. With the beginning of the 16th cent. we come to the important work of le Fèvre d'Étaples, which appeared between 1523 and 1530. The NT was published by Simon de Colines at Paris in 1523, and often reprinted later. The completed Bible appeared at Antwerp in 1530. The OT is largely a new translation from the Vulgate, and the glosses of the Bible Historiale for the most part disappear from the French Bible for the first time. But, save where J. de Rely had given the paraphrase of the Bible Historiale, and not the Bible text, le Fèvre only 'revised' his predecessor's work, comparing it with the Latin. The translation is described as 'painfully literal,' but the marginal notes with which it was accompanied were thought to savour of Protestantism, and in 1546 the book was put on the Index, and many copies were destroyed. A few years later a revision of the Antwerp Bible was undertaken by two Louvain divines in the interests of Roman Catholicism, and appeared in 1550. Very few changes from le Fèvre's version were made, but the translation was authorized and frequently revised (in 1608, 1621, 1647) and reprinted.

8. The translation of Olivetan of Noyon in Picardy marks an epoch in the history of the French Bible. This, the first French Protestant version, was published in 1535 at Serrières near to Neufchatel, and is sometimes called the Bible of Serrières. It was frequently republished with numerous revisions in the successive editions. The work of Olivetan has been the subject of several articles by Reuss in the Revue de Théologie (series iii. vols. 3 and 4), in which his relation to preceding workers is carefully examined in detail. His chief contribution was in the translation of the OT. This is, according to the estimate of Reuss, not only a work of erudition and merit, but a real chef d'œuvre. He had the Antwerp Bible before him, but generally the changes are so numerous that it would be hard to prove his use of it. There is no doubt that we have in the OT a new translation in which he sought faithfully to reproduce the original. Simon asserts that Olivetan had little or no Greek or Hebrew knowledge, and Pétavel that he was really dependent on Pagninus' Latin version of the Hebrew; but Graf says his marginal notes show that he does not follow Pagninus slavishly, but himself consulted and studied the Hebrew. In the Psalter, Olivetan translated from the Hebrew, whereas le Fèvre's version, in the Antwerp Bible, was based, like nearly all the mediæval French Psalters, on the Gallican Psalter of Jerome, which, as we have seen, represented a Hexaplar text. In the Apocrypha (Revue de Théologie, iii. 4. 14) he did not himself make a new translation, but 'confined himself to reproducing, with very slight and superficial corrections, the translation printed at Antwerp.' The marginal notes show the amount of work he himself did, sometimes explaining the Hebrew, in other places substituting one French word for another. These notes show that the Greek has been used in some cases, while elsewhere it has been quite neglected. The NT is substantially the same as that printed in the 1523 edition of le Fèvre, but there are changes probably due to the use of the fourth edition of Erasmus (1527), in which the Greek text, a Latin translation of it, and the Vulgate are placed side by side. That he has carefully used the Greek is seen by the care with which he marks the words in le Fèvre's version which are not in the Greek. These he prints in small type. Reuss regards his work, judged by the standard of that time, as indicating an 'erudition really prodigious.' It has been often asserted that Calvin collaborated with Olivetan in this work, but there is no proof of any association with Olivetan in the original translation, or in any revision before 1545. Before this latter date many editions had appeared,—including an anonymous one under the name of Belisem de Belimakom (i.e. 'no name from nowhere'),—and many changes had been made.

The first really important revision was that published at Geneva in 1588, which checked for a while the changes which had been introduced from time to time into Olivetan's version, and it is important not because of the changes made by the Geneva revisers, but because the edition became official.

Of the Geneva translation there were very many editions in the 17th and 18th cents. which had a wide circulation. The work of Martin (NT in 1696, Bible in 1707) and Roques' revision of it (1736) are comparatively unimportant.

A more complete and important revision of Olivetan's work was carried out by Osterwald, who published a Bible at Amsterdam in 1724. This was followed in 1744 by a much more thorough revision, which regarded mainly the French idiom and the exegetical views of the time. It is clearer than Martin, and bears the marks of careful work, but as a translation is heavy in style. Another Geneva edition of some importance appeared in 1802–1805, and in 1822 a revised edition of Osterwald was published by the Bible Societies of Lausanne and Neufchatel, which in turn was revised more than once later. In 1834 a committee was formed at Paris to make a good translation, and they proposed 'to combine Martin and Osterwald, keeping the exactness of the one and the clearness of the other.' As a result, a NT was published in 1842 at the expense of the S.P.C.K., and this was followed by the OT in 1849. But the Bible of Osterwald was still the most popular, and feeling was so strong that in 1863 a disruption of the Bible Societies in France was the result, the majority wishing to circulate other texts, while a minority was anxious to adhere to Osterwald.

9. Leaving, at this point, the history of Olivetan's version, we must go back chronologically to mention the French translation made by Castalion of Geneva, on which he had been at work since 1544, and which he published in 1555. This translation was made, not from his Latin version published in 1551, but from the Hebrew and Greek. His chief aim was to produce a work intelligible to the common people; and to effect his object he did not hesitate, if necessary, to coin a word. The style is brief, nervous, and often effective, but the expressions chosen are sometimes undignified. While its language was strongly censured by some when it appeared, as by Henry Stephen and the Genevan professors, it has been more highly valued by later Protestants as 'the first translation truly French and truly modern.'

10. It is not necessary to delay over the many Catholic versions of the 17th cent., connected with the names of Corbin (1643), Marolles (1649, etc.), Amelote (1666), Bouhours (1697), which were all based, more or less, on the Vulgate, and are chiefly interesting as showing the existence of a need among the French Catholics.

The only one of lasting importance is the work of the Port Royalists, which is associated with the names of Antony and Louis Isaac le Maistre. The last named is better known as de Sacy. The translation of the NT from the Vulgate was begun by Antony le Maistre before 1657, and revised and completed by Louis le Maistre, who used the original Greek. The whole was revised by Arnauld and others, with the help of the ancient Versions and Patristic commentaries. The translation was finally authorized, and the NT appeared at Mons in 1667. The OT translation was the work of de Sacy himself during his imprisonment in the Bastille; but the publication was authorized only if notes were added to the translation. This was done, and the result was that the publication begun in 1672 was only completed in 30 volumes, the last of which appeared in 1695. 'The translation made from the Vulgate is not always literal enough: it pays more attention to clearness and elegance than to faithfulness. Of all the French versions, it is the purest from the point of view of the language, and the best written.' It has been often reprinted with and without notes, and during the last century it was circulated even by the Bible Societies.

11. Numberless translations of the whole or part of the Bible have been published both by Roman Catholics and Protestants during the last century, which need not detain us. It is only necessary in conclusion to notice the translation of the NT published by Oltramare in 1872 and that of the OT by Segond in 1874. These were combined in an edition published by the French Bible Society in 1882. Segond completed his translation of the whole Bible by publishing a NT in 1880, which, though not so good as Oltramare's version of the NT, has been circulated widely by the English and French Bible Societies. In 1900 the French Bible Society again published the OT of Segond, and the NT version of Oltramare.

ii. ITALIAN VERSIONS.—1. None of the MSS of the Italian Bible which have survived probably belong to an earlier date than the 14th cent.; but the evidence they afford as to the text from which they are derived enables us to refer the origin of the translation to the middle or second half of the preceding century. It is not likely that the whole Bible was translated as early as this. That part is earlier than the 14th cent. is clear from the differences between the text of the Italian version and the Latin texts of the 14th and 15th cents., and its frequent agreement (e.g. at Ex 34^{28}, Nu 3^{45}) with the peculiar local readings of earlier Latin MSS circulating in Northern Italy. An early date is also indicated by other evidence furnished by some of the MSS. Thus the order of the books, and the divisions of the text found in two Paris MSS, and another at Siena, agree with those of Latin MSS prior to the 13th century. Other facts preclude the obvious suggestion that the resemblance is due to the use of the early Latin MSS by a 14th cent. translator. The beginnings of the version are to be traced to the 'religious and literary influence of France,' and it has many points in common with the early French MSS, more particularly those connected with Provence and the valleys of the Vaud. These resemblances occur throughout the whole Bible. Thus the Italian Psalter is in close agreement with one of the earliest French Psalters. Of the Gospels, again, M. Berger writes: 'The Italian Gospels stand in so close a relationship to the different Provençal texts that we have to look to each of them in turn for parallels to the peculiarities of our version.' * The Provençal text to which the Italian is related is an early form of that text. The same is true of the rest of the Italian version of the NT, but there are indications that it belongs to a somewhat later date. One of the most striking illustrations of the relationship between the Italian and Provençal texts is to be found in Jn 1^1, where 'In the beginning was the Word' is rendered by the Italian version 'In the beginning was the Son of God.' This is found also in Provençal MSS, and other versions connected with them. Another parallel between the Italian and Provençal is found in the famous passage 1 Jn $5^{7.8}$.

Probably in Italy, as elsewhere, only single books or sections of the Bible were first translated; and those the books most in use for devotional purposes, or for edification, such as the Gospels, the Psalms, and the Sapiential books of the OT, and more particularly the Book of Proverbs. Thus the earliest MS of the version which is assigned doubtfully to the 13th cent., a MS in the library of St. Mark at Venice (Cl. i. ital. 80), is a translation only of the Gospels and Epistles of the Sundays according to the Roman year. Other MSS of the Gospels consist of extracts, making a harmony of the Four Gospels, beginning sometimes with one, sometimes with another, this harmony being often paraphrastic. Others give a complete text of the Gospels; and of these complete MSS Berger enumerates six of the 14th and 15th centuries.

* Romania, xxiii. 386. In this article the late M. Berger gives a very careful account of the early Italian Bible, and many facts have been taken from it.

2. To those parts of the Bible which have been mentioned, translations of the rest were subsequently added, the OT being for the most part the latest to be dealt with. The completion of the translation was probably the work of the Dominicans of the 14th cent.; but complete Bibles, owing to their expense, were rare. As elsewhere, the historical books of the OT were at first paraphrased rather than translated, on the plan of the Historia Scholastica or the French Bible Historiale, modelled on it. In this form we find a good deal of the OT in a Siena MS (I. v. 5) of the 14th century. Another Siena MS (F. iii. 4) is 'our best MS' of the OT, the whole of which it contains. This last MS dates from the 14th or 15th cent., and is interesting for the old order in which the books of the Bible are found, and the old system of divisions of the text. Other noteworthy MSS are two belonging to the Riccardi Library in Florence, one of which (MS 1250) is a 15th cent. MS of the whole NT; the other (MS 1252) is a 14th cent. MS of the second half of the Bible from Ecclesiasticus to Revelation. The first half of the Bible, Genesis to Ps 14, is found in a Laurentian MS (Ashb. 1102) of the year 1466; while a Paris MS (ital. 3 and 4) of the year 1472 contains the second and third volumes of a Bible, beginning with Ezra. The only complete MS of the whole Bible which has come down to us is also in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (MS, ital. 1 and 2). This dates from the end of the 15th cent., and with the other Paris MS came from the library of the kings of Naples, and no doubt represents a version made there.

3. The MSS, in which the version is contained either wholly or in part, have many of them been carefully examined with a view to the evidence which they afford in regard to its general character and history. This may be summarized as follows. The language is, as a rule, the Tuscan dialect as spoken at Florence in the 14th cent.; but in some cases, e.g. in the Psalter contained in the St. Mark MS, ital. 57, the influence of the Venetian dialect is evident, and the MS of the Gospels (MS, ital. i. 3) in the same library is in pure Venetian. The text found in both these MSS, as might be expected, represents a different underlying text from that found in the majority of MSS.

In the Pentateuch the MSS as a rule present one and the same version; but one MS (Riccard. 1655), containing Genesis only, preserves a text quite different from that of the other MSS, such as Siena MS, F. iii. 4. In the historical books we have two versions—one more incorrect, abounding in glosses and paraphrase, and therefore probably the earlier, found in the Siena MS (I. v. 5); the other more literal and exact (Siena MS, F. iii. 4, Paris, Bibl. Nat. ital. 3). In the Psalter we find many variants in the comparatively large number of MSS, but these really represent only one original version. In the Book of Proverbs, one of the earliest books to be translated, there are almost as many versions as there are MSS. Of the Book of Judith there are two versions—the one free, the other literal. For the rest of the OT, though there are many variants, yet these do not indicate more than one translation.

Passing to the NT, we find that most of the MSS of the Gospels go back to one and the same version. An exception must be made in respect of the Venetian text (Marc. MS, ital. i. 3) already mentioned, which stands alone. The MSS of the Acts vary in the glosses which they insert; and Minocchi traces three redactions of the version, but these are not independent. The translator's name is given in a prologue found in some MSS as Domenico Cavalca, a Dominican of Pisa, who died in 1342. A curious fact mentioned by Berger (l.c. pp. 391, 392) is that this version has been used in two MSS connected with the Vaud, and is the source of an otherwise untraced rendering of Ac 16 onwards, found in those MSS. The process of Italian indebtedness to France has here been reversed. In St. Paul's Epistles there is only one version, though it has passed through more than one redaction. The version found in Riccard. 1252 seems at first sight to be independent; but there are expressions, which it has in common with other MSS, which point the other way. In the Catholic Epistles we find, as elsewhere, two translations—the one incorrect and glossed, the other literal. Most MSS of the Apocalypse contain the same text, but one (Riccard. 1349) is quite independent, and is related to the Provençal texts. The most striking and sufficient proof of this is the rendering of the words 'one like unto the son of Man' by 'one like the son of the Virgin,' a rendering found in several versions connected with the south of France.

In regard to the text of the version, Berger (l.c. p. 417) sums up as follows: 'We cannot affirm that it was translated entire by one single person, or by the same group of translators. . . . As for the NT, it appears to have come entirely from one pen, and that the pen of a man who knew the Provençal language perfectly, and who had the Provençal Testament under his eye or in his memory. Many readings of the Latin which the translator adopts are those which were current at the beginning of the 13th cent. in Languedoc. Sometimes the Italian text is not a translation of the Latin text, but of the Provençal or Vaud version.'

4. The name of one translator, Cavalca, has been already mentioned, but probably all he did was to revise an older text resembling those of southern France. Another name connected with the old Italian version as a translator is that of John of Tavelli, born in 1386, and afterwards bishop of Ferrara, who is said to have translated the version printed at Venice. An old Life of him ascribes a translation to him, but is indefinite as to the extent of the supposed translation; and the statement as to the Venice edition is disproved by the fact that the printed version is contained in 14th cent. MSS, while John of Tavelli was then too young to have done the work ascribed to him. The early versions have also been assigned to James of Voragine, Passavanti, and others. Passavanti is himself excluded by the way in which he speaks of the versions which existed in his time, and the mention of his and other names is probably due to the wish to assign the version to persons well known in connexion with the formation of early Italian prose.

5. Of course, in connexion with the Reformation movement, several translations came into existence. The earliest is associated with the name of A. Brucioli, one of those who championed Florentine liberty, and suffered for so doing. His translation was begun in 1528, and the NT was first published by Giunti at Venice in 1530. This was followed by the Psalms in 1531, and the whole Bible in 1532. This complete translation (and also translations of the separate books) was frequently reprinted. On his title-page Brucioli claims that the version was made from the Hebrew and the Greek. He probably knew Hebrew; but Simon has proved that no great knowledge of Hebrew is shown, and the author very probably relied on Pagninus' Latin version for the OT, and that of Erasmus for the NT. His commentaries betray Protestant ideas, and his work was condemned and put on Paul IV.'s Index of 1559, and after this it practically ceased to be reprinted. In 1538 a Dominican of some repute, named Marmochino, issued a translation which was in reality only a redaction of Brucioli's work, bringing it more into conformity with the Vulgate. The 16th cent. produced many other translations of separate books, with and without commentaries, but none are of any special interest.

6. The most important translation, which is still the official Bible of Italian Protestants, circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society, is that of J. Diodati, who was born at Lucca in 1576, and died in 1649. Diodati was a very good scholar, and when only twenty-one was appointed by Beza professor of Hebrew at Geneva. His work is described as remarkable from the point of view of literature and of scientific accuracy. As a rule he keeps close to the Vulgate, except in the Psalter, where the Vulgate follows the LXX. An edition of the whole Bible was published at Geneva in 1607. The NT was published separately at Geneva in 1608 and at Amsterdam in 1665. An edition with commentaries appeared in 1641. A carefully revised edition was published by the London Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in 1854.

7. Of Catholic translations there were fewer in this country than elsewhere. The prohibition, by Pope Pius IV. in 1564, of the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue was not removed till 1757, when Benedict XIV. gave a qualified permission, and so for two centuries the Catholics had no need of a translation. The only one which need be mentioned is that of Martini, archbishop of Florence, published in 1776 at Turin, and circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society in editions of the NT (1813) and of the OT (1821).

8. In conclusion, it is necessary to speak briefly of the earliest editions of the Italian Bible. One of these was printed by Wendelin at Venice in August 1471, and bears on its title-page as the name of the translator Nicolo di Malherbi. Berger says of it that 'the text in general differs much from that of the MSS'; but it is really not a new translation, but the old version with a few changes, chiefly dialectical, from the Tuscan of the MSS to Venetian. Of the frequent later editions of Malherbi's translation, one—that of 1490—is noteworthy if, as Carini says, the designs for its ornamentation were the work of Bellini and Botticelli. Another edition, which followed immediately in October of the same year, is that published by Jenson, the text of which was based partly on that of the MSS, partly, as in the NT and Psalter, on that of Malherbi's edition. The explanation of this is that the printing was begun simultaneously at different points. Berger says of it (l.c. p. 364) that it is 'faithful to the MSS, and those as a rule the best'; but the value of the edition is enormously depreciated by the fact of its being in large measure a reproduction of Malherbi's work. It had become a bibliographical rarity, for it was not in great demand, and was reprinted with a valuable introduction by Negroni in 1882–1887 in ten volumes.

iii. SPANISH VERSIONS.—1. The history of the Bible in Spain begins with Priscillian and Lucinius of Bætica, the correspondent of Jerome (Epp. lxxi. and lxxv.); and four centuries later the school of sacred palæography at Seville and afterwards at Toledo, from which came the Codex Toletanus and Codex Cavensis, might well detain us. The importance of the Visigothic text of the Vulgate, and the influence of Theodulf and the Latin Bible of Spain beyond the border of that country, are other interesting subjects closely connected with the Spanish Bible.

2. But our immediate object is to trace the history of the Bible in the Spanish language. To this there is no allusion before the 13th cent., when John I., king of Arragon, passed a royal decree in 1233 at Tarragona, that no one, clergy or laity, was to keep in his house any translation into the vulgar tongue of the OT or NT. This prohibition implies the existence of such a translation. A few years later, however, the reign of Alphonse X., surnamed 'the Wise' (1252–1284), marks a period of literary activity, especially in regard to the translation of ancient writings into Spanish. Among other works he is said to have ordered a translation of Jerome's text of the Bible. One of the most important productions of this reign was the commencement, at any rate, of a Historia General very similar in character to the Bible Historiale (see above, p. 405^{a}), but in its original form probably more general, and containing less of the Bible text than the French work. The Historia was divided into five parts, the first of which corresponded roughly to the Pentateuch; the second covered from the death of Moses to the death of David; the third the Psalter, Sapiential books, and some of the Prophets; of the fourth we do not know the contents; the fifth contained some of the Prophets, the Apocryphal books, and a large part of the NT. It is probable that the first two parts alone go back to the time of Alphonse X., and that in Spain, as elsewhere, the earliest form of the composition had comparatively little of the actual text of the Bible, though a good deal of it was paraphrased. Of this work we have many MSS of the 14th and 15th cents., some with, some without, the text of the Bible. It is impossible, however, to define precisely the date and origin of the Bible text contained in the work, the later MSS of which in Spain as in France no doubt gradually incorporated more and more of the ipsissima verba of the Bible. Comparatively little, if any, can be assigned to the date of Alphonse X.

3. One almost unique feature in the history of the Spanish version of the Bible, as compared with those made in other countries, is the large proportion of early translations made from the Hebrew text, the work of Jewish Rabbis. The history of these, and of the translations made from the Latin, has to be recovered from an examination of the text of MSS contained in the Escurial and elsewhere, and from such other information as these MSS give in the way of prefaces, notes, etc. Much has been done in this direction by Eguren in the work mentioned at the end of this section, and by Berger in a detailed comparison of the text of the MSS in two articles in Romania for 1899, where a full description of a number of MSS and a bibliography will be found.

Among the important MSS which contain translations from the Hebrew may be mentioned two in the Escurial, I. j. 8 and I. j. 6. The first of these is a 15th cent. MS, which contains a large part of the first half of the Bible, including the Psalter. This version of the Psalter is said, in a note prefixed to it, to be the work of Herman, a German, and to be made from the Hebrew. Now a man of this name, known as a translator of Aristotle, is connected with Toledo about the year 1240. There is no reason, then, to doubt that the Psalter was translated about that time by Herman. He probably used the Psalt. Heb. of Jerome, and so we find ṣelah (in Ps 51 [Eng. and Heb. 52][5]) rendered by 'always'; but the translation shows an independent knowledge of Hebrew, as at Ps 41[2] and 41[7]. The second MS mentioned above is assigned to the 14th cent., and contains the second half of the Bible. The Spanish used is that of the early 14th cent., and there are many points of resemblance, in respect of the text divisions, summaries, etc., between this MS and the Codex Toletanus, the Bible of Theodulf, and the Visigothic text—a resemblance which points to an early date for the translation. There are various other MSS containing versions from the Hebrew, e.g. Escur. Bibl. MS 4, and a bilingual (Lat. and Spanish) MS belonging to the Royal Hist. Library at Madrid, which begins with the Major Prophets and ends with 2 Maccabees. The best known of these translations is the so-called Bible of the Duke of Alba, the MS of which is now in the Liria Palace at Madrid. This is described by Berger as an 'unrivalled monument of Spanish art and science,' 'an enterprise unrivalled in the Middle Ages.' The work was ordered in 1422 by Louis de Guzman, master of the order of Calatrava, who paid more than £3000 for it. The translation was carried out between 1422 and 1430 by Rabbi Moses Arragel (i.e. 'the Expert') of Maqueda, near Toledo. It was not a new translation, but a revision of older texts.

Of versions made from the Latin Vulgate may be mentioned—(1) the Bible of Quiroga (Escur. MS 4), given by Cardinal Quiroga to Philip II. In this the order of the books is that of the Vulgate; and the Apocryphal books, not in the Hebrew, are translated; (2) a translation made for Alphonse V., king of Arragon (1416–1458). This MS contains the books from Proverbs to the Apocalypse; (3) a translation made by Martin de Lucena (about 1450) of the Gospels and St. Paul's Epistles contained in Escur. MS 11, a MS now lost; (4) a translation (in Escur. MS 7) of the books from Lv 7–2 Kings.

4. The earliest printed edition of any part of the Spanish Bible is that of the Pentateuch printed at Venice in 1497, which was the work of Spanish Jews exiled from their native country. By far the most important and the best known of the early Spanish Bibles is the so-called Bible of Ferrara, which contains the whole OT except Lamentations, and was the work of two Portuguese Jews, Duarte Pinel and Jerome de Vargas. It is not really a new translation, but only an editing of the old revision made with reference to the Hebrew. The translation, we are told, leaves much to be desired in respect of elegance and correctness, and is often inexact and full of Hebraisms. Some corrections were made in later editions, of which there have been very many between 1611 and the present day, published in many cases at Amsterdam. Besides the Bible of Ferrara, there have been many Jewish versions of the whole or parts of the OT: thus Plaine mentions three editions of the Pentateuch at Amsterdam, six versions of the Psalter (between 1625 and 1720), a translation of the Song of Songs, of the 'First Prophets,' of the Hagiographa, and of Isaiah and Jeremiah.

5. Translations made by Catholics in the 16th, 17th, and early 18th centuries are comparatively unimportant. The Council of Trent prohibited the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue, and one of the rules of the Inquisition was stringent in the same direction. It was not till 1757 that Benedict XIV. permitted the reading of the Bible in the language of the country under certain conditions; and fifteen years later, in 1782, the Spanish Inquisition gave similar permission. Moreover, in the 16th cent. at any rate the bulk of the Catholic theology of Spain was written not in Spanish but in Latin. For the most part, therefore, the efforts of Catholics in regard to Bible translation were confined to those parts of it which had a place in the liturgy, and several of these attempts were never printed. Of the Gospels, four complete or partial translations are recorded. The first is a translation of the liturgical Gospels and Epistles by Montesiro, which was printed at Madrid in 1512; the second is an anonymous translation of the four Gospels, contained in MS Escur. I. j. 9, but never printed, which is not dated, but is later than the Complutensian Bible of 1514–1517 which it uses; the third is a translation by a Benedictine, John de Robles, made in 1550 which is found in MS Escur. H. i. 4, but was never printed; the last is a translation of St. Matthew and St. Luke by Siguenza. Of the Psalms there were several translations, including one by Villa, a Benedictine of Montserrat, which was afterwards put on the Index; another by Cornelius Snoi, published at Amsterdam in 1553. The Sapiential books also found many translators, including the famous Louis of Léon, an Augustinian who translated the Book of Job. There was also a version of the Apocalypse by Gregory Lopez, which was published after his death.

6. More important were the Protestant translations. The earliest of these was the version of the Psalter by Juan de Valdes, a Lutheran, the MS of which is at Vienna. This was not published till 1880. To the same translator belongs the version of Romans and 1 Corinthians, printed at Venice in 1536 and 1557. The first published Spanish NT was the work of Francis of Enzinas, printed at Antwerp in 1543, and reprinted many times later. Another version, regarded by some as a model of Castilian style, was the translation of the NT from the Greek, and the Psalter from the Hebrew, the work of Juan Perez of Pineda, who fled to Geneva to escape the Inquisition. The first published edition of the whole Bible is the Biblia del Oso, so called from the bear which appeared as the frontispiece. This was the work of Cassiodore de Reina, a distinguished Hellenist, and occupied twelve years. The OT portion was probably little more than a translation of the Latin version of Pagninus. It is regarded as a satisfactory translation, and was published at Basle in 1567–1569. The edition by Cyprian de Valera (Amsterdam, 1602) was practically only a revision of the work of Cassiodore.

7. In the period after 1782, when the Inquisition revoked the prohibition against reading the Bible in the vulgar tongue, a number of Catholic translations appeared of the Psalms, Sapiential books, and Gospels. Only two of these Catholic versions are important. The first is the work of Philip Scio, afterwards bishop of Segovia, and was published at Valencia in 1791–1793. A second edition was published at Madrid in 1795–1797. This translation is based on the Vulgate, and is on the whole 'correct and elegant, though sometimes lacking in clearness and exactness, and more often in warmth and life.' As the first complete version by a Spanish Catholic it was received with enthusiasm, and went through many editions. But the need of a translation based on the Hebrew and Greek began to be felt, and in 1807 Charles IV. ordered such a one. This was the work of Felix Torres y Amat, afterwards bishop of Astorga, and was published 1823–1825. Though very successful and often reprinted, it did not supplant the translation of Scio, of which numerous editions still appear. There are no recent Protestant translations. The copies circulated in large numbers by the British and Foreign Bible Society are practically only reprints of the early Protestant translations of Enzinas, Cassiodore de Reina, and Cyprian de Valera already mentioned, and of the later Catholic versions of Scio and Torres Amat.

8. Besides the Castilian versions of the Bible of which we have hitherto spoken, the translation into Catalan, the language of Catalonia, also demands attention in connexion with the history of the Bible in Spain. Both by language and by political ties the district of Catalonia was in the early Middle Ages closely connected with southern France, and we are not surprised therefore to find a close resemblance between the Catalan version and those of France. According to Berger (Romania, xix. 523), the version 'is not older than the 14th cent., and was made in all probability by a native of Catalonia, educated at the University of Paris.' Its dependence on the French version is shown by the way in which it reproduces the most characteristic glosses of the French Bible.

The oldest MS of the version is a Marmoutier MS of the NT now at Paris (Bibl. Nat. Fonds esp. 486) of the 14th century. We have also later MSS —(1) Bibl. Nat. Fonds esp. 2–4; (2) Bibl. Nat. Fonds esp. 5; (3) Brit. Mus. Egerton 1526, all of the 15th cent., and all containing the same portions of the Bible,—which enable us to trace the history of the text to some extent. These later MSS preserve the same general text as that contained in the 14th cent. MS, but the glosses of the French Bible have been removed. 'The foundation of the version is the same: the phrases of the 15th cent. MSS from end to end are modelled on those of the 14th, and a number of characteristic expressions attest the original identity of the translation.' Of MSS of the Psalter in this language Berger mentions ten, and in them he distinguishes three independent versions. One is found in Bibl. Nat. Fonds esp. 5, another is contained in Bibl. Nat. Fonds esp. 2, and Egerton 1526, and a third in Bibl. Nat. Fonds fr. 2434. The first, like the other Catalan Psalters, is based on the Gallican Psalter; the second seems to rest on the Hebrew Psalter, but this is really not the case; the third represents the most ancient form of the text, and this last is based on a French version, for 'all the peculiarities of the Catalan text are explained by the French, and several are only explained by it.' The Sapiential books show evidence of the use of French and Latin as bases for translation. In the Book of Proverbs both French and Latin influences are clear, in Wisdom there is no evidence of French, in Sirach the two alternate. There is a similar want of uniformity in regard to the Prophets. The translation of Isaiah is made from the Vulgate, but shows French influence. In Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel there is no trace of such influence. Nor is the underlying Latin text the same; for, while Isaiah and Daniel rest on the ordinary Paris text of the 13th cent., there is no sign in Jeremiah and Ezekiel of the characteristic readings of that text. Of the Gospels we have three Catalan versions—one very inexact and paraphrased, the others literal. Two of these have many points of resemblance to the Provençal, by the help of which they were made, viz. those contained in the Marmoutier MS and Bibl. Nat. Fonds esp. 2; the third contained in a Barcelona MS does not appear to have anything in common with the Provençal text. In regard to St. Paul's Epistles, there is 'no doubt but that the Catalan Bible of the 15th cent. is dependent on that of the 14th, and the latter on the Bible in the language of France' (langue d'oil). The Apocalypse was based not on the French, but on the Vulgate; but in the middle of this translation made from the Latin we find reminiscences of the French. Berger sums up as follows in regard to the NT: 'I conclude by saying that the Catalan version of the NT was made at the latest in the 14th cent. in some places from a French text, in others from a Latin text very similar to those in use at Paris. The writer probably incorporated into his work an earlier translation of the Gospels.'

The names of two translators are met with in writings on this version. The one is Boniface Ferrer, to whom is ascribed the translation printed near Valencia in 1477–1478; but, while the version belongs to the 14th cent., Ferrer lived in the 15th. A more important name is that of Sabruguera, a Dominican of the beginning of the 14th century. He studied at Paris about the year 1307, and this would agree with the character of the version, as indicated by the MSS. Further than this, one MS attributes to him a version of the Psalter.

The only early edition is that just referred to; but nothing of it remains except four pages of one copy now in the monastery of Porta Cæli, near Valencia. A note on one of these pages preserves the name of Ferrer as the translator, and tells us the translation was made by him, with the assistance of other scholars, from the Latin. During last century, by the efforts of the British and Foreign Bible Society, a version of the NT in Catalan was made and circulated. The first edition was printed in London in 1832, and later it was reprinted in London and Barcelona.

IV. PORTUGUESE VERSIONS.—1. A 14th cent. MS in the Escurial (O. j. 1) contains a Portuguese translation of the first part of the Historia General of Alphonse (see p. 408^b), which of course had a Scripture basis. This translation may have been made by order of king Denis (1279–1325), the grandson of Alphonse, but it does not give the literal text of the Bible. In the same century we are told that king John I. (1385–1433) had a translation made by distinguished scholars of the Gospels, Acts, and St. Paul, but nothing more is known of it. His granddaughter Philippa, who died in 1497, is said to have had a translation made from French into Portuguese of the Gospels and Epistles of the Church year, and the MS of such a translation now exists at Lisbon.

2. A 15th cent. catalogue of the library of king D. Duarte (1433–1438) mentions among the books a translation of Genesis, another of the Gospels and Acts, another of the Books of Solomon. From this we may infer that before the date of his death a Portuguese version of these books existed.

3. In the same century we hear of the compilation of a Life of Christ preserved in a MS of the monastery of Alcobaça; and a paraphrase of the Acts, mixed with a good deal of legend, is found in another MS of the same monastery. We also know from the writings of D. Manuel of Cenaculo, bishop of Beia from 1770–1802, that twenty years before he wrote there was in existence a paraphrastic translation made in the 15th cent. by a Portuguese acquainted with Hebrew. Of this he gives a specimen from the beginning of the Book of Genesis, which shows that the translation kept fairly close to the text of the Bible. There was also in a MS of Alcobaça, which has since been lost, a less literal translation, or rather summary, of OT history. Some extracts of this which have been preserved are said to be written in language of the 14th cent., more archaic than the passage quoted by Cenaculo.

Most of the statements mentioned here are incapable of being tested by the evidence of MSS containing the version, but there is nothing improbable about them, and they imply that the Portuguese translation dates from the 14th cent., that at first only some parts of the Bible were translated, and those the parts most likely to be in use, and that the translation was made from the Spanish and the French, and no doubt also from the Latin.

4. It is not till the end of the 17th cent. that we meet with the first printed Portuguese Bible. This was a translation made by a native of Lisbon, John Ferreira d'Almeida, who went out to the East as a Roman Catholic missionary, and afterwards became a Protestant. He began with the NT, which, after being revised, was printed at Amsterdam in 1681; and a second edition appeared in 1712. Almeida's work, completed only as far as Ezekiel, was continued by others, and gradually the whole Bible was published, the last part to appear being the Major Prophets, which was printed in 1751. Almeida's version was not very popular, partly because it was antiquated in style, and partly, perhaps, from prejudice on account of his change of religion.

5. In 1784 a Catholic translation by Anton Pereira de Figueiredo was published at Lisbon. This work, with notes, in twenty-three volumes, was based on the Vulgate, but does not follow it slavishly, and sometimes departs from it in favour of the Greek. A revised edition was begun some years later, but not completed till 1819.

Both of these translations have been circulated in Portugal by the British and Foreign Bible Society, but not in very large numbers.

v. GERMAN VERSIONS.—1. The oldest fragment of the Bible in German is to be found in a MS, twenty-three leaves of which are at Vienna (MS N. ccxxxiii.) and two at Hannover. These leaves, recovered from the bindings of other MSS, come from a MS of the 8th cent. which belonged to the Bavarian monastery of Monsee, and they preserve fragments of a Latin and German translation of St. Matthew, the first of which begins at 8^{33} and the last ends with 28^{20}. The ending of the Gospel is followed by a Latin subscription, from which it is clear that only this Gospel was translated. The translation is unexpectedly good. The Latin is closely but not slavishly followed, and there are few mistakes due to misunderstanding the Latin. The German is clear, and 'it was the aim of the translator to give not only correct but good German,' in a dialect which is 'a Bavarian redaction of a Frankish or Alsatian original.' There is an edition of this very early and interesting MS by Massmann (Vienna, 1841), and more recently by Hench (Strassburg, 1890).

2. The next documentary evidence bearing on the Old German Bible is a translation of Tatian's Harmony of the Gospels, contained in a St. Gall MS (No. 56) of the second half of the 9th cent., in which the Latin and German are given in parallel columns. The Latin version rests on that of the Fulda MS of the 6th cent., and this is closely followed by the German, in an East Frankish dialect. The translation is not, as Sievers supposed, the work of a number of men, but of one, who perhaps received assistance from others, and may perhaps have used already existing translations of the separate Gospels made by different translators. The style of translation is not so vigorous as that of the Monsee St. Matthew, but it is clear, and runs easily. In one section there are peculiarities, best explained by supposing that there was a defect in the MS copied, which was supplied from another source.

3. We must leave on one side, as not properly belonging to our subject, such sacred poems, embodying a good deal of the Bible narrative, as the Krist of Otfrid and the Heliand by an unknown author. Both these belong to the middle or second half of the 9th century.

4. To the 10th or early 11th cent. belongs the work of Notker Labeo (d. 1022), a monk of St. Gall, who translated and commented on Job and the Psalter. His work on Job has been lost. That on the Psalter is contained in its entirety only in one MS (No. 21) at St. Gall, but fragments of different MSS of it are to be found at Munich, Basle, Maihingen, and elsewhere. The method adopted is to give each verse of the Psalms in the shortest possible sentences, first in Latin and then in German. This is followed by commentary or paraphrase. Above the Latin words an interlinear German rendering is given in the St. Gall MS; but this is later than Notker, and is not contained in the fragments in other libraries. Probably Notker's work was intended not for reading in the services, but for students in the monastery.

5. A little later than Notker is to be placed the work of Williram, abbot of Ebersberg in Bavaria (d. 1085), who translated and commented on the Song of Songs. Of this work many MSS survive, showing its popularity. The Latin text of the Vulgate is written in the middle of the page; on the left of this comes a Latin paraphrase in leonine hexameters, and on the right an explanation in German appended to little sections of the text in German, which are of varying length. The German translation is generally very free, often too free, but the style is good and almost ideal. 'Such a true translation was only possible because Williram loses himself in his text, and has sought to reproduce it even to the smallest details. Williram has absorbed the Song of Songs into his very being, and from his being it has welled out in purest German.'

6. The next fragments of Bible text are some portions of the four Gospels recovered from the bindings of volumes at Vienna (now Suppl. 2559) and Munich (now c.g.m. 5250) attributed by Walther (p. 456) to the 12th century. These are clearly copied from a MS belonging to an older, perhaps a much older, date. The sections are marked for liturgical use, both in the Latin and the German, and the 'use' points to the diocese of Constance, perhaps to St. Gall. The aim of the translator has been to give a 'flowing and popular' German version; and in this, in spite of an imperfect knowledge of Latin, he has succeeded. It is possible, but cannot be certainly proved, that the version was made for reading at church services.

7. To the 12th cent. belongs a MS of the Psalter now at Munich (Cod. Germ. 17), which came from the monastery at Windberg, and is dated 1187. With this may be discussed another MS of the Psalter belonging to the same century, now at Vienna (MS 2682). Both these are Latin Psalters with interlinear German versions. In the Wind-berg Psalter the Latin is represented sometimes by more than one synonym, and a fuller explanation given in the margin; the German is often omitted, or given only in part, possibly, as Walther suggests, because the scribe could not read the German he was copying. The synonyms were probably added later, possibly from a MS like the Vienna Psalter. The translation in this last Psalter is less exact than that in the Windberg Psalter.

8. To the next century Walther ascribes a Zürich MS (Stadtbibl. C. 55. 713) of the Gospels, which, like a later MS of the same family at Basle (A. iv. 44), shows signs of being copied from an earlier MS, in which corrections had been made, for two German words are often given for one Latin. Walther notices the effective and impressive character of the translation.

9. The beginning of the 14th cent. marks, according to Walther, an epoch in the history of the German Bible, and MSS begin to multiply. We need not therefore pursue beyond that date the history of separate MSS of the whole or part of the Bible. The multiplication of MSS is explained by the desire of the Christians in Germany to have translations of the Bible to which they might appeal in regard to matters of doctrine and practice, as the authority of the Pope was weakened by the events of the early 14th century. The result was that a number of independent translations were made, often very inexact and inadequate.

Walther enumerates altogether 203 MSS, beginning with those which have been mentioned, and going down to the 16th century. Of these, 10 contain the whole German Bible; 6 others were originally, but are no longer, complete Bibles; 5 contain the OT and 8 the NT. Of the whole number no fewer than 128 belong to the 15th century.

In connexion with all these MSS it is only possible to summarize the results as given in Walther's exhaustive work on the German Bible of the Middle Ages, and to mention one or two MSS of special interest or importance. The most important of the MSS, to which no reference has yet been made, if importance is to be measured by the amount of controversy of which it has been the occasion, is the so-called Codex Teplensis. It is so called because it is to be found in the library of the Præmonstratensians at Tepl in Bohemia. The controversy, of which it is the centre, is the relation, if any, between the German translation and the work of the Waldenses. On the one hand, Haupt maintained that the pre-Lutheran German Bible, with which this MS generally agrees, had a Waldensian origin; and, on the other hand, Jostes denied that there was any sufficient evidence of this. In this discussion many other scholars besides the two already named took part. The Codex Teplensis contains, among other things, a longish treatise on the '7 stücke dez heiligen christlichen Gelauben' (seven articles of the holy Christian faith) appended to a short discussion on the '7 heilikheit der kirchen' (i.e. the sacraments), and it is their inclusion which suggests to Haupt the Waldensian origin of the MS; and, as the text of this MS agrees with that of the first printed German Bibles, he goes on to infer the connexion of the German Bible with the Waldenses. Walther (l.c. pp. 193, 194) says: 'As a result of the controversy between Haupt and Jostes we may recognize that only the treatise at the end of the MS, and that very probably, originated among the Waldenses, while the other additions may have come as well from a Waldensian as from a Catholic. At the same time, it is by no means certain that the man who inserted the last piece was aware of its heretical origin, or was himself a Waldensian.' Other evidence is afforded by marks in the margin drawing attention to certain passages of doctrinal importance. But these marks do not all imply the same doctrinal views on the part of the person who added them. Some are Catholic, others Waldensian, and all in the same hand. These marks therefore only prove, according to Walther, that the MS was used and marked by one of the Waldenses.

Another MS which deserves attention is the splendid Bible in six volumes at Vienna (MS N. 2759-64) called the 'Wenzel Bible' after king Wenzel. It contains the greater part of the OT, and was the work of Martin Rotlev between 1389 and 1400. The importance of the MS lies not so much in the text as in the elaborate illustrations. Some of these are found in other MSS, and their origin and purpose are not always clear.

A third MS to be noticed is the so-called Florian Psalter, a trilingual version, in Latin, Polish, and German, chiefly interesting in connexion with the early history of the Polish Bible. This is also a sumptuous volume so far as illustrations are concerned, but for some reason or other they were never completed.

Among early groups of MSS one of the most interesting is that which contains a translation of the Psalter made by Henry of Mügeln about 1350. The oldest representative of this family is a MS of the Cistercian monastery of Rein near Gradwein, but the version is found in 18 other MSS. The MSS give a continuous translation with a Latin text on the margin and a gloss derived largely from Nicholas of Lyra. Of the translation represented by this group Walther writes (p. 718): 'His work on the Psalter cannot be brought into line with the other German Psalters, for his chief purpose is to provide a popular work, and he has succeeded in his object.'

Another group of MSS of the Psalter is one which goes back either to the original Hebrew text or to Jerome's Psalterium Hebraicum. As preserved in the MSS the text has been corrected by the help of the Vulgate.

10. From the MSS we pass to the early printed editions of the German Bible. Of these Walther enumerates as belonging to the period from 1466, the date of the earliest, to 1521, eighteen editions of the complete German Bible—fourteen in High German and four in Low German—besides thirty-four of Psalters or other separate books of the Bible. The four earliest bear no indication of the date or place of publication, and their order of precedence has been very carefully examined by Walther. The result of his investigation is to vary the order as previously given by Hain. Walther has proved that the earliest Bible is that printed by Mentel at Strassburg. In a note at the end of the copy in the Munich Library it is stated that 'this book was bought on the 27th of June 1466 for 12 gulden'; and a note at the end of a copy at Stuttgart says that it was printed in 1466. The second edition of the Bible is that of Eggestein, also printed at Strassburg. On the strength of a note in the Stuttgart copy, which says that it was printed in 1462, Eggestein's used to be regarded as the earliest German printed Bible. Walther shows that it is later than Mentel's edition, on which it is based, and that it dates from about 1470, as a note in the Gotha copy implies. The third, dependent on Eggestein, is Pflanzmann's Augsburg edition of about 1473. The fourth, also an Augsburg edition by Zainer, is a revision of Eggestein, for 'they have many most striking misprints in common.' This is assigned to about 1473, and is to be regarded as earlier than the Swiss edition, printed probably at Basle, which used to be put fourth. Of this Swiss edition one copy only, at Göttingen, out of the thirty-two known to us, bears a date, 1474. On Zainer's edition of 1473 the Swiss edition and three other Augsburg editions, printed by Zainer (1477) and Sorg (1477 and 1480), depend. The next edition, published by Koburger at Nuremberg in 1483, professes to be and is 'a revision made with great diligence,' his corrections being possibly derived from those in the Cologne Low German Bible, with which Koburger's edition has many illustrations and other points in common. The last five editions of the complete High German Bible which preceded Luther are dependent on that of Koburger. They were published, one at Strassburg (1485) by Grüninger, and four at Augsburg—two by Schönsperger in 1487 and 1490, and two by Otmar in 1507 and 1518. Walther thus sums up the result of his exhaustive investigation of the early printed Bibles: 'Our conclusion from the comparison of these Bibles is that they all belong to the same family of translations, but that the Bible first published by John Mentel at Strassburg in 1466 was revised about 1473 by G. Zainer at Augsburg, and that this new and revised edition received at the hands of A. Koburger at Nuremberg, and afterwards in the two last Bibles of the Middle Ages, a further slight correction.'

The text represented by this succession of printed Bibles is found also in various Psalters printed at various dates and in various places between 1473 and 1498, and also in an edition of the Apocalypse (1498) and of Job (1488). Besides printed editions of this recension of text, Walther enumerates fourteen MSS in which it is found, nine of which, however, are copies of a printed Bible, as is evident from the misprints which they reproduce, while a tenth also depends on a printed text. Two of the other MSS (at Wolfenbüttel and Nuremberg) are MSS of the early part or middle of the 15th century. That at Nuremberg contains only Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, but is interesting on account of the reasons given by the translator—John Rellach of Resom, in the diocese of Constance—for undertaking the work of translation. The other two are MSS of the NT—the one at Freiburg in Saxony; the other, already mentioned, at Tepl in Bohemia. These are 14th cent. MSS, having many points of resemblance, but neither is a copy of the other. From a careful examination Walther concludes that Mentel's Bible represents the text of this family in a purer and more original form than these, the oldest MSS which contain it. This text, based of course on the Latin, shows many points of agreement with old MSS of the Itala, and in the NT many points of agreement with the Greek against the Latin, but only in cases where the Greek has a reading not contained in the Vulgate; for if the Vulgate has a fuller reading than the Greek, the Vulgate is followed. The question to be decided is whether the German translator himself enriched his text by using several MSS of the Vulgate, or used a MS of the Vulgate which itself contained the additions which he has translated. Walther decides in favour of the second alternative, and finds such a MS in a Latin MS at Wernigerode, which has 37 of the 45 additions common to the first Bible and the Freiburg and Tepl MSS; and many, but by no means all, of these are found also in the Provençal version connected with the Waldenses. But the resemblances are not, as we have seen above (see p. 412^a), sufficient in number or distinctive enough to prove a Waldensian origin of the earliest German printed Bibles.

11. The work of Luther marks an epoch in the history of the German Bible. His labours in translation began with some of the Psalms, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, sections of the Gospels and the Epistles, all clearly intended for the edification of the unlearned.

The idea of making a complete translation of the Bible dates from 1521, but it was thirteen years later before the work was carried out in its entirety. The first part to appear was the NT, the translation of which was done at the Wartburg. This was the so-called Septemberbibel, so called because it appeared in September 1522, at Wittenberg, but without any date or the name of the publisher on its title-page. Of this a photographic facsimile appeared in 1883 on the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birthday. The first edition was followed by a second in the same year 1522, and by 1580 more than seventy editions of the NT had appeared.

The translation of the OT was a more difficult task, to which Luther then turned. He tells us that in the translation of Job days were sometimes spent over a few verses, and the erasures in the MS of his work, now in the Royal Library at Berlin, are sufficient evidence of the trouble which he took. The OT translation was published in parts, beginning with the Pentateuch, which appeared in 1523. The historical Books and Hagiographa were followed in 1532 by a complete translation of the Prophets, and in 1534 by the Apocrypha, and so 'in a relatively short time the most epoch-making work of modern times came to light.' For the translation Luther was himself responsible, though he consulted numerous friends. Though he is not wholly independent of the work done by his predecessors, some of whose mistakes he reproduces, he was not by any means dependent on them. Both in the OT and NT he translates from the original text, using in the OT the Brescia edition of 1494, and in the NT Erasmus' edition of 1519, which he follows, for instance, in the curious reading ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐμαῖς at Rev 2^{13}. He had also the assistance of the LXX, Vulgate, and the Glossa ordinaria. The object Luther set before himself was not to produce a literal translation, but one which should be clear and intelligible to the people; and in this he was successful, largely because he was a thorough German, fully conscious of the needs of the people, and in sympathy with them. The result was that this translation had an incalculable effect on the development of the German language and literature, leading to the predominance of one dialect throughout the country. Outside the limits of Germany it was the basis of the versions used in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Holland.

His work had no sooner appeared than it was the subject of much criticism, which came chiefly from the Roman Catholics. The earliest critic was Emser, who in 1523 published a volume, in which he called attention to the many mistakes and doctrinal errors contained in the work of Luther. Emser's work was the precursor of many others, and it is no doubt possible to point to mistakes due to a defective knowledge of Hebrew or Greek. But the best testimony to Luther's work is the permanent hold it has had on the German nation, as shown by the innumerable editions through which it has passed. Some of these are interesting because of the changes of different kinds which they introduced in many cases with the object of supporting special doctrinal views. Others had a linguistic purpose. More modern and familiar words and constructions were introduced in place of those which had become obsolete. One of these revised editions, which obtained a very large circulation, is that of 1703, of which the Canstein Bible Institute at Halle has since 1717 circulated, according to Nestle, more than five million copies.

12. Such was the position which Luther's translation occupied in Germany, that while it was generally admitted that revisions and corrections were necessary, many of the attempts in this direction roused great opposition; and while some would have been content with merely removing words which were obsolete or of uncertain meaning, others were in favour of a more thorough revision. Finally, a commission, representative of various theological views, was appointed, charged to make the minimum of necessary corrections, and the first result of their labours was the NT, published at Halle in 1867; and finally in 1883 appeared at Halle, 'The Bible, or the complete Scriptures of the Old and New Testament according to the German translation of D. Martin Luther. First impression of the Bible revised by order of the Eisenach German Protestant Church Congress.' This is the so-called Probe-Bibel or Proof-Bible. Two years were allowed for criticism, and then the final revision of the Proof-Bible began, during which numerous opinions and reports were sent in. In January 1890 the great final conference of all who had taken part in the theological and linguistic revision was begun at Halle, and at last in the beginning of 1892 the revised edition was issued by the Canstein Bible Press at Halle. This completed the work begun as long ago as 1855, when Pastor Mönckeburg of Hamburg made an appeal to the Bible Societies to unite in preparing a uniform text. It was inevitable that the result should be freely and variously criticised, and the amount of literature produced has been large. The defects are due not so much to the revisers as to the limitations set in regard to the amount of change they were to make, which were fixed before the work was begun.

13. The rapid and widespread popularity obtained by Luther's translation, when it first appeared, made other attempts in the same field rare, and the only important edition in the 16th cent. is the Zürich Bible of 1530, which followed the publication of the Prophets and Apocrypha in the preceding year. The translation was for the most part that of Luther, only unimportant linguistic changes being introduced. The only portion of the Bible of which a new translation was made was the Hagiographa, including Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs; and this was not satisfactory, especially on the linguistic side. A later edition of 1548 is said to be based on a comparison with the Hebrew, but the changes are not important. This edition of 1548 became itself in turn the basis of later revisions. Of such later revisions the most important is that of Breitinger, who published a NT in 1629, which introduced many changes, and aimed at extreme literalness. An attempt to secure a thorough revision aroused such opposition that it led to no result. It was not till the 19th century that any satisfactory or effective revision took place, and, as a consequence of these revisions, Nestle says that 'its dialectical character has now disappeared, and in respect of accuracy it may be compared with the best: it certainly has not come from one mould, and the effort after exactness has frequently led to bombastic language and lack of clearness.' In 1858 a commission was appointed in Switzerland to revise the work again, and in 1893 a NT and Psalter appeared, in which account has been taken of the results of scientific criticism of the Greek text.

14. Another Protestant translation of importance is that of J. Piscator, first published at Herborn in 1602, and afterwards in use at Bern and elsewhere. Nestle describes it as a weak translation, abounding in Latinisms, which indicate a use of the Latin versions of Junius and Tremellius. Mention should also be made of the Socinian version of Crell and Stegman (Rackau, 1630) and another by the Socinian Felbinger which was published at Amsterdam in 1660. Another translation, which had leanings to mysticism, was the Berlenburg Bible (1726–1742), based partly on Luther's version, partly on the Zürich Bible. Other versions, such as the Wertheim Bible of 1735, were rationalistic in tendency, and explained away the supernatural. The same object was kept in view in Bahrdt's translation of The latest revelations of God (Riga, 1773). Of 19th cent. translations those of de Wette (1809–1814) and Bunsen (1858–1869) are the most important. The first mentioned combined scholarly exactness with happiness in expression, the second aimed at being popular and easily understood by the masses.

15. The German translations made in the interests of Roman Catholics have not been very numerous or very important. The earliest is a translation of the NT by Beringer, published at Spires in 1526. This was almost a reprint of Luther's version. In the next year Emser, who has been mentioned as one of Luther's first critics, published a NT at Dresden, which also differs very little from Luther's save that glosses have been added in places, and the text of the Vulgate in some instances preferred. Emser's version has been many times reprinted. A few years later, in 1534, Dietenburger, a Dominican, printed a Bible at Mainz. In his translation he followed Luther in the OT, though he sometimes adopted the Vulgate rendering. The Apocrypha is a reproduction of the translation of Leo the Jew made for the Zürich Bible. The NT closely follows Emser's version. The version of J. Eck, Luther's famous antagonist (Ingolstadt, 1537), was in the NT only a reproduction of Emser, but in the OT the pre-Lutheran translation was followed as a rule. It does not seem to have been successful, and Nestle says of it that the 'German is beneath criticism.' In the 17th cent. the only Catholic version of importance is that of Ulenberg, based on the Sixtine edition of the Vulgate. This was published at Cologne (1630), and afterwards, as revised by the theologians of Mainz (Cologne, 1662), was known as the Catholic Bible. In the 18th cent. several translations appeared, that of Erhard (Augsburg, 1722) being perhaps the most often reprinted. At the end of the century appeared the work of Braun (Augsburg, 1788–1805) in thirteen volumes. This was afterwards revised by Allioli (1830). These and other Roman Catholic versions kept the Vulgate mostly in view, but a free rendering of the Greek of the NT was made by Brentano (1790). His translation of the OT from the Hebrew he did not complete himself, but his work was continued by others. The 19th cent. Roman Catholic versions are, like the earlier ones, based on the Vulgate, though the Hebrew and Greek texts are not neglected. The version of Kistemaker (1825) was the Roman Catholic version which was adopted by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

vi. DUTCH VERSIONS.—1. The earliest translation of the substance of any part of the Bible into Dutch is to be found in metrical versions of the Biblical narrative; but these do not represent literal translations of the text of Scripture.

2. Of literal translations of the whole or of parts of the Bible, Isaac le Long in his Boekzaal der nederduitsche Bybels enumerates twenty-four MSS; and to these Walther, in his work on the German translation (see p. 721 ff.), has added others. The oldest MS, according to Walther, is a Vienna MS in two volumes (MSS 2771-2), which he assigns to the second half of the 14th century. Among other early MSS are a MS at Paris of the historical books of the OT, two MSS in the Bodleian Library, one (dated 1472) of the Gospels, and another of the Acts, St. Paul, and the Apocalypse. All these contain a version made from the Latin, probably about 1300, by a Fleming, for the benefit of those unlearned in that language. Such a translation, according to the unnamed translator, was desirable in spite of 'the opinion of many clergy that the mysteries of the Bible should be kept from the ordinary man.' To the translation are added explanations based mainly on the Historia Scholastica of Peter Comestor; but these are distinguished from the text by being written in a different character. Moreover, some parts which it was thought undesirable to popularize (e.g. Dt $22^{13\text{ff.}}$) are left out, and for these the reader is referred to the original Latin. The first edition of this translation, but without the Psalms and New Testament, was printed at Delft in 1477.

3. It was inevitable that Luther's version should be translated very soon into Dutch, in spite of the opposition of the Inquisition and the edicts of Charles V., and an edition appeared at Antwerp in 1522, for which so much of this version as was available was used. In 1525 and 1526 other editions appeared of the New Testament at Basle, and in 1525 the whole Old Testament was published at Antwerp in four small volumes, the Pentateuch and Psalms being based on Luther, the rest on the Delft Bible. The first complete Bible was printed at Antwerp by Jacob van Liesveldt, and in the second edition of 1532 Luther's version of the Prophets was adopted as a basis. Several editions followed before 1546, when the printer was condemned and put to death for unorthodox statements in the notes. Liesveldt's Bible was revised by Vorsterman with the help of the Complutensian Polyglott.

4. It was only to be expected that efforts should be made by the Roman Catholics to secure a translation for their own needs. Editions of the New Testament appeared in 1527 and in later years, a Latin-Dutch version in 1539, and finally in 1548 editions of the whole Bible were published at Cologne and at Louvain. The first was the work of a Carmelite, the second of a Canon of Louvain, Nicholas von Wingh. This last, which contained a vigorous preface dealing with the mistakes of Protestant Bibles, was approved by the Theological Faculty at Louvain, and published with the sanction of Charles V. It has passed through many editions, was revised in 1599 after the Vulgate of 1592, and issued by the Plantin press at Antwerp, and has been many times reprinted. A later revision of this version dates from 1717, and is the work of Ægidius Wit, a Ghent divine. This is in the idiom of Flanders and Brabant, and follows the Vulgate, though in certain parts the original texts have been used. In 1820 permission was given to circulate a translation without note or comment for the benefit of Roman Catholics, and the edition of 1599—the so-called Moerentorf Bible—was reprinted at Brussels in 1821, and to its circulation the British and Foreign Bible Society contributed.

5. Amongst the various sects various translations circulated, each after a time preferring its own. Thus the Lutherans, who had used Liesveldt's Bible, in 1558 adopted one based on a Magdeburg edition, and the 1558 edition was many times revised and reprinted. The Mennonites used an edition of the Bible published by Viestkens in 1560, and of the New Testament published in 1562. A few years earlier the Reformed Churches acquired a translation printed at Emden in 1556. This was the work of Jan Gheylliart. In the earlier half of the Bible, down to and including Job, he used the text of Liesveldt, revised by the help of the Zürich edition of 1548-9; the rest of the Bible was a translation of this Zürich text. A separate edition of the New Testament was published in 1556, and this was many times revised. A few years later, in 1562, a translation based on Luther's version was adopted, the so-called Deux Æs or Eulenspiegel Bible. The Remonstrants for a long time used the version made by order of the States General, and first published in 1637. This sect was opposed to the views of those who took part in the translation just mentioned, but after careful examination they were so satisfied as to its accuracy that they adopted it, and have used the Old Testament ever since. A version of the New Testament was made for their use by Christian Hartsoeker, an Arminian minister; but, although it professes to be a new translation, it follows in the main the version hitherto used.

6. The first attempt to revise the existing Dutch version by use of the original texts seems to have been made by W. Baudartius of Zütphen, who in 1614 produced such a revised text, with the help of various scholars and earlier editions. Any such individual or private attempts were dwarfed by the combined effort in the same direction made by the States General, which resulted in the edition of 1637, to which reference has been already made. The necessity of procuring an improved version based on the original texts was generally recognized some time before any steps were taken to deal with the need. In 1594 the States General determined on undertaking such a work, and entrusted it in the first instance to Philip Marnix. The matter was discussed at several sittings of the Synod of Dort in 1618-9, but it was not till ten years later that the work was begun by six translators and eight revisers for the Old Testament and the same number for the New, the scholars being selected by the Synod, and paid by the States General. The translation was finished in 1632, and the revision in 1635. The first edition was printed in 1636, and published at Leyden in the following year. In the next thirty years many editions appeared at different places, and with slight revisions and changes in orthography (such as the unsuccessful revision contained in the edition of Henry Cats of 1834) it has been adopted up to the present day.

7. About the middle of last century (1848) an attempt was made to combine the various Protestant sects in the work of revision, and members of various theological faculties were entrusted with the task; but jealousy and distrust prevented a successful completion of the plan, and when the New Testament was ready in 1866 it was not welcomed. The work on the Old Testament, after an abrupt cessation, was resumed in 1884, and its publication at Leyden began in 1897.

8. The only modern translation not based on the edition of 1637 which need be mentioned is that of Professor Van der Palm of Leyden, published in 1825. This enjoyed great popularity during the thirty years after its publication, but was never adopted in churches.

vii. DANISH (AND NORWEGIAN) VERSIONS.—1. The earliest translation of the Bible into Danish is found in a 15th cent. MS now at Copenhagen. This contains the OT as far as 2 Kings, and is based on the Vulgate, which it follows very closely. The MS has been edited by Molbech at Copenhagen in 1828. The version belongs to the 15th or possibly the 14th century. This appears to be the only MS containing any large section of the Bible which has survived of the many which, according to the statement of Hvitfeldt (died 1609) in his Danish Chronicle, were to be found in the monastic libraries in his time. Of the Psalter there are several MSS of about the same date, and fragments of Biblical translations are also to be met with.

2. At the time of the Reformation, Denmark was the earliest of the Scandinavian kingdoms to possess a complete version of its own in the vernacular. The king, Christian II., entrusted the work of translation to his secretary, John Michaelis,—or Hans Mikkelsen,—who had heard Luther at Wittenberg. The NT appeared at Leipzig in 1524, and was reprinted at Antwerp in 1529. The translation of the Gospels was based on the Latin version of Erasmus, and the rest of the NT follows very closely Luther's German translation. The language into which Mikkelsen translated was not pure Danish, but a mixture of Danish and Swedish, and the work was not very well received.

3. In 1528 two Danish versions of the Psalter appeared. The one, based on the Hebrew, in which the Latin and German were also used, was the work of Wormord, a Dutchman, and was published at Rostock, but had no great success. The other was the work of C. Pedersen (1480–1554), a man 'who had the same importance for Danish literature that Luther had for German.' This version was based on the Hebrew text and Jerome, and was printed at Antwerp, and afterwards reprinted at Copenhagen. In 1529 he published an edition of the NT which he based on Michaelis' translation, but used also 'the help of the best available theologians,' i.e. Luther and Erasmus. Two years later another edition appeared at Antwerp, and also a version of the Psalter. In 1535 Tausen published at Magdeburg a translation of the Pentateuch, in which Luther's version, the Hebrew, and Vulgate were used. In 1539 a translation of the Book of Judges by Tidemann, based on the Vulgate and Luther, appeared at Copenhagen, and two years later the same translator issued a version of Wisdom and Sirach.

4. The year 1550 marks an epoch as the date of the appearance of the first complete Bible. This was the work of the Theological Faculty at Copenhagen, and among the collaborators Pedersen took a prominent place. The work was done by command of Christian III., who ordered Luther's version to be followed as closely as the Danish would allow. An edition of 3000 copies was published, and in 1589 a second edition followed, in which the archaisms of the first were removed.

5. The first translation based on the original languages was the work of Resen, bishop of Zealand, who, not finding the editions of 1550 and 1589 literal enough, undertook a revision, which was completed in 1607, the NT appearing two years earlier. This work of Resen was not very successful owing to its indifference to Danish idiom, and another edition of the older version appeared at Copenhagen in 1633, with slight changes. This is known as the Bible of Christian IV.

6. Resen's translation was revised by Swaning, bishop of Zealand, and others in 1647, and of this revision very many copies were circulated by the College of Missions, founded in 1714. Later it was adopted by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and with only slight changes it is the version which circulates generally at the present day. During last century revised editions of the NT (1819) and OT (1824) were published under the superintendence of Bishop Munter. Another revision of the whole Bible appeared in 1872, under the superintendence of Bishops Martensen and Hermansen.

7. The Bible used in Denmark was current also in Norway till the separation of the two countries in 1814. An important revision of the 1647 Bible was begun in 1842, and the work was carried on over many years. The translation of the OT as finally approved did not appear till 1890. Of the NT a new translation was made by Bishop Bugge, and revised by other scholars.

viii. SWEDISH VERSIONS.—1. The earliest reference to the Bible in Sweden is connected with the name of St. Bridget at the beginning of the 14th century. She is said to have had a translation of the Bible made for her. About the same time a great Bible in Swedish is mentioned in the will of king Magnus Smek, which may have been the same as that mentioned as made for St. Bridget, and probably was not a complete Bible, but an exposition of the Pentateuch made by Bridget's confessor Matthias, which was no doubt to have been continued in the other books. Towards the end of the next century the Books of Joshua and Judges were translated by Nils Ragnvaldson, and a little later Budde translated Judith, Esther, Ruth, and the Books of Maccabees. A version of the Apocalypse of about the same date also survives. No other parts of the Bible are known to have been translated. All those which have been mentioned are based on the Vulgate.

2. In 1523 Sweden separated from Denmark, and, in order to secure linguistic as well as political independence, Gustav Vasa commanded a translation to be undertaken. Two translations were ordered—one in the interests of the Church of Rome, for which Vasa had recourse to the archbishop of Upsala; the other, based on Luther's version, which was the work of Laurence Andreas, afterwards chancellor. Of the first, no part was ever printed. Of the second, the NT was published at Stockholm in 1526, and many times reprinted since. A few years later (in 1536) the Psalter and Sapiential books were translated, and in 1541 the first Swedish version of the whole Bible appeared at Upsala, the OT being translated from Luther's Bible of 1534 by Laurence Petri and others, and the NT being the translation of Andreas already mentioned. This is substantially the Bible in use at the present day. At the beginning of the 17th cent. a committee was appointed to collate various editions of Luther with the object of producing an improved Swedish version. The results were known as the Observationes Strengnenses—so called from Petri, bishop of Strengnäs; but the edition for which the notes were made did not appear till 1617, when it was printed at Stockholm. It was practically a reprint of the 1541 Bible with certain additions, and corrections of typographical errors. Several subsequent editions were issued, some of them with deviations from the text of the original. At the beginning of the 18th century a revision was ordered by Charles XII., and entrusted to Benzel, bishop of Strengnäs. Very few alterations from the 1617 text were admitted, and the work was published at Stockholm in 1703. During the 18th century many editions appeared; but, owing to their cost, the circulation was not large till the Swedish and British and Foreign Bible Societies took up the work. They worked together for some time, but the connexion between them was severed by a difference of opinion as to the inclusion or exclusion of the Apocrypha. The current translation of the NT appeared in 1882, and was slightly revised next year, and approved.

ix. HUNGARIAN VERSIONS.—1. The introduction of Christianity into Hungary towards the end of the 10th cent. was soon followed by sermons in the vernacular, but Latin still remained the language of the Court. The earliest specimens of Hungarian which have survived are a funeral oration in a 13th cent. MS, and another fragment of the 14th cent. on the virginity of Mary. The Hussite movement had some effect on Hungary, and some parts of the Bible were translated into Hungarian; but the inroads of the Turks checked any development in this direction. The earliest translation of which we have any remains dates from the beginning of the 15th cent., and was the work of two Franciscan monks, Thomas and Valentine, who, under stress of persecution, fled from Bohemia into Hungary. Fragments of their work survive in a Vienna MS (No. 47), which contains part of the OT; in a Munich MS, dated 1466, which contains the Gospels; and in a MS, belonging to the bishop of Stuhlweissenburg, containing the Psalms, Canticles, and Gospels. The Vienna and Munich MSS were published by Dobrentei in 1838–1842. The translation, which is based on the Vulgate, is described as terse and exact.

2. To the beginning of the 15th cent. is to be assigned a translation by Ladislaus Batori (d. circa 1456). Many fragments of this version, including Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, and NT, are said by Schwicker to survive in the library at Gran. A MS of the year 1519 contains a Hungarian version, perhaps the one by Ladislaus, complete. An almost complete translation of the Psalms is also to be found in a MS of 1522.

3. The beginning of the 16th cent. was a time of great literary activity in Hungary. The earliest printing-press in Hungary was established at Ofen in 1473, and many others followed in the 16th century. The earliest Hungarian book to be printed was Komjati's translation of St. Paul's Epistles. This was followed by a translation of the Acts, the work of the same scholar, which was based on the Vulgate. This was printed at Cracow in 1533. The next translation to appear was one of the Gospels by G. Pesti, also based on the Vulgate, but a successful rendering, more free and independent than that of Komjati. More important was the translation of the NT by John Sylvester (Erdösi), who had been a pupil of Melanchthon at Wittenberg, and was commended by him as a man rich in knowledge and wisdom. This scholarly but rather high-flown translation was printed at Uj-Sziget, the first Hungarian Protestant printing-press, in 1541, and afterwards at Vienna in 1574. A few years later (1551–1562) appeared a careful translation of the OT and NT, based on the Hebrew, by Kaspar Heltai, also, like Sylvester, a pupil of Melanchthon. Other translations followed; but none is of any importance till we come to that of Kaspar Karolyi, the most important Protestant translation. This was based on the Hebrew and Greek, the Vulgate and other translations being also used. It was first printed in 1589–1590 at Visoly near to Gönz, and is known as the Visoly Bible. It was revised in 1608 by Albert Molnar of Szencz, and has passed through many editions, and is still in use.

4. In the beginning of the 17th cent. we have a Roman Catholic translation, based on the Vulgate. This was the work of a Jesuit, George Kaldi, and is a vigorous and faithful version. It was published at Vienna in 1625; a second edition followed in 1732, and it is still in use among the Roman Catholics. About the middle of the century a revision was undertaken by Count Stephen Bethlen D'Iktar, who established a printing-press for the purpose at Waradin. The work of printing was but half finished when the town was taken and burnt by the Turks in 1660, and nearly half of the whole edition was destroyed.

5. During this century the use of the Hungarian language spread, though Latin was also used, and there was a great increase in the number of printed books. At the same time, even as late as 1682, we meet with complaints as to the scarcity of books, for the supply had apparently not kept pace with the demand. Towards the end of the century a complete Protestant translation of the Bible was undertaken by Georg Csipkes of Komorn, who had been a student of Hebrew under Leusden at Utrecht. This was based on the original languages, and finished in 1675. Owing to various political and religious obstacles the publication was delayed, and it was not till 1715 that arrangements were made with Vitringa at Leyden for the production of an edition of 4000 copies. A large number of these were burnt before delivery, by the intervention of the Jesuits.

6. The 18th cent. saw a great decline in the interest taken in the Hungarian language and literature; but copies of the Bible were difficult to procure, and costly. Steps were therefore taken to collect funds for reprinting Karolyi's translation, and this was done five times at Utrecht. Three editions also appeared at Basle.

7. At the beginning of the 19th cent. the British and Foreign Bible Society interested itself in the circulation of Bibles in Hungary as elsewhere, and for a time printed them in Hungary itself, because their introduction from outside was forbidden. From 1852 till 1867 no agents of the Society were allowed in the country; but with the accession of the emperor Francis Joseph, in 1867, permission to circulate copies of the Bible was again given. In 1886, on the initiative of a Hungarian scholar, and with the help of the British and Foreign Bible Society, a revision of the old text was undertaken, and the archaisms of Karolyi were removed without interfering with the general vigour of his translation. After many delays the first part, the Hexateuch, appeared in 1896. A revision of Karolyi's NT had previously been published in 1878 at Budapest. In the interests of Roman Catholics, a revision of Kaldi's translation was entrusted by the archbishop of Erlau to his secretary Béla Tárkányi, who, after nine years' work, completed a translation with notes, the first edition of which was published at Erlau in 1862–1865, and a second edition appeared in 1892. Balogh in his account of the version in Herzog's RE^{3} (iii. p. 118) sums up by saying that, between 1541 and 1871, 78 editions of the Hungarian Protestant Bible, and only 8 of the Roman Catholic Bible, appeared.

x. BOHEMIAN VERSIONS.—1. The oldest MSS of a Bohemian version of Scripture belong to the 14th century. There can be little doubt that the translation of some parts of the Bible was made considerably earlier, possibly as early as the 10th or 11th century, for the Eastern Slavs had many versions by that time (see vol. iv. p. 863 f. 'Slavonic Version'), and the Western Slavs, to whom the Bohemians belong, would be sure to follow the Eastern branch before long, and certainly had a Slavonic liturgy very early. No MSS, however, have reached us, for the fragments of a Bohemian version of St. John's Gospel, assigned to the 10th cent., are probably a forgery of Hanka.

2. Here, as elsewhere, the Psalter was one of the first books to be translated, and we have several early MSS of it, two of which are assigned to the 14th century. These are the Wittenberg Psalter, edited by Gebauer, which contains a Latin Psalter and an interlinear Bohemian version, and the rather later Clementine Psalter in the University Library at Prague. In all, four different early translations of the Psalter have been distinguished by Gebauer. Besides the Psalter, other books of the OT were translated in or before the 14th cent., including Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Daniel. The earliest parts of the NT to be translated were the parts used in Church services, and so it is not surprising that traces of Slavonic influence due to the use of a Slavonic liturgy should have been found in the Bohemian version. The translation was no doubt made from the Vulgate; but Vondrak, who has carefully examined the text with reference to any evidence of Slavonic influences, writes: 'It is true they took a Latin text for basis, but the translator, or rather "glosser," had also a Church Slavonic text before him.' Traces of similar influence Vondrak also finds in the Psalter. On the other hand, Dobrofsky maintains that there is not the slightest trace of Slavonic influence.

3. Besides translations of the parts of the Gospels used in Church services, complete Gospels in Bohemian were also extant in the 14th century. Wyclif mentions that Anne of Luxemburg, wife of Richard II., had a Gospel in lingua triplici exaratum scilicet in lingua Bohemica, Teutonica, et Latina, about the year 1380. To a slightly later date belong the MSS at Dresden (c. 1400), Leitmeritz (c. 1411), and Olmutz (1417). The text of these MSS is, according to Leskien, a 'conglomeration of the already extant older translations of single books of the Bible made by different persons at different times in different recensions.'

The important point is that the text of all these MSS is older than the time of Hus. He 'did almost as much for his native tongue as Luther for German. He corrected the translation of the Bible, rearranged the Bohemian alphabet, and fixed the orthography.' This revision had some reference to the Vulgate as the underlying text, but was directed mainly to removing obsolete words and expressions. During the interval which separated the death of Hus in 1415 from the first printed Bohemian Bible in 1488, many revisions of the text took place, and many MSS of this period, both of the whole Bible and of the NT, are mentioned by Dobrofsky, all dependent on the Vulgate. Some of these are only copies of other MSS, while others contain independent translations.

4. In 1487 the first printing-press was established at Prague, and next year appeared the first edition of the Bohemian Bible, interesting as 'the first instance on record of the application of the newly invented art of printing to the multiplication of the Scriptures in a living tongue.' On this first edition, with only slight alterations and corrections, many later editions are based. The edition of the NT which appeared in 1518 is interesting as the first work of the 'United Brethren' carried out by order of Lucas of Prague. But this and subsequent revisions were relatively unimportant when compared with the so-called 'Kralitz or Brothers' Bible,' published in six volumes at Kralitz in Moravia (1579–1593). This work is described as 'an eternal monument of the beauty of the Bohemian language,' for which the United Brethren did so much. The work was superintended by John Blahoslav, 'the first profound student of the Bohemian language,' who himself translated the NT from the Greek (1564). In the translation of the OT thirteen scholars besides Blahoslav took part. The Hebrew text of the Antwerp Polyglott was used as a basis, but previous Bohemian versions are also quoted.

5. The disastrous battle of the White Mountain in 1620 was followed by the crushing out of the Bohemian nationality. 'Books in the Chekh language were hunted up in all quarters and burned. The Jesuits were very active in these labours: one especially, Andrew Konias, probably the greatest book-burner whom the world has ever seen, boasted that he had been instrumental in destroying 60,000 volumes.' Owing to the proscription of the national language in 1621, and the activity of the Jesuits just mentioned, the circulation of the Bohemian version languished. But a demand on the part of Roman Catholics led to the publication of the so-called 'Wenzel Bible,' edited by Jesuits (1677–1715). The text of the Venice edition of 1506 was used as a basis, but the Brothers' Bible was also used. Another Catholic edition, which is a revision of the Wenzel Bible, was the work of Durich and Prochaska (1778–1780), and this in turn was again revised by Prochaska, the NT appearing in 1786 and the whole Bible in 1804. In 1808 Palkovitch published a reprint of the text of the Kralitz Bible, with a list of words which had become obsolete, and this was circulated later by means of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

xi. POLISH VERSIONS.—1. The earliest specimen of the Polish language which has survived is the well-known Florian Psalter, so called because it was discovered at the monastery of St. Florian near to Linz in Austria. This MS (St. Florian iii. 206) is trilingual, richly illuminated, in two columns. The versions represented are Latin, Polish, and German, a verse in Latin being followed first by a Polish and then by a German rendering of the same verse. It is uncertain whether the letter M and the arms of Anjou found in the MS signify that it belonged to Margaret the first wife of Louis king of Hungary and Poland, and daughter of Charles IV., or refer to Mary the sister of the Polish queen Hedwig of Anjou, and daughter of king Louis. In either case the date would be about the same, viz. the middle of the 14th century. It is asserted by Leciejewski that it is a copy of a much older text, and the version may well be referred to the 13th cent., to the end of which Macieowski assigns a version of Ps 50. The St. Florian Psalter shows a very close adherence to the Latin, and also a use of the Bohemian version. It is sometimes called the Psalter of queen Margaret, and has been carefully edited by Nehring.

2. Another important MS is the so-called Bible of queen Sophia, now in the library at Saros Patak in Hungary. According to a 16th cent. statement it was written for Sophia, the fourth wife of Jagello, about the year 1455. Other authorities date it a century earlier. This MS was edited by Malecki in 1872. It is perhaps copied from a complete Polish Bible, but is itself very incomplete, containing only the earlier books of the OT (according to Morfill, the whole Pentateuch; according to Leskien, Genesis only), Joshua, Ruth, Kings (and, according to Leskien, also Chronicles), and fragments of other books of the OT. The writing of five different scribes is traceable in the MS. The translation it contains is based on the Bohemian version, with occasional reference to the Vulgate.

3. Various other Polish translations were made after the beginning of the 16th cent., 'the classical age of Polish literature,' as it has been called. The first was a translation of the NT, the work of a Lutheran, Seklucyan, a competent Greek scholar, whose translation was 'made from the Greek, with the use of the Latin and other versions.' This was printed at Königsberg in 1551. The first version of the whole Bible was published at Cracow ten years later. This, the 'Old Cracow' Bible, was intended for Roman Catholic use; but the Pope refused to sanction it, because of the use made in it of the Bohemian Bible. The next important edition is the so-called Radzivil or Brest Bible, published at Brest for the Calvinists in 1563, at the expense of Prince Nicholas Radzivil. The son of this prince, who was a Roman Catholic, on his father's death bought up and burnt all copies of this translation. This version claimed to be based on the original texts, Hebrew and Greek, but was regarded as Socinian in places. It did not, however, satisfy this sect, for whom a version was made by Budny in 1570 'from Hebrew, Greek, and Latin,' and this was reprinted, with certain changes, in 1572. Another Socinian translation appeared in 1577.

4. Another important translation made from the original language was that published at Dantzig in 1632, and afterwards reprinted. A large number of copies of this edition were bought up and burnt by the Jesuits. At the beginning of the 19th cent. the text of the Dantzig Bible was adopted by the Berlin Bible Society for the edition circulated by that Society.

5. Of Catholic translations the first to be noticed is the Leopolita Bible, the translation of John of Lemberg, based on the Vulgate, and published in 1561. But the most important of the Catholic versions is that made by Jacob Wuyck, and published at Cracow in 1599. This was based on the Vulgate; but use was made by the translator of the original text, and also of previously existing Polish translations. It was sanctioned by Pope Clement VIII., and has been often reprinted. At the beginning of the 19th cent. the text of this edition was used by the St. Petersburg Bible Society in 1813, and it has since been reprinted and widely circulated.

xii. RUSSIAN VERSIONS.—The early history of the Bible in Russia is dealt with, in regard to its origin, and the MSS in which the version is preserved, in vol. iv. p. 863 f. In the present article the history may be taken up with the first edition of the Bible, and continued to the present day.

1. The first Russian book was an Apostol (the name given to the MS or volume which contained the Acts, Cath. Epp., and St. Paul's Epistles), printed at Moscow in 1564. The innovation of printing was not well received, and the printers, Theodorof and Mstislavetz, had to flee from Moscow into Lithuania. Here editions of the Gospels (1569), the Apostol (1574), and, finally (1581), of the whole Bible appeared.

This last is the famous Ostrog Bible, so called from the place at which it was printed, the first complete printed Bible in Slavonic. For this work, brought out under the auspices of Constantine, prince of Ostrog, various MSS of the Slavonic were used; the Slavonic text was compared with the Greek, and sometimes with the Latin; modern expressions were substituted for those which were obsolete, and therefore often unintelligible; and errors were corrected. Another work—the Bible of Skorina, (Prague, 1517–1525)—emphasized the growing need of a translation into the ordinary language of the time, and a few years later Gregory's version of the Gospels (1556–1561) marks the first definite beginning of a translation into Russian, as distinguished from Old Slavonic. The printing-press was re-established at Moscow by Ivan the Terrible (1533–1584), but the prejudice against introducing corrections caused the perpetuation of the mistakes found in the Slavonic MSS. At last the agitation for, at any rate, necessary reforms became powerful enough to be effectual. In this agitation the famous Nicon, who became patriarch of Russia in 1652, took a prominent part. Scholars were summoned to Moscow, and in 1653 Greek MSS were brought from Mt. Athos. This revision was the beginning of dissent in Russia, for many adhered to the use of the unrevised books. In face of the opposition, progress was slow, and it was not till 1674 that a revision of the Slavonic Bible according to the Greek text was ordered, and begun under the superintendence of Epiphanius Slavenetzki. In 1683 a translation of the Psalter into Russian by Pheersof appeared.

2. The age of Peter the Great marked an epoch in the history of the Bible, as in other things. He revised the alphabet, removing some letters and introducing the character with which the reader of modern Russian is familiar, but the Old Slavonic remained in use for ecclesiastical purposes. In 1712 a revision of the text was ordered by Peter the Great, but the printing of this revised edition was delayed by his death. His successor, Catherine, continued the support given by her predecessor; but it was not till Elizabeth's reign that anything effective was done, owing to the persistent opposition to the work of revision. In 1744 Elizabeth ordered the Synod to proceed with the work, and finally in 1751 appeared the so-called Bible of Elizabeth. With very few changes this is the Bible in ordinary use in Russia at the present time, the text of the second edition of Elizabeth's Bible (1756) being the one adopted.

3. The reign of Alexander I. (1801–1825) marks the next event of importance in connexion with the Bible, viz. the establishment of the Russian Bible Society. This was in the first instance due to the energy of John Paterson, an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and with the warm support of the emperor the first depôt of the Russian Bible Society was opened at St. Petersburg in 1813. In 1818 the first edition of the Gospels in Slavonic and Russian was printed, in 1822 an edition of the NT followed, and a beginning was made on the OT, a Psalter appearing in the same year. But the work of the Society was to be shortlived. It met with opposition from rationalists on the one hand and conservative Bible students on the other, and fell into disfavour also with the emperor on the suggestion that there was about it somewhat of the nature of a secret political society. It 1824 the work of translation was discontinued, and the existing copies burnt; and two years later the Society was finally dissolved by the emperor Nicholas, after having during its short existence translated parts of the Bible into fourteen new languages, and circulated nearly a million copies of the Bible or some parts of it in twenty-six different languages or dialects.

4. But the demand for Russian Bibles continued to be keenly felt; and Philaret, the famous bishop of Moscow, made attempts, but without much success, to prosecute the work of translation. The first attempt to translate the OT from the Hebrew original into Russian was made by Pavski, professor of Hebrew at the Academy of St. Petersburg; but this work was not for general use. Similar work was being done by Macarius, and his translation was submitted to the Holy Synod, with a representation as to the urgent need of completing the Russian translation. At last the Synod was moved to action, and in 1860 the translation of the Gospels appeared, followed, in 1862, by the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse. The first part of the OT to be published was the Pentateuch in 1868, but the whole work was only completed in 1875, nearly twenty years after the passing of the original resolution of the Synod in 1857. This was the first translation approved by the Czar and the Synod, and is in ordinary use. A translation of the OT made from the Hebrew into Russian by the British and Foreign Bible Society (London, 1875) was not allowed to circulate, but the same Society was allowed to print the translation made by the Synod, and to circulate it without the Apocrypha of the Greek and Latin Bibles translated by the Synod.

LITERATURE.—This is for the most part in Russian. See Scrivener's Introduction, ii. 157 ff.; art. by the present writer in the Church Quarterly Review, October 1895 [from which the above facts are summarized], and the Literature there referred to; Nestle, Urtext, etc., 211 ff.; Kean, The Bible in Russia.

xiii. MODERN GREEK VERSIONS.—1. The earliest translation into modern Greek dates from 1547, when the Pentateuch, the five 'Rolls,' and the other parts of the OT read in the Jewish services were translated from the Hebrew, and printed at Constantinople, in three columns which contained the Spanish, modern Greek, and the Targum of Onkelos. All three columns were printed in Hebrew characters; but the edition had no widespread circulation, and had a literary rather than a religious value.

2. The first really important translation was that of the New Testament made by Maximus Callipoli. This was printed at Geneva in 1638 at the expense of the Government of the United Provinces, and contains an introductory preface by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, who had studied at Geneva. This translation, in the Greek of the 17th cent., follows closely the original text; and of the edition of 1500 copies many were by permission distributed in the East.

3. The translation of Maximus was reprinted in 1703 in London at the expense of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, after having been revised by Seraphim; and after further correction by Anastasius and Kollettis an edition was published at Halle in 1710 at the queen of Prussia's expense.

In Greece the favourable reception originally given to Maximus' work was modified later, on the ground that it was made in a dialect, and therefore not generally intelligible. The real underlying ground of opposition was distrust of Protestant influence. Whatever the cause, the circulation of Seraphim's work was forbidden by the patriarch Gabriel, as that of Maximus had been earlier.

The influence of the British and Foreign Bible Society at the beginning of the 19th cent. made the matter of a modern Greek version again prominent. In 1810 Maximus' translation of the New Testament was reprinted, and several editions were circulated before 1830, the necessary permission having been obtained from the patriarch Cyril in 1814.

4. But the need of revision was recognized, and accordingly in 1819 the archimandrite Hilarion was entrusted with the work, the ultimate responsibility for the revision being undertaken by the learned archbishop Constantius of Sinai. Certain difficulties arose as to the inclusion of the OT Apocrypha, for Hilarion's version of the Old Testament was made from the Septuagint. Ultimately it was decided by the British and Foreign Bible Society that the translation of the Old Testament should be made from the Hebrew, and the headquarters of the work were established at Corfu. Here two English scholars, with a knowledge of Hebrew, and with the help of other scholars, including two learned Greeks, Bambas and Tipaldo, began the work, using not only the Hebrew, but the French translation of Martin, the Italian of Diodati, the Septuagint, Vulgate, and other versions. Parts of the Old Testament (e.g. the Psalms) were printed and circulated as they were finished, and by 1836 the whole Old Testament was completed. The New Testament translation of Hilarion was also revised by Bambas, and an edition appeared in 1848. This 'revision is considered so correct and idiomatic that it has now completely superseded that of Hilarion.'

As once before, so again, a reaction set in against Western influences, and Biblical translations were forbidden in the Orthodox Church. But, in spite of this, the British and Foreign Bible Society continued to print translations into modern Greek.*

APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.—

i. Definition.
ii. Origin.
iii. Value.
iv. Reception and influence.
v. Classification.
Literature.

i. DEFINITION.—The history of the word 'Apocrypha' accounts for its various uses, and its etymology explains its diverse meanings (see art. APOCRYPHA in vol. i. p. 112). 'Apocryphal' was a title of honour when it was applied to writings which were hidden on account of the unique value of their contents; their secret doctrines imparted to them a special authority (auctoritas secreta). But 'apocryphal' was a term of reproach when it was applied to writings which were hidden on account of the heterodoxy of their contents; their heretical teaching rendered them specially harmful. An approximation of the two opposite senses of 'apocryphal' may, however, be traced; for the secrecy which was originally a claim to peculiar regard soon became a mark of inferiority, owing to the suspicion which rests on books of hidden origin. From these differences in the application of the word it is not difficult to understand how it came to pass that Gospels which were held in high esteem, as, e.g., by Gnostic sects, were condemned by the Christian Church and declared to be unworthy of a place in the Canon, notwithstanding that for some of them Apostolic authorship was claimed; it is also not difficult to understand how Gospels, which were not condemned for their false teaching, were excluded from the Canon because of their inferiority to the writings of the four Evangelists. Hence 'apocryphal,' which in the early Fathers means heretical, acquired the sense of uncanonical, which it now most frequently bears.

Under the heading of 'Apocryphal Gospels' it is customary to include all extra-canonical writings which claim to be Gospels, whether they are rivals of or supplements to the canonical Gospels, whether they are dependent on or independent of the writings of the four Evangelists, whether the tradition they embody has the appearance of being authentic or is manifestly fictitious. But when the term 'apocryphal' has this wider denotation, it has a narrower connotation. To Jerome this extension of the meaning of the word is generally ascribed, for he applies it to those Jewish writings which had a place in the LXX Greek version of the OT but were not included in the twenty-two books of the Hebrew Canon (Prologus Galeatus: 'Quidquid extra hos est, inter ἀπόκρυφα esse ponendum'). Nevertheless, Jerome held that some of the OT apocryphal books might be read 'for the edification of the people, not for confirming the authority of Church dogmas' (Prol. to Books of Solomon); his description of these non-canonical books as apocryphal does not therefore imply that he condemned them as false and worthless. This must be borne in mind when 'apocryphal' is defined as uncanonical in its application to Gospels. Apocryphal Gospels are uncanonical Gospels; but all uncanonical Gospels are not necessarily apocryphal in the bad meaning which adheres to the word. A Gospel may be neither spurious nor heretical, though it is apocryphal; it may be based upon a genuine tradition, though it is uncanonical.

* These were sanctioned on condition that the ancient Greek text was printed in parallel columns with the modern Greek version. But in 1901 ecclesiastical and patriotic prejudices were roused by a modern version or 'paraphrase,' circulated at the expense of queen Olga, and, in consequence, the circulation of any Greek version except the ancient Greek text has been denounced by the Synod and prohibited by the Government.

ii. ORIGIN.—The resemblances and the variations in the Synoptic Gospels furnish a problem which requires for its solution either an oral tradition which gradually became as stereotyped as though it had been written, or documentary sources modified by oral traditions. Most critics recognize elements of truth in the oral as well as in the documentary theory of the origin of the Gospels. Those who adopt the documentary hypothesis allow for the influence of traditions current in the Church, though not committed to writing. The problem presented by the apocryphal Gospels is to determine how far their additions to the narratives of the four Evangelists are derived from authentic sources, also to decide how far the fictitious accretions are due to fraudulent intentions or the heretical tendencies of the respective writers. The external evidence for the existence of an apocryphal Gospel must be weighed together with the evidence derived from a careful study of its contents before any judgment can be pronounced as to its origin. But no pre-judgment of the issue in any particular case is involved in the statement of some general considerations which must guide every such inquiry. The author of Supernatural Religion thinks that 'apologetic critics' are prejudiced by 'canonical glamour'; but there may be an unreasonable bias against as well as a reasonable presumption in favour of the canonical Gospels. The reverence they enjoyed for centuries is a significant fact, and is not satisfactorily accounted for by the statement that they were 'more fortunate' than the Gospels which were never included in the Canon of Scripture (The Gospel according to Peter, p. 132). The claim of an uncanonical Gospel to represent an early form of the Christian tradition cannot be dismissed on a priori grounds, nor can it be admitted without the most thorough investigation. The author may have derived the narratives of unrecorded incidents in the life of Jesus, or the reports of His unwritten sayings, from sources unknown to the four Evangelists. Jesus did 'many other things' (Jn 21^{25}) than those which the canonical Gospels relate; before St. Luke wrote the Third Gospel many had 'taken in hand to draw up' similar, if less complete, narratives (Lk 1^1). Moreover, the manufacture of fanciful traditions is not always to be ascribed to the zeal of heretics, but sometimes to an eager desire to satisfy—without critical discrimination between the nucleus of fact and the embellishments of fiction—curiosity in regard to those periods in our Lord's life about which the four Evangelists tell us nothing. Pseudo-Matthew had persuaded himself that the motive which impelled him to write was love for Christ (Liber de infantia Mariæ: 'amor ergo Christi est, cui satisfecimus'). But before any apocryphal Gospel is assumed to contain an earlier and purer form of the Evangelic tradition it must be examined in the light of indisputable evidence that writers of Gnostic tendencies (cf. Epiph. Hær. xxvi. 8, 12) published fictitious and pseudepigraphic works to support their peculiar tenets, claiming that their works imparted knowledge, secretly handed down to them, of the things hidden by Jesus from the multitude to whom He spoke in riddles which none but His most favoured disciples understood. Origen (c. 240) says: 'There are some believers exactly like drunken people who treat with violence their own body, for they falsify and alter the text of the Gospels three or four times, in order that they may evade its remonstrances' (contra Celsum, ii. 27. See Harnack, Chron. i. 590).

The variations in the texts of such apocryphal Gospels as are extant in different recensions cannot, in the judgment of Tischendorf, be explained as unintentional alterations; often the sense of a passage is completely altered, these Gospels being treated with a freedom which is inconceivable on the supposition that they were held in as high esteem as the canonical Gospels (de Evv. Apocr. origine et usu, p. 121: 'Fraudis apocrypha (evangelia) convincuntur ex mira qua laborant textus ambiguitate, a qua immensum canonica differunt, quamquam et ipsa haud exigua lectionum varietate premuntur'). The authors of the apocryphal Gospels, whether they were influenced by dogmatic motives or by a desire to satisfy curiosity, adopted, as Hofmann points out, similar methods of composition. In both classes of writings there are some stories which are pure inventions, but there are others in which a causa media may be discovered. Sometimes elaborate narratives are developed out of a mere allusion in the canonical Gospels, sometimes words of Jesus are transformed into deeds, sometimes a slavishly literal fulfilment of an OT prophecy is recorded, and sometimes Jesus is represented as working marvels closely resembling and frequently surpassing OT miracles (Herzog, PRE^{3} i. 655).

iii. VALUE.—The revival of interest in the apocryphal writings of the NT is due partly to the discovery of new documents, and partly to the attraction exerted upon the minds of many scholars by the fascinating and complex problem of the literary origin of the Gospels. Amongst the questions upon which light is sought are the following: Do these uncanonical Gospels impart any additional knowledge of the words and works of the Lord Jesus? In this respect it is generally agreed that their value is slight. Do they help to establish any theory of the origin of the Gospels? In this respect their value differs greatly: until more complete and more accurate texts of some of these Gospels are accessible it is impossible to express any positive judgment in regard to their relation to the canonical Gospels. It may, however, be said that the theory of a common oral tradition deserves more careful consideration than it has received from some modern critics, whose arguments are valid only on the assumption that priority to the canonical Gospels and direct dependence on them are the only possible alternatives.

The apocryphal Gospels contain information which is of considerable value to the student of the manners and customs of the Jews in early Christian times. It is true that their statements are sometimes in flagrant contradiction to history; but it is, as a rule, not difficult to discover the dogmatic bias which led to a perversion of the facts. When no such motive is discernible, and the details given violate neither psychological nor historical probability, the writer's source may be an authentic tradition. For example, the setting of some of the fabulous stories of our Lord's childhood has an interest for the antiquarian who regards the fantastic miracles as quite incredible. It is also probable that, in the near future, these Gospels will prove of even greater value to historians as they strive to disperse the gloom which still hangs over the first two centuries of the Christian era,—the period when heretical tendencies appeared within the Church, and heretical sects were formed outside it. In the controversy which has arisen on this question there has been on the one side a tendency to forget that in the 4th cent. opinions might be regarded as heterodox which were not so regarded in the 2nd cent.; but on the other side there has been a tendency to claim the sanction of the early Church for later forms of asceticism and Gnosticism, on the insufficient ground that some of these Gospels which originated in heretical circles found some favour amongst Christians. Von Dobschütz, who has studied these writings from this point of view, has called attention to facts which have an important bearing on the discussion, as, e.g., that the adherents of Gnosticism who claimed to belong to the Christian Church, and sought to propagate their peculiar views within its borders, did not of their own accord leave the Church,—it was the Church that excluded them; also that the Docetic type of Christianity current in Egypt at the end of the 1st and at the beginning of the 2nd cent. was at a very early date discredited as heretical, though it long continued to dominate Christian thought as expressed in Christian art (Theol. Lit.-Zeitung, 1903, No. 12).

In this article the contents of the various apocryphal Gospels are given, sometimes in full, but always in sufficient detail to enable the reader to judge of their worth. This course has been taken in the belief that first-hand acquaintance with these writings establishes, by contrast, the unique value of the canonical Gospels, and furnishes the most conclusive refutation of the theories which seek to lift these extravagant stories to the same level as the narratives of the four Evangelists. To pass from the NT to these apocryphal Gospels, in so far as they embody independent traditions, involves a complete change of psychological climate. The wisdom of Westcott's words is confirmed by recent research: 'The completeness of the antithesis which these spurious stories offer to the Divine record appears at once—if we may be allowed for a moment to compare light with darkness—in relation to the treatment of the three great elements of the Gospel history—Miracles, Parables, and Prophecy, the lessons of power, of nature, and of providence. In the apocryphal miracles we find no worthy conception of the laws of providential interference; they are wrought to supply personal wants, or to gratify private feelings, and often are positively immoral. Nor, again, is there any spiritual element in their working. . . . The apocryphal Gospels are also entirely without parables; they exhibit no sense of those deeper relations between nature and man—between corruption and sin—which are so frequently declared in the Synoptic Gospels. . . . Yet more, they do not recognize the office of Prophecy. History in them becomes a mere collection of traditions, and is regarded neither as the fulfilment of the past nor as the type of the future' (Introd. to Study of the Gospels, Appendix D).

iv. Reception and influence.—In tracing the influence of these writings no question arises, as in regard to the OT Apocrypha, of their reception by any section of the Church as canonical or deutero-canonical books. In the 2nd cent. four Gospels, and only four, were recognized. There is also ample evidence, as will hereafter be manifest, that most of the apocryphal Gospels have always been condemned by orthodox Christians. A few, however, had an extensive and early circulation amongst Christians in the East: for example, the Protevangelium of James was read in churches in the 4th cent., and was translated into the Syriac, Arabic, and Coptic languages. Details of such usage will be given in the notes on the several Gospels; but in general it may be said that these writings were condemned by the Western Church until the Middle Ages, when a sufficient period of time had elapsed for their origin to be forgotten. Pseudo-Chrysostom (c. 600) is said to have made use of the apocryphal Gospels of the Childhood of Jesus, and from the 10th cent. onwards they formed the material for legendary poems and miracle-plays, whilst some of their traditions were embodied in paintings and other works of art. The first of a series of Latin poems by Hroswitha (d. 968), a Saxon nun, is based on the fictitious accounts given in these Gospels of the perpetual virginity of Mary. Vincent of Beauvais, a Dominican, did much to popularize these apocryphal stories by including many of them in his Speculum Majus (c. 1250); the third part of this work, the Speculum Historiale, contains twelve chapters from the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew, and several from the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary. In the 14th cent. the Speculum Historiale was translated into French and other European languages. In his Speculum Sanctorum de Voragine (d. 1298) made use of almost the whole of the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, and of a few chapters from the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew. This work, better known as the Legenda Aurea, and the Speculum Historiale of Vincent were amongst the earliest printed books in the 15th cent.; they are the chief sources from which many popular Roman Catholic compilations of these stories are derived. Yet Vincent put the Gospels he made use of into the category of 'doubtful' writings; and amongst Roman Catholic divines who have denounced them as unauthoritative, Tappenhorn mentions Alcuin (d. 804), St. Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), and Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). As recently as 1884, Pope Leo XIII. reaffirmed the judgment of the learned Pope Benedict XIV., which declares the Protevangelium of James and other works on the Nativity of Mary to be 'impure sources of tradition' (de Festis B.M.V. lib. ii. cap. 9: 'Cum plures scribere voluerint, ex turbidis fontibus, quæ tradiderunt, hausisse videntur'). Tappenhorn, whose work is published with episcopal authority, laments that these fictions are often accepted as embodying 'ancient and pious traditions.' 'The veil which the Holy Spirit in the Gospels has drawn over the birth and early life of the Mother of God, we ought not to try to remove by means of untrustworthy, apocryphal narratives' (Ausserbiblische Nachrichten, p. 18 f.).

Some of the fables of these Gospels are found in the Ḳoran, as, e.g., the vow of Mary's mother to consecrate her virgin daughter to the temple-service, the feeding of Mary by an angel, the use of rods to discover by lot a guardian for Mary, the making by the boy Jesus of twelve sparrows out of clay, etc. Kessäus, the famous commentator on the Ḳoran, refers in his notes to more of these stories (cf. Forbes Robinson, Coptic Apocr. Gospels in 'Texts and Studies,' IV. ii.; 1896).

v. Classification.—There is an article on the Gospel of Nicodemus in vol. iii. p. 544 ff., and an account of the Gospel of Marcion in art. Luke (Gospel of), ib. p. 168 f. Separate articles on the Gospel according to the Hebrews (see above, p. 338 ff.), and on the Gospel of Tatian (see art. Diatessaron, below, p. 451 ff.), appear in the present volume. In the present article the most important of the apocryphal Gospels, other than those above mentioned, will be treated in the following order:—

A. Gospels (or fragments of Gospels) which, in the opinion of some critics, embody an early tradition, and rival the canonical Gospels. In regard to the date, character, and tendencies of these

Gospels there has, however, been much controversy; they are known as—

1. Gospel according to the Egyptians.
2. Gospel according to Peter.
3. Fayûm Gospel Fragment.

B. Gospels which claim to fill up the gaps in our knowledge of the parents of Jesus, or of His infancy and childhood, viz.—

1. Protevangelium of James, including the Latin recensions known as—(a) Gospel of pseudo-Matthew,
    (b) Gospel of the Nativity of Mary.
2. Gospel according to Thomas.
3. Arabic Gospel of the Childhood.
4. Arabic History of Joseph the Carpenter.
5. The Departure of Mary (Transitus Mariæ).

C. Gospels whose heretical origin is universally acknowledged, viz.—

1. Gospel of the Twelve Apostles.
2. Gospel according to Philip.
3. Gospel according to Matthias.
4. Gospel according to Basilides.

D. Gospels of which almost nothing is known except their name. These will be mentioned in alphabetical order, and, as far as possible, described.

LITERATURE.—In 1552 Bibliander's edition of the 'Protevangelium Jacobi' appeared; this work is also the only Gospel in the earliest collection of NT Apocrypha: Apocrypha, h.e. narrationes de Christo, Maria, Joseph, cognatione et familia Christi, extra Biblia, etc., 1564, added by M. Neander Soraviensis to his Catechesis Mart. Lutheri parva. Fabricius published the first critical edition in 1703: Codex apocryphus NT; this work is the basis of Jones' A New and Full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the NT, and of Birch's Auctarium cod. apocr. NT Fabriciani. In 1832 Thilo's Codex Apocryphus NT appeared with valuable Prolegomena; this work is the basis of Borberg's Bibliothek der NT Apokryphen, and of Brunet's Les évangiles apocryphes. A new impetus to the study of these writings was imparted by the publication of the results of Tischendorf's learned researches: Evangelia Apocrypha, 1853, 2nd ed. 1876; this standard edition was preceded by Tischendorf's prize essay: de Evang. Apocr. origine et usu, 1851; in the same author's Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst? there is a chapter on 'Apocr. Literatur.' Hilgenfeld's NT extra canonem receptum, 4th ed. 1884, contains, in the section entitled 'Librorum Deperditorum Fragmenta,' learned notes on some of these Gospels.

In recent years elaborate investigations of the apocryphal Gospels have been published. Invaluable to all students are those found in Harnack's Altchristliche Litteraturgeschichte and Zahn's Geschichte des NT Kanons. Holtzmann's Einleitung in das NT, 3rd ed. 1892, contains an appendix on the 'NT Apocrypha.' Admirable introductions to these Gospels, with complete translations of their contents, are given in Die Apokryphen des Neuen Testaments—a comprehensive work shortly to be published under the editorship of Dr. Hennecke, who, with Prof. A. Meyer, has contributed the greater part of the section on the apocryphal Gospels.

Preuschen's Antilegomena: Die Reste der ausserkanonischen Evangelien und urchristlichen Ueberlieferungen, presents a critically edited text of the extant fragments of these writings. The Syriac Versions are brought within the student's reach by Wright's Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the NT, and his articles in the Journal of Sacred Literature, 1865; the Coptic Versions by Forbes Robinson's Coptic Apocryphal Gospels.

i. MEANING OF THE TITLE.—In the title which Clement of Alexandria first applies to this Gospel—τὸ κατ' Αἰγυπτίους εὐαγγέλιον—the preposition κατά cannot have the same meaning as in the titles of the canonical and other Gospels, where it is used with a proper name in the singular. The reference is not to authorship, but to the region in which the Gospel found acceptance, or to the circle from which it sprang. It is improbable that the Gospel was written in the Egyptian, i.e. the Coptic language; Clement of Alexandria quotes from it, but there is no evidence either that he made use of a translation or that he had learnt Coptic during his residence in Egypt. On account of the resemblance of the title to that of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, Harnack (Chronologie, i. 612 f.) suggests that one Gospel circulated amongst the Jewish Christians residing in Egypt, and the other Gospel amongst the Christians who were natives of Egypt; it is also a possible inference that the Gospel was not called καθ' Ἕλληνας, because Christianity had more adherents amongst the native Egyptians than amongst the Greek residents in Egypt. But there is insufficient foundation for Harnack's argument, when he maintains that the title—the Gospel of the Egyptians, or the Egyptian Gospel—signifies that this was the only Gospel known to these Egyptian Christians. 'If, in the same circles, the Gospels according to Matthew, Mark, etc., had been read with equal or even higher authority, it would have been impossible in those circles to describe this Gospel as the Gospel of the Egyptians.' Harnack's conclusion rests upon his statement that the name was given to the Gospel by Egyptian writers, i.e. by Clement of Alexandria and Origen; he acknowledges that if non-Egyptian Fathers had thus described this Gospel, 'we might, nay we must, have believed that because the Gospel came from Egypt it was called the Egyptian Gospel, just as the Palestinian Gospel was called τὸ εὐαγγέλιον καθ' Ἑβραίους, or Ἑβραϊκόν, or Ἰουδαϊκόν.' But although Origen was a native of Alexandria, Clement was an Athenian. Zahn (Geschichte, ii. 630) can find no intimation in the writings of Clement and Origen that they regarded themselves as Αἰγύπτιοι; his explanation of the title, therefore, is that whilst the Church at Alexandria kept to the canonical Gospels, this non-canonical Gospel had considerable popularity in the provinces of Egypt during the 2nd century. This conclusion is a probable inference from the scanty facts; moreover, it is in accord with the history of the Church in Egypt during the 3rd and 4th cents., when the provincial Churches diverged in their theology from the teaching of the Alexandrian Fathers.

ii. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—1. The Gospel according to the Egyptians is first mentioned (175-200) by Clement of Alexandria. After quoting a passage which Julius Cassianus (c. 170) ascribes to 'the Lord,' Clement adds: 'We have not this saying in the four Gospels that have been handed down to us, but in the Gospel κατ' Αἰγυπτίους (Strom. iii. 13, 92). The Gospel is not described as a heretical writing, but it is regarded as outside the class to which the four Gospels belong (τοῖς παραδεδομένοις ἡμῖν τέτταρσιν εὐαγγελίοις).

2. Origen in his Commentary on Lk 1^1 (c. 220) gives the unknown authors of τὸ κατ' Αἰγυπτίους εὐαγγέλιον the first place in his list of those who 'took in hand to draw up a narrative of Gospel occurrences.' With these writers who took the matter in hand he contrasts the four Evangelists who wrote as they were moved by the Holy Spirit (ἐξ ἁγίου κινούμενος πνεύματος). Latin translations of Origen's notes on this passage are given by Jerome and by Ambrose; both place the Gospel in the class of heretical writings. Jerome's words are: 'Ecclesia quatuor habet evangelia, hæreses plurima, e quibus quoddam scribitur "secundum Ægyptios."' (Cf. Zahn, Geschichte, ii. 625). After naming other apocryphal Gospels, Jerome says 'et alia plura legimus': these words are not in the extant Greek text; but as it bears elsewhere signs of abbreviation, and as Ambrose in his independent version essentially agrees with Jerome, the Latin is probably a correct rendering of Origen's words. Harnack and Zahn conclude that Origen had this Gospel in his hands; hence we may, with some degree of confidence, accept his judgment as to the character of a work which he had himself read.

3. This Gospel was known by name to two other authors. Hippolytus (155–235) quotes from a Naassene work a passage which treats of the constitution of the human soul, and says (Philos. v. 7) that this Gnostic sect found support for their fantastic theories ἐν τῷ ἐπιγραφομένῳ κατ' Αἰγυπτίους εὐαγγελίῳ. Of the Naassenes little is known. Lightfoot (Biblical Essays, 1893, pp. 408, 411–418) sought to prove that the ἑτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες of the Pastoral Epistles closely resembled them; but Hofmann, B. Weiss, and Hort (Judaistic Christianity, 1894, pp. 130–146) have shown that this view does not meet the requirements of strict exegesis. The Naassenes were not Jewish legalists, but Gnostics 'in whose syncretistic system there were Jewish elements' (cf. Zahn, Einleitung, i. 476).—Epiphanius (377) states that the Sabellians appealed to this Gospel in support of their doctrine; he does not give a quotation from it, but says that it represents 'the Saviour' as teaching His disciples that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are the same (τὸν αὐτὸν εἶναι πατέρα, τὸν αὐτὸν εἶναι υἱόν, τὸν αὐτὸν εἶναι ἅγιον πνεῦμα); he also asserts that the heresy was derived from apocryphal sources, especially from 'the Egyptian Gospel' (ἐξ ἀποκρύφων τινῶν, μάλιστα ἀπὸ τοῦ καλουμένου Αἰγυπτίου εὐαγγελίου). The slight change in the title (Αἰγύπτιον εὐαγγέλιον) renders still more probable the view taken above of its meaning; Epiphanius (Hær. xxx. 13) also speaks of a Hebrew Gospel (Ἑβραϊκόν), and the natural explanation yields good sense in both cases: the Gospels would fitly be so described which were used respectively by the Egyptians and by the Hebrews.

4. The so-called Second Epistle of Clement of Rome.—Of writings which are supposed to contain quotations from this Gospel, although it is not named, the most important is the 'Ancient Homily,' which from the 5th cent. was known as the Second Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (130–140). Pseudo-Clement—unlike the genuine Clement, whose Scripture references are almost exclusively to the OT—makes many allusions to the Evangelic history, using both the canonical Gospels and apocryphal narratives. In one passage there are verbal agreements with the Gospel according to the Egyptians: 'For the Lord himself, being asked by a certain person when his kingdom would come, said, When the two shall be one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female neither male nor female' (2 Clem. xii.). Lightfoot concludes (Apost. Fathers, pt. i. vol. ii. p. 238) that 'our pseudo-Clement would seem to have employed this apocryphal Gospel as a principal authority for the sayings of our Lord. Harnack is quite certain that he did, but the evidence does not warrant a positive statement; there are differences as well as agreements in the two forms in which the saying is quoted (cf. iii. below). The two versions may therefore be derived from a common source, either oral or written, the purer form of the saying being found in pseudo-Clement. Zahn and Resch oppose the identification of the source as strongly as Hilgenfeld and Harnack assert it; Harnack assigns three other quotations in the Homily to this Gospel (Chron. i. 618). Ropes says that it is impossible to express a confident opinion (Die Sprüche Jesu, pp. 132, 146).

5. In recent criticism there has been manifested a tendency to refer back to this Gospel sayings of our Lord and narratives of events found in other fragmentary sources. Harnack favours the theory that the Logia in the Oxyrhynchus Fragment were taken from this Gospel (cf. Expositor, 5th series, vi. 411); Sanday does not adopt this view, but is of opinion that 'they may well have had their birth in proximity to it' (Crit. Rev. viii. 140); Armitage Robinson says: 'I am not at present prepared to say that the newly discovered sayings are excerpts from the Gospel according to the Egyptians. I must content myself with the statement that such a view is not improbable' (Expositor, 5th series, vi. 421). It is a mere conjecture that the Fayûm Fragment (Mk 14^{26-30} abbreviated, with v.^{28} omitted) is an extract from this Gospel. Harnack (Chron. i. 590) suggests the Gospel according to the Hebrews as an alternative source, whilst Zahn regards the verses as the fragment of a homily (Geschichte, ii. 789 f.). Völter (Petrusevangelium oder Ægypterevangelium?) holds that the Gospel of Peter is identical with this Gospel, in which, however, he is compelled to acknowledge the presence of interpolations. The reasoning has failed to convince scholars who have made a special study of the Gospel of Peter (cf. Crit. Rev. v. 299). Other conjectures, as, e.g., that this Gospel is related to the Didache and to Tatian's Diatessaron, are mentioned by Harnack, but he does not deem it needful to discuss them. On the general question, it may be said that it is hazardous to treat one Gospel, whether canonical or apocryphal, as dependent on another, because similar reports of our Lord's words or deeds are found in both; they may be independent of each other, but dependent on a common source, oral or written.

iii. CONTENTS.—The passages from this Gospel quoted by Clement of Alexandria are taken from the discourse of Jesus with Salome. (For the Greek text, see Harnack, Geschichte, i. 13; Preuschen, Antilegomena, p. 2 f.). To Salome's question, 'How long shall Death reign?' Jesus replies, 'So long as ye women give birth; for I came to destroy the works of the female.' Salome says, 'Then should I have done well, if I had borne no children?' and the Lord makes answer, 'Eat every herb, but the bitter one eat not.' [Salome's words are καλῶς οὖν ἐποίησα μὴ τεκοῦσα; Lightfoot proposes 'an easy change of reading' (ἂν ἐποίησα) to avoid the contradiction to the canonical narratives implied in the rendering 'then I did well that I bare not.' But, as Zahn points out, this rendering would require οὐ in place of μή; all difficulty is removed by adopting Harnack's note of interrogation]. To a further question of Salome, 'When shall these things be known?' the Lord replies, 'When ye tread underfoot the garment of shame, and when the two become one, and the male with the female neither male nor female.' (Cf. ii. 4 above for pseudo-Clement's version of this saying).

Another extract from this Gospel is given by

Hippolytus in his refutation of the Naassene heresy (Philos. v. 7): 'They affirm that the soul is very difficult to discover, and hard to understand; for it does not remain in the same figure or the same form invariably, or in one passive condition, that either one could express it by a sign or comprehend it substantially. But they have these varied changes [of the soul] set down in the Gospel inscribed "according to the Egyptians."'

Epiphanius (Hær. lxii. 2) states that this Gospel was a chief source of Sabellian heterodoxy; but, although he asserts that in it many such things are ascribed to the Saviour 'with a mystical significance' (μυστηριωδῶς), he mentions only one: 'the same [person] is Father, the same is Son, the same is Holy Spirit.'

In Harnack's judgment, three more passages found in the homily of pseudo-Clement (Ep. c. 4, c. 5, c. 8) are quotations from this Gospel, viz.: 'The Lord said, Though ye be gathered together with me in my bosom and do not my commandments, I will cast you away, and will say unto you, Depart from me, I know you not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity.' (Cf. Lk 13^{27}, Mt 7^{23}). 'For the Lord saith, Ye shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves. But Peter answered and said unto him, What then, if the wolves should tear the lambs? Jesus said unto Peter, Let not the lambs fear the wolves after they are dead; and ye also, fear ye not them that kill you and are not able to do anything to you; but fear him that after ye are dead hath power over soul and body, to cast them into the gehenna of fire.' (Cf. Lk 10^3, Mt 10^{28}, and Lk $12^{4.5}$). 'For the Lord saith in the Gospel, If ye kept not that which is little, who shall give unto you that which is great? For I say unto you that he which is faithful in the least, is faithful also in much.' (Cf. Lk 16^{10}, Mt $25^{21.23}$).

iv. ORIGIN AND CHARACTER.—There is great divergence of opinion in regard to the character of this Gospel. All are agreed that it circulated amongst various heretical sects or schools; but was it, therefore, a heretical Gospel as regards its origin? or was it, as Harnack believes, 'part of the original Evangelic literature in the strict sense of the word?'

The facts of which any satisfactory solution of the problem must take account are these: 1. Clement of Alexandria's statements (Strom. iii. 9, 13, 91) that the Gospel was used (a) by Cassian, the Gnostic leader (ὁ τῆς δοκήσεως ἀρχηγός) of the Encratites who were ascetics and condemned marriage, and (b) by Theodotus, the Egyptian pupil of the Gnostic Valentinus. 2. Hippolytus asserts that the Naassenes, who were also Gnostics, quoted it in support of their speculations about the soul of man. 3. Epiphanius says that the Sabellians found passages in it which taught a modalistic doctrine of the Trinity. 4. Clement of Alexandria classes it apart from 'the four Gospels.' 5. Origen puts it at the head of the list of heretical Gospels.—Is Origen's judgment confirmed by the extant fragments of this Gospel? To this question Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 712) replies: 'The Gospel was a product of pantheistic gnosis'; unquestionably, it contains traces of the teaching that the true gnosis imparts 'insight into the unsubstantial character of all the distinctions which prevail among, and separate one from another, the things of this visible world'; it reflects also the practical as well as the mystical aspect of Gnosticism, for the Encratite prohibition of marriage was the natural consequence of insight into the vanity of the distinctions of sex. Some amount of Encratism is recognized by Harnack, but he contends that it is not present to such an extent as to justify those who describe the Gospel as heretical and Gnostic. He is right in maintaining that the ascetic tendency of some of the sayings has been exaggerated, and in urging that the entire Gospel may have contained material derived from purer sources than the fragments known to us. But to establish the non-heretical character of this Gospel more conclusive evidence is required than its use by pseudo-Clement, which, as we have seen, cannot be regarded as a certainty. The least convincing part of Harnack's investigation is that in which the inference that this Gospel bears the Synoptic stamp, and is closely akin to Matthew and Luke, is made to rest upon the insufficiently attested assertion that it was used by pseudo-Clement. 'It contained nothing heretical,—if it had, the Church at Rome in 170 would certainly not have read it' (Chron. i. 619). But if pseudo-Clement drew from the same source as this Gospel, the phenomena of the text would be satisfactorily explained, especially the expanded and less credible form given in this Gospel to the words of Jesus. Moreover, this solution of the problem is quite consistent with Harnack's view that this Gospel is not dependent on the Synoptics, but 'derives from the sources of the Synoptics.' The strongest argument adduced to prove that this Gospel must have contained much orthodox teaching, is based upon the fact that Clement of Alexandria held it in good esteem and gave a different, if mystical, interpretation to those passages which the Encratites quoted in support of their ascetic practices. The most probable conclusion which the evidence now available warrants is that the Gospel according to the Egyptians is a Gnostic writing derived, it may be, from a good source; but if its unknown author had access to material as valuable as that of which the Evangelists made use, he treated it more freely, and both added to and modified the Evangelic tradition.

In regard to the place where this Gospel was written, Zahn suggests Antioch; Harnack prefers Egypt. Its date cannot be later than the middle of the 2nd cent., probably about 140. Harnack, however, holds that the terminus ad quem is 130.

    2. Origen.
    3. Eusebius, etc.
    4. Some doubtful testimony.
ii. Contents of recently discovered Fragment.
iii. Relation to the canonical Gospels.
iv. Alleged use by early writers.
v. Character and tendencies.
vi. Date and place of origin.
    Literature.

i. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE PRIOR TO ITS DISCOVERY.—1. The earliest evidence of the existence of this Gospel is found in a letter of Serapion, who became bishop of Antioch c. 190. Eusebius mentions amongst the memorials of his 'literary industry' a work composed 'on the so-called Gospel of Peter,' and gives the following extract from it (HE vi. 12 [McGiffert's translation, p. 258]): 'For we, brethren, receive both Peter and the other apostles as Christ; but we reject intelligently the writings falsely ascribed to them, knowing that such were not handed down to us. When I visited you, I supposed that all of you held the true faith, and as I had not read the Gospel which they put forward under the name of Peter, I said, "If this is the only thing which occasions dispute among you, let it be read." But now, having learned from what has been told me that their mind was involved in some heresy, I will hasten to come to you again. . . . For having obtained this Gospel from others who had studied it diligently, namely, from the successors of those who first used it, whom we call Docetæ (for most of their opinions are connected with the teaching of that school), we have been able to read it through, and we find many things in accordance with the true doctrine of the Saviour, but some things added to that doctrine, which we have pointed out for you further on.'

2. Origen, writing c. 246, not only mentions this Gospel, but also shows some knowledge of its contents. 'Some say, basing it on a tradition in the Gospel according to Peter, as it is entitled, or the Book of James, that the brethren of Jesus were sons of Joseph by a former wife, whom he married before Mary' (Com. on Mt. bk. x. 17 [Ante-Nicene Christian Library, p. 424]). Eusebius tells us (HE vi. 21) that Origen was summoned to Antioch by Mammæa, the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus, and 'a most pious woman,' though it is not said that she was a Christian. From Serapion's statements about this Gospel it is evident that it was not widely circulated; but if Origen saw it during his visit to Antioch (probably 218), his uncertainty in regard to a particular passage is only what might be expected, and does not detract from the value of his testimony to its general character.[*]

3. Besides quoting Serapion's estimate of this Gospel, Eusebius (c. 324) refers to it twice (HE iii. 3, 25). 'The so-called Acts of Peter, however, and the Gospel which bears his name, and the Preaching, and the Apocalypse, as they are called, we know have not been universally accepted, because no ecclesiastical writer, ancient or modern, has made use of testimonies drawn from them.' In his chapter on the Canon of Holy Scripture, Eusebius classifies the books into Homologoumena or 'accepted,' Antilegomena or 'disputed,' νόθοι or 'spurious,' i.e. orthodox but not canonical. After enumerating the writings which are placed under these several heads, he adds: 'We have felt compelled to give this catalogue in order that we might be able to know both these works and those that are cited by the heretics under the name of the apostles, including, for instance, such books as the Gospels of Peter, of Thomas, of Matthias, or of any others besides them, and the Acts of Andrew and John and the other apostles, which no one belonging to the succession of ecclesiastical writers has deemed worthy of mention in his writings.'

The statement of Jerome (de Vir. Illust. 1) that this Gospel is a heretical work, also the condemnation pronounced upon it in the so-called 'Gelasian decretal' ('evangelium nomine Petri apostoli apocryphum'), are in agreement with, and possibly are based on, the judgment of Eusebius.[†]

4. Historical critics of different schools regard the testimony of Theodoret (c. 450) as untrustworthy. He says that this Gospel was used by the Nazarenes, of whom, however, he knows nothing except that they 'honour Christ as a righteous man' (Hær. fab. ii. 2). Zahn points out in detail the marks of confusion in Theodoret's references to the Jewish Christian sects (Geschichte, ii. 743); Harnack inserts a note of interrogation, and attaches no more value to this than to most of 'this historian's remarkable statements' (Chron. i. 623); Hofmann thinks that Theodoret meant the Gospel according to the Hebrews (PRE^{3} i. 663).

There has been much discussion in regard to the meaning of a phrase in Justin Martyr's (c. 150) Dialogue with Trypho. Some have thought that this Gospel is referred to as the 'Memoirs of Peter' in the passage: 'And when it is said that he changed the name of one of the apostles to Peter; and when it is written in the Memoirs of him (ἀπομνημονεύματα αὐτοῦ) that this so happened, etc.' The difficult problem of the relation to this Gospel of Justin Martyr's quotations cannot be discussed until its contents have been given; but it is important that the discussion should not be biassed by the assumption that 'the name "Memoirs" cannot with any degree of propriety be applied to our canonical Gospels,' as the author of Supernatural Religion asserts (The Gospel according to Peter, p. 22). It may be granted that the αὐτοῦ is more naturally interpreted as referring to Peter and not to Jesus; but the judgment of such an expert as Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biography, ii. 712) must not be forgotten: 'In the passage in question the right reading is most probably not ἀπομνημονεύματα αὐτοῦ (i.e. of Peter mentioned just before), but ἀπομν. αὐτῶν (i.e. τῶν ἀποστόλων as elsewhere).' But if, contrary to his invariable practice, Justin here attaches a name to the Evangelistic writings, it is by no means certain that he speaks of this apocryphal Gospel as the 'Memoirs of Peter.' He may refer to the Second Gospel, for many ancient authorities support the testimony of Origen: 'The Gospel published by Mark may be called Peter's, whose interpreter Mark was' (adv. Marcion. iv. 5), and in Mk 3^{17} there is a record of the fact mentioned by Justin: 'Simon he surnamed Peter.'

ii. CONTENTS OF RECENTLY DISCOVERED FRAGMENT.—In 1892 M. Bouriant published the manuscript known as 'the Akhmim Fragment'; it contains portions of the Gospel of Peter, of the Apocalypse of Peter, of the Book of Enoch, and of the Acts of St. Julian. This parchment manuscript and a papyrus collection of mathematical problems were discovered by the French Archæological Mission during the winter of 1886–87 in the tomb of a monk at Akhmim, the ancient Panopolis, in Upper Egypt. A heliographic reproduction of the manuscript greatly assisted palæographists to determine the true text, in regard to which scholars are now generally agreed. The parchment codex is assigned to a date between the 8th and the 12th century. The following translation by Dr. J. Armitage Robinson was carefully revised by him in accordance with the photographic facsimile (Ante-Nicene Christian Library, vol. ix. p. 7 f.):—

1. But of the Jews none washed his hands, neither Herod nor any one of his judges. And when they had refused to wash them, Pilate rose up. And then Herod the king commandeth that the Lord be taken, saying to them, What things soever I commanded you to do unto him, do.

2. And there was standing there Joseph the friend of Pilate and of the Lord; and, knowing that they were about to crucify him, he came to Pilate and asked the body of the Lord for burial. And Pilate sent to Herod and asked his body. And Herod said, Brother Pilate, even if no one had asked for him, we purposed to bury him, especially as the Sabbath draweth on; for it is written in the Law that the sun set not upon one that hath been put to death.

3. And he delivered him to the people on the day before the unleavened bread, their feast. And they took the Lord and pushed him as they ran, and said, Let us drag away the Son of God, having obtained power over him. And they clothed him with purple, and set him on the seat of judgment, saying, Judge righteously, O king of Israel. And one of them brought a crown of thorns and put it on the head of the Lord. And others stood and spat in his eyes, and others smote his cheeks; others pricked him with a reed; and some scourged him, saying, With this honour let us honour the Son of God.

4. And they brought two malefactors, and they crucified the Lord between them. But he held his peace, as though having no pain. And when they had raised the cross, they wrote the title, This is the king of Israel. And having set his garments before him they parted them among them, and cast lots for them. And one of those malefactors reproached them, saying, We for the evils that we have done have suffered thus, but this man, who hath become the Saviour of men, what wrong hath he done to you? And they, being angered at him, commanded that his legs should not be broken, that he might die in torment.

[†] Other writers who were probably acquainted with the Petrine Gospel are the author of the Didascalia and Apostolical Constitutions (cf. Harnack, Bruchstücke, p. 41 f.), and Cyril of Jerusalem (cf. Swete, 'The Akhmim Fragment,' in his edition of the Gospel of Peter, xxx ff.).

5. And it was noon, and darkness came over all Judæa: and they were troubled and distressed lest the sun had set whilst he was yet alive: [for] it is written for them, that the sun set not on him that hath been put to death. And one of them said, Give him to drink gall with vinegar. And they mixed and gave him to drink, and fulfilled all things, and accomplished their sins against their own head. And many went about with lamps, supposing that it was night, and fell down. And the Lord cried out, saying, My power, my power, thou hast forsaken me. And when he had said it, he was taken up. And in that hour the vail of the temple of Jerusalem was rent in twain.

6. And then they drew out the nails from the hands of the Lord, and laid him upon the earth, and the whole earth quaked, and great fear arose. Then the sun shone, and it was found the ninth hour; and the Jews rejoiced, and gave his body to Joseph that he might bury it, since he had seen what good things he had done. And he took the Lord, and washed him, and rolled him in a linen cloth, and brought him into his own tomb, which was called the garden of Joseph.

7. Then the Jews and the elders and the priests, perceiving what evil they had done to themselves, began to lament and to say, Woe for our sins; the judgment hath drawn nigh, and the end of Jerusalem. And I with my companions was grieved; and being wounded in mind we hid ourselves: for we were being sought for by them as malefactors, and as wishing to set fire to the temple. And upon all these things we fasted and sat mourning and weeping night and day until the Sabbath.

8. But the scribes and Pharisees and elders being gathered together one with another, when they heard that all the people murmured and beat their breasts, saying, If by his death these most mighty signs have come to pass, see how righteous he is—the elders were afraid, and came to Pilate, beseeching him and saying, Give us soldiers that we may guard his sepulchre for three days, lest his disciples come and steal him away, and the people suppose that he has risen from the dead and do us evil. And Pilate gave them Petronius the centurion with soldiers to guard the tomb. And with them came elders and scribes to the sepulchre, and having rolled a great stone together with the centurion and the soldiers, they all together who were there set it at the door of the sepulchre; and they affixed seven seals, and they pitched a tent there and guarded it. And early in the morning as the Sabbath was drawing on, there came a multitude from Jerusalem and the region round about that they might see the sepulchre that was sealed.

9. And in the night in which the Lord's day was drawing on, as the soldiers kept guard two by two in a watch, there was a great voice in the heaven, and they saw the heavens opened, and two men descend from thence with great light and approach the tomb. And that stone which was put at the door rolled of itself and made way in part; and the tomb was opened, and both the young men entered in.

10. When therefore those soldiers saw it, they awakened the centurion and the elders; for they too were hard by, keeping guard. And, as they declared what things they had seen, again they see three men come forth from the tomb, and two of them supporting one, and a cross following them: and of the two the head reached unto the heavens, but the head of him that was led by them overpassed the heavens. And they heard a voice from the heavens saying, Thou hast preached to them that sleep. And a response was heard from the cross, Yea.

11. They therefore considered one with another whether to go away and show these things to Pilate. And while they yet thought thereon, the heavens again are seen to open, and a certain man to descend and enter into the sepulchre. When the centurion and they that were with him saw these things, they hastened in the night to Pilate, leaving the tomb which they were watching, and declared all things which they had seen, being greatly distressed, and saying, Truly he was the Son of God. Pilate answered and said, I am pure from the blood of the Son of God: but it was ye who determined this. Then they all drew near and besought him and entreated him to command the centurion and the soldiers to say nothing of the things which they had seen: For it is better, say they, for us to be guilty of the greatest sin before God, and not to fall into the hands of the people of the Jews and to be stoned. Pilate therefore commanded the centurion and the soldiers to say nothing.

12. And at dawn upon the Lord's day Mary Magdalen, a disciple of the Lord, fearing because of the Jews, since they were burning with wrath, had not done at the Lord's sepulchre the things which women are wont to do for those that die, and for those that are beloved by them—she took her friends with her, and came to the sepulchre where he was laid. And they feared lest the Jews should see them, and they said, Although on that day on which he was crucified we could not weep and lament, yet now let us do these things at his sepulchre. But who shall roll away for us the stone that was laid at the door of the sepulchre, that we may enter in and sit by him and do the things that are due? For the stone was great, and we fear lest some one see us. And if we cannot, yet if we but set at the door the things which we bring for a memorial of him, we will weep and lament, until we come unto our home.

13. And they went and found the tomb opened, and coming near they looked in there; and they see there a certain young man sitting in the midst of the tomb, beautiful and clothed in a robe exceeding bright; who said to them, Wherefore are ye come? Whom seek ye? Him that was crucified? He is risen and gone. But if ye believe not, look in and see the place where he lay, that he is not [here]; for he is risen and gone thither, whence he was sent. Then the women feared and fled.

14. Now it was the last day of the unleavened bread, and many were going forth, returning to their homes, as the feast was ended. But we, the twelve disciples of the Lord, wept and were grieved; and each one, being grieved for that which was come to pass, departed to his home. But I Simon Peter and Andrew my brother took our nets and went to the sea; and there was with us Levi the son of Alphæus, whom the Lord . . .

iii. Relation to the canonical Gospels.—A careful study of the contents of this Gospel reveals many close resemblances to, and some striking divergences from, the canonical Gospels. The author of Supernatural Religion endeavours to prove that it is not dependent on them, and describes those who differ from him on this question as 'apologetic critics' (op. cit. 107 f.). But Harnack's judgment is that acquaintance with Mark is 'proved or almost proved,' on the other hand acquaintance with John is 'not proved'; in regard to Matthew and Luke he is uncertain whether their points of agreement with this Gospel show that its author made use of their narratives, or of the same sources as the Evangelists (Bruchstücke, p. 32 f.). Zahn holds that 'the only sources from which the Gospel of Peter has drawn its materials are our four Gospels,' and shows that there is close agreement with each Gospel as well in forms of expression as in subject-matter. He accounts for the divergences by allowing time for the development of variations in the text of the canonical Gospels (Das Evangelium des Petrus, p. 47). But, whilst the evidence available may suffice to establish the probability of dependence upon the four Gospels as a source, it is not sufficient to prove that they were the only source. The subject is exhaustively treated in the introduction to Swete's edition of this Gospel ('The Akhmim Fragment,' xiii ff.). The Petrine Passion-history 'exceeds by about one-fourth the average length of the four canonical narratives,' and this notwithstanding many significant omissions; the result of a verbal comparison reveals coincidences which, in Swete's judgment, prove that the use of the First and Second Gospels by the author of the Petrine Fragment is 'scarcely doubtful'; that there is a 'strong presumption' in favour of his use of the Third Gospel; and that traces of verbal indebtedness to the Fourth Gospel are fainter, though it is 'at least probable that he had access' to it. From the nature of the case absolute proof is not attainable, but the solution of this complex problem, to which the investigations of many scholars point, is that the Petrine Gospel is later than the canonical Gospels; that its author was acquainted with them; that his sources are treated with great freedom, many of the changes being due to his recasting of the Gospel history in the form of a personal narrative; and that possibly he had access to other sources, which may have included, as Harnack rightly says, some good traditions (Chron. i. 624).

iv. Alleged use by early writers.—Traces of the Petrine Gospel have been diligently sought in the works of authors who wrote before the date at which it is known to have been in circulation. The author of Supernatural Religion argues for the probability that Tatian possessed this Gospel, but reveals an apologetic interest in the establishment of a conclusion which might 'lead to the opinion that Tatian's Harmony was not composed out of four Gospels, but out of five' (op. cit. p. 41). It is, however, an indisputable fact that there are signs of harmonizing in this Fragment: to refute the argument that Tatian used it by proving that its author used Tatian is impossible, but in all probability a Harmony, such as the Diatessaron, was known to him. This is Swete's view, though he does not think that the Petrine writer was 'limited to the use of the Diatessaron' (op. cit. xxiv.). Dr. Rendel Harris, in his 'Popular Account' of the Gospel, clearly states the facts, but reserves his final judgment.

There is much more to be said in favour of the view that Justin Martyr (c. 150) was acquainted with the Petrine Gospel, as a comparison of the following passages with the Fragment will show. 'The Spirit of prophecy foretold . . . the conspiracy which was formed against Christ by Herod, the king of the Jews, and the Jews themselves, and Pilate who was your governor among them, with his soldiers' (Apol. i. 40). 'And, as the prophet spoke, they tormented him, and set him on the judgment-seat, and said, Judge us' (Apol. i. 35). 'Those who crucified him parted his garments among themselves, each casting lots for what he chose to have, and receiving according to the decision of the lot' (Dialogue with Trypho, 97). The words and sentences in italics are the most important parallels to the Petrine Gospel in Justin's writings, and the most striking of these is the statement that Jesus, not Pilate (cf. Jn 19^{13}), sat on the judgment-seat. But Justin's account bears a closer resemblance to John's than to the longer narrative in the Petrine Fragment; if there be dependence, Justin's seems to be primary. This conclusion is confirmed by a fact to which Dr. Salmon calls attention, viz., that Justin—who, ex hypothesi, believed this Gospel to be Peter's, and therefore a document of paramount authority—'in every case where the account in this Gospel differs from that in the canonical, and where we have the means of judging which Justin prefers, follows the latter without hesitation' (Introd. to NT, Appendix, p. 587).

The Epistle of Barnabas (vii. 3-5) resembles this Gospel in representing Jesus as drinking gall mingled with vinegar, and in its description of the fasting and mourning that followed the Crucifixion. Dr. Swete thinks that it may 'not improbably have come into the hands of the party from which the Petrine Gospel emanated.' He is also of opinion that the resemblances between the Sibylline Oracles (bk. 8) and the Petrine Fragment are 'for the most part superficial.'

v. CHARACTER AND TENDENCIES. — Serapion, who first mentions 'the so-called Gospel of Peter,' states that it was used by the Docetæ; after reading it through, he pronounced it orthodox in general, but condemned it on account of its heterodox additions. Is this judgment as to the character and tendencies of the Petrine Gospel sustained by the knowledge gained of its contents from the discovery of the Akhmim Fragment?

Docetism in the 2nd cent. had various forms. Ignatius combated a Docetic heresy which Lightfoot describes as 'Judaic,' for it combined a denial of the reality of Christ's passion with a tendency towards Judaizing. But the author of the Petrine Fragment does not doubt that Christ had a true body, and he manifests an anti-Judaic spirit in his endeavour to fasten on the Jews the responsibility for the crucifixion of Jesus. Irenæus describes an Ophite system, which more nearly resembles the teaching of this Gospel; but Swete points out that, according to that system, the Christ withdrew from Jesus before the Crucifixion, whereas the Petrine Gospel 'regards the higher nature of the Lord as remaining with Him on the Cross up to the moment of His death' (op. cit. xxxix. f.). Hippolytus (Philos. viii. 8, x. 12) refers to a Gnostic sect, which bore the name of Docetæ, although they taught that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, and had a true body. On the ground that Serapion could not have spoken so favourably of a work which denied the reality of Christ's body, McGiffert identifies the Docetæ, who used the Petrine Gospel, with this Gnostic sect, whose speculations added to true doctrine (Eusebius, Church History [McGiffert's tr.], p. 258, n. 8). There are, however, points of contact between the Petrine Fragment and the comments of Valentinian writers who accepted the facts of the Gospel history, but made it the vehicle of Gnostic teaching. Dr. Swete inclines to the belief that the Petrine writer, though not himself a Valentinian, 'felt the influence of the Valentinian school.' It is not necessary to decide between the claims of these different types of Gnostic Docetism to see that a writer of either of these schools would be likely to produce just such a Gospel as Serapion describes. Moreover, his judgment as to its character and tendency is fully sustained by the contents of the Akhmim Fragment, which has many features in common with the canonical Gospels, and yet has many additions to the Evangelic tradition, some being obviously unorthodox. The amplifications of the Gospel history, which clearly reveal a Docetic purpose, are: the statement that the Lord was silent on the Cross 'as though having no pain' (sec. 4); the cry, 'My power, my power, thou hast forsaken me,' followed by the description of His death as an ἀνάληψις: 'and when he had said it, he was taken up' (sec. 5). The conclusion arrived at implies that Eusebius too severely condemns this Gospel; it compares favourably with the other Gospels assigned by him to the 'heretical' category, though it is not free from Docetic tendencies which characterized some forms of early Gnosticism.

vi. DATE AND PLACE OF ORIGIN.—From Serapion's evidence the terminus ad quem for the date of this Gospel cannot be placed later than A.D. 170. The fixing of the terminus a quo depends upon the decision arrived at in the foregoing discussions. Critics who, like Harnack, hold that Justin used the Gospel, assign its composition to the beginning of the 2nd century. The opposite conclusion implies A.D. 130-150 as the probable date; in Swete's opinion, it cannot be placed earlier than A.D. 150. There is no evidence of the circulation of this Gospel in the West; a probable inference from the places of residence of the writers who were familiar with it is that it was a Syrian Gospel.

A. 3. FAYÛM GOSPEL FRAGMENT.—

Literature.

i. DISCOVERY.—Fayûm is a province of Egypt about 50 miles south of Cairo. It has become famous within the last 25 years owing to the discovery at Medinet, its capital, and elsewhere, of a large quantity of papyri in Latin, Greek, Coptic, and other languages. In 1882 the Austrian Archduke Rainer bought a mass of documents which are now in the Imperial Museum at Vienna. In this valuable collection a small and mutilated fragment of a Gospel was found. The honour of deciphering and restoring the true text belongs to Dr. Bickell, Roman Catholic Professor of Christian Archæology in the University of Innsbruck. In the Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie (1885, iii. 498 ff.), Bickell published the Fragment, and his judgment in regard to its antiquity and value. Since then his conclusions have been subjected to keen criticism by many scholars. The principal contributions to the discussion have been made by Harnack and Zahn; the result of their critical investigations is given below. An instructive account of the Fayûm papyri in general, and of this Fragment in particular, was published by Professor Stokes of Dublin in the Expositor (3rd series, i. 334, ii. 132, vii. 449).

ii. CONTENTS.—The Greek text of the Fragment, as finally restored by Bickell, is as follows: Μετὰ δὲ τὸ φαγεῖν ὡς ἐξ ἔθους, πάντες ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ νυκτὶ σκανδαλισθήσεσθε κατὰ τὸ γραφέν· πατάξω τὸν ποιμένα καὶ τὰ πρόβατα διασκορπισθήσονται. Εἰπόντος τοῦ Πέτρου· καὶ εἰ πάντες οὐκ ἐγώ. ἔφη αὐτῷ· ὁ ἀλεκτρυὼν δὶς κοκκύξει καὶ σὺ πρῶτον τρὶς ἀπαρνήσῃ με.

Certainty in regard to some details of the reconstruction cannot be attained. At first Bickell read ὡς ἐξῆγον, the letters being here obscure. Zahn (Geschichte des NT Canons, ii. 785) prints what he regards as the most probable text in a way which shows at a glance the mutilations at the end of the lines—

. . . ὑμνησάντων δὲ αὐτῶν
μετὰ τὸ φ]αγεῖν ὡς ἐξ ἔθους, πά[λιν εἶπε· ταύτῃ] τῇ νυκτὶ σκανδαλισ[θήσεσθε κατὰ] τὸ γραφέν· "πατάξω τὸν [ποιμένα, καὶ τὰ] πρόβατα διασκορπισθήσ[εται." εἰπόντος δέ το]ῦ Πετ. "καὶ εἰ πάντες, οὐκ ἐγώ," ἔφη· "πρὶν] ὁ ἀλεκτρυὼν δὶς κοκ[κύξει σήμερον, σὺ τρὶς με ἀ]παρν[ήσῃ" . . .

According to Zahn's reconstructed text, the contents of the Fragment are: 'Now when they had sung a hymn, after eating according to custom, he said again: This night ye shall be offended according to the Scripture, "I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered." When Peter said: Even though all, yet not I, he said: Before the cock shall crow twice this day, thou shalt deny me thrice.'

iii. THEORIES OF ORIGIN.—The passages in the canonical Gospels which correspond to the contents of the Fayûm Fragment are Mt 26^{30-34}, Mk 14^{26-30}, the resemblances to Mark being more close. The words used for 'cock' and 'crow' (lit. 'cry cuckoo') are not found in the NT. In Bickell's judgment these few verses are a genuine relic of early Evangelic tradition, and the Fragment is part of such a document as Luke mentions in the preface to his Gospel. Harnack inclines to Bickell's view, though he admits that the words may be a free quotation from Mark rather than a part of the original material used by the Synoptic writers ('Das Evangelienfragment von Fajjum' in Texte und Untersuchungen, v. 4). The use of different words for 'cock' and 'crow' does not disprove the latter theory, but tends rather to confirm it. The Fragment has ἀλεκτρυών for ἀλέκτωρ, and κοκκύζειν for φωνεῖν. ἀλεκτρυών is the more usual word in classic prose; κοκκύζειν is more expressive than the colourless φωνεῖν. 'It is most probable that the words used in the canonical Gospels are more original, and that a preacher substituted in one case a more elegant, and in the other case a more significant expression' (Zahn, op. cit. ii. 787). Hort favoured the view that the passage is an extract from the Synoptic Gospels, and uttered a timely warning against hasty deductions from one scanty fragment (Times, 25th June 1885). Other conjectural explanations of its origin are that it is a quotation from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, or the Gospel according to the Egyptians (Harnack), and that it is a Gnostic recension of the canonical Gospels (Stokes).

The style of writing and the methods of contraction employed in this Fragment furnish, in the judgment of eminent palæographists, a strong argument for fixing the date of its composition in the 3rd century.

Literature.

i. TITLE.—This work claims to have been written by James the Just, in Jerusalem, but its author does not describe it as a Gospel. Its title in the manuscripts is 'The History of James concerning the Birth of Mary.' Early writers do not refer to it as εὐαγγέλιον, but describe it as διήγησις, λόγος ἱστορικός, ἱστορία or γέννησις Μαρίας. The name of Protevangelium was probably given to it by Oriental Christians; it is not known to have existed before the 16th cent., when the Latin version of Postellus and the Greek version (πρωτευαγγέλιον) of Michael Neander appeared.

ii. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—1. The Protevangelium, in its present form, was known to 4th cent. Fathers. Epiphanius (c. 376) made use of it (Hær. lxxix. 5, lxxviii. 7); Harnack (Chron. i. 601) finds reference to it in Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. in diem Natal. Christi, iii. 346), Eustathius, and the Excerpta Barbari.

2. If this work had been known in early times as 'the Gospel of James' the evidence of Origen (c. 246 A.D.) would have been less trustworthy. There is, however, little doubt that he refers to it as 'the Book of James' (ἡ βίβλος Ἰακώβου) in a passage where he distinguishes its title from that of 'the Gospel according to Peter,' and yet refers to both writings as common sources of the tradition that our Lord's brethren were 'sons of Joseph by a former wife, whom he married before Mary.' Origen adds: 'Now those who say so wish to preserve the honour of Mary in virginity to the end' (in Matt. tom. x. 17); this comment is an accurate description of the purpose of the Protevangelium.

3. Possible traces of anonymous use.—Points of contact between this work and other writings have been found. Peter of Alexandria (d. 311) in all probability derived from it his account of the death of Zacharias (Routh, Rell. Sac. iv. 44). Clement of Alexandria (c. 200 A.D.) may have learnt from it the story of the attestation of Mary's virginity after the birth of her son, but the indefinite words 'some say' may refer to oral tradition (Strom. vii. 16). Justin Martyr (c. 140 A.D.) has several remarkable 'concordances' with the Protevangelium. Both combine (Apol. 33) the angel's message to Mary (Lk 1^{32}) with his words to Joseph (Mt 1^{21}); both state (Dial. 78) that our Lord was born in a cave; both speak (Apol. 33) of Mary's overshadowing by 'the power of God'; both attach importance (Dial. 100) to the Davidic descent of Mary; both assert that 'Mary received joy,' though Justin (Dial. 100) connects the words καὶ χαρὰν λαβοῦσα Μαρία with the angelic salutation, whilst in the Protevangelium the same words are associated with the priest's benediction. Zahn regards the dependence of Justin on this Gospel as proved. But the more exact resemblances would be satisfactorily explained if both writers made use of a common tradition; and the variation in the context of the statement about Mary's joy points, in the judgment of many scholars, to the use by Justin of an older text of the Protevangelium. On the whole, the evidence cannot be said to prove that he used this Gospel in its present form.

iii. SUMMARY OF CONTENTS.—[Two Latin Gospels of the Childhood—pseudo-Matthew and the Nativity of Mary—either depend on the Protevangelium, or on the sources used by its author. In so far as the contents of these Latin Gospels are parallel to its narrative, the chief variations will be noted; they furnish important data for the solution of the problem of the mutual relations of these Gospels].

1. On a great festival, Joachim, an exceedingly rich man, brings double offerings to the temple; they are rejected because he is childless. In his grief he retires to the desert and fasts forty days, prayer being his food and drink. 2. Anna, the wife of Joachim, being reproached by Judith her maid-servant, prays to God under a laurel, and asks that to her, as to Sarah, a child may be given. 3. Beholding a sparrow's nest in the laurel, Anna laments that she is not like the fowls of the heaven, which are 'productive before thee, O Lord.' 4. An angel of the Lord announces to Anna that her prayer is heard; she vows that her child shall be a gift to God. Another angel bids Joachim return home; he obeys, and takes with him flocks for an offering. Anna and Joachim meet at the gate.

In pseudo-Mat. 3 the angel bids Anna meet her husband at the Golden Gate; in Nat. Mary 4 the angel bids Joachim meet his wife at the Golden Gate. Cf. Ac 3^2.

5. On the following day Joachim brings his offering to the temple and goes down to his house 'justified.' In course of time a daughter is born to Anna and Joachim; Anna calls the child Mary.

In Nat. Mary 5 the name Mary is given at the command of the angel.

6. When the child is six months old, Anna sets her on the ground 'to try whether she can stand, and she walks seven steps'; Anna vows that Mary shall not walk on this earth until she has been taken to the temple of the Lord. When Mary is a year old, Joachim makes a great feast; the chief priests bless the child, and Anna sings a song to the Lord. 7. When Mary is three years old, her parents take her to the temple in fulfilment of their vow. After the high priest has blessed her, he 'sets her down upon the third step of the altar'; she 'dances with her feet, and all the house of Israel love her.'

In pseudo-Mat. 4 the child is put down before the doors of the temple, and 'goes up the fifteen steps so swiftly, that she does not look back at all.' In Nat. Mary 6 the virgin of the Lord goes up all the steps without help 'in such a manner that you would think she had already attained full age.' The Lord 'by the indication of this miracle' foreshowed the greatness of 'his virgin.'

8. Mary dwells in the temple 'as if she were a dove,' and is fed by the hand of an angel. When she is twelve years old, Zacharias the high priest summons the widowers in order that the Lord may signify whose wife Mary is to be.

Pseudo-Mat. 6 adds many marvels, as, e.g., the angels often speak to Mary and most diligently obey her; sick people who touch her go home cured. Both in pseudo-Mat. and Nat. Mary the age of Mary is fourteen when she refuses to be given in marriage, and announces her resolve to be a virgin to God.

9. Joseph, throwing away his axe, obeys the summons; the widowers present their rods to the high priest in the temple. A dove comes out of Joseph's rod and rests upon his head—the sign that he is chosen to keep the virgin of the Lord. 10. When Joseph refuses, saying, 'I have children, and I am an old man,' the priest warns him of the guilt of disobedience. Joseph therefore takes Mary from the temple to his home.

In pseudo-Mat. 8 the tribe of Judah is chosen by lot; then every man of that tribe, 'who has no wife,' takes his rod to the temple. The high priest does not at first bring Joseph's rod out of the Holy of Holies 'because he was an old man.' Joseph asks: 'Why do you hand over to me this infant, who is younger than my grandsons?' In Nat. Mary 8 Joseph withholds his rod; God is consulted a second time, and Joseph is found out; also Joseph's rod produces a flower on which the Spirit descends in the form of a dove (cf. Is $11^{1.2}$).

11. The angel of the Lord announces to Mary at the well the coming upon her of the power of the Lord.

In pseudo-Mat. 9 the angel appears to Mary in her chamber, while she is working at the purple for the veil of the temple.

12. Mary visits Elisabeth, who greets her as 'the mother of my Lord.' 13. Mary returns home after her three months' visit to Elisabeth; Joseph reproaches her, and with weeping she maintains her innocence. 14. The angel of the Lord appears to Joseph. 15. Annas the scribe accuses Joseph of stealthily marrying Mary; the officers bring her with Joseph to the tribunal. 16. Joseph and Mary drink the water of the ordeal and remain unhurt.

Pseudo-Mat. 10–12 describes with even less restraint the incidents recorded in chs. 13–16. In Nat. Mary 9 the words of the angel to Mary are much expanded; from one addition it would seem that when this apocryphal book was written the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was unknown: 'that which shall be born of thee shall alone be holy, because it alone, being conceived and born without sin, shall be called the Son of God.'

17. Joseph takes Mary and his sons to be enrolled in Bethlehem. In Mary's face sometimes there is laughter and sometimes sorrow; she explains to Joseph, 'I see two peoples with my eyes; the one lamenting, and the other rejoicing.'

Pseudo-Mat. 13 adds 'she saw the people of the Jews weeping, because they have departed from their God; and the people of the Gentiles rejoicing, because they have been made near to the Lord.' But cf. Gn 25^{23} or Lk 2^{34}.

18. Joseph leaves Mary in a cave in charge of his two sons, whilst he seeks a woman to minister to her needs. The sky is astonished and the birds keep still. 19. When the woman enters the cave a great light shines, but it gradually decreases until the infant's birth. 20. The woman tells Salome of the strange event; Salome demands proof. Her hand is made to burn with fire as a punishment for her unbelief, but is restored when she touches the infant. 21. The Magi are led by the star to the cave, and present their gifts. 22. Herod sends murderers to kill the children from two years old and under. Mary puts her child into an ox-stall. A mountain is cleft to receive Elisabeth and John.

Pseudo-Mat. adds many details. The star is 'larger than any that had been seen since the beginning of the world.' The ox and the ass 'incessantly adore him,' fulfilling the word of Habakkuk the prophet: 'Between two animals thou shalt be made manifest' (Hab 3^2 LXX ἐν μέσῳ δύο ζῴων γνωσθήσῃ, by slight change in Hebrew text: שְׁנַיִם חַיִּים for שָׁנִים חַיֵּיהוּ).

23. Zacharias is murdered, because he cannot tell the officers of Herod where his son is. 24. A priest hears a voice saying, 'Zacharias is murdered'; the body of Zacharias is not found, but his blood is turned into stone. Simeon is chosen in his place. 25. The author says that he withdrew into the wilderness, because of the commotion that arose about the death of Herod. Doxology.

iv. CHARACTER AND TENDENCIES.—From the summary of contents given above, it will be seen that chs. 1–17 of the Protevangelium are occupied with the story of Mary—her birth and childhood, her life in the temple, and her betrothal to Joseph. In chs. 18–20 the style of the narrative is changed, the direct form is assumed: 'I, Joseph, was walking,' etc. The writer, laying aside all reserve, enlarges upon the marvel of the birth of Jesus, and upon the perpetual virginity of Mary. The remaining portion of this work (chs. 21–25) consists of (a) the account of the visit of the Magi, which closely follows the narrative of the canonical Matthew; and (b) the story of the marvellous escape of John from Herod's massacre, and of the murder of his father Zacharias.

The extravagances of chs. 18–20, the Gnostic tendencies of the narrative, and the abrupt introduction of Joseph as the speaker, are sufficient reasons for regarding this section of the Gospel as derived from an independent source. Harnack calls this section Apocryphum Josephi. Some light has been cast upon chs. 22–24, which Harnack calls Apocryphum Zachariæ, by the researches of Berendts (Studien über Zacharias-Apokryphen, 1895); he holds that the Protevangelium does not contain these legends in their oldest form. Confirmation of this theory is found in the fact that Origen (in Matt. tract. 25), who was acquainted with the Book of James, gives a very different account of the martyrdom of Zacharias; his account may have come from an independent source, but the recognition of this possibility renders no less probable the suggestion of Harnack (Chron. i. 601) that the βίβλος Ἰακώβου to which Origen refers is essentially identical with chs. 1–17 of the Protevangelium. The evidence of Origen, therefore, like the evidence of Justin, yields no proof of the existence of this Gospel in its present form; he becomes, however, the oldest witness for the γέννησις Μαρίας, the story of the Nativity of Mary.

The result of the foregoing analysis is to show that in all probability the Protevangelium is a composite work. The facts do not warrant the inference that its author had three separate documents before him of which he made free use, adding his own embellishments; they point rather in the direction of the conclusion at which Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 703) arrives by a different course of reasoning. The author's acquaintance with Jewish customs is manifest to every reader; but, as Lipsius points out, such incidents as the refusal of Joachim and his sacrifice, the bringing up of Mary in the temple, and the drinking by Joseph of the water of the ordeal, are quite contrary to Jewish ideas and usages; moreover, there are traces of Gnostic speculation, especially in the Apocryphum Josephi and the Apocryphum Zachariæ. 'This curious admixture of intimate knowledge and gross ignorance of Jewish thought and custom compels us to assume and distinguish between an original Jewish-Christian writing and a Gnostic recast of it.'*

v. RELATION TO LATIN RECENSIONS. — 1. The Gospel of pseudo-Matthew. This Gospel claims to be Jerome's translation into Latin of what the holy Evangelist Matthew wrote in Hebrew and 'set at the head of his Gospel.' It gives, with variations such as are noted above, the same narrative as the Protevangelium; but, instead of ending with the martyrdom of Zacharias, it describes (chs. 18–24) the flight into Egypt, and enlarges upon the marvels of the journey—e.g. the adoration of the infant Jesus by dragons, lions, and panthers; the bending of a palm-tree at His word, in order that His mother may gather its fruit; the shortening of the way, so that in one day they accomplish what would otherwise have taken thirty days; the prostration of the idols when Mary with her child enters the Egyptian temple. The rest of this Gospel, in what Tischendorf regards as its complete form (Evang. apocr. 51–112), gives the story of the boyhood of Jesus in a form even more extravagant than the Gospel according to Thomas, an account of which is given below. There is little doubt that, in so far as this Gospel is parallel with the narrative of the Protevangelium, it is independently derived from the same sources. It alone records the special series of miracles wrought in Egypt and on the way thither; in the narratives which it has in common with the Protevangelium there is a marked development of the marvellous nature of the incidents; the growing exaltation of Mary is also very apparent.

2. The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary.—This short Latin Gospel, entitled the Evangelium de Nativitate Mariæ, covers the same ground as the early part of the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew; its last words describe the birth of Jesus at Bethlehem. It is found amongst the works of Jerome, and has every appearance of being an orthodox revision of the Latin Gospel of pseudo-Matthew.

vi. DATE.—According to the view taken above of the composite character of this Gospel, the original Jewish-Christian work dates from the middle of the 2nd century. The Protevangelium in its present form embodies the result of a Gnostic recast, and cannot be earlier than the latter part of the 3rd century. To the 4th cent. or perhaps the 5th must be assigned the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew, of which the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary is a later redaction.

LITERATURE.—In 1552 Bibliander's Latin edition was published, Postellus having prepared the text from a Greek MS. In 1840 Suckow issued a separate edition, ex. cod. MS Venetiano. See A. i. EVIDENCE OF EARLY WRITERS.—1. A Gospel κατὰ Θωμᾶν was, according to Hippolytus (155–235), in use among the Naassenes. A passage, in which they found support for their teaching in regard to the 'nature of the inward man' (φύσιν . . . τὴν ἐντὸς ἀνθρώπου), is quoted from the Gospel: 'He who seeks me shall find me in children from seven years old; for there will I, who am hidden in the fourteenth æon, be manifest' (Ἐμὲ ὁ ζητῶν εὑρήσει ἐν παιδίοις ἀπὸ ἐτῶν ἑπτά· ἐκεῖ γὰρ ἐν τῷ ιδ' αἰῶνι κρυβόμενος φανεροῦμαι).

2. Origen (c. 246) mentions this Gospel (Hom. i. in Luc.), and Eusebius (c. 324) places it with the Petrine Gospel amongst the 'heretical' writings (HE iii. 25). Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 386) states that the Manichæans wrote it (Catech. iv. 36), and in a later passage of the same work traces its origin to 'one of the three base disciples of Moses' (vi. 31). Later writers refer to the high esteem in which it was held by the Manichæans.

ii. PRESENT FORM.—A Gospel, entitled 'Thomas the Israelite philosopher's Account of the Infancy of the Lord' (Θωμᾶ Ἰσραηλίτου φιλοσόφου ῥητὰ εἰς τὰ παιδικὰ τοῦ Κυρίου), is extant in two Greek recensions, also in a Latin and in a Syriac version. Tischendorf gives the longer Greek recension

---

* The secondary character of this Gospel, in so far as it can be compared with the narratives of Matthew and Luke, is recognized by critics of various schools, notwithstanding the attempt of Conrady to show that the Evangelists borrowed from it (Die Quellen der kanonischen Kindheitsgeschichte Jesus). 'It would have been a literary miracle if the opening chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke, with their lifelike touches and tender humanities, had been derived from a work teeming with superstitious trivialities' (Dr. T. Nicol in Critical Review, xii. 35).

(Evang. apocr. pp. 140–157), the shorter Greek recension (pp. 158–163), and the Latin version, which Harnack describes as a compilation, with striking resemblances to the apocryphal Gospel of Matthew (pp. 164–180). The Syriac version (Wright, Apoc. Lit. NT, p. 6 f.) is a somewhat abbreviated form of the longer Greek recension. (For English translations of the two Greek and the Latin versions, see Walker's Apocr. Gospels, p. 78 ff.; and for a detailed account of the variations in the several texts, see Lipsius' article in Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 704). None of these four recensions contains the Naassene quotation from this Gospel which is given by Hippolytus. Does he refer to a different Gospel, or to an original Gospel of which the longest extant version contains only fragments? The attempt to answer these questions must be deferred until the outline of the contents of these four recensions has been given. But one important piece of evidence is here in place. Nicephorus (d. 599) mentions this Gospel in his Stichometry, and states that it contained 1300 stichoi. Therefore, inasmuch as the longest extant recension does not contain half of that number of stichoi, it is possible, though not certain, that the copy known to Nicephorus contained the passage quoted by Hippolytus.

iii. SUMMARY OF CONTENTS.—The narratives contained in this Gospel of the Childhood of Jesus consist of (a) stories of His superhuman knowledge, (b) stories of His superhuman power. The different versions frequently disagree, as well in their statements in regard to the scenes of the miracles and the names of the chief actors, as in the form of the narratives and in the arrangement of the various incidents. The following summary is based on the longer Greek recension:—

(a) To his teacher, Zacchæus, the child Jesus repeats the letters of the alphabet, 'from the Alpha even to the Omega, clearly and with great exactness'; He questions His teacher about the first letter, and convicts him of ignorance of the nature of Alpha, and therefore of inability to teach others the Beta. 'Thou hypocrite! first, if thou knowest, teach the A, and then we shall believe thee about the B. . . . And in the hearing of many the child says to Zacchæus: 'Hear, O teacher, the order of the first letter' [the old Phœnician A was written 𐤀 or ∀], 'and notice here how it has lines, and a middle stroke crossing those which thou seest common; (lines) brought together; the highest part supporting them, and again bringing them under one head; with three points [of intersection]; of the same kind; principal and subordinate; of equal length. Thou hast the lines of the A.' The amazement of Zacchæus, as he listens to this allegorizing, is thus expressed: 'That child does not belong to this earth. . . . What great thing he is, either god or angel, or what I am to say, I know not.' The shorter Greek recension represents Jesus as saying: 'I know more than you, for I am before the ages. . . When you see my cross, then will ye believe that I speak the truth.' When Joseph takes the child to another master, who tries 'to flatter him into learning his letters,' Jesus immediately reads a book that lies on the desk, and by the Holy Spirit teaches the Law to those that are standing round. The account of the child's visit to the temple with His parents follows closely the narrative of Luke (2^{41-52}). It describes Him as 'sitting in the midst of the teachers, both hearing the law and asking them questions,' but adds: 'And they were all attending to him, and wondering that he, being a child, was shutting the mouths of the elders and teachers of the people, explaining the main points of the law, and the parables of the prophets.'

(b) Some of the miracles ascribed to the child Jesus are works of beneficence, but others are deeds of vengeance. When five years old He makes twelve sparrows out of clay, and as soon as He claps His hands they fly away. At the same age He raises to life a child killed by a fall; and also a young man who, whilst splitting wood, cut the sole of his foot in two, and died from loss of blood. 'And he said to the young man, Rise up now, split the wood, and remember me.' When six years old He breaks a pitcher, but fills His cloak with water and carries it to His mother; He stretches a short piece of wood, and makes it equal to the longer piece. At the same age He cures His brother James, who was dying from the effects of the bite of a viper; He also performs two more miracles of raising from the dead. But His miracles of vengeance make such an impression that the parents of a boy whom Jesus has killed say to Joseph: 'Since thou hast such a child, it is impossible for thee to live with us in the village; or else teach him to bless, and not to curse, for he is killing our children.' The son of Annas the scribe is 'dried up' at His word; a boy who runs up against Him is struck dead; one of His teachers incurs His wrath, and at His curse swoons and falls to the ground; His accusers are smitten with blindness, and dare not provoke Him to anger lest His rebuke should maim them.

iv. CHARACTER AND TENDENCIES.—To the evidence of Hippolytus that this Gospel was known to the Naassenes, and of Cyril of Jerusalem, who regards it as a Manichæan work, should probably be added the witness of Irenæus (c. 190) to its use amongst the Marcosians, a Gnostic sect, whose leader boasted that he had improved upon his master, Valentinus. It is true that Irenæus does not name the 'spurious writing'; but he accuses the Marcosians of pulling to pieces 'the dispensations of God, in themselves so striking, by means of Alpha and Beta,' and of bringing forward 'that false and wicked story' that the Lord said to His teacher: 'Do thou first tell me what Alpha is, and then I will tell thee what Beta is.' 'This they expound as meaning that he alone knew the Unknown, which he revealed under its type, Alpha' (Hær. I. xx. 1; cf. xvi. 3). The value of this passage consists in its testimony to a second-century Gnostic interpretation of an incident which is recorded in the extant Gospel according to Thomas. Harnack (Chron. i. 594) assigns to this apocryphal Gospel, in its original form, a saying of Jesus, which Irenæus charges the Marcosians with misinterpreting: 'I have often desired to have one of these words, and I had no one who could utter it' (Hær. I. xx. 2). The saying may, however, be a loose quotation from the canonical Gospels (Lk 10^{24}; cf. Lk 19^{42}).

The question asked above may now be answered. If one sect of Gnostics found in the contents of this Gospel—not to assume that the Gospel itself was in their hands—support for their speculations, the Syrian Gnostics (Naassenes) may have used the same Gospel, though the passage quoted in Hippolytus is not found in the extant fragments. The saying (see § i.), whatever be its true meaning, is clearly a Gnostic interpretation of some of our Lord's sayings about childhood, with Gnostic accretions (cf. Mt 7^8 18^5). Ropes (Die Sprüche Jesu, p. 100) expounds it as signifying that only when a child attains to full intelligence can the image of Christ be manifested in it. The saying is not so entirely out of harmony with this Gospel of the Childhood as to compel the ascription of it to an unknown Gospel of Thomas. The undoubted difference between this saying and the fabulous contents of the Gospel that has been preserved would be explained if the Gospel quoted in Hippolytus was revised by an anti-Gnostic editor and abbreviated in accordance with his views. Such an anti-Gnostic would be a heretic in the judgment of writers like Origen, for in the canonical Gospels the child Jesus works no miracles. It is probable, as Lipsius suggests, that this Gospel originated in an attempt 'to enlist the miraculous stories of the Childhood on the Catholic side. . . . The child Jesus [it might be argued] must certainly have worked some miracles in order to rebuke the Gnostic error, which made the Christ to descend upon Him for the first time at His baptism' (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 704).

v. DATE.—Zahn holds that this Gospel was one of the sources used by Justin Martyr (c. 140), who says (Dial. 88) that Jesus 'was in the habit of working as a carpenter when among men, making ploughs and yokes' (ἄροτρα καὶ ζυγά); there is a verbal coincidence with this Gospel which describes Joseph as a carpenter who 'made ploughs and yokes.' But Justin, who was a native of Palestine, would scarcely require a written source for this tradition, nor is he likely to have used a heretical Gospel as an authority. Justin cannot, therefore, be quoted to prove the existence of this Gospel in the first half of the second century; a legitimate inference from the evidence already given is that in its original form it was written c. 160–180. But Harnack does well to add that it is impossible to say certainly how much of the Gospel in its present form was derived from the longer work. There may, of course, be interpolations in the abbreviated versions of this Gospel.

LITERATURE.—Cotelerius published a fragment from a Paris MS of the 15th cent. in his notes to the Const. Apost. vi. 17; also Mingarelli a larger portion: Nuova raccolta d'opuscoli scientifici, tom. xii., Venet. 764, pp. 73-155. See A. i. SOURCES.—This Gospel is entitled in Tischendorf's corrected Latin version (Evang. Apocr. pp. 181-209), Evangelium Infantiæ Salvatoris Arabicum. The Arabic text is a translation from the Syriac. The work is a compilation. The author refers to 'the book of Joseph, the high priest' (c. 1), to 'the Gospel of the Infancy,' and to 'the perfect Gospel' (c. 25), and concludes: 'Here endeth the whole Gospel of the Infancy, with the aid of God Most High, according to what we have found in the original.' For the first part of this Gospel (1–25) the compiler claims the authority of Joseph Caiaphas, whose book Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 705) identifies with 'the Gnostic work made use of in the Protevangelium, and which bore the name of Joseph (not Caiaphas, of course, but the husband of Mary)'; the earlier portions of his narrative are to a large extent parallel to the Protevangelium and to the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew; but he also draws largely on 'the perfect Gospel,' though he records 'very many miracles' of the Lord Jesus which are not found either in it or in less 'complete' Gospels of the Infancy. In the second part (26–55) his chief source is the Gospel according to Thomas.

ii. CONTENTS.—This Gospel begins by quoting a word of Jesus spoken, when He was lying in His cradle, to Mary His mother: 'I am Jesus, the Son of God, the Logos, whom thou hast brought forth.' Miracles are narrated for which no parallel can be found either in the canonical Gospels or in the apocryphal writings, as, e.g., the Lady Mary gives to the kings from the East one of her child's swaddling-bands, which 'the fire was not able to burn or destroy' (8); a demoniac boy, the son of an Egyptian priest, is healed by putting upon his head a newly washed garment of the Lord Christ (11); the water in which Mary washes Jesus cleanses from leprosy (17); by witchcraft a youth has been transformed into a mule; Mary puts Jesus on the mule's back and asks Him to exert His mighty power, whereupon the animal 'became a young man, free from every defect' (21); the Holy Family fall into the hands of two robbers, Titus and Dumachus; Titus bribes Dumachus to let them go free, and Jesus tells His mother that in thirty years 'these two robbers will be raised upon the cross along with me, Titus on my right hand and Dumachus on my left; and after that day Titus shall go before me into Paradise' (23); at the age of twelve, Jesus discourses in the temple to astronomers on the heavenly bodies, 'their course, direct and retrograde, the twenty-fourths and sixtieths of twenty-fourths, and other things beyond the reach of reason' (51); also to a philosopher 'skilled in treating of natural science' He explains 'physics and metaphysics, hyperphysics and hypophysics . . . and other things beyond the reach of any created intellect' (52); 'from this day' (i.e. from His twelfth year) 'he began to hide his miracles and mysteries and secrets, and to give attention to the law, until he completed his thirtieth year' (54).

iii. CHARACTERISTICS.—The extracts given from this Gospel prove that its author not only drew largely from his sources, canonical and apocryphal, but also allowed his imagination free play, with the result that his work is a strange conglomerate of authentic Evangelic tradition and the most fantastic legends. In one respect alone does it compare favourably with the apocryphal Gospels it most closely resembles; from its fabulous stories there is an absence of miracles of vengeance such as are found in the Gospel according to Thomas and the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew. There are many traces of the influence of Gnosticism in this Gospel, but it also contains a clear recognition of the humanity of Jesus: the mother of a dying boy who is healed by 'the smell of the clothes of the Lord Jesus Christ' says to Mary: 'Now I know that the power of God dwelleth in thee, so that thy Son heals those that partake of the same nature with himself' (30). The central section of this work has been aptly described as 'thoroughly Oriental in its character, reminding one of the tales of the Arabian Nights, or of the episodes in the Golden Ass of Apuleius' (Walker, Apocr. Gospels, x.).

No definite date for the composition of this Gospel can be fixed. Lipsius is content to say that it was compiled 'comparatively late, but probably earlier than the Mahometan times.'

B. 4. JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, ARABIC HISTORY OF.—

i. Sources.
ii. Contents.
iii. Characteristics. Date.
Literature.

i. SOURCES.—This Gospel is entitled in Tischendorf's Latin version (Evang. Apocr. pp. 122–139), Historia Josephi Fabri Lignarii; his edition takes note of variations in the Sahidic and Memphitic dialects of the Coptic, from which language the Arabic text was a recension. The author relates briefly the life of Joseph, and at greater length his death and burial; he also represents Jesus as uttering lengthy and rhapsodical lamentations. For the greater part of his narrative there is no parallel in other writings, but in the sections which describe the choice of Joseph to be the guardian of Mary, his betrothal to her, Herod's search for the children, and the flight into Egypt, the author is in close agreement with the Protevangelium. If he used it as a source, he omitted the portents which it describes as accompanying these events; it is more probable, however, that his source was the earlier Jewish-Christian tradition, for the rest of his work does not suggest that Gnostic embellishments would have been distasteful to him. There are more distinct traces of his dependence upon the Gospel according to Thomas in the account given of Joseph's perplexity and the words of the angel (17); Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 706) adds that in the Coptic recension 'the use made of the Gospel of Thomas is still more evident.'

ii. CONTENTS.—In the introduction to this history the author states that it was related by our Lord to His disciples on the Mount of Olives. The speaker throughout is Jesus, who says of His mother: 'I chose her of my own will, with the concurrence of my Father, and the counsel of the Holy Spirit. And I was made flesh of her, by a mystery which transcends the grasp of created reason' (5), a mystery which 'no creature can penetrate or understand, except myself, and my Father, and the Holy Spirit, constituting one essence with myself' (14).* Joseph before his death asks Jesus for pardon (17); Jesus sees Death and Gehenna approaching: 'accordingly I drove back Death and all the host of servants which accompanied him' (21); when Joseph died, 'he had fulfilled a hundred and eleven years; never did a tooth in his mouth hurt him, nor was his eyesight rendered less sharp' (29); of Joseph's body Jesus says: 'Not a single limb of it shall be broken, nor shall any hair of thy head be changed. Nothing of thy body shall perish, O my father Joseph, but it will remain entire and uncorrupted even until the banquet of the thousand years' (26).

iii. CHARACTERISTICS.—The motive of this history is revealed in words spoken by the Apostles to Jesus: 'Thou hast ordered us to go into all the world and preach the holy gospel; and thou hast said: Relate to them the death of my father Joseph, and celebrate to him with annual solemnity a festival and sacred day. And whosoever shall take anything away from this narrative, or add anything to it, commits sin' (30). There is another reference to the day of Joseph's commemoration (26); the work is doubtless, as Lipsius suggests, 'a festal lection for St. Joseph's day.'

The words of Jesus to Mary, 'Thou, O my virgin mother, must look for the same end of life as other mortals,' point to a date of composition earlier than the 5th cent., when the Assumption of Mary was taught. Tischendorf decides for the 4th century.

i. VERSIONS.—Tischendorf published in his Apocalypses Apocryphæ the Greek text of a work sometimes described as the Evangelium Joannis; its full title is, The Account of St. John the Theologian of the Falling Asleep of the Holy Mother of God. Two Latin versions are printed by Tischendorf, and the writing is generally known as the Transitus Mariæ or The Departure of Mary. Wright has edited three recensions of a Syriac text. Arabic, Sahidic, and Ethiopic versions are also extant. Lipsius finds the nearest approximation to the original text in the Greek and in the Syriac versions known as B and C. Syriac B was edited by Wright (Journal of Sacred Literature, 1865), and Syriac C is published in his Contributions to the Apocr. Lit. of the NT, pp. 24–41. Walker's translation of the Greek text is used in the following section ('Ante-Nicene Christian Library,' Apocryphal Gospels, etc. p. 504 ff.).

ii. SUMMARY OF CONTENTS.—'The all-holy glorious mother of God and ever-virgin Mary' goes to 'the holy tomb of our Lord' to burn incense and to pray. She is invisible to the guards. Gabriel informs her that her request is granted: 'thou having left the world, shalt go to the heavenly places to thy Son, into the true and everlasting life.'

Mary and her three virgins return to holy Bethlehem; in answer to her prayers the Apostles are summoned to her deathbed. John is 'snatched up by a cloud from Ephesus' and assures Mary that her 'holy and precious body will by no means see corruption.' By a whirlwind the Holy Spirit brings 'Peter from Rome, Paul from Tiberias, Thomas from Hither India, James from Jerusalem.' The Apostles who have fallen asleep are raised from their tombs, but the Holy Spirit says: 'Do not think that it is now the resurrection; but on this account you have risen out of your tombs, that you may go to give greeting to the honour and wonder-working of the mother of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, because the day of her departure is at hand, of her going up into the heavens.'

Mary, sitting up in bed, asks the Apostles to tell her how they had been summoned. John says, 'I was going in to the holy altar in Ephesus to perform Divine service'; Mark says, 'I was finishing the canon of the third [day] in the city of Alexandria'; Matthew says, 'I was in a boat and overtaken by a storm, the sea raging with its waves; on a sudden a cloud of light overshadowing a stormy billow, changed it to a calm, and having snatched me up, set me down beside you.' Similar experiences are narrated by the other Apostles.

Marvels accompany Mary's departure: the sun and the moon suddenly appear about the house; all who are 'under disease and sickness' are cured, if they touch 'the outside of the wall of the house' where Mary was lying. The Jews, 'boiling with rage,' say to the Procurator, 'The nation of the Jews has been ruined by this woman; chase her from Bethlehem and the province of Jerusalem.' The Procurator refuses, but yields to importunity and 'sends a tribune of soldiers against the Apostles to Bethlehem.' The Apostles leave the house 'carrying the bed of the Lady, the mother of God'; they are 'lifted up by a cloud' and transported to 'the house of the Lady' in Jerusalem. The priests and the people 'being the more moved with hatred' take the wood and fire, 'wishing to burn the house where the Lord's mother was living with the Apostles'; but many Jews are burnt up by 'a power of fire suddenly coming forth from within by means of an angel.'

The Holy Spirit reminds the Apostles that 'on the Lord's day' Gabriel made the Annunciation to the Virgin; 'on the Lord's day' the Saviour was born; 'on the Lord's day' the children of Jerusalem welcomed Him with palm-branches and Hosannas; 'on the Lord's day' He rose from the dead; and 'on the Lord's day' He will come to judgment. 'On the Lord's day' Christ comes with a host of angels and says to His mother, 'Thy precious body will be transferred to Paradise.' Mary kisses and adores the right hand of the Lord; she beseeches Him as 'God, the King of the Ages, the only-begotten of the Father,' to bestow His aid 'upon every man calling upon, or praying to, or naming the name of, thine handmaid.' The Lord replies, 'Every soul that calls upon thy name shall not be ashamed, but shall find mercy, and comfort, and support, and confidence, both in the world that now is, and in that which is to come, in the presence of my Father in the heavens.'

Whilst the Apostles sing a hymn, and the powers of the heavens respond with Alleluia, the blameless soul of Mary departs. When Jephonias puts his hands upon the couch on which her holy body lies, 'an angel of the Lord by invisible power, with a sword of fire, cut off his two hands from his shoulders, and made them hang about the couch, lifted up in the air.' At the word of Peter the hands are 'fixed on again.'

Different accounts are given of the transference of Mary's 'spotless and precious body' to Paradise. One describes the translation as taking place after the body had lain for three days in Gethsemane in a new tomb; another represents 'twelve clouds of light' as snatching up the Apostles with the couch and 'the body of our Lady' into Paradise; and another narrates the miraculous resuscitation of the Virgin's body. 'Anna, the mother of the Lady,' is one of the heavenly choir that sing the Alleluia and adore 'the holy relics of the mother of the Lord.'

iii. CHARACTERISTICS AND DATE. — Although, as Lipsius points out (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 707), 'a comparison of the various texts proves that the original narrative was now abbreviated and now enlarged in manifold ways with all manner of foreign additions and strange ornaments,' yet, in all the various forms in which this work is extant, the Departure of Mary (κοίμησις τῆς Μαρίας, Transitus Mariæ) contains many evidences of a desire to furnish Apostolic sanction for Mary-worship of an advanced type. Traces of the Protevangelium Jacobi and of Gnostic apocryphal writings are found in some texts, but the narrative common to all versions is undoubtedly 'a Catholicizing recast of an heretical work.' Such phrases as 'the holy altar,' 'the canon of the third day,' i.e. a part of the Church service consisting of nine odes, 'cast incense and pray,' are internal evidence of a Catholic development of ecclesiastical ritual. Lipsius says: 'The Catholic recast plainly belongs to a time when the worship of the Virgin is already flourishing, i.e. at the earliest, the close of the 4th, and most probably the beginning of the 5th century.' Proof of the wide circulation of this work is afforded by the number of extant versions of it; in Catholic circles it has had great influence. Orr and Wright quote with well-merited approval the judgment of Ewald: 'This book has become from the first the firm foundation for all the unhappy adoration of Mary, and for a hundred superstitious things, which have intruded with less and less resistance into the Churches, and have contributed so much to the degeneration and to the crippling of all better Christianity.'

i. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—1. A Gospel entitled τὸ ἐπιγεγραμμένον τῶν δώδεκα εὐαγγέλιον (Jerome: 'juxta XII apostolos' and 'Evang. XII apostolorum') is placed by Origen (c. 230) amongst the heretical Gospels (Hom. 1 in Lucam). But Origen esteemed highly 'the Gospel according to the Hebrews,' which Jerome (417) confuses with 'the Gospel according to the Apostles' (adv. Pelag. iii. 2). Of modern scholars who accept Jerome's identification of the two Gospels, the most distinguished are Resch (Agrapha, p. 327) and Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 710 f.). Zahn (Geschichte des NT Kanons, ii. 662, 724) and Harnack (Chronologie, i. 629) discuss the question in detail, and agree in the conclusion that Jerome misunderstood Origen, from whom all his information about this Gospel was derived (see art. HEBREWS [GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE] above, p. 338 ff.). Lipsius considerably modifies his acceptance of Jerome's statement by his confession: 'One thing is certain, that at various times and in different circles it took very different shapes'; he frankly recognizes the existence of 'contradictory phenomena,' and suggests that the Gospel known to these Fathers was 'a recast of an older original' (op. cit. ii. 711).

2. By those who regard this Gospel as an independent work it is often called 'The Gospel of the Ebionites.' In their view the Ebionites who composed and used it were not Jewish Christians who observed the Mosaic law, though to them the name was first given (Orig. adv. Cels. ii. 1); they were the heretical sect of Ebionites, more correctly described as Elkesaites, and characterized by 'an abhorrence of sacrifice and by an objection to the use of flesh meat' (cf. Salmon, Introd. to NT, p. 159 f.). Owing to the ambiguity in the meaning of 'Ebionites,' conflicting interpretations are given to the statement of Jerome (398) that the Gospel, of which he speaks indifferently as 'according to the Hebrews' or 'according to the Apostles,' was used 'by the Nazarenes and by the Ebionites' (Comm. in Matt. 12^{13}). If he means orthodox Jewish Christians, he is 'guilty of a confusion, and adds the Ebionites to the Nazarenes, though the two were identical' (Menzies, above, p. 339^{b}); if, however, he means Elkesaites, his original mistake in identifying two different Gospels may account for his mentioning together the two parties by whom the two Gospels were respectively used.

Epiphanius (377) was acquainted with a Gospel which the Ebionites called 'the Gospel according to Matthew, not entire and perfectly complete, but falsified and mutilated (οὐχ ὅλῳ δὲ πληρεστάτῳ, ἀλλὰ νενοθευμένῳ καὶ ἠκρωτηριασμένῳ), which they call the Hebrew Gospel' (Hær. xxx. 13). The last sentence has no weight, for Epiphanius also says that Tatian's Diatessaron was called the Hebrew Gospel (op. cit. xlvi. 2); the value of his statement consists in its correct description of the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, of which he alone has preserved fragments, neither lengthy nor numerous, but sufficiently extensive to prove that the author of this Gospel used Matthew's narratives or his source, mutilating it, and falsifying it by additions which have an Elkesaite tinge.

ii. CONTENTS.—The extant fragments of this Gospel are found in one of the writings of Epiphanius (Hær. xxx. 13-16, 22). Zahn gives the Greek text (Geschichte des NT Kanons, ii. 725) of all the passages that in his judgment are quotations. (Cf. Preuschen, Antilegomena, 9 ff.; also Westcott, Introd. to Study of Gospels, 465 ff.).—

1. 'The beginning of their Gospel is this: It came to pass in the days of Herod, king of Judæa (in the high priesthood of Caiaphas), that a man called John came baptizing with a baptism of repentance in the river Jordan, who was said to be of the race of Aaron the priest, a son of Zacharias and Elisabeth; and all went out to him' (cf. Mt 3^1, Lk 1^{13}).

2. 'There arose a man called Jesus, and he was about thirty years old, who chose us. And when he came to Capernaum he entered the house of Simon who was surnamed Peter, and opened his mouth and said: As I passed along the Lake of Tiberias I chose John and James, sons of Zebedee, and Simon and Andrew and Thaddæus and Simon Zelotes and Judas Iscariot; and thee Matthew I called as thou wast sitting at the receipt of custom, and thou followedst me. Therefore, I wish you to be twelve Apostles, for a testimony unto Israel' (cf. Mt $4^{12f.\ 18ff.}$ $9^{9f.}$, Lk 3^{23}).

3. 'And John arose baptizing; and Pharisees went out to him and were baptized, and all Jerusalem. And John had raiment of camels' hair, and a girdle of skin about his loins; and his food (the Gospel says) was wild honey, the taste of which was the taste of manna, like a honey cake steeped in oil' (cf. Mt $3^{7ff.}$).

4. 'When the people were baptized, Jesus also came and was baptized by John. And as he came up from the water, the heavens were opened, and he saw the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove, which came down and came upon him. And a voice came from heaven, saying: Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased. And again: To-day have I begotten thee. And immediately a great light shone round about the place; and John, when he saw it (the Gospel narrates), says to him: Who art thou, Lord? And again a voice came from heaven to him [John]: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And then (the Gospel says) John fell down before him and said: I beseech thee, Lord, do thou baptize me. But he forbade him, saying, Suffer it, for thus it is becoming that all be fulfilled' (cf. Mt $3^{13ff.}$).

5. 'I came to put an end to sacrifices, and unless ye cease from sacrificing, [God's] anger will not cease from you.'

6. = Mt 12^{47-50}; the last verse reads: 'They who do the will of my Father are my brethren and mother and sisters.'

7. 'Have I earnestly desired to eat this flesh, the Passover, with you?' (cf. Lk 22^{15}).

Westcott adds—

8. 'They say, according to their absurd argument: It is sufficient for the disciple to be as his Master' (cf. Mt 10^{25}).

iii. CHARACTER AND TENDENCIES.—The foregoing extracts furnish the material upon which any judgment as to the characteristics of this Gospel must be based. Its verbal agreements with the canonical Gospels are evident; references to parallel passages in the Synoptics might have been multiplied. Zahn inclines to the view that its author made use of all four Gospels (Geschichte des NT Kanons, ii. 732 f.), though he grants that dependence on the Fourth is doubtful. The use of the Johannine designation 'Lake of Tiberias' is noted, and the unique position of John at the head of the list of the Apostles. The most striking parallels with Luke occur in extracts 1 and 7. It is certain that the writer had access either to the Synoptic Gospels or to their sources; but it is also evident that he has altered the meaning of some passages and made additions to others. His heretical tendencies appear in 5, which gives expression to the Elkesaite abhorrence of sacrifices; in 7, which disparages the Passover by adding the word 'flesh' and by turning our Lord's statement into a question to which a negative answer is implied. The vegetarian practices of the sect account for the omission in 3 of 'locusts' from the Baptist's food; the comment of Epiphanius on this passage is instructive, and his play on words shows that he was using a Greek and not a Hebrew text of Matthew: 'that they may convert the word of truth into a lie, and put honey-cakes (ἐγκρίδας) for locusts' (ἀκρίδας). It is plain from 1 that this Gospel had no narrative of the birth of Jesus and no genealogy; but these omissions may not have any significance, for the story of the virgin-birth was accepted by some Gnostic Ebionites, and the resemblance to Mk 1^1 is obvious. The account of the baptism of Jesus should be compared with the corresponding narrative in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Nos. 3 and 4. See HEBREWS [GOSPEL ACCORDING TO], above, p. 341b); the different traditions embodied in the two Gospels supply a strong argument for their distinctness. This section also shows that the author did not always make skilful use of his sources; the statement that Jesus forbade John is irrelevant, and inconsistent with the context. Only eight Apostles are mentioned in 2, but the emphatic reference to 'the Twelve' in the immediate context imparts probability to the suggestion that the omission of four names is due rather to a scribe's error than to the author's carelessness.

The examination of the contents of the extant fragments of this Gospel yields slight evidence for its dependence upon the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and brings to light differences in the parallel narratives which point to the use of different sources. The facts have a satisfactory explanation, if the Gospel is a distinct work compiled to some extent from good material by an author who did not scruple to modify the Evangelic tradition, and to introduce spurious details in order to adapt his work to the principles and practices of a heretical Ebionite sect. The inconsistencies presented by the extant passages of this Gospel are so marked as to lead Westcott to contemplate the possibility that the information of Epiphanius may have been 'derived from different sources'; but he does not exclude the alternative and, on the whole, more probable view that the incongruous elements 'had been incorporated in the Gospel in the time of Epiphanius' (Introd. to Study of Gospels, p. 466).[*]

Zahn assigns an early date to this Gospel (170), but his argument is not convincing. He supposes Clement of Alexandria (c. 190) to refer to it when he says that 'the Lord announced in some Gospel or other: My mystery is for me and for the sons of my house' (Strom. v. 10, 64). The ultimate source of this saying is the LXX rendering of Is 24^{16}; but in what apocryphal Gospel Clement found his version of the passage it is hazardous to affirm. This Gospel was known to Origen, and it reflects a Gnostic form of Ebionite teaching; the latter part of the 2nd or the early part of the 3rd cent. is the probable date of its composition.

C. 2. PHILIP, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—

i. Evidence of existence.
ii. Contents of extant Fragment.
iii. Characteristics. Date.

i. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—The Coptic-Gnostic work known as Pistis Sophia testifies to the existence, in the second half of the 3rd cent., of a Gospel ascribed to Philip. This Apostle is represented as having written in a book the mysteries which the risen Lord revealed to His disciples: 'Et quum Jesus finisset dicere hæc verba, exsiliens Philippus stetit, deposuit librum, qui in sua manu, iste γὰρ est, qui scribit res omnes, quas Jesus dixit et quas fecit omnes' (see Harnack, Christliche Urlitteratur, i. 14, where the whole passage is quoted). Epiphanius (377) knew that the Gnostic heretics, against whom he wrote, used a Gospel which bore Philip's name (εἰς ὄνομα Φιλίππου τοῦ ἁγίου μαθητοῦ εὐαγγέλιον πεπλασμένον). He quotes from it the passage given below. Leontius of Byzantium (d. 543) states that the Manichæans had composed a Gospel of Philip; but that he is referring to the work known to Epiphanius cannot be affirmed (de Sectis, iii. 1).

ii. CONTENTS OF EXTANT FRAGMENT.—The passage quoted by Epiphanius (Hær. xxvi. 13) from this Gospel is thus translated by Lipsius (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 716): 'The Lord revealed to me what the soul ought to say when she mounts to heaven, and what answer she should give to the higher powers: "I have known myself and gathered myself together, and begotten no children for the Archon of this world, but have torn up his roots, and gathered the scattered members; and I know thee and who thou art! for I also am descended from the upper world."'

[*] The quotations given by Epiphanius from this Gospel have been compared by J. Rendel Harris with the contents of a Syriac MS edited by him. In his judgment the Syriac work is an extract from an adaptation of an earlier lost Gospel, and not a version of the Gnostic Gospel of the Twelve Apostles (The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, etc., edited from the Syriac MS, Camb. 1900).

iii. CHARACTERISTICS.—The Fragment has a few points of contact with the Fourth Gospel, but the resemblances are too slight to prove dependence (cf. Jn 11^{52} 8^{23}). The ascetic and Gnostic tendencies of the work are both manifested in the single sentence, 'I have begotten no children for the Archon of this world.' Lipsius notes that this brief extract also dwells on a favourite theme of Gnostic writings, viz. 'The prayers of the departing soul as she passes through the various heavens' (op. cit. 716).

Zahn (Geschichte des NT Kanons, ii. 767) thinks it probable that Clement of Alexandria (c. 190) had the authority of this Gospel for his assertion that it was Philip to whom our Lord said, 'Leave the dead to bury their own dead,' etc. (Lk 9^{60}). Whence Clement derived this tradition cannot now be determined, but the conjecture cannot be accepted as evidence for an early date. Harnack decides for the end of the 2nd or the first half of the 3rd cent., and bases his argument on the nature of the Gnosticism which the extant Fragments of this Gospel reflect.

C. 3. MATTHIAS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—

i. Evidence of existence.
ii. Conjectural identifications.
iii. Supposed contents.
iv. Origin and date.

i. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—Origen (c. 246) mentions a Gospel κατὰ Ματθίαν (Hom. 1 in Luc.), and Eusebius (c. 324) places it, together with the Gospels according to Peter and to Thomas, in his list of 'heretical' writings (HE iii. 25). The name of this Gospel is also found in later lists of apocryphal works, but no writer who uses this title gives any quotation from the Gospel.

ii. CONJECTURAL IDENTIFICATIONS.—Hippolytus (155–235) states that the Basilidians appealed to 'secret discourses' which had been communicated to them by Matthias, who had been privileged to receive private instructions from our Lord: 'φασὶν εἰρηκέναι Ματθίαν αὐτοῖς λόγους ἀποκρύφους, οὓς ἤκουσε παρὰ τοῦ σωτῆρος κατ' ἰδίαν διδαχθεὶς' (Philos. vii. 20). If from other sources the contents of this Gospel were known, it might be possible to identify it with these ἀπόκρυφοι λόγοι, but the reference is not of necessity to a 'writing' (Lipsius, Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 716); and it would be satisfactorily explained if the Gospel of Basilides, mentioned by Origen (tract. 26 in Matt. 33, 34), claimed for the teaching of his school the authority of Matthias. The name of one who was not chosen to be an Apostle during the life of Jesus would naturally suggest itself to a Gnostic writer who knew that the only way to trace his doctrine to our Lord was to invent the fiction of secret teaching given to an Apostle in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension.

Clement of Alexandria (175–200) quotes three passages from the 'Traditions of Matthias' (Παραδόσεις Ματθίου). The three quotations given below are respectively introduced by the following formulæ: 'Matthias exhorting in the "Traditions" says'; 'They say that Matthias also taught thus'; 'They say in the "Traditions" that Matthias, the Apostle, constantly said.' Clement refers to the work known as the 'Traditions of Matthias' with respect. In the first passage he mentions it between Plato's Theætetus and the Gospel to the Hebrews; in the second passage he quotes its teaching immediately after a reference to our Lord's saying about the impossibility of serving 'two masters,' these being, in his view, 'pleasure and God.' Lipsius and Zahn identify this work with the Gospel according to Matthias mentioned by Origen. Lipsius allows that the identification is a conjecture; Zahn enters into a detailed argument in support of the suggestion (Geschichte des NT Kanons, ii. 751 ff.). But Harnack's refutation of this theory is powerful and convincing. In the earlier part of his work (Christliche Urlitteratur, i. 18) he speaks with qualified approval of Zahn's arguments in favour of identification, and assigns to them a measure of probability; but his more mature judgment is that they are inconclusive (Chron. ii. 597). In the work known to Clement the speaker is not our Lord, but Matthias. Neither this fact nor the title 'Traditions' is favourable to the hypothesis that it was in reality a Gospel. Some of Zahn's reasoning is based upon conjectural emendations of the text; but, unless these subjective alterations are accepted, the authorities he quotes refer not to Matthias but to Matthew.

iii. SUPPOSED CONTENTS.—The passages quoted by Clement of Alexandria from the 'Traditions of Matthias' are given here because they have an interest of their own apart from their relation to the Gospel according to Matthias, of which it is probable that we know nothing but the name.

'Wonder at the things present, for that is the first step towards a knowledge of the things beyond' (Strom. ii. 9).

'The flesh must be fought and evil entreated, and its unbridled lust must in no wise be yielded to; but the soul must grow through faith and knowledge' (Strom. iii. 4).

'If the neighbour of an elect person sin, the elect one sinned. For if he had conducted himself as the word enjoins, his neighbour would have so reverenced his manner of life as not to sin' (Strom. vii. 13).

iv. ORIGIN AND DATE.—In accordance with the views already expressed, nothing can be said of the 'Gospel according to Matthias,' except that it was known to Origen in the early part of the 3rd century. The 'Traditions of Matthias' was quoted with respect by a Christian Father towards the close of the 2nd cent., and it appears to have been highly esteemed by Gnostics on account of its ascetic teaching, though in the extant fragments there is nothing extravagant. Harnack finds in the phrase 'as the word enjoins' (ὡς ὁ λόγος ὑπαγορεύει) the stamp of Greek philosophy; but this is by no means certain.

C. 4. BASILIDES, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.—

i. Evidence of existence.
ii. Character and contents. Date.

i. EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE.—Origen (c. 246) is the oldest and probably the sole authority for the statement that Basilides (c. 133), the founder of a Gnostic school in Egypt, 'had even the audacity (ἐτόλμησε) to write a Gospel κατὰ Βασιλίδην' (Hom. in Luc. 1). Later writers who express a similar judgment, but can scarcely be quoted as independent witnesses, are Ambrose (Exp. in Luc. 1) and Jerome, who includes a 'Gospel of Basilides' in his list of Apocryphal Gospels (Præf. in Matt.).

ii. CHARACTER AND CONTENTS.—More is known of Basilides' Exegetica, a commentary on 'the Gospel,' than of the Gospel which he is said to have written. Agrippa Castor, to whom Eusebius (HE iv. 7) refers as a 'most renowned writer,' who 'exposed the error' of Basilides, says that he 'wrote twenty-four books upon the Gospel' (εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον βιβλία). A more specific title (Ἐξηγητικὰ εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον) is given to this work by Clement of Alexandria (175–200), who quotes from the twenty-third book (Strom. iv. 12) a passage which treats of the relation of sin to suffering and martyrdom. Lipsius thinks that Basilides is endeavouring to base his Gnostic teaching on an exposition of Lk $21^{12ff.}$; but Zahn suggests Jn 9^{1-3}, to which the resemblances are closer (Geschichte des NT Kanons, i. 767; cf. McGiffert, Eusebius, p. 179, n. 12).

Another fragment from 'the thirteenth book of the treatises (tractàtuum) of Basilides' is preserved in the Acta disputationis Archelai et Manetis, c. 55 (see Galland, Bibl. Patr. iii. 608). This passage contains an exposition of the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16). Zahn traces to the Exegetica the Basilidian teaching about marriage in Clement (Strom. iii. 1), where the reference is clearly to Mt $19^{11.12}$. It is reasonable to assume that the 'Treatises' and 'Expositions' of Basilides are different titles for the same work. In regard to the number of the canonical Gospels upon which the Exegetica were based nothing can be positively asserted; but it is known that the schools of Valentinus and Basilides used the Gospels on which the extracts from this work are based. The Exegetica almost certainly includes John as well as Luke, probably Matthew also.

In regard to the relation of 'the Gospel' to the Exegetica different opinions are held. McGiffert (op. cit.) suggests that 'Origen mistook the Exegetica for a Gospel'; but it is necessary neither to ascribe this confusion to him, nor to suppose that he inferred the existence of an apocryphal Gospel from the variations from the text of the canonical Gospels in the passages upon which he comments. There is evidence that the followers of Basilides made use of the 'Traditions of Matthias' (Hippol. Philos. vii. 20), and that he claimed to have received instruction from 'Glaucias, the interpreter of Peter.' Herein may be found the explanation of his departures from the Evangelic tradition. There is nothing inherently improbable in the hypothesis, which seems best to account for all the facts, that in the interests of Gnostic doctrine Basilides wrote a Gospel and afterwards a commentary on it. His Gospel may be described, with Zahn, as 'a kind of Harmony'; but the sources from which his narrative was derived appear to have been used with considerable freedom.

The date of this Gospel and of the Exegetica is probably 130–140, the period when Basilides appeared as the founder of a sect.

D. Of the following Apocryphal Gospels little is known but their name. Use has been made of Hofmann's list, derived from Fabricius (in PRE^{3} i. 661)—

1. ANDREW, GOSPEL OF.—Possibly identical with the Gnostic 'Acts of Andrew' (περίοδοι Ἀνδρέου). Augustine refers to apocryphal writings of Andrew (c. Adversar. Leg. et Prophet. 20). See Lipsius, Die apokr. Apostelgeschichte, i. 543 f.

2. APELLES, GOSPEL OF.—Probably a mutilated version of a canonical Gospel by a disciple of Marcion. According to Epiphanius (Hær. xliv. 2) this work is the source of the familiar unwritten saying of our Lord: 'Become approved money-changers' (γίνεσθε δόκιμοι τραπεζῖται); see AGRAPHA, above, p. 349^b. Cf. Harnack, De Apellis gnosi monarchia, 1874, p. 75.

3. BARNABAS, GOSPEL OF.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree, but nothing is known of its contents unless fragments of it have been preserved in the Mohammedan Gospel of Barnabas. See White's Bampton Lectures, 1784, and Axon's article in Journal of Theol. Studies, April 1902, p. 441.

4. BARTHOLOMEW, GOSPEL OF.—Mentioned in the Gelasian Decree, and by Jerome (Præf. in Matt.), in surroundings which suggest that it was a Gnostic work. There is no sufficient reason for identifying this Gospel with the Hebrew Gospel according to Matthew, which Bartholomew is said to have taken to India (Eusebius, HE v. 10).

5. CERINTHUS, GOSPEL OF.—Mentioned by Epiphanius (Hær. li. 7). Hofmann thinks that this work was a mutilated version of the Gospel according to Matthew, similar to that which the Carpocratians used.

6. EVE, GOSPEL OF.—Mentioned by Epiphanius as in use among the Borborites, an Ophite sect of Gnostics (Hær. xxvi. 2 ff.). Harnack is doubtful if it can properly be called a Gospel. Lipsius describes it as a 'Gnostic doctrinal treatise, though presented, it may be, in an historical form' (Dict. Christ. Biog. ii. 717). Preuschen prints the extracts quoted by Epiphanius as a fragment of an Ophite Gospel (Antilegomena, p. 80). Jesus is represented as saying in a voice of thunder: 'I am thou, and thou art I, and wherever thou art there am I, and in all things I am sown. And from whencesoever thou gatherest me, in gathering me thou gatherest thyself' (cf. Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu, p. 56).

7. JUDAS ISCARIOT, GOSPEL OF.—According to the testimony of Irenæus (adv. Hær. i. 31), Epiphanius (Hær. xxxviii. 1), and Theodoret (Hæret. Fab. i. 15), this work was in use among the Cainites, a Gnostic sect. Lipsius says that it represents Judas's betrayal as 'a meritorious action, and the traitor himself as the perfect Gnostic who destroyed the dominion of the Demiurge by bringing about the crucifixion of our Lord.'

8. THADDÆUS, GOSPEL OF.—Mentioned in some MSS of the Gelasian Decree, but nothing is certainly known of its contents. The name of the author may be intended for the Apostle, or for one of the Seventy who, according to tradition, was sent to king Abgar (see art. THADDÆUS in vol. iv. p. 741 f.).

9. VALENTINUS, GOSPEL OF.—Mentioned by Tertullian (de Præscript. Hæret. c. 49), and usually identified with the 'Gospel of Truth' (Evangelium Veritatis) on the authority of Irenæus (adv. Hær. iii. 11), who says (1) that the 'Gospel of Truth' was used by the Valentinians, and (2) that it departed entirely from the canonical Gospels. Zahn holds that the two Gospels were probably separate works (Geschichte des NT Kanons, i. 748).

Literature.

Discovery in modern times.—The publication in 1883 of the early Christian manual popularly known as the Didache marks an epoch in the study of primitive Christianity. One might compare it to the rediscovery of the genuine Ignatian Epistles in the 17th century. But the comparison would do scant justice to its real significance, which lies in the way in which the Didache bears on a wide range of early writings, and on phenomena in them which it causes to stand out in new and clearer light. It is needful, then, to do more than consider the actual contents of our MS, written in 1056 by 'Leo, notary and sinner,' and discovered about 1875 in the library of the Jerusalem monastery in Phanar, the Greek quarter of Constantinople, by Philotheus Bryennios, a scholarly Greek ecclesiastic. One must also try to estimate the various literary and historical relations of the original work which the MS brings to our knowledge, and of which it remains the prime representative. In this MS, doubtless Palestinian in origin, it occupies 203 lines, of 53 letters on an average; so that it is about the size of St. Paul's letter to the Galatians. But in all probability the original work, with which we are mainly concerned, was slightly shorter. Accordingly, our inquiries will fall under three main heads, viz., (A) The primal Didache: its contents, genesis, date; (B) the transformations which it underwent in various circles; (C) its significance in the history of Christianity.

A. THE PRIMAL DIDACHE.—i. THE DIDACHE OF OUR MS.—(a) Title.—Of the two titles in the MS, 'Teaching of the XII Apostles' and 'Teaching of the Lord through the XII Apostles to the Gentiles,' it seems natural to regard the latter as the more original. One can hardly imagine the fuller and more individual title being added between the commoner one and the text proper. It is unlikely, however, that either of them belonged to the earliest form of the 'Teaching,' corresponding roughly to chaps. i.-vi. of our MS. This body of precepts touching the Two Ways may perhaps, in its oral stage, have had some descriptive title, such as 'the Way of the Teaching'* (see ταύτης τῆς ὁδοῦ τῆς διδαχῆς in vi. 1), or 'the Way'; or it may have been known simply as 'the Teaching' (see ἄλλην διδαχήν in xi. 2, cf. vi. 1; cf. Barn. xvi. 9 αἱ ἐντολαὶ τῆς διδαχῆς, also xviii. 1), or 'Teaching of the Lord' (perhaps preserved in our second title, Διδαχὴ Κυρίου, κ.τ.λ., cf. ἐντολαὶ Κυρίου, iv. 12 f.), the God of Israel (see παρεκτὸς θεοῦ, vi. 1). This would accord both with the contents of the original Two Ways and with the phrasing in Ac 13^{12} ἐκπληττόμενος ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ τοῦ Κυρίου, where reference has just been made to τὰς ὁδοὺς τοῦ Κυρίου τὰς εὐθείας (Hos 14^{10}). Here 'Teaching' has the objective sense of 'Doctrine.'

As Dr. C. Taylor† says, 'the primitive Church had, instead of a New Testament, a body of teaching, which was at first, from the nature of the case, wholly unwritten. To this St. Paul alludes when he lays down that a bishop must be blameless, "holding to the faithful word which is according to The Teaching" (Tit 1^9). Justin Martyr again expressly refers to it, speaking of Christ as attested "by the words of The Teaching, and the prophecies to Him ward" (Dial. 35). This teaching would sometimes be spoken of as the Lord's, and after a while as the Apostles' (2 Jn ^{9}, Ac 2^{42}), just as the Jews spoke of a Torah absolutely, and of a Torah of Moses, and of the Lord.' Certainly the way in which St. Paul refers to the 'type of teaching' (in relation to 'sin, unto death,' and 'obedience, unto righteousness') unto which the Roman Christians were 'committed' (Ro $6^{16f.}$), and which forbade the causing of division (διχοστασία, 16^{17}, cf. Did. iv. 3 οὐ ποιήσεις σχίσμα), is very suggestive of a recognized form of 'Teaching' to converts, on lines similar to those of our Two Ways. Still full proof is lacking that it was so styled.

Nor can we be sure of the title under which the Teaching was first written down. 'Teaching of the Apostles' (cf. Ac 2^{42}) is likely enough, especially if this was, as it appears, the earliest form in which it was known in Egypt. But, even were this more certain than it is, it would not necessarily be the original Palestinian form, which might be simply 'The Teaching' (like Didascalia, the title of a later Palestinian work suggested by our Didache). Still, the varied character of the witness to 'Teaching of the Apostles' rather supports this as the primitive title of the written Two Ways. Thus the Lat. version, the purest form of the Two Ways apart from our MS, has as its rubric de doctrina Apostolorum; so also Eusebius (HE iii. 25 τῶν ἀποστόλων αἱ λεγομέναι διδαχαί, which Rufinus renders Doctrina quæ dicitur Apostolorum), Athanasius (Festal Epistles, 39, διδαχὴ καλουμένη τῶν ἀπ.), and Nicephorus (διδαχὴ ἀποστόλων).

It looks, then, as if there were two distinct lines of transmission in the history of the Two Ways, of which the Latin and our MS are the types—a result borne out by textual criticism. The question of their mutual relations will be dealt with later on. Only, we may here observe that the phrase 'XII Apostles' is no less primitive than 'the Apostles' pure and simple. Thus in that part of the Ascension of Isaiah which represents a time prior to A.D. 100, it is 'the Twelve Apostles of the Beloved' who plant the Church (iv. 3); and it is 'the preaching (προφητεία) of his Twelve Apostles' that is forsaken by the mass of 'disciples' 'on the eve of His approach' (iii. 21). Hence the idea of 'the Lord's teaching through the Twelve Apostles to the Gentiles' is quite in keeping with an early date for the recension so described, especially if it belong to Palestine. And as it does not claim for its contents that they are the very words of the Apostles (cf. 'my child' in iii. 1–iv. 1), there is nothing pseudonymous about the work. It represents current teaching and usage at a time when it was natural to assume that these did but express the mind of 'the Lord'—which to the compiler of our Didache doubtless means, as in several other places (viii. 2, ix. 5, εἰς ὄνομα Κυρίου, xi. 2, 4, 8, xv. 4, xvi. 1, 7 f.), the glorified Christ.

(b) Contents and structure.—As it stands in our MS, the Didache has real organic unity. A natural development of thought is traceable throughout (save perhaps in one section near the beginning), as will appear from the following summary.

There are Two Ways in this world, one of Life and one of Death—so radically different are they. The Way of Life consists of love, (1) to God our Maker, (2) to one's neighbour as to oneself: this involves refraining from doing to another what one would not have done to oneself.

'Now of these words the Teaching is as follows':—

The Evangelical precepts which follow in our MS exemplify the thought of positive love to man, flowing from love to God. But the latter idea, the first element in the Great Commandment, is not formally developed. It is regarded as fulfilled in relation to man as God's image, whether in the fuller way represented by our MS, or up to the level of the negative form of the Golden Rule, which practically replaces the positive in the exposition or 'teaching' of the Way of Life in its original form (see below).

Then comes a section dealing with practical love to one's fellow in the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount, in which forgiveness of wrong and the relief of physical need by one's own goods are emphasized. In the latter case a warning to the recipient is appended, as to his final accountability to God, if he take save when in want; likewise he who has whereof to give is bidden to make sure that he finds a fit recipient.

† The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles: Two Lectures, p. 112.

The exposition of the negative form of the Golden Rule opens (ch. ii.) with the words, 'Now the second precept of the Teaching (is).' It consists of an expansion of the second table of the Decalogue, beginning, after Jewish usage, with 'Thou shalt not kill'; but it also inserts the Third Commandment against perjury, in close connexion with false witness. The expansion in question is in terms of vices to which paganism was specially addicted.

The incidence of pagan failings explains the reversal of the order as to homicide and adultery found in the Latin version. This change confirms the view that its text represents Alexandria rather than Palestine; Dt $5^{17f.}$ LXX, cf. JQR xv. 309 ff.

No mention is made of the Sabbath or of honour to parents. The former seems to be omitted intentionally; the latter may be taken for granted, or may be omitted because pagan parents must be disobeyed. Abstinence from idolatry is naturally assumed: thus in iii. 4, vi. 3, things are forbidden as leading to or implying idolatry. This section ends with what is its keynote—prohibition of all evil purpose or feeling against another. Indeed it goes further: 'Thou shalt not hate any man; but some thou shalt rebuke, and for some thou shalt pray, and some thou shalt love above thine own life.'

The next section (ch. iii.), which has a unity of its own as regards its first five or six precepts at any rate (indicated by the recurrence of 'my child'), passes to the subtler sort of sins, which lead on to the grosser kind already dealt with. It makes the moral ideal more searching and exhaustive. In Jewish phrase, 'it fences the Law': 'My child, flee from every evil, and from everything like unto it.' Its Jewish colour is very evident; and the cardinal sins to which others lead are homicide, adultery, idolatry, theft, blasphemy. In contrast to the haughty and self-assertive temper, to which the last of these is traced, there follows a series of exhortations to humility of spirit and conduct which have a more specifically Christian ring; and the section ends with an exhortation meekly to accept the dispensations of Providence as good (which may once have followed the last of the more Jewish precepts, in an oral body of catechesis for proselytes to Judaism).

An easy transition to the last class of duties (ch. iv.), those of life in the religious community and family in particular, is presented by the inculcation of reverential docility towards 'him who speaks the word of God'; 'for where the lordship is spoken, there is the Lord' (a truly Jewish maxim). And here follow precepts on consorting with 'the saints'; on the avoidance of disunion, partiality in judgment, a doubtful mind; on selfishness and beneficence—the latter marked by a cheerful spirit, in view of Divine recompense and of the brethren's fellowship in the greater goods of immortality; on parental discipline and the mutual relations of master and bond-servant (2–11). The whole ends with the summary precepts:[*] 'Thou shalt hate all hypocrisy and whatsoever is not pleasing to the Lord. Thou shalt not abandon the Lord's precepts, but shalt keep what thou didst receive, neither adding nor taking away. In meeting thou shalt openly confess thy transgressions (cf. Ja 5^{16}), and shalt not come to thy prayer with a bad conscience. This is the Way of Life.'

The Way of Death (ch. v.) is simply the opposite of all this, and takes the form of a List of Vices (§ 1 follows the order of chs. ii.–iii.), a common topic both in classical and Jewish literature.

In Judaism, indeed, there seems to have existed something like a standing list, to judge from the many points of contact between this list and those in the NT (e.g. Mk $7^{21f.}$, Ro $1^{29ff.}$, 1 Co $5^{10ff.}$, 2 Co 12^{20}, Gal $5^{19\cdot 21}$, Col 3^{5}, 1 Ti $1^{9f.}$, 2 Ti $3^{2ff.}$), on the one hand, and the traditional Confession of Sins in the Synagogue (Vidui), taken along with Wis $14^{22ff.}$, the Slavonic Enoch $10^{4f.}$, and Test. XII Patriarchs (Reuben 3, Levi 17), on the other: cf. Clem. Hom. i. 18, xi. 27, Recogn. iv. 36. Note the Jewish alphabetic number 22 in § 1: see Rendel Harris, Teaching, 82 ff.

Instruction in the 'Two Ways' ends (ch. vi.) in our MS with warning against deviation from 'this way of (the) Teaching' as deviation from God's truth. To which are added two postscripts: 'If, then, thou art able to bear the whole yoke of the Lord, thou shalt be perfect: but if thou art not able, what thou canst, that do. But touching food (βρῶσις), bear what thou art able; yet of that (food) which hath been offered to idols beware exceedingly; for it is a service of dead gods.'[*] The significance of these will be dealt with in the sequel.

Such was the Teaching[†] which should ring in the ears of the Gentile convert as he took upon himself the vows of Christian baptism. Of this, in a simple[‡] form, the manual now goes on to speak (ch. vii.). And as it refers to fasting as an accompaniment of baptism, it passes naturally to the stated Christian Fasts and Prayers (ch. viii.),—in each case as contrasted with those of 'the hypocrites' (i.e. unbelieving Jews). Next comes a description of the special Eucharistic prayers preceding and following the actual eating of the Church's sacred meal (lit. 'being filled'). A striking feature of both groups of prayers is their reference to the fulfilment of the feast, and of its imagery, in the consummated state of the Church in the kingdom of God. It is added, however, that the liturgical forms here given (chs. ix. x.) are not to bind 'prophets' in Eucharistic prayer.

At this point the manual pauses once more, to call attention to all that has gone before (ταῦτα πάντα τὰ προειρημένα) as the norm of true teaching on the matters in question, and the test of such as are to be received as teachers. 'If the teacher himself turn and teach another teaching to the undoing (of this), hear him not; but if to the increase of righteousness and knowledge of the Lord, receive him as the Lord' (xi. 2). And so we are led naturally to a description of the ministry of the Word, which is of the 'prophetic' or heaven-sent type. 'Apostles,' or divinely prompted missionaries,[§] are described quite briefly, as being rather exceptional visitants. They are first named in conjunction with the prophets,[‖] as persons provided for by 'the rule of the gospel' (κατὰ τὸ δόγμα τοῦ εὐαγγελίου); and then follow one or two rough and ready rules for their treatment, as they pass through existing churches on the way to their mission-fields (cf. 3 Jn $^{5-8}$). 'Prophets' occupy more space, probably as being a subject of more practical interest for those addressed. The need of tests, as between genuine and spurious claimants to the high authority and functions conceded to him who had the spirit of prophecy (a prime mark of the Messianic age, Ac $2^{17f.}$), was becoming acutely felt. But the simplicity of the tests here supplied—those of character merely, where the recognized phenomena of 'speaking in Spirit' were present—shows that the age of 'enthusiasm' is still far from over (cf. Jude $^{12.19}$, 2 P $2^{1f.13}$). As these two types of itinerant ministry are to be received according to certain rules, so the ordinary Christian stranger needs handling with prudence, including cases in which he wishes to settle among his new friends (ch. xii.). This in turn suggests the case in which even a prophet desires to settle in one community. His support is provided for by the principle that 'the labourer is worthy of his meat'; and this applies also to 'teachers,' a less spontaneous and more local type of the inspired ministry.* But it is the prophets, above all, who answer to the highest ministry under the OT; 'they are your chief priests' (esp. as offering the sacrifice of prayer at the Eucharist, x. 7, xiv. 1–3); and accordingly, to them, in the first instance, fall the first-fruits of various kinds (those specified are mainly country produce). Failing a prophet, first-fruits go to the poor (ch. xiii.).

[*] Probably part of the original framework of Jewish oral catechesis; cf. the re-emergence of 'my son' in the Latin version, which may here preserve an original touch.

[*] Wis 13^{10} 'But wretched they, and in dead (things) their hopes: for that they called "gods" the works of men's hands.'

[†] Compare the 'foundation of repentance from dead works and of faith towards God' in He 6^{1}, with its own further διδαχή attached.

[‡] Simpler originally than what now stands in Did. vii. 2–4; see below, iii. (d) ad fin.

[§] By this time called 'evangelists' in most regions outside Palestine; cf. Eph 4^{11}, 2 Ti 4^{5}, Ac 21^{8} (written for non-Palestinian readers), Euseb. HE iii. 37; yet see Rev 2^{2}.

[‖] An unworthy 'apostle' is called a 'pseudo-prophet' (xi. 5)

After this excursus on matters of Discipline in relation to brethren coming to the community from outside,—suggested, it seems, by the mention of prophets in connexion with the Eucharistic Meal,—the compiler turns again to the chief features of internal church order, and so to the Eucharist, the stated Breaking of Bread on the Lord's day,† to lay down the conditions of its 'pure' observance (ch. xiv.). This depends on prior confession of trespasses (cf. iv. 14) between those uniting in the sacred 'sacrifice' of praise in prayer. None may partake while out of harmony with his fellow;‡ so shall their sacrifice of prayer§ be that pointed to by Mal $1^{11.14}$. The thought of the Church's gathering on the Lord's day leads to mention of the local ministry, 'bishops' and 'deacons,' as those who, in a sense, share the sacred ministry (λειτουργία) primarily belonging to the ministers of the Word, prophets and teachers. Hence they are not to be looked down upon because their own special functions are of a humbler order, but are to rank as associates of their more gifted colleagues in the honour of the ministry (xv. 1, 2). With this apology for the administrative ministry, elected by the local community itself (and now assuming greater importance than in the past), the compiler returns to the thought of fraternal discipline, already alluded to in connexion with the Eucharist. He uses terms which imply that it was a matter of the Church itself, and not only of its bishops and deacons, and enjoins that it be dealt with 'as ye have it in the Gospel' (cf. Mt $18^{11ff.}$). This same Gospel standard‖ is to regulate their supplications (εὐχάς) and alms and all their actions (xv. 3, 4).

Finally, let them 'watch' in the interests of their 'life,' to be ready when the Lord comes. The last days may be very near, marked by abundance of pseudo-prophets and corrupters (already on the horizon, xi. 2) and by degeneration of the sheep. Then, as lawlessness increases, hatred shall go the length of persecution and treachery among the brethren, until there shall appear the world-deceiver as God's Son, with signs and wonders, and run a course of temporary triumph. Thus mankind shall be tested, and even many believers shall fail: 'but those who shall endure in their faith shall be saved by the curse* itself.' And then shall appear the signs of the truth; first, the sign of outspreading (the Crucified with outspread arms) in heaven;† next, the sign of a trumpet's voice; and third, resurrection of the dead—not of all, however, but, as it was said, 'the Lord shall come and all the saints with Him.' 'Then shall the world see the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven.'

ii. MATERIALS FOR COMPARATIVE CRITICISM.—In view of this summary most will agree with Harnack (Herzog's PRE^{3} i. 713) when he says: 'Even if we knew nothing of the document from separate tradition, were aware of no later recensions of it, and were not in a position to supply its sources, we should—apart from some passages in the first chapter, which, in any case, raise the suspicion of being later additions—have to acquiesce in the assumption of the integrity of the writing.' Perhaps this is to overlook one or two secondary features in chs. vii.–xvi., particularly ch. vii.; but, broadly speaking, it is true. When, however, we turn to the traces of the work in the ancient Church, and to certain related documents that have reached us, perplexities and complications arise on every hand. These we must now examine, yet without ignoring the unity in style and language, as well as in feeling, which marks our Didache as a whole.

(a) Textual witnesses: (1) Primary—

(α) A=Apostolical Constitutions, vii. 1–32. This embodies the whole of the Didache, almost as found in our MS—the Two Ways largely verbatim (1–21), the rest with more reserve; but throughout occur large additions meant to suit the taste of certain circles of Syrian Christians in the latter half of the 4th century. Its special value lies at once in the relative completeness of its use of our Didache, and in the fact that it belongs, broadly speaking, to the same region.

It opens with the reference made by 'the lawgiver Moses' to choice between the Ways of Life and Death (Dt 30^{19}), and having cited the words of 'the Lord Jesus,' 'No man can serve two masters,' continues: 'As in duty bound (ἀναγκαίως), we also, following the Teacher (διδασκάλῳ), Christ, . . . say that "Two Ways there are,"' etc. This rather points to knowledge of Διδαχὴ Κυρίου in the title, just as the opening of the Apost. Const. as a whole, πᾶσι τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν πιστεύσασιν, points to τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. As to the Twelve Apostles, this is found in the title of the Didascalia (see below), the basis of Apost. Const. i.–vi., which runs: 'The Didascalia, or the Catholic Teaching of the Twelve Apostles and holy disciples of our Saviour.'

(β) B=Epistle of Barnabas. In chs. xviii.–xx. it quotes the bulk of the Two Ways as found in Did. i.–v., but in a very different order and with some textual variation (partly due to freedom of citation, partly, perhaps, also to original textual differences). There are slight echoes of the Two Ways in other parts of the Epistle, as also a rather close parallel in iv. 9, 10 to Did. xvi. 2. The great value of the Epistle of Barnabas is that it supplies an early date (see below, iii. (b)) in the literary history of the Didache.

(γ) CO=Apostolic Church Ordinances, 1–14. This compilation of about A.D. 300‡ does for the Egyptian Church what Apost. Const. vii. does for the Syrian; it works up the local recension of the Didache into a form more accordant with current sentiment. This work (which exists in Greek, Coptic, and Syriac) is our chief witness for the textual transmission of the Two Ways in Egypt; for there is no proof that the Epistle of Barnabas was written in Alexandria, rather than to it. Thus it is by the aid of CO that we are able to recognize the next document as a witness to the Egyptian type of text. But CO has one or two features due to the Epistle of Barnabas also.

† Mt 24^{30} 'the sign of the Son of Man in heaven' (so Apost. Const. vii. 32).

‡ The shorter recension found in Cod. Ottob. and two other MSS (see T. Schermann, Eine Elfapostelmoral, München, 1903) may be rather earlier.

(δ) L=The Latin version. Until recently this was known only in a fragment (Cod. Mellicensis), ending with Did. ii. 6^a. But in 1900 it was published by J. Schlecht from a complete 11th cent. MS, now at Munich, and extending to vi. 1, after which come two or three concluding paragraphs peculiar to itself (see below). This version probably belongs to the 4th cent. (cf. Schlecht, Die Apostellehre in der Liturgie der Kathol. Kirche, 67 f.), and its value is great in two directions. It tends to confirm the idea that the original Didache consisted of the Two Ways and nothing more; and it is a most important textual witness in conjunction with CO and Barnabas. As to L and what of CO answers to it, we may say in general that they represent the same type of text at different stages of deviation from its primal form. On the whole L is further from our MS, and this not only because of such liberties as are natural to a translator. Sometimes it or its Greek original omitted and transposed,[*] and sometimes adopted additional touches from Barnabas and Hermas, at least in the opening paragraph.

'Viæ duæ sunt in sæculo, vitæ et mortis, lucis et tenebrarum. In his constituti sunt angeli duo, unus æquitatis, alter iniquitatis.' Here the words in italics echo Barn. xviii., ἥ τε τοῦ φωτὸς καὶ ἡ τοῦ σκότους . . . ἐφ' ἧς μὲν γάρ εἰσι τεταγμένοι φωταγωγοὶ ἄγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ, ἐφ' ἧς δὲ ἄγγελοι τοῦ Σατανᾶ. L's deviation from B in describing the angels is due to Hermas, Mandates, vi. 2. 1, δύο εἰσὶν ἄγγελοι μετὰ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, εἷς τῆς δικαιοσύνης καὶ εἷς τῆς πονηρίας. In view of this, one must assign to Hermas, Mand. ii. 4, the addition to iv. 8 (rather mangled at the end) of 'Omnibus enim dominus dare vult de donis suis.'

As to its ending, L has special features which deserve attention. It runs as follows :—

(1) 'Abstine te, fili, ab istis omnibus, et vide ne quis te ab hac doctrina avocet, et si minus extra disciplinam doceberis. (2) Hæc in consulendo si cotidie feceris, prope eris vivo deo; quod si non feceris, longe eris a veritate. (3) Hæc omnia tibi in animo pone et non deciperis de spe tua [sed per hæc sancta certamina pervenies ad coronam per Dominum Jesum Christum regnantem et dominantem cum Deo Patre et Spiritu Sancto in sæcula sæculorum. Amen].'

Here we may safely set aside the words in brackets as late, and probably due to the translator. But it is otherwise with the rest. As to 1, the fact that the injunction to avoid the things of the Way of Death is separated from immediate connexion with that section, is probably a mistake; while 'doctrina' is secondary as compared with ὁδοῦ τῆς διδαχῆς, and 'extra disciplinam' as compared with παρεκτὸς θεοῦ. On the other hand, L seems to preserve the more original form in 'abstine te, fili,' the plural of our Didache being an adaptation to its fresh setting in the larger work. In 2 we may at present set aside 'in consulendo' as ambiguous (yet see below, iii. (b)). But the simple religious phrase 'prope eris vivo deo' looks at once primitive and Jewish in type; and the thought occurs that it is equivalent to 'thou shalt be a true proselyte.'[†] So Philo speaks of the proselyte as 'deserting to God' or 'to the Truth' (cf. Did. v. 2^a), which corresponds exactly to the terms of L's antithesis. If this view be correct, L probably preserves the original form of Jewish-Christian 'Teaching' to converts, while Did. vi. 2, 3 represents the fresh form given to this clause by the author of the fuller Didache, in terms of current Palestinian conditions at the time when he wrote. In this light, 3^a, with its reference to the believer's Hope, may also be original,[*] corresponding in function to the eschatological reference in Did. xvi.

(ε) Sch=The Life of Schnudi, an Egyptian monk of the Thebaid, who died about A.D. 451. Here we have in an Arabic version (ed. Iselin, Texte und Unters. XIII. i.) the bulk of the Two Ways, i.e. i.-iv. 8 (so CO) and traces of v., vi. 1.

(2) Secondary witnesses: containing textual evidence of a fragmentary or uncertain nature, like that of the Sibylline Oracles. The parallels in these, as in most of the writings here named, will be found in J. Rendel Harris' Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.—
